And here, Sir, I would ask the House to observe that of these three main principles of last year's Bill only one remains in this. And why is this fundamental recommendation of the Commission, this primary principle of last year's Bill, to be given up? Because it would involve some expense, and because it is alleged that it might lead to a want of uniformity in registerial decisions. As to the expense, an official witness—Mr. Malcolm—tells us, in a letter addressed to the Chairman of the Commission, that the country at present loses some £47,000 a-year in the shape of loss of interest incurred in fostering Friendly Societies under the present system. Now, if 40 or 50 local Assistant Registrars were appointed, as proposed by the right hon. Gentleman last year, and if each of them were paid as large a salary as that at present paid to the Assistant Registrars in Scotland and Ireland, the total cost to the country would not amount to more than a fraction of what is now spent uselessly, or worse than uselessly, in subsidizing these societies. As to the alleged want of uniformity of decisions under the present system, with the independent Registrars in Scotland and Ireland, we have experienced the evils of this want of uniformity, and we have examples of societies being registered in one part of the United Kingdom and refused registration in another. But how does the right hon. Gentleman propose to get over this difficulty? Not by abolishing the Registrars' offices in Scotland and Ireland, but by making them subordinate to the office in London—by granting an appeal to the Chief Registrar against the decision of the Assistant Registrars in Edinburgh and Dublin. What was there to hinder the adoption of the same method of securing uniformity of decisions had the number of subordinate registration centres, instead of three, been 40 or 50, as the right hon. Gentleman recommended a year ago? In point of fact, in that Bill the local registrars and the clerks of the peace who were to discharge their duties were effectually controlled from the central office. Nay, the very object of the central control which the Commissioners insisted on was to ensure this uniformity of action. For as the Report points out (Par. 871), three systems of registration for Friendly Society purposes have been tried by this country; two have already been discarded as failures, and they were about to discard the third as a failure also.

"The only system," they tell us (Par. 872), "which the history of the movement shows us not to have been tried is precisely the one to which the facts of the present time point as a remedy—a local machinery under central control; and we take note of this circumstance," they add, "with a view to the recommendation which we are about to submit."

Now, it is important that hon. Members should distinctly understand that the duties assigned to the Assistant Registrars and clerks of the peace under the Bill of last year were not merely to register documents, but to exercise such functions conferred by the measure upon the Chief Registrar as that official might choose to delegate, and generally, as the Bill expressed it—

"to act and assist in carrying out this present Act, as by regulations to be made under the same shall be from time to time determined." "Surely," again, to quote the words of the Commission, "in the presence of the enormous development of the Friendly Society movement, a purely central machinery must break down."

"Obviously," to use the expression of the right hon. Baronet himself, "we must abandon the old system of a central authority." And yet, in the face of such emphatic testimony as to the uselessness of this purely central organization, the right hon. Baronet now proposes to dispense with that machinery which was demanded as the first condition of successful legislation. Can it be that there is any chance that the present registration system could overtake any portion of the additional work which it is proposed to impose upon it? In the light of the Report of the Commissioners, in the light of last Session's explanation by the right hon. Baronet, I say, emphatically, no. Look at the extent to which it has failed in carrying out the objects for which it now exists, and which are very much less elaborate and extensive than those proposed to be committed to its care. Why, Sir, once more to quote the authority of the Commissioners, it has broken down to the extent of having failed to bring two-thirds of the existing Friendly Societies up to the point of affording to the public the two most elementary and indisputable data as to their condition. It has broken down even in its dealings with registered Friendly Societies to the extent of having failed to bring half of these up to this simplest standard of legal requirement. I am aware that under the measure now before the House, the Registrar will be entrusted with a certain increase of power; but the Commissioners not only contemplated this, but they and the right hon. Gentleman contemplated also, as the basis of any satisfactory legislation on the subject, the establishment of a system of local registration under his control. For they knew that though they might confer upon him additional statutory powers, unless they could also confer upon him the eyes of Argus and the hands of Briareus, he would be unable, whatever his statutory powers, by himself to carry out the programme which they desired to enforce. As I have shown you, the Government have not only abandoned the first principle of their Bill of last Session, but they have, while retaining the intention to carry it out, eliminated from it the second principle—namely, the publication of correct tables. I shall now proceed to show the House to what extent the adoption of this measure will assist in carrying out the third principle laid down by the right hon. Baronet—namely, "the encouragement, and, as far as possible, enforcement, of a system of periodical valuation." So far as this enforcement applies to registered societies, I should not join issue with the right hon. Gentleman. But it must be remembered that a large number of Friendly Societies, stated by the Commission at a third of the whole, are not registered. These unregistered societies are at present outside the pale of the law—they cannot sue or be sued. The English law affords them practically no protection against fraud and embezzlement on the part of their officials, and their members are powerless to enforce the performance of contracts of which they may have carried out their parts with a life-long pinching and scraping—contracts which it is assuredly not the interest of the State to discourage. Now, Sir, I maintain that the effect of this Bill, if it becomes law, will be to increase the number of unregistered societies at the expense of registered societies; that its effect, so far from raising the standard of Friendly Societies at large, will be to repress that tendency to improvement which is said to exist, and to drive out a number of institutions which at present enjoy the advantages of protection against fraud into the ranks of those Pariah societies which the law only recognizes that it may declare them free to plunder and be plundered with impunity. This is a bold proposition, and before asking the House to hear my argument in support of it, I shall show you that it is not a conclusion peculiar to myself, but one which forced itself upon that half of the Royal Commission which signed the first supplemental Report, and which included the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for Ireland. If hon. Members will turn to P. 219 of the Report, they will find these Gentlemen speaking thus—

"We fear that instead of increasing the number of societies simply obtaining by registration a legal status, the additional conditions which the Report recommends in respect of such societies, such, for instance, as compulsory periodical valuation, will rather deter them from registration than attract them to it. This would indeed be a most undesirable result."

I think no one who knows anything of the subject will dispute the undesirability of this result, and I not only share the fear which this section, numbering exactly one half of the Commissioners, expressed; but I have no doubt in my own mind that if the present Bill becomes law, that fear will be realized. In order that my argument may be understood, I would especially ask hon. Members to remark the expression of these Commissioners that "societies simply obtaining by the registration a legal status" will, by the enforcement of periodical valuation, be deterred from registering; and I do so, because the number of societies which register simply for the purpose of obtaining this legal status, constitutes the largest section of registered Friendly Societies. This assertion I make, not of course, on my own authority, but on the authority of one of the Assistant Commissioners, Sir George Young, the value and accuracy of whose Report I am sure the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be the first to acknowledge. Well, on Page 31 of Sir George Young's Report, we find this statement—

"Of the advantages possessed by a registered club over an unregistered, that most frequently referred to, and apparently most valued, is the security obtained for its funds. This security depends, first, upon the power of prosecuting, recovering from, and punishing a fraudulent secretary or trustee (18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, s. 24); and, secondly, upon the means provided under the statute for the settlement of disputes arising between any of the members or officers of the society (18 & 19 Vict. ss. 40, 41, and 42). The testimony afforded me is overwhelming, that no societies of a purely popular and unpatronized character, would take the trouble of registering, or submitting their rules to the Registrar's revision, if they did not obtain this security by registration; and that hardly any one would care to register merely to obtain the minor advantages conferred by the Act upon registered societies, if they knew of a simple way to obtain this particular advantage without submitting to the Registrar's control."

Here Sir George Young goes on to point out that another means does exist, but that it is very little known. I shall, before I sit down, allude to that means; but meanwhile I only ask you to remark that there is overwhelming evidence that the great majority of popular and unpatronized societies only register to obtain that legal status which shall give them security for their funds; and, secondly, that the proposal of compulsory periodical valuation will, in the apprehension of one-half of the Commissioners, deter societies which now register for that purpose from registering at all. Assuredly it will, and that in a large number of cases, and for the very simple reason, that while in the case of such societies the inducement to register remains the same as at present, the restrictions and interferences implied in registration will be very much greater. Take, for instance, compulsory valuations. Independently of the serious expense which this implies, and which can only be met by Government fixing a very low standard of fee for the services of the official actuaries, it must be remembered that what are called Friendly Societies are distinctly divisible into two classes—mutual benefit societies, which alone are really co-operative, and which generally provide for benefits in sickness as well as on death, and collecting burial societies, which are generally proprietary and trading companies. In many of the latter, the management of the society, as is clearly shown by the Commissioners, is really in the hands of one man or a set of men, who look upon the society as they would on a business of their own, and who consider, to use the words of one witness, and that witness a solicitor, quoted in Paragraph 524 of the Commissioners' Report—

"That as long as they have funds in hand sufficient to meet the claims that may fall in on the death of the members, the rest of the funds of the society practically belongs to them, and whether they take it in the shape of salaries or in any other way, they consider practically, and I myself," he added, "consider, that they do their duty to the public."

Now purely mutual societies, in the solvency of which all the members are alike interested, need fear no disclosure of the real condition of their society, except in so far as any disclosure of insolvency is calculated to increase their embarrassment by frightening young insurers from joining. But it is self-evident that the proprietors, so to speak, of proprietary societies will view with very different feelings any disclosures adversely affecting their credit and reacting on those profits which they regard as legitimately their own, and which are to be divided amongst them in the shape of salaries or otherwise. The societies, therefore, which most require looking after on the ground of doubtful solvency, will avoid unpleasant disclosures by the simple expedient of non-registration. Again, the Bill contains a provision that no policy issued by a collecting society, which is generally, as I have said, virtually a proprietary company, shall lapse through non-payment of contributions until after the defaulting member shall have been served with a written notice that if he does not pay he will forfeit his contingent benefit. This provision is aimed against the practising of fraudulent lapsing, or putting members out of benefit by intentionally neglecting to collect their contributions; and though, in consequence of the inadequate machinery adopted in this Bill, it will effect little good, it is probably one of the most valuable and legitimate provisions of the measure. But it will also largely diminish the number of legitimate lapses occurring in connection with burial societies—the number of persons who owe their lapse of benefit to their own carelessness and unpunctuality. Now lapses, legitimate or illegitimate, constitute the chief source of income of many burial societies. One witness quoted by the Commissioners estimated that seven in every eight insurers who joined his society allowed their policies to lapse without becoming entitled to benefit. Lapsing, he said, is a source of profit to collectors, and more so to the society. He considered that a burial society could carry on for an indefinite term with three months' income, the business changing so rapidly—thanks to these lapses—that the amount in hand required to meet liabilities was very small. "A general burial society," add the Commission (Paragraph 505), "thus lives by its lapses; in other words, by confiscation of the premiums of its members." Now, the provision against lapsing will either kill the societies that live thus, or compel them to forego registration. I am aware that the provisions with regard to lapsing to which I refer are extended under this Bill to unregistered as well as registered collecting societies. But how are they to be enforced? Are we to expect that the machinery which has so utterly broken down when called on to supervise the actions of 22,000 bodies of men, will be found capable of controlling those of a still larger number? Had the fundamental recommendation on which this Bill was originally based as its leading feature been maintained, had the right hon. Gentleman adhered to his original system of local registration, it might have been possible to enforce the provisions of the Bill with respect to unregistered as well as to registered societies. As it is, that portion of it which relates to unregistered societies will, like so many other well-meant provisions of the 19 Acts of Parliament which have up to this been passed on the subject, be simply a dead letter, and the sole effect of these provisions will be to drive a number of the very societies which most need supervision into the rogues' paradise of non-registration, where they will be able not only to "lapse," but to cheat and swindle their clients without legal let or hindrance. In this portion of my argument I have assumed that those societies which have registered under the present system shall, when the Bill comes before a Committee of the House, be allowed to choose whether they will continue to be registered or not. The correctness of this assumption does not affect the soundness of my argument. It merely lessens the extent of its immediate applicability. But if it does that, it does so at the expense of a very grave injustice; for if the Bill, as it now stands, becomes law, the effect will be that societies which have, for the purpose of obtaining legal protection against fraud, submitted themselves to the easy and unenforced conditions which registration now implies, will find themselves obliged either to carry on their business under an entirely new set of conditions, or to escape from registration by dissolution. If they dissolve, they must do so at an imminent risk of finding it impossible to reconstruct their societies, while if they hesitate to have recourse to such an extreme step, what will be the result? They must submit to periodical valuations the minimum expense of which will depend entirely upon the fees which the Treasury may name for the services of the official auditors, a point concerning which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has as yet given us no information whatever. As in many societies collectors vote at meetings and take part in the management, it will be necessary to change the constitution of the society in this respect, and here also in the direction of increased expense. The diminution of legitimate lapses, from which, as I have already pointed out, a large number of societies derive a material portion of their income, will, in many cases, necessitate re-adjustment of contributions and benefits, and here again in the direction of increased payments for the same benefits. Having bargained only for a set of nominal conditions, almost every one of which they knew could be disregarded with impunity, they will find themselves brought under the operation of an Act which, according to a statement made by its draftsman a few nights since at a meeting of the Social Science Association, lays down no fewer than 355 penal offences. Finally, they must be prepared to find themselves bound by a law in which, in no fewer than 12 places I believe, such phrases as the following occur:—"As the Chief Registrar shall from time to time see fit," "as he may direct," "as he may prescribe," and so forth. I am sure it was never intended by the Commissioners or by the right hon. Gentleman, that under guise of a system of voluntary registration, a section, and that a very large and respectable one, of Friendly Societies should be placed between the Scylla of submitting to a series of rules they never dreamt of, and which are in a number of instances left to the discretion of the Registrar, and the Charybdis of dissolution. But if it be the intention of the right hon. Gentleman that such should be the case, I think the fact would furnish another good reason for rejecting the Bill now under consideration. Arguing, as I do, that by casting aside the primary recommendation of the Commissioners, the idea on which the Bill of last Session was based, the chief provisions against fraud contained in this measure will prove as futile as the many which have turned out useless, or worse than useless in the previous 19 Friendly Society Acts. I need not detain the House by referring to various clamant evils to which the Commissioners direct attention, which the Bill—assuming it to be capable of being successfully worked—would fail to grapple with. I will, therefore, only allude to two points of detail which indicate the spirit of indifference to those of the recommendations of the Commission conceived in the interest of the public, which seems to me to characterize the present Bill. One of the most important of the recommendations of the Commissioners is the 43rd—

"That the existing system of Government insurance through the Post Office for death and Deferred Annuities be extended, so as to cover the whole ground now occupied by what is termed industrial assurance."

This recommendation is altogether ignored by the Government. Another of their most important recommendations is the 37th—

"That, in addition to his power of dissolving the society, the Chief Registrar should have authority, on the application of a certain number or prescribed proportion of members, to make an award binding on a society for the adjustment of contributions and benefits."

The Bill of last Session, both in its original and amended form, contained a provision for carrying out this recommendation. That provision has been struck out of the Bill now before the House. Thus, in the Bill we find two of the three main principles of the Government measure of last year struck out, and an important subsidiary one—conceived in the interests of the public—ignored. As I have shown, through the absence of the fundamental desideratum of a system of local Registrars, it becomes extremely doubtful whether the enforcement of the third principle of last year's Bill, that—namely, of compulsory valuation, will not do more harm than good. If, therefore, I were asked to define the principle of the present Bill, as compared with that of the measure of last year, I should characterize it as the principle of emasculation, emasculation of every real safeguard introduced in the public interest. Compared with the Bill of last year, the present measure is but as shadow compared with substance. And now I come to a part of my argument against this Bill which carries great weight with myself, but which I approach with diffidence; because on this point I have not the authority of the Commissioners, or of half of their number, to support me as heretofore, but have to rely on the strength of my case, and the principle laid down by two of the eight Commissioners in an additional supplemental Report. That principle is, that means should be taken for extending the remedies now open to the members of unregistered societies in case of fraud and other malpractices, so that there should not be a temptation held out to fraudulent and designing managers to keep out of registration so as to escape any of the remedial provisions of the law. Sir, I conceive this principle, though endorsed but by two out of the eight Commissioners, to be one of vital importance, and I think very few Members would venture to controvert the forcible language in which one of these Gentlemen (Mr. Roundell) expressed his adhesion to it. He did so, he tells us—

"on the ground that unregistered societies when not actually illegal, ought not to be regarded as outside the pale of the law, and that power for the punishment of fraud is not so much a privilege of a society as a check to knaves."

Well, as the law at present stands, the members of a society can say—"We know our own business, and don't care to be trammelled by red tape, but we desire that security against frauds, and the benefit of those provisions for the settlement of disputes, which Sir George Young tells on overwhelming testimony is the reason why the vast majority of popular and unpatronized societies submit to registration." They can say—"We desire security, but wish to conduct our own business according to our own fashion," and they can without further question than whether their society is established for a lawful purpose, by simply depositing their rules at once obtain that security for their funds and that legal assistance in the settlement of disputes which they desire. The law on this point is by no means perfect—rules once deposited may be altered, and the object of the society thus changed to any extent, without the Registrar or the public knowing anything of the change; but this is a matter of detail and obviously the result of an oversight. What, therefore, I wish to point out is that in the Proviso regarding societies with deposited rules, the law at present recognizes this most important principle, that the members of every Friendly Society established for a legal purpose, whether its members choose to hold an annual feast, or to spend a certain portion of their money in drink or not, whether it chooses to restrict its investments according to Government ideas or not, whether it chooses to have collectors on its committee of management or not—that every such society is entitled to the benefit of these provisions against roguery and fraud which most people consider to be the right of every subject of a civilized country. Now, the present Bill proposes to put an end to this acknowledgment of a most salutary principle, a principle which, as Sir George Young points out in the Report to which I have before referred, has only failed to be largely taken avail of because the law on the subject was not generally known. It proposes, I say, to do away with this invaluable principle in the existing law, and to substitute for it another to this effect—that the members of every Friendly Society must either conduct their business according to the rules devised by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote), that they must invest its funds in the manner which has been laid down, that they must draw up its rules according to his Schedule, that they must submit its accounts to the Registrar, and that they must undergo a valuation of its assets and liabilities once every four years, or that the society shall be considered as outside the pale of the law—that they shall be outlawed as if they were persons of the vilest type, and exposed to have themselves cheated and their funds embezzled without legal remedy. Now, Sir, I look upon the negation of this great principle in the existing law as a drawback which more than counterbalances all the enforceable provisions of the present Bill. Had there been engrafted on the Bill of last Session a provision for the compulsory deposit with the Registrar of such particulars as were necessary for the identification of a society and its objects—its rules, its office address, and the names of its office-bearers; had every society been compelled, as with the machinery of last year's Bill it easily might have been, to publicly record these particulars; and had the provision of the law protecting from fraud and facilitating settlement of disputes been extended to all societies, registered and unregistered, the Bill of last year would, in my opinion, have been a most satisfactory measure. To attempt to amend the present Bill in that direction would be futile. It lacks, as I have shown, the machinery which would be necessary to carry out the provisions which it contains. It is really, so far as the Bill of last Session is concerned, but the shadow of a name. Of the three main principles of that Bill, two—local registration and official tables—have been eliminated from this, and without the first of them, as I think I have shown, the third—that of periodical valuation—will do more harm than good. I have shown that the Bill before us has been curtailed of the most important provisions of that of last Session, and that, maimed and mutilated as it is, it must utterly fail to carry out the recommendations of the Commission. I have pointed out that, contrasted with the three main principles of the Bill of last year, the present Bill seems to have but one main principle, and that is emasculation. I have pointed out the all but certainty that under the new Bill a number of societies now registered, or with deposited rules, will be found to place themselves outside the pale of the law; and I have shown that in proposing to do away with the advantages at present obtainable by the deposit of rules, the right hon. Gentleman proposes to do away with a most salutary feature of our law, and to substitute for it a retrograde and obnoxious one. Having done so, Sir, I think I am fully justified in moving, as I now do, as an Amendment to the Motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Dr. Cameron.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. A. H. BROWN remarked that it was necessary to deal gently with these societies, and while seeking to strengthen their good habits to endeavour to put down those abuses which some amongst them had unfortunately upheld. When he looked over the Bill it appeared to him quite plain that it was simply a direction to a central body to be located in London, and could only be regarded as a sort of sign-post to the road which Friendly Societies ought to go; and its success would entirely depend upon its constitution, power, and ability of that body. He deprecated any powers given to the central body which would have the effect of taking these societies off the register. On the whole, however, the Bill seemed to be carefully guarded in this respect, and in the case of the great affiliated Orders this power of the central body was subject to the consent of the central body of the Order. Further, it recognized the fact that there was nothing which the working classes so disliked as unnecessary interference. One provision in the Bill required further consideration, and that was the proportion of members at whose instigation the central body was to be put in motion. In this respect the Bill was hardly sufficiently elastic. Societies differed greatly in the number of their members; some were local, some general. While some numbered over 300,000, some were only 50 in number, and the same proportion of members at whose instigation the central body was to be put in motion did not suit all. While recognizing the right of minorities, it would not be well to encourage factious minorities; and he would suggest that, in the case of societies which were not local, one set of numbers should be prescribed, and another set in the case of societies which were local, to justify the interference of the central body. The Bill contained various improvements in the law. Among these was a provision limiting the amount of insurance upon the life of infants. It seemed to him that the amount mentioned in the Bill—£3—was a very fair one. It was said that £3 was not enough to pay the doctor and undertaker, but in these sad cases a doctor was not in attendance, and the funeral was of the cheapest kind. He did not believe that any attack was thereby intended upon working men; the provision being directed against the serious evil known as baby farming. He also differed from his hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron) with regard to local registration, for he thought that the absence of the local register in the Bill was an improvement upon the measure of last year. His hon. Friend had objected to the Bill on the ground of the absence of actuarial tables; but the words of the 10th clause gave quite sufficient powers to the central body to make provision for that and other purposes. Reviewing the whole provisions of the Bill, he must say he saw nothing in it which could induce him not to give it his hearty support. He cordially supported the measure, because he believed it was an honest attempt on the part of the Government to do what they could to strengthen and improve good societies in the interest of the working classes, leaving them, as far as possible, to manage their affairs in their own way. He most strongly deprecated anything being done which would impede the passing of a Bill introduced with such an excellent object.

LORD ESLINGTON said, he hoped, as he took a deep interest in this subject, that he might be allowed to make a few observations on this occasion. He could not imagine for a moment that the House was prepared to reject the Bill, and unless some stronger reasons than those given by the hon. Member opposite (Dr. Cameron) were adduced against the principles of the Bill, he had every confidence that the House would support its second reading. He regarded the provision in the Bill requiring periodical valuation as absolutely indispensable to soundness. The hon. Member who moved the rejection of the Bill said that that provision would cause a great number of the present registered societies to become non-registered societies, over which there would be no control. Now, that argument proved too much, because if pressed to its legitimate conclusion, it would follow that any restriction imposed on the societies, or any provision that might be framed to secure for contributors that knowledge and publicity which were essential to the soundness of those institutions, would deter societies from registering or force them to become unregistered. That argument applied against the whole Bill, and would apply to any Bill which might be framed, and he hoped the House would not be led away by any such false issue. The great object of this Bill, and of the complicated machinery which it provided, seemed to be to encourage the powerful institutions, and indirectly to discourage the less powerful. The experience they had had, as well as the evidence taken on the subject, all proved that the great bodies ought to be encouraged, and that the larger they were the greater was their power of doing good. But there was one defect in their rules which he wished to point out, and he was sure that any suggestion made in temperate language would receive from those societies a respectful consideration. The rates of contribution had not been so accommodated to agricultural wages as to induce the agricultural class to join the great bodies, and to derive the advantages which the economy of their management insured. He believed that in that great institution, the Manchester Unity, only 7 or 7½ per cent were agricultural members. It was a great misfortune that the proportion should be so small. It was the wealthier class of artisans which constituted the ranks of the great affiliated Orders to which he was referring, and the poorer labourers were kept out. But his chief object in rising was to express his strong objection to the limitation contained in the Bill as to the insurance of infant life. That would be looked upon as an insult by the working classes, and though he had looked carefully more than once into that part of the Commissioners' Report which attempted to justify the limitation, it appeared to him singularly inconclusive. In the first place, the evidence upon the subject was extremely limited, having been confined in the main to the manufacturing districts of Lancashire and the great town of Liverpool. Besides, more than half of those examined stated that the power of insuring infant life had no tendency whatever to produce a high rate of infant mortality. It should be remembered that the Commissioners based their conclusion upon the rate of mortality among infants up to four years of age in the manufacturing districts. To base any conclusion upon such facts was, he thought, a great mistake. Before he admitted that this mortality was due to the power of insuring he would like to know what was the normal ratio of mortality at that age as compared with other ages. He thought the mortality in certain manufacturing districts was stated to be 30 per cent below two years of age and 50 per cent up to the age of four. He wanted to know whether there were not circumstances connected with the habits of the people in the manufacturing districts which would largely account for the mortality of infants at those ages? Might it not be that the temptations of the mill induced the mother to return to her work far too soon for her own health and for that of her infant, the latter being left to the care of a young sister or other unskilful nurse, and not receiving proper nourishment? In that way a considerable amount of infant mortality might arise. Those considerations induced him to form the opinion which he entertained against the limitation of insurance, in addition to which the sum allowed was insufficient for the purpose. He understood the hon. Gentleman opposite to prefer the Bill of last year to the present one; but the impression out-of-doors appeared to have been that the Bill of last year went too far, whereas the persons who were supposed to largely represent the working classes regarded the present Bill as a really good one, so far as its principle and its main provisions went, although they might take exception to some of its details. The Bill would materially tend to give publicity to the accounts and to the obligations of those great institutions, and that object would be attained by means of an efficient audit, periodical valuation, and quinquennial Returns, the want of which at this moment was one of their great defects. The measure, he hoped, would also have the effect of encouraging the amalgamation of the smaller with the larger societies, and of thereby strengthening those institutions. What they must try to do was to secure the maximum of publicity with the minimum of interference, with a view to the soundness and safety of those societies, which he looked upon as the great practical schools of the country for the adult population, inasmuch as they fostered that feeling of self-reliance and self-government which could not be sufficiently encouraged. He cordially supported the second reading of the Bill.

MR. LOWE said, that considering the very long time that this matter had been under consideration, and the persons for whose information this Bill was intended, the House had every right to expect that the Bill would be a model, at any rate, for clearness and perspicuity, whether Members were able to agree with its provisions or not. On that point, however, he was extremely disappointed, and he would call the attention of the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth) to the Bill, which appeared to him (Mr. Lowe) to embody almost every vice in the drawing of Bills which it was possible to conceive. This was extremely to be regretted, because it was a measure intended for the poorer classes, who were very often ignorant people to whom it was desirable that the matter should be made as clear as possible. Instead of that the art of Parliamentary mystification had in this measure been carried as far, probably, as it was possible to go. He would give his reasons for thinking so. First, it was a Consolidating Bill. By that he understood a Bill which repealed former statutes, and bound them all together in a single Act, so that those who wished to know what was the state of the law on a particular subject might have that single Act to refer to. The present Bill proceeded partially in that course; it began with repealing the Act 18 & 19 Vict., a Consolidating Act for Friendly Societies; but having repealed that Act, as if for fear of making matters too simple, it reserved three sections which were still to remain in force, and to which we must go back in order to find out what was the state of the law as embodied in these three sections bearing on the important subject of interest to be given by certain large insurance offices. But that was not all. Of course, there was nothing more important in this Bill than the office of Registrar, and the state of the law as bearing on this point was to be fished out by referring to four different clauses. Then, when you had read these four clauses, you would not yet have read the most important of what applied to the Registrar, because after that you must go back to the very Act which was repealed, and which stated what the office of the Registrar was, as the Bill said you were to have the same powers now vested in the check people by leaving them to appoint officers to check themselves. Having said that much, he would venture to make an observation or two in the direction of what appeared to him would be a better frame for the Bill. It seemed to him that the way in which the Bill dealt with registration assumed that registration was to benefit only the societies, and that if the societies did not choose to enforce it themselves, there was no harm to any one else. But he maintained that registration was as much a benefit to the public as to the societies; because the use of registration was that the societies could sue and be sued through the trustees, and if a society was not registered, it became a legal monster which could not be sued, excepting by suing all its members: It was most necessary and desirable, therefore, that everything should be done to facilitate the obtaining of that power. But these societies were unwilling to come in and take that power; and he did not much wonder at it. It occurred to him, however, though he did not say that we should register societies against their will, to ask why a law should not be passed, saying that all such societies which were not illegal should be able to sue and be sued by their trustees. In the matter of registration, it would have been better to have followed the course laid down in the Public Companies Act; but to erect the Registrar into a high judicial personage, as was done under the Bill, was contrary to the spirit and genius of our Constitution. It seemed to him that the real question resolved itself into a very simple matter. It must be taken into consideration that there were two kinds of societies. There was one kind of societies which could not be too highly commended, and which we could not do too much to help—societies which existed for the purpose of giving assistance in cases of sickness and funerals; and, as for these, if Parliament gave the power of suing or being sued, with any enabling clause that might be necessary, it would do all that was required. Better leave them to work out their own rules in their own way, without encumbering them with all this legislation. The advantage would be that they would learn something. Experience forced on people was apt to slide off; what they worked out themselves stuck; and that would be the gain in the case of another class of societies. He dealt with questions which appeared to him should be taken into consideration in all classes at all. Then, for the knowledge of the Government; the Government in any hurry to do more wisely also, letting them do their own way. The Government might deal with these societies in the Post Office, and the security within the classes if they chose should we not follow these societies, the adopted and four well in the case of societies? Instead of quarrel about ce which gave those which they were no pare for them, as in stock companies, sh lations, which sh unless they chose. He could not help provisions of this possible to work. There ought no tating between ty lieved the working manage their own class of societies to and he thought it not left alone to do he admitted the Bi deal of out-door pe everything which kept, and keepin should have been. Mr. W. H. St the House had at the right hon. G that the Bill was fe by the working-cla Gentleman had ur leaving the worki their own affairs, what the Bill propo object and great p to ensure publicit accounts and valua Gentleman referre provisions were cor of Parliament, and was so, but they operative, not having been secured by adequate penalties; and one of the main objects of the Bill was to see that the law as it existed should be operative and successful. In styling the Registrar a high judicial personage, it seemed to him the right hon. Gentleman had considerably magnified that functionary's importance, seeing that his duty was simply to see that societies complied with the rules in force. There was a good reason in giving to the Treasury the power of his appointment and removal; and if his conduct were called into question there was a Department ready to inquire into the matter without the employment of cumbrous and special machinery. He confessed he could hardly reconcile that part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech where he urged the adoption of means to prevent the management of societies from falling into the hands of a knot of dishonest persons with the desire he subsequently expressed that the working-classes should be left to manage their affairs themselves. In point of fact, the Bill did contemplate the management of the societies by the people themselves, and provided a great check on improper proceedings by means of publicity and the influence of public opinion. Again, the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion that there ought to be rules scheduled under the Act seemed to be directly opposed to the principle on which he desired to proceed. What the Government desired was that, subject to the check he had mentioned, the working-classes should have full liberty to found, control, and carry on such societies as they considered necessary or advantageous to themselves. It was not for the Government to say what the wants of the working-classes might be; but it was for Parliament to say that their own rules should be observed when laid down; that accounts in conformity with the Act should be rendered; and that quinquennial valuations based upon those accounts should be made in order that the ignorant and the simple might have within their reach information to guide them in the selection of a society. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), to judge from his speech, could hardly have been aware of the existing law with regard to Friendly and Insurance Societies. [Dr. CAMERON: There are 4,000 illegal Insurance Societies in existence at present throughout the country.] At any rate, every such society of an illegal nature might in future be proceeded against under the provisions of the Life Insurance Acts, and this circumstance alone would, he believed, prove a great safe-guard to the public. He refused to believe, however, that the great majority of the Friendly Societies of this country were so dishonestly managed that they would be afraid of that periodical valuation which was one of the most important provisions of the Bill. If they continued to exist, they would be compelled to render their accounts either as Friendly Societies or as insurance companies. The Government were charged with reference to this Bill, on the one hand with doing too little, and on the other with doing too much. The Bill was an attempt to keep clear of the evil of paternal Government, and at the same time—and he believed it would prove to be successful—to take away from those who were breaking the law the immunity with which they now broke the law, and to compel them to make their actions clear before the world. It would be impossible by any mere legislation to provide absolute security either for the societies or their members; but it was very necessary that the public should not be left without information when there was the power to compel the officers to make returns. At present, however, there was no penalty attaching to the rendering of a false return, and to show the value of obtaining returns he would only say that a short time since he received information of a society which had a reserve of only £45,000, but which had insurances of £6,200,000. That society had not made a return because it did not come within the law as it at present existed; but if this Bill passed it would be bound to make a return at the specified period. Another objection which had been raised against the Bill was that it was an enabling Bill, but practically he considered it was a compulsory measure; because societies must register themselves as Friendly Societies, or subject themselves to the penalties of Insurance Societies if they did not bring themselves within the scope of Mr. Cave's Act. He expressed an earnest desire that if the Bill was read a second time the House would do all in its power to perfect its machinery, which was intended, as far as legislation could go, to give security to the saving, to encourage by all possible means that most valuable spirit of thrift and economy which existed in so large a measure among the working-classes, and which was too often discouraged and depressed by the fact that savings, going on for years and years, had turned out to be entirely lost from the fraud or mismanagement of those to whom they had been entrusted.

Mr. W. HOLMS: I concur to some extent with my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) in his opinion that this Bill is not satisfactory, at the same time I think that there is in it so much that is good, so much that is sound, and so much that is in accordance with the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Friendly Societies that I shall support the second reading with a view to going into Committee, and, if possible, remedying the objectionable clauses. My hon. Friend has told us that a vast number—probably not less than a third—of all Friendly Societies are unregistered, and has used this as an argument in favour of having a large number of local registrars. I wish to point out to the House that the fact of a large number of these societies being unregistered is not a question of the number of registrars; it is a question of whether certain classes of Friendly Societies can be admitted to registration. At present the law is, that no “yearly” or “dividing” society can be registered. On inquiry I find that a very large proportion of unregistered societies come under this class; for instance, as regards 12 districts in Scotland, the Assistant Commissioner has reported that wishing to ascertain the reason why so many societies were unregistered, he made an inquiry, and found that of 2,756 no fewer than 2,216 were “dividing” societies, and therefore could not be registered; of the remaining 540, some were unregistered for other reasons, such as not having power, if registered, to invest their funds in shares. I would remind my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow that the Bill now before the House proposes to admit dividing societies, and to allow all Friendly Societies to hold shares. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London has described the Bill as a weak Bill;

but I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that it contains two admirable provisions, and if it contained nothing else, and thorough effect could be given to them, I venture to think that it would not be a bad Bill. The first of these provisions gives full power to a certain number of members of a society to demand an investigation into the state of its affairs, and the second provides against lapses; it has been the habit of some societies to neglect to call upon certain members for their periodical contributions, the consequence being that those members lapsed out of benefit, and in the Report of the Commissioners this is repeatedly referred to as a cause of fraud on poor and ignorant people. If the House accepts the Amendment of my hon. Friend, legislation will be delayed at all events for another year, it cannot be urged that we have not sufficient information on the subject, for in this respect the Report of the Royal Commissioners has been most complete and exhaustive. Nor can it be said that we have not had time to consider this measure. Last year the Bill was laid before the House, read a second time, and afterwards committed and reprinted. During the Recess, hon. Members and deputations from Friendly Societies have had opportunities of laying their suggestions before the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I am bound to confess that the right hon. Gentleman has always received such suggestions with the greatest courtesy and consideration. The result of all this is the Bill now in the hands of hon. Members. It may be asked, are the Friendly Societies themselves in favour of legislation? It has been my good fortune to have come much in contact with leading men connected with those societies, and I can assure the House that those men, representing upwards of 2,300,000 members, are desirous of such legislation as will clearly define their position; that will protect the ignorant and helpless, so far as they can be protected by Act of Parliament; and that will give the public confidence that their operations are conducted on sound principles. At the same time, they are most anxious that there shall be no undue Government interference, and that within certain well-defined limits they shall have full power to manage their own affairs in the manner they think best; and it appears to me that they have good reason for taking up this position. If we look to the history of these societies, we must acknowledge that the working men of this country have in their management shown an amount of prudence, self-reliance, and practical sagacity which forms one of the most interesting features in the progress and civilization of the century in which we live, and which finds no parallel in any other country in Europe. Friendly Societies are of comparatively recent origin. The first Act for their regulation was passed in 1793. Such, however, at that time was the ignorance of vital statistics and of the principles on which such institutions should be conducted, that few or none of the societies founded during the last century are now in existence. During the last 30 years, and more particularly during the last 10 years, their progress has been remarkable. So quietly, however, have their operations been conducted, that until the Report of the Royal Commission was published, I believe that the public had scarcely any conception of their magnitude. I find that the Manchester Unity of Odd Fellows had in 1873 470,000 members. During the preceding five years its income was £2,800,000, or nearly £600,000 a-year. Of this £1,928,000 was distributed in sick allowances and grants made on the deaths of members. Another society—the Ancient Order of Foresters—which in 1845 had only 66,000 members, had in 1873 increased to 420,000, with an annual income of £491,000, so that those two societies alone have between them nearly 900,000 members, with a revenue of more than £1,000,000, and, I believe, funds amounting to £4,920,000. It has been estimated that 3,000,000 of the very very flower of the working classes are directly or indirectly interested in these great affiliated orders or brotherhoods. There is another class of societies even more numerous in their membership. I refer to the Collecting or Burial Societies, one of them, the Royal Liver, having upwards of 600,000 members. Besides these great classes, there is an infinite variety of local and other societies, the whole forming an aggregate of 4,000,000 members, with funds in hand amounting to £11,000,000 or £12,000,000. It has been estimated that by their means £2,000,000 a-year is saved to the rates;

but, what is of greater importance, these societies, while thus tending to lessen the degrading influence of our Poor Law system, promote habits of thrift and forethought. They are the great life insurance companies of the working classes, who naturally look with jealousy upon any legislation of an arbitrary character, or which will favour one class of society at the expense of another. It is well that the healthy breeze of public opinion should be brought to bear on them, but we should carefully avoid interfering with what is sound, vigorous, and useful in the work now going on so successfully. I give the Chancellor of the Exchequer full credit for desiring to make this a good measure. At the same time, I am bound to say that I think it contains provisions which, if allowed to remain unaltered, will seriously affect the future success of Friendly Societies. To some of these I shall now, with the permission of the House, briefly refer. The first and most important requisite for these societies is sound tables. The Royal Commissioners report as follows:—

and they recommend that tables of premiums for sickness and death claims should be prepared by Government, the adoption of which should not be compulsory. I trust that a clause will be introduced into the Bill instructing the Chief Registrar to prepare such tables, as will constitute a standard by which the public may judge whether a society is being conducted on a sound basis or not. I venture also to suggest that a provision should be made that all monies for insurance purposes should be kept distinctly apart from the funds that are destined to be divided. I agree with the hon. Member for Wenlock (Mr. A. H. Brown) that the number of persons who can demand an investigation is too small; it is an anomaly to provide, as proposed in the Bill, that three-eighths of the members are necessary to an investigation, when the total number in a society is under 1,000, and that only 100 should be required to obtain an inquiry when the members are under 10,000. The most objectionable clause, in my opinion, is Clause 29, which enables societies carrying on their operations within one county to be free from nearly every restriction imposed in the Bill, and if passed in its present form, the result will be that instead of encouraging those large societies to which reference has been made by the noble Lord the Member for South Northumberland (Lord Eslington), an undue advantage will be given to small local societies, which under the shadow of the law will be enabled to continue unchecked those abuses so ably pointed out by the Royal Commissioners, I would strongly urge that local societies should be placed in the same position as other societies. There is in this clause a remarkable peculiarity, unregistered societies are required, under certain penalties, to give rules and policies to their members, to give notice to members before their benefits can lapse, to provide a balance sheet for the inspection of members; but, nevertheless, there is no machinery provided in the Bill to give the Registrar any hold over them: I would suggest that all unregistered societies, by sending a copy of their rules and the address of their chief office or place of business, should have the benefit of the clauses for the prevention of fraud and the settlement of disputes, and might be called "Enrolled Societies." I confess that I am at a loss to understand why societies should by this Bill be permitted to invest their funds in shares of any kind they like while they are limited to the purchase of one acre of land in each county in which they may have an office. Why, Sir, had their power in this respect been untrammelled in the past their property would have been greatly increased in value, for hon. Gentlemen are well aware that there is no class of property so safe, and none which has more increased in value than land. In conclusion, I wish to call attention to the almost unlimited powers given to the Chief Registrar under Clause 37. I am strongly of opinion that all rules, regulations, and forms of Returns, should, as far as practicable, be set forth in Schedules in the Bill itself, in the same manner as has been done in the Life Assurance Companies' Act. I have thus endeavoured to point out some of those features in the Bill which appear to me to be objectionable, and I trust that if read a second time, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will allow such a time to elapse before going into Committee as will enable hon. Members fully to consider the various points to which their attention may be called in this debate; and, I further trust that the right hon. Baronet will be prepared before going into Committee to make such alterations as may be necessary to render this Bill what I am sure he, and this House desire it should be, a measure that will deal fairly with all Friendly Societies, and tend to promote their greater usefulness and further development.

MR. HOLT wished to thank the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the kindness which he had shown to deputations who had attended on him with reference to this matter. He thought that, if such a measure as the present was to be of practical value, there must be nothing like petty meddling, and broad principles must be laid down for the government of Friendly Societies. The constituency he represented (North East Lancashire) took a great interest in the question, and he had received a good deal of correspondence on the subject of the Bill. The whole of these communications, however, he might say, mainly referred to two matters—the first relating to infant assurances, and the second to restrictions placed on the investment of their funds by the societies. As regarded the former, they were in favour of having matters left as they were, so far as the insurance was concerned; and they thought that if the receipt of the insurance money were limited to parents or guardians, that would practically be a sufficient precaution against abuse. The Commissioners believed that it would be impossible to ascertain, without compulsory powers and without the right of indemnifying witnesses, whether or not the present system encouraged child murder; and he thought there should be full inquiry before such a stigma as that involved in the provisions of the Bill should be passed upon the working classes. With regard to the investment of the funds of these societies, objections were entertained to the limitations contained in Clause 16. The working classes looked at this question from a practical rather than a theoretical point of view. He had some figures affecting 55 societies in his district, containing 10,000 members, with an accumulated capital of £55,720, upwards of £33,000 of which was legally invested. It suited the purpose of many of these societies to run the risk of illegal investment rather than submit to the restriction of the law, which hampered their action and damaged their property. If undue restrictions were imposed, the societies would refuse to register, and would keep outside the pale of the law; and he hoped, therefore, that some relaxation of the 16th clause would be made. He asked the Government, also, whether it might not be desirable to put a clause in the Bill which would make societies anxious to register? This Bill would certainly not have that effect; and he, for one, was desirous that all societies should be registered. On the whole, he recognized great improvements in the Bill compared with that of last year, and trusted that in Committee it might be still further improved. It was impossible to meet the requirements of every particular case. Parliament must be content to lay down certain broad principles, and its object should be to strengthen rather than fetter the action of these societies in carrying out their very laudable purpose.

MR. COWEN said, that for over 20 years he had had considerable experience of these societies and was unable to concur with his hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron) in the Amendment for the rejection of the Bill. On the contrary, he thought that the Bill fairly met the requirements of those societies. It might be amended in Committee; but, substantially, he believed it would satisfy the managers, and be of service to a very important section of the community. One of the strongest passions of Englishmen was their desire to take part in matters of a public nature, and if a number of them were thrown upon a desert island, he believed the first thing they would do would be to call a meeting, appoint a Chairman, and nominate a Committee of Management. This desire was gratified in the case of working men by their becoming members of these societies. There they became acquainted with the restraints of public business, were enabled to meet their brother workmen, and to discuss matters affecting themselves and their fellows. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had evidently studied the whole subject very carefully; and of the three Bills which had been prepared, the second was better than the first, and the third was better than the second. Some persons were of opinion that the best thing the Legislature could do for these societies was to leave them alone; while other persons held that such societies should be hedged round by legal restrictions. The Bill struck a very fair medium between these conflicting views, and, with the Amendments, which would no doubt be adopted in Committee, he should cordially support it. Friendly Societies wanted protection, not interference. By protection he meant protection from the improper proceedings of dishonest officials; but there should be no Government interference with the internal affairs of the societies. He believed that the educational influence of these societies was felt by the entire community. With respect to their stability, there existed a general impression that they were insolvent. Now, he admitted that some of them, if they were suddenly called upon without warning, would not be able to meet their engagements. For instance, when the cholera was very prevalent some of them were considerably paralyzed; and if a similar calamity should again occur in some parts of the country, other institutions, besides Benefit Societies, would be placed in great difficulty. Some 24 years ago he was a member of a society which many authorities pronounced to be insolvent, but that society was in a flourishing state to-day. The Amalgamated Society of Engineers was said by very competent persons to be insolvent; but it was more powerful to-day than ever. He had no faith in predictions. Prophecy was a very seductive but not a very profitable thing. They had heard many predictions that this country was on the high road to ruin; but the gentlemen who made them would now be the first to admit that England to-day was more prosperous and the people more contented than ever. The predictions with regard to Benefit Societies and their insolvency were as little to be relied on as political prophecies. The last Bill which the House had before it proposed that tables of contributions should be published for the benefit of these societies. Such tables should be framed upon the very lowest scale of payment compatible with security, and for this reason: a working-man might have nominally £75 a-year; but owing to deductions on account of holidays, weather, and other causes, his real earnings might not average more than two-thirds of that sum. A mason, for example, would be better able to pay 3s. or 4s. a-week in summer than a third or fourth of that amount all the year round. The Government, therefore, in preparing tables would do well to make the payments as small as possible. He agreed with the observations which had fallen from his noble Friend the Member for Northumberland (Lord Eslington) with regard to Burial Societies. He could say from his acquaintance with working-men that the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the subject, and the clause in the Bill had been a source of serious pain and grievous annoyance to a large class who viewed it as an insult to themselves. He was quite certain that neither the right hon. Gentleman nor the Royal Commissioners meant that any such interpretation should be put upon what they had done, and that no man in the country seriously harboured the thought that working-men would allow their children to die of neglect or by some means still more culpable if they were enabled to insure their lives. It would be a libel on the working classes to say so. The best course to take would be to strike the clause out of the Bill. He had for years sympathized in their political opinions, and worked with them for their social improvement. He had watched them closely, and he knew that the statement that they were indifferent to their offspring was not founded on fact. No man felt more keenly for the poor man than his brother workman, and the parental feeling of the artizan was as strong for his children as that of other persons in higher classes. It was impossible to meet the views of all parties, or to please such a highly-critical Gentleman as the right hon. Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe); but he had hopes that a Bill would be passed which substantially would meet with general approbation, and which would be satisfactory to the great mass of the working people of this country.

MR. STANSFELD said, he was surprised, after the speech of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen), that he was not prepared to support the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) instead of opposing him, for, if he understood him rightly on this subject, the working classes required protection—but not interference—and that was the view which his right hon. Friend propounded. As to the manner in which the Bill had been drafted, that was a matter which might safely be left to the Committee. Undoubtedly, the quinquennial returns and valuations, however imperfect, would be of value, because, when published, they would have a beneficial effect upon the course of business of these societies. He noted, also, with considerable confidence, the clause in the Bill which referred to the inspection of the affairs of societies as one which would probably be very operative. The subject had been investigated by a Commission consisting of very earnest and able men, and the evidence taken by them showed its great complexity. Instead of entering into a critical discussion of the clauses of the Bill, he would state the general views which he was disposed to entertain, with regard to legislation on this complicated subject. There were two principles under the guidance of which it appeared to him they might safely legislate. The first was one which had been laid down by his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London, and no reply had been made in regard to it by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith). It was that in the interests of the societies themselves and of the community at large, it was right that the societies should have ordinary protection against fraud—that they should be brought within the law and enabled to sue and be sued on easy terms. The second principle was not so absolute, although it recommended itself to his mind. It was that if after adopting the former principle they wished to apply a more stringent law in order, step by step, to raise the character and status of these popular bodies of men it ought to be done by voluntary arrangement, and there ought to be nothing compulsory. If the Legislature was guided by these principles, they would be able to effect all that it was desirable to attempt. With respect to the application of these principles, different methods were possible. Four of the Commissioners who had considered the subject recommended in a separate Report a method of their own. It was that discriminating certificates should be given to the societies, those whose affairs were found by the actuaries to be highly satisfactory receiving a first-class certificate. Having regard to the principles he had mentioned, this plan of requiring all societies to be registered, but granting discriminating certificates, did not recommend itself to him. He thought it too stringent, and that the line of demarcation between the two classes of societies would not be broad enough. Whilst granting protection to all societies, without registration and on deposit of rules, he should be prepared to go much further than this Bill proposed in the direction of making more stringent regulations for the government of registered societies, and so to secure their practical solvency. He should be willing to have registered societies a select class to be dealt with much more stringently than they were at present, but to which additional privileges should be given in return. He should also be prepared to render them greater assistance than it was quite clear that the right hon. Gentleman proposed to give them by this Bill, and he should like to see the machinery of the Bill strengthened. He wished to know why the Bill did not include the provisions which were in the measure of last year for the appointment of an actuary and the framing of insurance tables. The Bill enacted that a society already registered would be a registered society, and that with respect to the societies not registered, they would have to be registered, or else comply with the regulations under which Insurance Companies were established; and the argument of the Secretary to the Treasury was that in this way all Friendly Societies would come within the purview of the Act. He doubted the efficiency of central management and control, and could not see how a Registrar in London could undertake to superintend all those throughout the country, and he therefore hoped the Government would take care to provide an adequate local machinery. On the whole, however, he should advise the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) not to press his Amendment that the Bill should be read a second time that day six months, in the hope that the right hon. Gentleman would give a careful consideration to the various suggestions that had been offered in the course of the debate.

sity of London that the Bill should be re-modelled, in order that it might be better understood, not only by lawyers, but by the officers and members of Benefit Societies. There were provisions in it which were contradictory, and others so obscure as to leave those who attempted to understand them in a perfect fog. It was, he understood, intended that the measure should be applicable not only to England, Scotland, and Ireland, but to the Isle of Man and the Channel Islands; but though the 1st clause provided that the Bill should extend to the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man, the Channel Islands were not again mentioned from the beginning to the end of the Bill, except that in the Interpretation Clause it said that "England" should include the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man. Hon. Members all knew that the Channel Islands were in some respects independent of that House—had Legislatures of their own, and had a system of law of their own, and methods of administering justice totally different to those in force in this country. There would, therefore, be the greatest difficulty in applying the provisions of the Bill to those Islands. With regard to the Isle of Man—indeed, the Bill contained some special provisions, but still its operation in that Island would probably be left doubtful and uncertain. That consideration being borne in mind, it would have been a great deal better if the framers of the Bill had confined their attention in the first instance to England and Wales, and then have added substantive provisions by which to apply it to the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man. He regretted that it was not proposed to repeal the various Acts upon the subject, and to re-enact such portions of them as it might be thought desirable to retain. Upon the whole, however, he could not but express satisfaction that the Bill was a great improvement upon that of last Session, especially with respect to the very reasonable compromise which was now proposed with regard to insurances upon young children, and he would, therefore, support the measure.

MR. MELDON said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer appeared to have altogether forgotten the interests of Ireland in framing the provisions of the Bill. There were two great objections to it as affecting Ireland. In the first place, the

and he was quite prepared to see a Notice placed on the Paper by some hon. Member for reading the Bill a second time that day six months. But he owned he was rather surprised and very sorry to see that Notice in the name of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), because there were very few Members in the House, as he knew, who had paid so much attention to this subject as that hon. Gentleman. He had heard of gentlemen who had worked for six months at the Report of the Royal Commission, but the hon. Member for Glasgow had been working at the question for years before the Royal Commission was appointed, and no one gave them better evidence when they were in Glasgow than the hon. Member. He was, therefore, sorry to find that the Bill had so far displeased the hon. Member that he found it necessary to put so strong a Motion upon the Paper. He hoped, after what had passed, and after what had been stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), the hon. Member would not find it necessary to press his Motion to a division; and that, after the general feeling expressed in all quarters that the measure was at least one deserving of examination and consideration in Committee, it would be allowed to pass the second reading without opposition. He admitted, however, that the hon. Gentleman had raised many points well worthy of attention, and his Motion had given occasion to a debate which could not fail to be instructive, and he hoped useful, in the further stages of the measure. He would endeavour, in the observations he had to make, as far as possible, to keep to the leading principles of the Bill; and he would say it rested upon three principles, of which one—he might call it the main and governing principle of the whole measure—was this, that they should endeavour to proceed by way of recognition and amendment of the present system rather than by endeavouring to sweep it away and establish a new one. If they had a tabula rasa before them; if they had a new work to undertake, he was not prepared to say that the system embodied in this Bill would be in all respects that which they should select. But that was not the state of the case. They were legislating for an existing state of things. A system of law and practice founded on that law had grown up for now quite a century, and they had a very large number indeed of the working class and the lower middle class of this country interested in the system that now existed. According to evidence given before the Commission, they had reason to believe that there were 4,000,000 persons directly, and probably another 4,000,000 indirectly, interested in these societies as they stood, and they must take very great care that any legislation they attempted considered properly the interests of these 8,000,000 persons. The House of Commons was always most tender with respect to vested interests; and were there any vested interests that could compare with those of this great body of people to whom he had referred, who had invested under the present system, he believed, not less than £11,000,000 or £12,000,000 sterling, and in the respect to which any step taken, though seemingly harmless, might produce disastrous consequences? Therefore, they could not deal with this matter in the smooth and easy way in which they might deal with it if they were about to set up a new system, and considering what that new system should be. He ventured to say, both on the ground of policy and justice, they must be very considerate of these people, and of the societies which had come into existence. What was the condition of these societies? There were at least 30,000 Friendly Societies, and of these 22,000 at least had obtained registration; 22,000 societies were now in possession of the field, and their rules bore the signature of Mr. Tidd Pratt or Mr. Stephenson. Were they going to ignore these societies? Were they going to sweep them away altogether? They could not strike out the names which had been signed; they could not—to coin an expression—un-Tidd Pratt these societies. What were they to do with them? Were they to leave them in possession of such a prestige as their present certificate denoted? Surely that would be simply to stereotype the Government approbation to which so much objection was raised. In any action they might take, they must consider the class of persons to whom their legislation applied, and the effect it would have upon them. What was the history of these societies? From what had they sprung? Not from the legislation of Parliament, but from the action of the people themselves. What was that action? It was the effort of the great mass of the people to free themselves from the demoralizing influence of the Poor Law; it was what he might call the heroic conduct of the great mass of the people to provide for themselves. It might, perhaps, be the case that in some of the steps taken they had not altogether kept themselves free from error, follies, or mistakes; but it would be as ungenerous and unworthy to allow the contemplation of these errors and mistakes to blind them to the real merits of that great system, as it would be to criticize the conduct of a patriotic band of Volunteers engaged in defending their native land from hostile invasion, because they did not keep step or march with all the exactness of the Regular Army. This system had grown up by the exertions of the people themselves, and they must take care that what they proposed commended itself to their favourable consideration, otherwise their laws would be waste paper, and things would be no better, perhaps worse, than before. Then, again, they had to consider that this system, though sprung from the people themselves, had been elaborated so far by the concurrence and assistance of the Legislature. They could not say they washed their hands and kept themselves clear of the system. They had made themselves responsible for a great deal that had occurred; and they could not say they would be responsible no longer. They must bear in mind that their laws had been of very great weight in determining the condition into which this question had now come. It was quite true that many of their regulations were not adopted with a view to the precise effect they had produced. The Registrar's certificate, for instance, was to the effect that the rules of such and such a society were in conformity with the law; but it was not originally the intention that the certificate should indicate a well-managed society. It was given on account of the jealousy with which Parliament regarded these secret societies, and was intended merely to imply that there was nothing in the objects of the society contrary to public policy. It was true it had grown into something different; because the Registrar now looked into the rules of the society to see whether they were in conformity with the objects Parliament had in view, and whether they were or were not such as he thought would be calculated to accomplish the objects which the society professed. But, that being what the thing had grown to, they could not set all that aside, because they were already responsible for having brought those societies into the position in which they stood; and if they were now to abandon them and place them in the difficulty in which they would thereby put them, the societies would have a very just cause of complaint against them. Therefore, he said, their new Bill was one founded on the present system, while they also endeavoured to amend that system where it required it. For a main or, at all events, a primary justification of their course in so doing, he would appeal to the men who were connected with those societies and who managed them, themselves; and even the right hon. Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) was compelled to admit that the measure was one which had, on the whole, the approval of the working-classes of the country. And there was a great deal in that. It was everything, in fact, as regarded the principle of the measure; because they were now taking the opinion not of the worst of the working-classes, but by hypothesis that of the very best, the most prudent them—of the men who had done most of to advance the cause of providence and independence among the people. They were taking them into council, and it was in accordance with their views and wishes that they were proceeding in the matter. And having now spent several years in the investigation of that subject, and having had occasion to communicate with large bodies of people, and with the representatives of most of the largest of those societies, he said with confidence that the best of those who represented that cause would tell them boldly and fairly that they looked on the system of registration as a great advantage, and that it had been by the influence of the Registrar and of the Registration system that they had been enabled to bring about many of the reforms they had accomplished. If they asked those who were responsible for the affairs of the Manchester Unity, the Foresters, or other great societies, they would all hold the same language. That did not arise from any desire to throw off the responsibility which belonged to them, or from a wish to lean on Government responsibility; but those persons found in that system, even with the defects pertaining to it, an assistance and support in working out the improvement of their societies, and therefore they desired to uphold it. What happened five years ago, when the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lowe) proposed to alter the system, and brought in a Bill to do away with the Registrar's office? Why, there was such a general movement among the different societies in opposition to that measure, that the right hon. Gentleman was obliged to suspend, if not to abandon, his proposal, and the result was the appointment of the Royal Commission which had led to the introduction of the present Bill. He had said the Bill proceeded on three principles, and that the governing principle was to proceed on the lines of the existing law. And they would do so within these two limits:—First, that they should endeavour, as far as possible, to give assistance and information to the promoters and the members of these societies; and, secondly, that they should require from the promoters and managers of these institutions information which would enable those belonging to them to form good opinions for themselves as to the character, solvency, and general management of the societies of which they were members. And he thought that, on the whole, they had succeeded tolerably well in framing their measure on those lines. He did not say it would not have to be considered and discussed in Committee. There were many amendments in it that would have to be made; but he should be much disappointed indeed if the principles they had sought to lay down were not accepted by the House. With regard to the general tenour of the observations of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), he would admit that the Bill differed materially in several important respects from the recommendations of the Commissioners. The Bill introduced last year was more nearly in accordance with those recommendations than the present Bill. He was not ashamed to say that if the matter were entirely free from difficulties he would prefer that the present Bill should have more closely followed the recommendations of the Commissioners; but the representations made from all parts of the country in conferences which he had held with persons connected with those societies had convinced him and his Colleagues in the Government that it was necessary in some respects to modify those recommendations. He did not, however, think they had departed from them by any means to the extent the hon. Member supposed. They had given up one important provision—he meant the local registration—but in other respects the changes which had been made were more apparent than real. For instance, with regard to the question of Government insurance, that was a matter which lay outside the Bill, and which could not be dealt with in it, although nothing had been said on that subject and certainly nothing had been said to intimate that the Government would not at the proper time, or under the proper restrictions, take that proposal into consideration. He did not wish to express now, on the part of the Government, any opinion favourable or unfavourable upon it. Then with regard to the preparation of the tables and the actuarial staff, it was true that provisions on those points did not appear in the present Bill; but, as had been pointed out by his right hon. Friend the Member for Halifax, those provisions were not necessarily set aside because they did not appear in the Bill. As he had informed the House when introducing the measure, it was the intention of the Government to proceed with the preparation of tables; and the reason why they had not inserted the words in the Bill was that they found an impression prevailing on the part of many societies that the words in the Bill of last year implied that the tables to be put out by the Government were to be compulsory on the societies. That would have been entirely at variance with the principles on which they intended to proceed. Anything further from their intentions than putting out tables that were to be compulsory on those societies could not be conceived. They retained, however, the intention of promulgating such tables; and so with regard to the actuarial staff or whatever staff might be necessary to strengthen the central office; that would receive attentive consideration. Now that they had parted with local registration it followed that they should make the central office as strong as might be requisite for the work it would have to do. With regard to the criticisms of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lowe) he confessed he had expected a very formidable onslaught on the measure from that right hon. Gentleman, and he was somewhat relieved when he found him first directing his attack against the draftsman. That gave him the impression that the right hon. Gentleman had not seen good ground for assailing the principles of the Bill. Some of his strictures as to the drawing up of the Bill turned on points rather of taste and of fancy than of material importance. And when it was said that it was difficult to understand the Bill, he must observe that the great mass of persons connected with those societies with whom he had been in constant communication had found no difficulty in understanding it, whether they altogether approved its provisions or not. Then the right hon. Gentleman opposite said they professed to consolidate the law and repeal all the Acts on the subject with the intention of re-enacting them, but that they left many of them standing, and then they had clauses to invest the Registrar with powers which it was impossible to understand without reference to some Acts which they had repealed. But that was not quite the case. The clause to which the right hon. Gentleman alluded referred, indeed, to the powers possessed by the Registrar under other Acts; but those Acts did not relate to Friendly Societies, but to Savings Banks, Trades Unions, and other institutions which it was attempted last year to weld into one Bill, but which they were compelled to keep separate through the objections—mistaken objections, he thought them—of Trades Unions and other societies to be incorporated into one Bill with Friendly Societies. The right hon. Gentleman said—"You profess to lay down a certain code of law, but you really give the Treasury the power of making regulations which are to be law; therefore, after taking all this trouble to lay down a code of law, it is really the Treasury who are to make regulations for the Registrar, the procedure under this Act, and so forth." That was a very formidable objection at first sight, and he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) turned for a moment to the Bill to find out how they came to put such a clause in it, and then it occurred to him that it was a clause which was not original. It was plagiarised from a very high authority. In fact, it was taken word for word from a clause which was contained in a Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London himself in the year 1870, with two exceptions. One of those exceptions was that in that Bill the President of the Board of Trade was to make these regulations, whereas in this Bill it was to be the Treasury—he did not know whether that made any difference—and the other was that by this Bill the Government proposed that all these regulations should be laid before Parliament, whereas in the right hon. Gentleman's Bill there was no provision of that kind. Therefore, if they had erred, they had erred in very good company. There were other provisions which the right hon. Gentleman criticized; but, as he was not then present, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) would not detain the House by going minutely into them. But there was one observation he made which was a little amusing, because after he told them his objections to the Bill, and said it interfered too much, and hampered societies, he gave them a little cursory sketch, not very fully worked out, of what his own idea was; and his own idea was that they should make model rules for all these societies, and put them into Schedules to the Act. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) must say that if they attempted to deal with these societies on the principle of making model rules for them, and put them into Schedules, they would be doing something much stronger than he had attempted to do by this Bill. He was quite satisfied that the Manchester Unity, the Foresters, and even the Ancient Antediluvian Order of Buffaloes, and other Friendly Societies should be allowed to make their own rules, subject to the condition that the Government should see there was nothing in those rules that was distinctly contrary to law, and provided also that they should see those rules contained matter which it was essential for them to contain in order to give proper information. And such rules as those actually were in the Schedule of this Bill—that was to say, the points which must be touched by those rules were all distinctly set forth in the Schedule, power being reserved to the Treasury to lay before Parliament from time to time such regulations as they might think should be incorporated with those rules. If anybody could feel jealousy on that point, it would be the managers of societies, and he was bound to say that he had discussed with many managers of societies, and he thought, upon the whole, that they were convinced, when they talked the matter over, that it was better the House should not try to cast these rules into hard-and-fast provisions in the Schedules of an Act of Parliament, but should allow the greater elasticity which belonged to the action of the Treasury and the Registrar's Office. As to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) did not know that there was very much in it that it was necessary for him to remark upon. The right hon. Gentleman said that, in his opinion, they ought to bear in mind two principles—first of all, that they ought to afford ordinary protection to all societies against fraud; and, secondly, that if they wished to raise their status they should do that by 'voluntary arrangements.' He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) confessed he did not thoroughly understand the second of those principles. He did not quite understand the meaning of raising their status by voluntary arrangements. It appeared to him that the right hon. Gentleman set aside—as he quite agreed with him in setting aside—the recommendations of half of the Commissioners who wished to make two grades of societies. As to the deposit of rules, it was one of the most inconvenient points in the present law. It was one of the ways by which a door was open to evade provisions of the law, and one of the greatest improvements they could make was to get rid of the system of the deposit of rules. But the right hon. Gentleman said they ought to afford ordinary protection to all societies against fraud. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman meant all Friendly Societies or all societies whatever. If he meant to say that the House ought, by provision of law, to protect all persons associating themselves for any object whatever from fraud, he was quite prepared to agree with him. To a certain extent that was already done by the Act of the Recorder for the improvement of the law of larceny; but that Act did not protect all associations against fraud. He did not think protection ought to be limited to Friendly Societies. He thought they ought to extend whatever protection they wished to give to all associations of persons who were assembled for lawful and innocent purposes. But if he meant to give a privilegium of that kind—protection against fraud—to Friendly Societies, as such, he introduced a different principle, and one that the House would have very carefully to consider. That led him (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) to the consideration that the status of Friendly Societies was a privileged status. That must never be forgotten. They put these societies into a position which they could not occupy by the ordinary law. That was an answer to a great many complaints that were made by them or by writers who said Friendly Societies had this restriction and that restriction put upon them. Those restrictions were imposed upon them because a privilege had been given to them. They were exempt from the legal control to which life insurance companies were subjected, and from the operation of an Act of George III. which prevented the insurance of those in whom the would-be insurers had not an insurable interest. When it was said this legislation accomplished no good whatever—that societies would try to keep out of it, or would disestablish themselves in order to get away from it—he did not consider that was a correct description of the condition of things that would arise. There were ample means and ample inducements for those societies to bring themselves within registration. It was said the registration would be futile, as it had hitherto been. He did not think it would be, because by this Bill, for the first time, the obligations imposed on registered societies were to be enforced by penalties. It was also said—"What was the use of penalties when they had done away with all local registration?" He had confidence in the good sense and good feeling of the managers of the great mass of these societies, and he believed when their attention was really directed to the subject, and they were supported by more stringent and more convenient provisions, they would be quite ready to come forward to make returns in a way that would render it unnecessary to attempt to enforce the making of them. Nothing had struck him with more admiration than the way in which they had for years made these returns, at great trouble to themselves, all the time knowing that no use was being made of them, that they were put on a shelf, and the Registrar's office encumbered with them; that they had received no acknowledgment of them, and that perhaps the only communication they had received was a notice that they ought to send in a return, which they had sent in two or three months before. Looking at the way in which the societies had worked under the present law with all its inconveniences, he confidently expected that the Bill, affording them as it did increased facilities for the conduct of business, would meet with their cordial co-operation. He believed that although the Government had not been able to devise local machinery which could be put into an Act of Parliament they would have the assistance of the local machinery which already existed in carrying out the provisions of the Bill, and that the spirit of independence which was spreading throughout the country, and which the discussions of the Manchester Unity, the Foresters, and other societies did so much to promote would raise them up a host of friends and assistants. This feature of local co-operation was, indeed, one of the great recommendations of the course which the Government were pursuing. The Bill itself, he was convinced, would materially aid in the establishment of county societies, and stimulate the efforts that were being made in every quarter of the land to improve such societies as already existed.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said: The chief objection that has always been made to the existing relations between the Friendly Societies and the Government is, that the system is "neither the one thing nor the other." That there is a plan of Government registration, which by many persons is very naturally taken to imply solvency; while those who really understand the position of affairs well know that registration does not imply solvency at all. So unsatisfactory from this point of view is the existing state of things, that the right hon. Member for the London University (Mr. Lowe) proposed on behalf of the late Government to abolish registration. The chief complaint against the present measure is, that it retains, if it does not intensify, this hesitation in the attitude of Government towards the societies. The Chancellor of the Exchequer refuses to abolish registration altogether; but he still proposes that registration should not be compulsory; and under his Bill, while he will worry the great and solvent societies, he will obtain no additional control over the insolvent societies against which he complains. Personally, I see no objection to a small annual outlay by the State for the maintenance of an officer charged with the duty of collecting and diffusing statistical and actuarial information among the societies; but while the great object that should be sought is to get bodies partly of uneducated and partly of poor men, although in part composed of the best of the working classes and small tradesmen, to avail themselves of actuarial science—to force this upon them by Government interference is to make them at once dislike it, and in reality to defeat your own ends. They will make a perfunctory use of the regulations which you obtrude upon them, and when difficulties arise, they will shift the responsibility from off their own shoulders, and cast the entire blame upon the Government and its officials. If you leave them to find out—as the Manchester Unity of Odd Fellows and the Ancient Order of Foresters already have done—the value of actuarial skill for themselves, they will value it in a higher degree, and be less likely to resign the advantages which once they will have conquered. By what means have caution and prudence in the investment of savings been, so far as they have been, instilled into the minds of the richer classes? By experience, taught and brought home to them through the losses of the less intelligent. I do not believe that you will make men more prudent by a system designed to do that which cannot be done—namely, guarantee them against all possible loss. In throwing doubt upon the value of this Bill, I do not wish to attack either the policy of the appointment of the Commission, or the Report, as a whole, which that Commission made. The evidence collected was of enormous value, and the Reports of the Assistant-Commissioners form a text-book of all the learning upon the subject. But a great many of the remarks in the Report of the Commissioners themselves—while they are of value as suggestions to the societies for their self-improvement, are not of use to us for legislative purposes; because they refer to subjects with which the State cannot hope to deal successfully. I venture to believe that the true policy which should guide us is to aid in the diffusion of sound knowledge and information; but to leave the business of seeing that the law is not infringed to the action of the individuals who may be aggrieved in the ordinary Courts of the country. If you wish to go further—if you think that you can point out evils to justify a departure from the ordinary practice of the State—then, I venture to suggest that your action should take the form of a prevention of the creation of new societies with bad rules. This would have the effect of giving a virtual monopoly to the older and more powerful orders. New societies, at the present time, start in country districts by offering to the young an inducement of lower contributions than those of the older societies; and if you can prove that this evil is on the increase, the prevention of the creation of new societies with false rules is the proper way to meet it, and not interference with the old societies that already exist; because you dare not propose as regards the old societies an interference such as would really form a safeguard. You are not prepared to insist on registration; you are not prepared to suppress by force the whole of the unsound societies. You did not propose it even in your first Bill of last year; your second Bill was still further from it; and the third Bill which we have before us now, is still further off from it again. You wish to induce societies to register; but the more restrictions you put upon their financial transactions, the more you force the weak and bad societies—which are the very ones you want to register—away from, and out of, registration; and that is the great blot upon the Commissioners' Report and upon the three Bills. But it is questionable whether the worst of the existing societies cannot be dealt with directly by the existing law. The Commissioners say, page ccii., section 867, that the country swarms with illegal companies, and that of the 10,000 unregistered Friendly Societies, probably 4,000 are setting at defiance

the Life Assurance Companies' Acts. I think it would be found that the majority of the worst societies have incurred heavy penalties under the Act of 1870; but, if not, they would fall under the old Assurance Act, 14 Geo. III., c. 48, and their insurances probably are void at law at the present moment, and might be repudiated. Others—the worst of the dividing societies—are illegal companies, under the 4th section of the Companies' Act of 1862. It is therefore absurd to agitate the country in favour of a stringent friendly societies' law on the ground that in the rural districts, and in parts of the North of England, the poor are swindled by bad societies; when, on the one hand, the Bill which you introduce would not touch the evil in the least, but, on the contrary, by frightening them out of registration, would intensify it; while, on the other hand, it can be contended with at least some show of argument, that the worst of the bad societies have already made themselves obnoxious even to the present law. Mr. Bircham, in his most valuable additional and separate Report—page cxxi.—points out that societies which persist in not registering—which will increase in number as the law is made more vexatious, will not be touched by any of the registration proposed. Fraudulent and designing managers will purposely keep those bad and feeble societies out of legislation, so as to escape the perils which you put in their way by your new laws. Yet it is the ignorant members of these bad and feeble societies, who are just the people that you want to help, because the strong can take care of themselves. Mr. Bircham having seemingly a prophetic knowledge of what your Bill would be, pointed out that such a measure would mean less power of controlling the societies, which would hold themselves outside the law, and less power to interfere with, or even to inquire into, the affairs of the worst organizations than of the best. That the fears of the harm that you may do by increasing your interference are not mere idle bug-bears, is clear, from the harm which, in similar cases, you have already done. At page xliii, sections 155 and 156, it is shewn that the virtual independence which the former Friendly Societies Acts have conferred on branches has very seriously interfered with the solvency of the great orders. In the case of the Fireman's Society, one of the branches altered its rates and scale in a wrong direction, and the controlling body, which would otherwise have prevented the change, has, under your legislation, lost its power to do so—the Registrar being legally bound to accept alterations by the branches which he knew to be, and which the society knew to be, financially unsound; and the Registrar now, contrary to his former practice, refuses even to certify a branch rule providing that the rules of the branches shall not be altered without the assent of the general body. You may meet one such case of hardship by this Bill; but where you meet one you create a dozen, which is a fate that always attends Government interference with the affairs of the people. If you must needs interfere, strengthen the old orders, strengthen the head quarters, strengthen the control of the governing bodies over the branches. But, at the present moment, your interference goes in the opposite direction, although the Commissioners can find no words too strong to express their delight at the progress which is being made by the central bodies of the affiliated orders. The Commissioners state—

"That they are increasing not only in magnitude, but also in stability;" that the smaller clubs "are rapidly diminishing under the stress of the competition of the affiliated orders;" "that it is impossible to deny that they may succeed in rectifying their remaining faults, after they have already succeeded in rectifying so many;"— and in answer to Question 59, the gentleman who has been for 37 years examiner of the rules of Friendly Societies in the Registrar's office, says—

"As regards the Manchester Unity and the Foresters, persons deputed by those orders have drawn up a model set of rules, which guide all their branches, and meet all their requirements. They were submitted to our office some years ago, were examined, and were settled with the secretary of each order. All difficulties are smoothed over, and their rules are now certified almost without alteration," and that is without your present Bill. Now, I am aware that the Chancellor of the Exchequer thinks that the great societies are friendly to his Bill. The fact is, that while there is a powerful and active minority among the governing bodies of the great orders, who are opposed to this Bill root and branch, there is a majority favourable to accepting it provided that changes are made in it to which he has said there is no chance that he will agree. To show that I am correctly stating their view, I must quote their words. These are from the speech of the spokesman of the deputation who waited on the Chancellor of the Exchequer—

"As they had grown to their present proportions without help from any Government, it was not unnatural that members should be jealous of any action or over interference on the part of the Government, knowing as they did, that the success as yet attained, has rested with themselves, who for the most part are really working men earning weekly wage . . . they regretted to find in the amended Bill several matters which, if passed into law in their present shape, would inflict upon their societies very serious injury."

It then named a series of points of which only one is touched by the changes that have been since made in the Bill. In the official document which they put out as to the second Bill of last Session, they said—

"The great professed aim of the Bill is to bring all friendly societies within the limits of registry. This is most desirable, but we submit that the Bill defeats its own aim by imposing such regulations and restrictions as must tend to prevent registration on the one hand, and to drive societies already registered to form themselves under the Companies Acts on the other. While the Bill assumes to propound a remedy for certain real or alleged evils, it is marked throughout with the utmost indefiniteness of provisions in detail, leaving its issues to the caprice or experimental regulations of sundry officials specified therein—a course which could not fail to lead to litigation and increased expenditure without efficient result. While the Bill is professedly incompetent as to detail of suitable provisions, it has deputed extreme and almost unlimited powers to the central office, giving in effect the force of an Act of Parliament to any regulations that may be drawn up by such office."

They then go on to speak of the provisions of the Bill as—

"Extreme and impracticable—totally inadequate and unsatisfactory to the societies and to the country at large, and tending to diminish the self-reliance so important to working-men in their own affairs."

Now, that is what the Chancellor of the Exchequer calls the societies supporting his Bill! The Scotch societies, in their Report on this very amended Bill now before us—that is—on the third edition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's scheme, use language of a similar kind. Yet no one knows better than he does how great are the interests at stake. The measure seriously affects societies possessing 4,000,000 of members and £12,000,000 of funds, and that is a measure, which we are not in the House of Commons bound to accept upon the ipse dixit of a Minister, even though he does tell us that the societies themselves do not oppose it. Some of the societies believe that if they do not pass this Bill they will be worried more and more, year by year, without end. They think that while it will not do any good, it will not do very much harm—a reason which I think is hardly sufficient for our passing a most complicated measure, and one upon which we possess singularly little knowledge. Bills are often passed with hardly any opposition, which afterwards we regret; and we often in the House of Commons vote for measures—which subsequently we wish we had opposed;—as, for instance, the Licensing Act of the late Government, which we passed without opposition through the House except upon points of detail, although it was a measure at least of doubtful expediency. The famous proviso to which I called attention last year, that registration—

“shall not be taken to imply that the rules of the society, in respect to which the same may be given, are legal, or that the society, is established on a sound basis,”

has been omitted in the new Bill; but, until corrected, I venture to think that the words have been omitted by the draftsman, upon receiving a hint from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that they revealed too nakedly the impolicy of the Bill, and I would ask whether the omission of the words taken by itself has any significance whatever. I think that when the Chancellor of the Exchequer had once put those words in his Bill, and had so shown his hand, and revealed the weakness of the measure, he might just as well have left them as before this year, and that their omission has no force, and that they were equally understood whether they were there or not. I have also another great ground of objection to this Bill, and it is that it lumps together the great orders, the small friendly societies, the burial clubs, the benevolent societies, workmen's clubs, cattle insurance societies, fishermen's societies for the insurance of boats and nets; whereas the great friendly societies ought, if dealt with by Parliament at all, to be dealt with by a Bill which would apply only to themselves.

I have but one thing to add to my criticism of the Bill, and that is, that those things in it which appear to be good, are, without exception, contained in the existing law—namely, the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, being an Act to consolidate the law relating to Friendly Societies, as amended by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 101, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 58. Those three Acts the Bill repeals and re-enacts, nobody knows why. Probably, for the reason for which most new Acts of Parliament are passed—namely, that a Commission has sat upon the subject, and has made a Report; that a clause has been put into the Queen's Speech promising legislation. We should remember that there is no country in the world which can show anything like our great orders. I, for one, should greatly regret to see Government attempt to undertake that which we already find the people are doing for themselves. We cannot be too careful when we are dealing with great associations affecting the interests of enormous numbers of people, and organizing the greater portion of the tendencies towards providence, and towards brotherly help, which exist among the people of this country. I dare say there are many who will have to deal with this subject who are hardly aware of the numbers and wealth of the great orders—indeed, I may observe that Parliament is, perhaps, less competent to deal with the subject of Friendly Societies than with any that could be brought to its notice. Sir George Young, one of the Assistant-Commissioners, has said—

“Everywhere that I have been I have heard the same story from members of the older or local clubs. We cannot stand against the great orders; wherever they penetrate, the existing clubs at once cease to enter young members, and within half a generation they die out or break up. . . . Of the various orders which have come under my notice, there is none that can be said to occupy a third place with the Manchester Unity of Odd Fellows, and the (London) Ancient Order of Foresters. I have visited no town, and but few large villages, in which a ‘lodge’ or ‘court’ of these orders was not to be found. . . . The constitution and character of these societies is well known to the Commissioners. They aim at combining the advantages of local and non-local clubs, their branches being financially independent, as far as the sick pay is concerned, but interdependent within limits of a district, so far as the liability for burial money is concerned; while the districts, again, are independent of each other in all pecuniary relations, but co-operate in sending delegates to a general assembly for legislative purposes, and the whole is kept together by a central executive, responsible only to the general meeting, and elected by the delegates. This form of benefit club appears to have been first worked out by the Odd Fellows (Manchester Unity), and since it is the undisputed invention of men belonging to the class for whom benefit societies are intended, it is important to point how admirably it is adapted to meet the primary requisitions of a good system of thrift, as thrift is understood by the members of that class in England. I find it to be universal that the first benefit desired by the working man from his club is the weekly provision in case of sickness; the second is with equal unanimity declared to be the sum at death, to clear off standing scores, pay funeral expenses, and assist a widow or children through the first days of bereavement. There is not an equal concurrence of opinion as to the third, but a very considerable number are in practice found to prefer an increase upon the usual burial benefit, to any other. Taking these two to be the primary objects of a benefit club, the chief difficulties encountered in securing them are, in the first case, imposition; in the second, insufficient numbers to form a basis of insurance. The mischief which may be done by imposition and by lax administration, which accompanies it, is best guarded against by confining the sick club to a small area within which the members know each other, and each can watch his neighbour, while the intenser personal interest which they naturally take in a fund locally subscribed, ensures that the supervision shall be stricter. A small area may be sufficient to afford a basis for sick pay, while insufficient to ensure burial money, because the payments are smaller in the proportion of shillings to pounds, and are distributed among a larger number of the members. In the case of burial benefits, the risk requires a large area, which is found in the district of the affiliated orders. The sagacity necessary for the guidance of such great societies, as these have become, is sought out by the delegate system and utilized in the central executive, and the general meeting so organized is both an excellent medium for disseminating just ideas throughout the order, upon the questions brought to issue, and also a fair representation of the best opinion current among the members. I purposely abstain from entering into a more particular examination of the system pursued in these societies. But I desire to express a conviction, formed by intercourse with their members in every place I have visited, that their claim to speak in the name of the present generation of working men, so far as concerns the largest section of the most intelligent among them, is well founded; and that their existence and prosperity, founded as it is upon the spontaneous energies and mutual help of individuals, without external initiative, and with but a minimum of Government aid, is in itself a valuable national possession. "Ce qui a fait jusqu'ici le succès de ces sociétés,—succès lent à la vérité comme tout ce qui concerne les masses, c'est la liberté, et cela s'explique."—Bastiat Harmonies Economiques.

The Registrars of Friendly Societies have also stated (Question 14,976) that the Foresters and Odd Fellows Societies have a far better system than the smaller societies; and, if so, that is surely a ground for not dealing with them in the same Bill with burial societies and societies of an inferior type. I want to know what is the result you can hope to obtain by this Bill, in regard to those societies, other than that which you have already obtained without it? But my real objection to the Bill is, that which I have already pointed out, namely—that while it contains stringent and objectionable provisions pressing upon registered societies, it furnishes no particular reasons to induce societies to register; and that in consequence it would be the solvent societies that alone would come under the operation of an Act which is intended to protect persons against the insolvent societies.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY wished to say, in reply to the challenge of the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), that the Executive Committee of the Ancient Order of Foresters, who had asked him to represent their interests in the House, viewed that Bill with great satisfaction. They considered that it dealt with them most tenderly as one of those great solvent societies which were doing so much good; and that if they were not cumbered and fettered by any further restrictions in Committee, they were perfectly prepared to accept the Bill.

MR. DODSON said, he was disposed to approve of the plan that the Government should prepare and publish tables of mortality, rates of contributions, and other model forms; and he would suggest that there would be an advantage in providing, by a clause in the Bill, that it should be the duty of the Government to prepare such tables, but that the use of them by societies was to be optional. After the very general consensus of opinion on the part of the House that the Bill should go forward, he trusted that hon. Members would not be put to the trouble of going to a division.

MR. SALT agreed that, in the main, these great societies were in favour of this Bill; but, at the same time, he had received from a most important body of Friendly Societies an expression in strong terms of their doubts as to the working of several parts of the measure. He would urge that the objections to the Bill should be most carefully considered before going into Committee. The position, functions, duties, and powers of the Registrar, and the definition of what Friendly Societies really were, were points requiring special consideration. But the real point was, whether the Bill really covered one half of the question. It was distinctly shown before the Royal Commission that more than half of the societies were unregistered, and the House ought to know distinctly before it parted with the Bill whether these societies were to be brought under the Companies, Life Insurance, and other existing Acts, or whether they would be dealt with by the Bill.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON confirmed the statement of the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. E. Ashley) with regard to the feeling of the Order of Foresters. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not hurry on the consideration of the Bill in Committee.

DR. CAMERON said, that after the general expression of opinion which had been given by the House, he would withdraw his Amendment.

BUILDING SOCIETIES ACT (1874)

AMENDMENT BILL—[BILL 72.]

(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Mr. Assheton Cross.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, explained the reasons which had induced the Government to bring in an Amendment Bill to an Act which had been passed last Session. It was found that an error had inadvertently occurred in the passing of that Act in "another place." There had been an understanding between the different building societies and the Government that the Bill should be of a permissive character; but by the inadvertent placing of a sentence, a compulsory nature was given to it, thus entirely altering the terms on which the Building Societies had accepted the measure. The matter had been brought under the notice of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, and the Bill which he placed on the Table was entirely limited to the correction of the error.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday next.

POLICE MAGISTRATES [SALARIES].

Resolution [February 23] reported;

"That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of the Consolidated Fund, of increased Salaries to the Magistrates of the Police Courts in the Metropolis."

Resolution agreed to.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON moved for leave to introduce a Bill, to make further provision with respect to the salaries of the magistrates of the police Courts in the Metropolitan Police District, founded on the Resolution of the House. As far back as 1838 a Select Committee reported in favour of increasing the salaries of the police magistrates, and in the following year the Act of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 17 fixed those salaries at £1,200. In 1855, the salary of the chief magistrate was increased to £1,500. As, however, the magistrates were inadequately paid as compared with the County Court Judges and some of the Registrars, and as their duties had been multiplied by numerous statutes passed since the latter date, the Government were of opinion that the time had now arrived when their salaries should be further increased.

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, Mr. Secretary CROSS, and Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH.

EXPLOSIVE SUBSTANCES BILL.

RESOLUTION. FIRST READING.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in rising to move, that the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law with respect to manufacturing, keeping, selling, carrying, and importing Gunpowder, Nitro-Glycerine, and other Explosive Substances, said, the subject was brought before the late Government before the great explosion of last year, and one of the first acts of the present Government was to appoint a Committee to consider the whole of the circumstances relating to Explosive Substances, and they eventually produced a Report which he believed to be a most satisfactory one, and on that Report the present Bill was for the most part based. It was a Consolidating Bill, and it proposed to repeal all other public Acts relating to explosive substances, so that all the law on the subject might be contained within the four corners of the Bill. It would consist of four parts. The first would deal with the manufacture, storage, and carriage of gunpowder, and would contain all the main provisions and safeguards hitherto contained in regulations only. Part 2 would deal with nitroglycerine and other explosive substances of an equally dangerous character, the regulations respecting which, instead of being contained in the Bill, would be left to a great extent to the Secretary of State. Part 3 related to administration and the power of inspection, and Part 4 to the legal proceedings incident to the carrying out of the Act. In legislating with regard to gunpowder, they had to deal with the manufacturer and the man who kept a large store magazine; next, with persons, like mine-owners, who used large quantities of powder for the purpose of their business, and kept what might be called consumers' stores. Then came the retail dealer, who was at present almost without legislation. As to the place of manufacture and the large store magazine, the licensing would be left as at present with the Petty Sessions in counties and the local authorities in other cases, subject, in case of refusal, to an appeal to the Secretary of State for the Home Department. One change was made in the law. At present it was found that local authorities were sometimes either too lenient or too strict in granting licences. They were generally country gentlemen. They did their duty to the best of their ability, but had no real knowledge of the dangers to be apprehended, and the best way of preventing them. Following, therefore, the recommendations of the Committee, the Bill provided that before a man applied for a licence he should submit his plans to the inspection of the Secretary of State, who would pronounce whether, in his opinion, considering the nature of the site and other circumstances, the plan proposed was a safe one. Even if his Report was favourable, the local authority would still be able to refuse the licence, having regard to present or future buildings around the proposed site. Such a decision, however, would, as at present, be subject to appeal to the Secretary of State. General rules were provided in part 1 for the safety of the public in the manufacture and storage of gunpowder, and persons carrying on this business would be required to make special rules for the regulation of their workmen. In the case of existing factories, application must be made to the Secretary of State for continuing licences, in order that he might know where the factory was; but there would be no alteration in the terms of the licence, and the proprietors would, so far, be in exactly the same position as at present. Then, with regard to consumers' stores, regulations would be laid down by means of which upon licence from the local authorities, consumers would be able to keep from 2 cwt. up to two tons. The Bill dealt with retailers on still easier terms. The Government had no wish to put them under any unnecessary restrictions, but it was right that persons who dealt with these dangerous substances should be known, and therefore they would be called upon to get themselves registered by the local authorities. That could be done on payment of nominal fees, sufficient to keep the machinery of registration going. By this means it would always be known where powder was. This dealt with dealers who were allowed to have up to 200 lb. of powder on their premises at one time, the amount being regulated according to the conditions of storage. Those who kept powder only for their own use, provided it did not amount to over 30 lbs, need not register themselves. Gunmakers would be allowed to have a larger stock of powder in cartridges than was permitted at present. Certain provisions had been inserted in order that gunpowder might be safely carried. It would be absolutely impossible to lay down in a Bill positive rules and regulations for the carriage of gunpowder under every possible circumstance. It was, therefore, thought better to enact that bye-laws should be made for the purpose; but, then, those bye-laws would not be left totally "at large," but what their scope should be would be indicated in the Bill. The second part of the Bill related entirely to all other explosives. It adopted to a great extent the machinery for licences in the first part of the Bill; but, instead of laying down specific rules, it left to the Secretary of State a wide discretion in the matter. There were a great many explosives which did not require to be so stringently dealt with as nitro-glycerine, and suitable regulations and relaxations with regard to them would be found in this part of the measure. The third part of the Bill dealt simply with the administration of the law, or, in other words, with the power of inspection. There would be Government Inspectors who would have certain powers of entry, and there were clauses in the Bill as to their making reports and inquiries in cases of accident. It was made incumbent on the local authorities to see that the provisions of the Act were enforced within their jurisdiction, but they would not have power to enter the large factories. The fourth part related simply to legal procedure for the purpose of putting the Act into force, and gave larger powers to owners of factories and great magazines to eject, if necessary by force, anyone doing anything likely to cause danger of fire or explosion. These were the main features of the Bill. It was now in print, and in a few days would be in the hands of Members. What he would propose was to take the second reading some time before Easter than to allow the Bill to rest until after the holidays, in order that persons interested in the trade might have a full opportunity of becoming acquainted with its clauses and of making their views on the subject known to the Government.

MR. WHITWELL approved of the mode in which the Bill was drafted. He hoped, however, that, should the Government Inspector refuse to licence any works, his decision should not be considered final, as such a provision might be made a hindrance of trade. He hoped, too, that the rules relating to the transport of gunpowder would not be made too restrictive.

In reply to MR. GRIEVE,

MR. ASSHETON CROSS stated that the Bill would apply to Scotland.

MR. M'LAGAN inquired whether the Bill dealt with petroleum?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, it did not, but that he intended to propose the continuance, for perhaps two years, of an expiring Act relating to petroleum.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law with respect to manufacturing, keeping, selling, carrying, and importing Gunpowder, Nitro-Glycerine, and other Explosive Substances.

Resolution reported: — Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary CROSS, Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, and Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH.

MOUNTJOY FEMALE PRISON.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. SULLIVAN moved for—

"Copies of any Charge or Complaint, if any, preferred against Mrs. Ellen Richardson, Deputy Matron of Mountjoy Female Prison, in reference to the circumstances stated by the Chief Secretary for Ireland to have been the reasons for removing her from the public service; of any Evidence taken at any investigation, if any was held, into the justice of any such charge or complaint against her; and, of any Correspondence on the subject between Mrs. Richardson and the Chief Secretary or Captain Barlow, or between the Chief Secretary and Captain Barlow."

The hon. Member said, he had reason to believe that Mrs. Richardson had been dismissed without fault or investigation, and he contended that the circumstances had a public as well as a personal interest, inasmuch as they afforded an illustration of the evil of leaving these persons under a despotic authority which acted without the check of public criticism.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That there be laid before this House, Copies of any Charge or Complaint, if any, preferred against Mrs. Ellen Richardson, Deputy Matron of Mountjoy Female Prison, in reference to the circumstances stated by the Chief Secretary for Ireland to have been the reasons for removing her from the public service:

"Of any Evidence taken at any investigation, if any was held, into the justice of any such charge or complaint against her:

"And, of any Correspondence on the subject between Mrs. Richardson and the Chief Secretary or Captain Barlow, or between the Chief Secretary and Captain Barlow."—(Mr. Sullivan.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he thought it could be shown that it was necessary to have the convict prisons of Ireland under a central authority, and that that authority had been exercised with good judgment and discretion. He could not agree to the Return for which the hon. Member moved, because it was unusual to print Minutes passing between two officials in the public service which were more or less of a confidential character, and as to the remainder of the correspondence, it consisted of little more than Mrs. Richardson's own letters. In September last an outbreak occurred in the prison of such a character as to show that the discipline had been lax, and for the circumstances that had led to this state of things Mrs. Richardson had been held to be in great measure blameable. Her duty was mainly to superintend the conduct of other prison officers; yet for the last 10 years only in one single instance had she reported any neglect of duty, though the state of the prison in September showed how much cause there must have been for such reports to be made. The Report from Captain Barlow was to the effect that the prison could not be properly worked while she held her office. It was true there was a medical inquiry into her health, not to call upon her to resign on account of ill health, but to ascertain whether her failure to perform her duty was, in any degree, due to this cause; and in consequence of her long services and personal character, he intended to recommend her for a moderate pension.

MR. MELDON recommended that the Motion should be withdrawn and the matter left in the hands of the Chief Secretary.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

House adjourned at a quarter

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Patents for Inventions (15).

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS BILL.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

(NO. 15.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, this is a question in the discussion of which, I believe, no party feeling can enter. I may at once announce that it is not my intention to vote against the second reading of the Bill; but on several grounds I would venture to follow up the suggestion I made when the noble and learned Lord laid the Bill upon the Table, and ask him to consent to its being sent to a Select Committee upstairs. I feel that I can make this request with the less difficulty, because the same appeal was made to myself when, as Vice President of the Board of Trade, some 24 years ago, I introduced a Bill on the subject of the Patent Laws. In bringing the measure now before the House under our Lordships' notice, on occasion of the first reading of the Bill now before your Lordships, the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack treated the subject in an exhaustive manner. He gave your Lordships the entire history of the Patent Laws, and in doing so pointed out that those laws originated in no enactment of the Legislature, but had their origin in a monopoly which was excepted from the general repeal of monopolies effected by the statute passed in the reign of James I. I think, my Lords, it is clear that when patents were first granted they were granted not so much in the interest of inventors as a revenue to persons favoured by the Sovereign, who were the sole possessors of patents at that time. I think it further appears that the Patent Laws in continental countries were not of that restrictive character which they are now; because in those times the exercise of trades in the ordinary way was not permitted to any persons but the members of guilds; but patents gave persons not in guilds the right of manufacturing articles to which the patents applied. My Lords, we have heard much about the property a man has in his invention. I think the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack fully disposed of that. As the noble and learned Lord showed, it is impossible to limit a man's right in property. If it is property in the usual sense, it ought not to be limited—a man has a right to use his own invention; but it is a different thing to assume that he may prevent anyone else using it. The fallacy about an invention being also property was also clearly demonstrated by my noble and learned Friend behind me (Lord Selborne), in a speech made by him in the House of Commons some seven years ago. It has been given in evidence that this is the principle which has been laid down in decisions of the Courts, and I observe that Mr. Bramwell, the ablest defender of patent rights, although he does not distinctly abandon the ground of property, entirely lays it aside as the basis of his argument. Now, my Lords, the evidence taken on the subject of the Patent Laws and a careful consideration of the whole question have led me to the conclusion that Patent Laws are a mistake, and that their entire abolition would be not only for the benefit of the public at large, but for that of the class in whose interests they are usually advocated—I mean the inventors themselves. Before proceeding to state some of the reasons which have influenced me in coming to this conclusion, perhaps your Lordships will allow me to refer to another mistake made by some of those who are in favour of patents. They ask, what is the difference between authorship and invention, and what is the difference between allowing a patent for an invention and allowing copyright for a book? Well, my Lords, there is an obvious answer to this—indeed, all the arguments that can be put forward in favour of a patent for an invention may be urged with at least equal force in favour of copyright for authorship; while the latter is open to none of the objections which tell forcibly against the former. A man—let me say my noble Friend (Lord Stanhope), who is not now in the House—writes a book. The authorship cannot be contested, and it is admitted to be impossible to allege that anyone else is the author of the book. Well, it is true that no one else may publish that book; but there is not an idea nor an argument in it that any other writer may not adopt and make use of in his own writings. My attention was first drawn to this subject in a conversation with one of the ablest, most fertile, and boldest inventors I ever knew—the late Mr. Brunel. He told me what he afterwards stated before a Committee of your Lordships' House, how much he had been connected with patents. How he had for a long time resolved to have nothing to do with them. How they interfered daily with improvements which he saw might be advantageously adopted in the plant and machinery of a railway; how injurious they were to workmen as well as to their employers. I subsequently had an opportunity of learning the opinions of the late Sir William Cubitt, who had been a working man himself, and who was one of the most prudent and cautious persons I ever met. Well, Mr. Brunel agreed with Sir William Cubitt in the opinion that the Patent Laws were not to the advantage of either inventors or the community. I am aware that opinion is much divided on this subject; that it has been much discussed; and that, by high authorities who differ on the point, much argument has been brought forward on both sides. I can assure your Lordships that in anything I may say on the subject I am in no way influenced by hostility to inventors. Half the arguments of those who uphold patent rights are simply in favour of inventions, and they treat the opponents of patent rights as if they were all of the same opinion as an old official at the Admiralty, who said to Mr. Sydney Herbert soon after his entrance into the office—"Sir, I was sorry to see you speak to that man, he is an inventor, and it is not for the first time, he invented something last year." Now, no one honours them more than I do, I do not believe that any others—whether statesmen, warriors, or poets, or artists—have done so much to benefit the human race as inventors, and therefore I, for one, should not be disposed to deprive them of any share of the advantage which they ought to derive from their inventions; but the question is whether the present system—I speak of the Patent Laws—is of any real advantage to them. I do not believe it is; nor do I think it is of any benefit to the community. There are, of course, some persons to whom it is of advantage. It is of advantage to lawyers whose practice is connected with patents; to scientific men who advise patentees, and who give evidence on Patent trials; to patent agents and patent-mongers; and also to some large and respectable firms, who buy up patents, some for use, and some for obstruction, and who find them profitable as advertisements and puff: of course, those numerous persons who purchase up patents for the purpose of securing their own monopolies profit by them; but I am convinced that, as a class, inventors suffer by it. Another evil which I would point out in connection with the system is, that by a patent an artificial merit is often given to an invention which has no real merit. Your Lordships know that a patent is no evidence of merit in the invention; but among a large section of the public a contrary impression prevails, and thus a person who is able to purchase a patent for an inferior contrivance often stands in the way of meritorious inventors. The great argument put forward in favour of patents is that they stimulate inventors and induce persons to invent. Now, in the first place, I would remark that some of the authorities who are most strongly in favour of patents complain that under the existing system patents are in many instances unremunerative—that they do not compensate the inventor for his loss of time and money. I believe this is true. It is said, however, that there are exceptions, and that some few patentees make great fortunes. I must express my belief that the making of great fortunes by patents is a thing quite distinct from the inventions. By some inventions of little or no merit great fortunes are made; while some inventions of very great merit are not so rewarded. But as to this argument about stimulating inventors, I should say in reply to it, that of all persons who could be named inventors require stimulation the least. You do not stimulate inventors of real talent by your Patent Laws—the inventors you do stimulate are those of whose inventions not one in a hundred has the least chance of success. Remember, my Lords, that nearly all inventions of real value proceed step by step. One improvement—and perhaps it is only a very slight one—is followed by another, till the contrivance is made perfect, or as far as may be so. This being so, the result of the Patent Laws is, that the inventor is often retarded, if not stopped in his progress, because his next step may be regarded as an infringement of a patent. No doubt, the prospect of obtaining a patent has a certain amount of attraction for working men. They regard an invention as property, and look forward to securing a great stroke of fortune; but, my Lords, I doubt whether this is a wholesome stimulation. There is much of the gambling spirit so common to the human race in this endeavour to make a fortune by means of a patent. We know how strong a passion the gambling spirit is in the human race—so strong that in some countries where the Government is averse from a continuance of the State lotteries, they dare not do away with that species of gambling. I have not the slightest doubt that this gambling spirit induces a number of poor men to abandon a practical use of their ability and to fix their mind exclusively on one intellectual venture with the idea that they will make their fortune by it. Take some of the inventions which are most valuable to the human race, and take one of the most distinguished of the professions—I mean the medical profession. Does a physician or a surgeon take out a patent for any invention to alleviate the sufferings of mankind? Why, if he did, the members of his profession would refuse to meet him; they would exclude him from their professional society, and I believe they would expel him from the College of Surgeons or the College of Physicians, as the case might be. Now, as to the supposed benefit of patents to poor men. Mr. Mundella, in his evidence before the Committee of the House of Commons on Patent Laws, gave several instances of the marvellous tenacity with which poor workmen pursued the carrying out of their designs under circumstances of the greatest difficulty. One of those instances was a narrative full of pathos. Your Lordships know that Mr. Mundella has achieved a well-earned reputation as an excellent and benevolent employer. He found a poor man in a wretched garret in a starving condition working at the development of an invention in which his mind was wholly absorbed. Mr. Mundella took the man from the garret, paid him 30s. a-week, and put him under a skilled mechanic. The invention was worked out and a patent taken for it by Mr. Mundella, who gave the man one-third of the profits of the invention. This is the way in which Mr. Mundella acts with poor inventors, and would he not have behaved in a similar way if there had been no Patent Law? Would he not have given the same assistance to an ingenious and inventive workman, and have, at an earlier period, prevented the destruction of the man's health, caused by his desire to let no one know his secret. But take the reverse case. Suppose Mr. Mundella was a hard-hearted man, and that he had found this poor inventor starving in his wretched garret—he would have allowed him to starve for a few days longer, and then have bought the invention for a few shillings and have worked it for his own profit, the unfortunate inventor having nothing more to do with it. Again, look at the jealousies to which the system gives rise as between the manufacturers and the operatives. When any of the latter are inventors, and are endeavouring to work out their inventions in the factory, the manufacturer is jealous lest his own premises and his own machinery may serve for the development of something which will be used against him. On the other hand, there is on the part of the inventive workman the fear that his employer may deprive him of the profit of his own ideas. Another argument put forward in favour of the Patent Laws is that this country would labour under a disadvantage if we had no Patent Laws, seeing that other countries have them. I believe this to be an entire mistake. It is to be remembered that there are no Patent Laws in Holland or in Switzerland, and in Germany the Patent Law is a nullity. I doubt if there is any nation more shrewd than Holland; and as to Switzerland, I think I can show that my noble Friend (Lord Houghton) must have been labouring under a mistake a few years ago when he said, "I never heard of any manufactures in Switzerland except alpenstocks and long hotel bills." Mr. Samuelson, in his evidence stated—

"In the year 1867 I visited Switzerland, and I was surprised to find how successfully our inventions in spinning machinery are immediately copied there, the result being that our trade in spinning machinery, so far as neutral countries are concerned, more especially the South of Germany and the North of Italy, has been transferred almost entirely to the Swiss; and they have this advantage—that they are able to avail themselves of a combination of English patented inventions, each of which is a monopoly in this country, and they are thus able to produce occasionally a better spinning machine

Now, as to foreign inventors in their relations with this country. It is said that foreign inventors would not come to this country with their inventions if we had not Patent Laws. I believe that men of great technical knowledge and of inventive intellect would always come to this country, even without Patent Laws, rather than go to a country inferior in wealth and natural resources with Patent Laws. But suppose they would not. In that case we could send to other countries for the inventions of those foreigners, getting them for nothing. Much has been said about the extensive patent system of the United States; but I think the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack showed your Lordships the other night that it was not desirable we should follow that example. There appear to be too many patents in that country. My Lords, I cannot help being much struck with these observations of my noble Friend (the Earl of Derby), in reference to our Patent Laws—

"It was impossible to carry on an inquiry into the Patent Laws without a doubt being forced on one's mind whether any Patent Law could be framed in such a manner as not upon the whole, on a balance of good and evil, to do more harm than good. This conclusion, he was bound to say, was totally opposed to his earliest impressions upon the subject. He resisted it for some time, but the more he had to look into the matter the more clearly it appeared to him that the evil was really irremediable, being inherent in the principle itself. The objections to the principal of a Patent Law was three-fold—first, you could never secure the reward going to the right man; secondly, you could not establish any proportion between the public service rendered and the value of the reward received nominally for the service; and, thirdly, you could not by any arrangement, he could discover, prevent very great inconvenience and injury being inflicted upon third parties."

My Lords, I know what Lord Derby describes as having occurred to him did occur to several Members of the Royal Commission. They entered on the Commission with views entirely in favour of the Patent Laws; but their minds were completely changed. This cannot be said of Mr. Hindmarsh, as in the separate report he put in, he gave no opinion on this point; but, without any disrespect, it may be said of him that he was not entirely unbiassed. I do not speak of an unworthy prejudice; but as a distinguished lawyer, having so much to do with patents, he must have been somewhat biased in their favour. My Lords, in confirmation of what I have said as to the change which came over the minds of the Commissioners, I will quote one passage from the Report—

"The changes suggested will do something to mitigate the inconvenience now generally complained of by the public as incident to the working of a Patent Law. It is their opinion that these inconveniences cannot be wholly removed. They are, in their belief, inherent in the nature of a Patent Law, and must be considered as the price which the public consents to pay for the existence of such a law."

My Lords, I am of opinion that there are evils "inherent in the nature of the Patent Law" which no legislation but legislation to abolish patents will succeed in removing; but having said that, I must not be understood as complaining of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack for having introduced this Bill. I do not complain that the noble and learned Lord does not propose the total abolition of the Patent Laws—because I am ready to admit that I do believe public opinion is not yet ripe for such a measure. At the same time, I think public opinion has been a little manufactured on this subject by able men—men very popular and of great attainments—who have got hold of the mind of the public. At all events, I do not think the public mind is ripe for the total abolition of the Patent Laws, and it would not be right of the Government to run counter to that opinion. Well, then, not being in a position for that reason to propose the total abolition of patents, the noble and learned Lord is quite right to introduce some amendment; but it gave me some satisfaction to hear the noble and learned Lord say on a former occasion that, in his opinion, those laws must come to an end; and that satisfaction has been considerably increased by the opinion expressed to me to-day by a gentleman much in favour of patent rights, who said that if the Lord Chancellor's Bill was passed, the whole thing would be smashed in two years. I am glad, my Lords, that public opinion is coming. I think it desirable that this Bill should go to a Committee—either a Select Committee or a Committee of the Whole House. A great many objections have been taken to its provisions. In some of those I agree, from others I entirely differ; but, having regard to the questions involved in the measure being questions on which there is so much difference of opinion, nothing could be worse than to pass the measure without a full consideration of all the objections that are urged against it. Both those who oppose the Patent Laws, and those who are in their favour, should endeavour to make this Bill as perfect as possible. I am rather in favour of the preliminary examination of patents proposed by the noble and learned Lord, and I think the Royal Commission was in favour of such an examination; but even after the lucid explanation of the noble and learned Lord on the occasion of the introduction of the Bill, I am not quite clear as to what is to be done. I understood the noble and learned Lord, in answer to the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset), to say that the Examiners will not have the power to report against an invention on the question of utility. I think that is quite right; because, after all, experience is the only test of utility, and we know how mistaken some of the most scientific men have been as to what was practical in mechanical construction. The noble Lord on the Woolsack said that Sir Humphrey Davy would have reported against lighting our streets with gas. We know that Dr. Lardner proved it was impossible that any steamship could cross the Atlantic Ocean. When on the Commission for the Exhibition of 1851, and when we had got over our great difficulty by the suggestion of Sir Joseph Paxton for the building, for which, by-the-by, he never took out a patent, I remember reading a letter from Professor Airey, in The Times. In that letter, that distinguished man proved that the exhibition building could not stand against the several gales which might be expected during the year. He gave his calculations as to the average force of these gales, and as to the power of the building to resist such a force, and he proved mathematically that the latter was insufficient. I dressed as quick as I could, and jumped into a Hansom. I found Mr. Brunel. "Have you read Professor Airey's letter?"—"Yes." "Have you gone through his calculations?"—"Yes." "They are all wrong?"—"No, they are all right; but he proves too much. If he is right, your house, and all the houses in London must come down four times a-year." Then, if the granting of a patent depended on the inventor being able to convince the Examiners of the utility of his invention, what would the inventor of the electric telegraph have to say? Why, I should say, that by means of a wire, he proposed to make messages travel at a rate faster than the wind. The Examiners might be incredulous, and report against his invention, if they were allowed to go into the question of utility. There is some ambiguity in the provision relating to frivolous inventions, and I have some doubt as to the propriety of enlarging the Patent Commission by the addition of five unpaid Commissioners. The experience we have had of the working of permanent unpaid Commissioners is not encouraging. I think the three or four Examiners will be the wheels on which the coach will run; and I am afraid that there is danger in the unlimited panel of Referees by whom the Examiners are to be assisted. Those Referees are to be gentlemen of scientific and technical knowledge, and, however honourable they may be, it will be difficult to make certain that they are unprejudiced in their views, and not interested in trades or manufactures to which patents coming before them are proposed to be applied. I think that, in order to render the inherent vice in the Patent Laws as innocuous as possible, it is quite right that there should be a system of licences. It is monstrous that a man with a patent should be allowed a monopoly of it for 14 years, no one else being permitted to use it even on payment to the patentee. I also entirely approve of the prevention of a person getting a patent for an invention which is not his, but which, in these times of easy communication, he has brought from some foreign country. My Lords, there are several matters in this Bill which can be more properly dealt with in Committee, and which, I think, could be dealt with best by a Select Committee. I regret to think this cannot be a final settlement of this great question; but as I have admitted that the noble and learned Lord would scarcely be supported by public opinion if he were now to propose the total abolition of the Patent Laws, I trust I shall not be deemed inconsistent if, having made a speech against those laws, I announce my intention of voting for the second reading of this Bill.

LORD BELPER said, much as he admired the ability with which the noble Earl had explained his views, he hoped that they would not be adopted by their Lordships. He entirely agreed with the noble Earl that an inventor possessed no natural or original right to a monopoly of his invention, and that the existence of patents could be defended only on the ground of public utility. Patents were the creation of the law, and the question to be decided was, whether they should secure to an inventor for a limited period the property in his own invention. He thought it was scarcely possible for anyone to read through the lives of the eminent inventors of this country without perceiving the great encouragement which the Patent Laws had given to those men, and how much those laws contributed to the success of their inventions. He would take only two instances—those of Watt, the inventor of the steam-engine, and Arkwright, the inventor of the spinning machinery. Both these illustrious men were at one period of their lives in a state of poverty; but they were men of great perseverance and genius, and they struggled on through their difficulties. But what had given them encouragement? The object they had in view was to obtain a patent; they knew that if they could effect that they were sure of assistance from capitalists to enable them to carry out their inventions. It must be remembered that if there were no patents, capitalists would be very reluctant to invest money in inventions, however good; but when the working of an invention was secured for a limited time, that was something to induce men of money to come forward and assist poor inventors. Therefore, a patent was a thing of great value in itself—it was something tangible in reference to which patentees could ask for the assistance of capitalists, and the question was, whether inventors would care to perfect their inventions, and bring them before the public, if they were not thus to have the benefit of their discoveries. He did not think the enormous number of useless patents taken out had any real bearing on the question of the utility of patents when he could point to such remarkable instances of their public utility as those which he had cited. No doubt, under the patent system, monopolies were granted for a certain time; but generally the monopoly was not an absolute one, because, in almost all cases, it would be for the benefit of the inventor to allow licences for a term to other persons to carry on the trade under the patent. In that way the public were not prohibited from having the benefit of the patent. Their Lordships would also remember that it was a condition to the granting of a patent that the invention should be made clear, and the description be such as that any one could work it from the description—so that, at the proper time, all other persons might avail themselves of the invention. Suppose there was no Patent Law, and that some ingenious man invented an improvement—say in some machinery. His great object would be to conceal it from the world; and, in practice, it might be concealed, in some cases, for even a longer period than the duration of a patent. It would be very injurious to the community to have a man endeavouring to secure an advantage to himself by keeping an invention from all other persons engaged in the same trade. On the other hand, several of those persons would be endeavouring, by bribing workmen in his employment and other such means, to discover his secret. I put it to your Lordships whether, under these circumstances, it is not more for the public advantage that inventors should enjoy the protection of patents. There was another point—the question whether patents should be extended beyond the period for which they were granted. As he understood, at present, if the invention was one of great importance, and if in the opinion of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council the inventor had not been sufficiently rewarded in the 14 years, the Committee could extend the patent; but by the Bill the period of 14 years was not to be extended; and he must express his opinion that the arguments of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack were so cogent against those extensions, that though they might be desirable in some cases, he concurred with the noble and learned Lord that they should be put an end to. He spoke with great diffidence on the subject of the Patent Laws, because he was aware of the difficulties attending it, but he hoped the present measure would meet with the approbation of their Lordships.

LORD HATHERLEY said, that perhaps he ought to apologize for trespassing on the attention of the House in that discussion, and might be asked what he had to do with patents? But so long ago as 1851 he had, with his lamented Friend (Lord Romilly), and afterwards with the present Lord Chief Justice, to assist in the preparation, and in the passing, of a Bill through the House of Commons for the amendment of the Patent Law. The Bill of that year came up to their Lordships' House too late, but next year became, with few exceptions, the law now in force. He had since that time served on the Patent Law Commission, and he had also been for a period of 15 years a Judge of First Instance in Chancery, and he thought that he had had a full share of patent cases brought before him. Therefore, it might not be amiss if he offered a few observations on the subject. Concurring in the speech of the noble Earl (Earl Granville), he would content himself with mentioning a few of the difficulties of the present law, and why he thought patents worked injuriously to the public. At the present time inventions so rapidly succeeded one another, and advanced so entirely step by step, that it often happened there was no high degree of merit to be ascribed to the inventor, who, perhaps, by one small step had succeeded in completing the invention of a machine. Many men's minds were directed to the same subject, and it sometimes happened that two men invented the same thing almost at the same time; and in such cases the man who was really the later inventor of the two might chance to be the better acquainted with the mode of obtaining a patent, and might thus be able to shut out the other from the benefit of his invention. Take, for instance, the case of the invention of achromatic glasses as applied to lenses, for which a patent was taken out by a Mr. Dollond. Well, it was found on inquiry that a quiet country clergyman—a Mr. Hall—had invented it a year or two before the patentee, and had satisfied himself with the amusement it afforded him, without making it public in any way. By the Patent Laws, Mr. Hall would be shut out for 14 years from using his own glass. There was a case of patent wheels for carts. A firm exported largely to the Continent only a cart-wheel of peculiar construction without having a patent for it; and on another inventor subsequently patenting it, a Court of Law decided that the patent was valid, and the firm in question was greatly prejudiced in its natural rights by that fact. Those cases showed one form of inconvenience which resulted from the present system of granting patents. Another evil of the system was that patents were sometimes taken out or bought up with the simple object of preventing the use of the inventions. Persons said—"It will pay us to buy up this invention, and so keep others from using it, merely that we may be able ourselves to go on in the old jog-trot way." That had been done with regard to an invention connected with the manufacture of carpets, and with another of candles—he would not mention the names, but the case came under his cognizance in his own Court. The interference of the Patent Laws with the interests of the country had been experienced in a singular degree by the Admiralty when a ship was about to be built. In a case which had come before the Patent Laws Commissioners, a gentleman from the Admiralty said, if he remembered right, that, in connection with the construction of a certain man-of-war, as many as 17 distinct intimations were received that the plans involved infringements of patents. This case induced the Government to bring the question before the Law Courts, and it was held that the Crown was not bound by the grant of patents. The multiplicity of very small inventions, all of them patented, was the cause of a great deal of inconvenience to the public, and the risks a manufacturer had to run in using a new machine were very serious; for unless he was prepared to run the gauntlet of actions by patentees, with all their counsel at their backs, he must suffer great inconvenience. A little joint here, a little fastening there, might involve an infringement of a patent. This state of things tended greatly to discourage invention. When a man really invented something of great utility, from which he might fairly expect to derive a considerable profit, it usually happened that from the moment he made it public he was resisted to the utmost, and had to fight his way from Court to Court—from the Court of Law to the Court of Chancery, and perhaps from the Court of Chancery back to the Court of Law and a jury—and then, perhaps, a new trial was ordered, and so on through a whole series of vexations. The following was a very remarkable instance of the injustice that might be done to an inventor under our present system of Patent Laws. A very ingenious gentleman, who possessed considerable inventive talent, discovered an invention by which mills might be worked so as to avoid the inconvenience occasioned by the floating dust—an invention which was, of course, of great advantage to the health of the factory hands. The invention was found to be so useful that every mill-owner wished to employ it in his mill. But what did the mill-owners do? They held meetings among themselves, and they formed themselves into two unions, one in London and the other in Manchester, for the purpose of resisting the rights of the patentee, and then of sharing the profits so obtained between them. They all by one consent infringed the patent, and the patentee was compelled to file 50 Bills against different members of those associations. The result was, that the unhappy inventor became bankrupt, and died before he realized a single penny from his invention. There was another curious case in which a patentee was eventually successful, but not until after long years of litigation. The inventor was a Mr. Betts, and his patent was for making metallic capsules from tin and lead rolled together for bottles containing effervescing liquids. The patent was found to be a very useful one; whereupon a large manufactory for making the capsules was established in Belgium, and numbers of casks of the article were sent over to this country. Mr. Betts having taken proceedings against the persons who were thus infringing his patent, the case went into every conceivable Court, and ultimately it found its way into the House of Lords. When the case was tried at the Assizes everything was going in favour of the patentee, when a very dramatic incident occurred. An attempt had been made to set up an old patent taken out some 40 or 50 years previously against the new patent; but it was on the point of failing for want of proof that anything had ever been made under the former pain a man who was in the gallery Court asked what the matter on being told, exclaimed that seen in the service of the original and that he was in a condition that the patent had been attacked. Upon this he was handed the stairs and into the Court, having had some conference with counsel for the defendants, he was the box, and gave such evidence and the jury to return their verdict against Mr. Betts, on the ground that the patent was not new. The case before him (Lord Hatherley) lately, he entertained some suspicion of the bond fides of the evidence and came to light in this singular case consequently he directed that the case should be sent down for trial. The result was that on the occasion of the second trial this man was not found, and it turned out that his story was a pure fiction invented on that occasion; and eventually the validity of the patent was finally established in their Lordships' House. Some time afterwards, Mr. Betts not having obtained a patent out for Scotland, it was at a Scotch brewer, who was a brewer not made by Mr. Betts, was a beer in bottles secured by such a device as one of our seaports for shipboard; and application being made to the Court (Lord Hatherley) was granted an injunction to prevent the beer being shipped—and thus it remained for a considerable time in this way being preserved by the very party who the Scotch brewer sought to prevent. He was sorry that he had detained the ships at such great length upon the matter; but his excuse must be that it was an almost insuperable difficulty in the way of making these laws work for the real benefit of the public. The present Bill was really a very good attempt to do the best of the matter; but while it did not throw no obstacle in the way of the second reading of the Bill, he was at the noble and learned Lord's consent to its being referred to a Select Committee.

LORD OF SOMERSET said, he objected to the proposal in the Bill placing such great power in the hands of the Referees and Examiners. It was not impossible that they could exercise it in a manner satisfactory to the public whether an invention was novel or frivolous or not. The Bill then went on to propose that when the inventions had passed the scrutiny of the Referees and Examiners, they should go before the Law Officers of the Crown. But what was the use of sending them before the Law Officers, who would have no time to examine the inventions, while the mere passing of them would necessarily be regarded by the public as an incontestable certificate of the great value of the inventions? Now, he believed that 90 patents out of every 100 would be found worthless if they were attacked, and therefore it would be deluding the public to send them all forth as bearing the stamp of having received the approval of the Law Officers of the Crown. He was most anxious that this subject should be referred to a Select Committee. There was one point of particular importance to which no reference had as yet been made, and that was with regard to inventions made in the War Departments. It very often happened that an officer in the Department at Woolwich made an invention, and then the question arose with regard to the course that the War Office should take. If the inventor did not patent the invention, somebody else would do so, and then a difficulty might arise as to the right to use it; while, on the other hand, it was very objectionable to allow an officer to take out a patent for a discovery which he had made with the means and the assistance of the Government. It would be very objectionable to allow these public officers to take out patents; but in such cases, no other persons ought to be allowed to do so. He trusted that before this Bill was passed it would be referred to a Select Committee, so that it might be ascertained whether it was really an improvement upon the existing law.

LORD SELBORNE said, that having fully expressed his opinions upon this subject in his evidence given before a Select Committee of the House of Commons, and also in his speech addressed to the House of Commons on a former occasion, he would not trouble their Lordships at the present moment with more than a very few observations. The opinions he then expressed still remained unaltered. From his own experience he feared that the obstructive operation of the Patent Laws in respect been in his place I do not believe that my noble Friend would have receded in the least degree from the opinions he has uttered. I have never been a strong advocate for patents, as I told your Lordships on a former occasion; but, although I recognize many of the objections which have been made to them, I hope that the noble and learned Lord (Lord Hatherley) will forgive me for demurring to one of the objections which he made. He described in graphic terms the misfortunes which sometimes befall a patentee — the combinations which might be formed against him, the infringements of his patent rights, and his liability to be engaged in costly litigation. A number of law suits might be brought against him, and in such a case no doubt he might, as the noble and learned Lord stated, eventually succumb. But what objection is that, my Lords, to a system of Patents? It may be a very strong argument for altering the proceedings in the Courts of Law and Equity and making litigation less costly; but what argument can it be against the Patent Laws that a patent now costs the inventor a great deal of money? The hypothesis is that invention is beneficial and that the inventor ought to be protected as much as possible, and if he is put to great expense the mode of proceeding should be altered so that the expense may be lessened. I think it desirable that the public should discriminate between the principles of a Patent Law and those inconveniences and anomalies which exist in the working of it. These, in place of going to the abolition of our Patent Laws, are rather to be treated as arguments for the modification and amendment. I will not speculate as to what may happen in the course of 100 years. The country may come round to the opinion that it could do without a Patent Law, and I should look forward to such a state of things with considerable complacency. But what we have to do in the present day is to see what we can do to improve the system which exists, and which by this Bill we are not going to overthrow. There have been two points raised in this debate on which I wish to say a few words. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) said it was very important to look at the machinery by which the new system was to be worked. He said that we have already several unpaid Commissioners at the head of the Patent Department, and that now five more are to be added to the number. I can only say there has been a very general demand in the country that there should be associated with the present Patent Commissioners, who are all legal officials, some persons who are connected with the trade manufactures and arts of the country. As to their being unpaid, if these gentlemen were to have thrown upon them the responsibility of working out the details and giving opinions on patents, it would be absurd to expect them to give up their time to such a work and rightly to perform such duties. What we want from unpaid Commissioners is that the office shall be esteemed by them as one of honour and dignity, and that they will take part in setting forth and regulating a general system, which will work so as to be acceptable to the trade who are interested in it. I agree that the Examiners who are to be appointed and who will examine the patents in detail will bear the principal burden of the working of this Bill. The noble Earl says that I put an unlimited number of people on the panels and that they will be under the influence of trade sympathies and antipathies. We propose to place a panel upon each particular patent, composed of those who are not connected with the particular trade and not associated in any way with the patentee. There is to be an unlimited panel of experts, who are to be on the rota, and those who are selected will make a declaration that they have no interest in the particular patent. I will not dwell on that; but it should be borne in mind that the Experts and the Examiners are not to decide whether the patent is to be granted. They are to make a report under their hand, and on their responsibility they are to give answers to specific questions, and their report is to be sent to the Commissioners; who will then transmit it to the Law Officers; who having considered it will report to the Commissioners their opinion whether a patent may be granted or not, and if granted for what term. Here their functions end. The noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) asked why these reports should go before the Law Officers at all, seeing that hitherto they have given no attention to the merits of patents? But that is exactly the reason why they are now to approve the report before the Patent is issued. Hitherto they have acted without having before them the materials on which to act; but we are now going to supply them with the materials they require for forming a judgment. They are the Officers of the Crown, and they are responsible for every patent that is granted. I am not going to change the constitution of the country in regard to the Letters Patent of the Crown; but if any persons challenge the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown—if any patentee thinks that he is aggrieved by the refusal of a patent—he may appeal to the Judge of the Superior Court. My belief is that this system will work. The noble Viscount (Viscount Cardwell) has made an objection which is not, I think, very logical. He says you have a system of preliminary examination in the United States which, in the opinion of good judges, does not work well, and therefore it is probable that a system of preliminary examination will not work well here. But because it does not work well in one country is that any reason why it should not work well in another? Another objection of the noble Earl (Earl Granville) refers to the system of granting compulsory licences. If we proposed by this Bill to throw upon any body of Commissioners the duty of deciding the reasonable term for which licences should be granted, that duty could not, I think, be performed. But it is quite a different thing to say, as we do by this Bill, that after a patent has been in operation for two years the patentee may be called upon to answer the charge that he has refused to grant licences on reasonable terms. In answer to the question how we should accomplish the refusal of patents for frivolous inventions, I refer by way of illustration to the instance just named of attaching sand-paper to a hat for the purpose of lighting a match.

It might be said that such a manufacture would be now in this country, but this is a frivolous thing for which no patent ought to be granted. We cannot have a proper system unless we repose confidence somewhere to secure the rejection of applications for patents on the ground that the invention is frivolous. I do not say the power should be reposed in the Referees or Examiners without there being the opportunity of appeal to a proper tribunal, if any applicant chooses to carry the matter there. It is quite true that in the present position of the Patent Law, it does happen that, towards the termination of the period for which a patent has been granted, the patentee frequently seeks to make a minute addition with the object of prolonging the original grant. It is this practice which one clause is designed to meet; but it may be that the words of that clause are open to consideration in Committee. Reference has been made to the effect of the Bill on the War Department and other Departments of the State. The noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) has said that the officers of these Departments will be enabled to avail themselves of the Government plant and expenditure in perfecting their inventions, and that nevertheless the Government will have to pay for the use of their inventions. This is entirely a matter of internal administration. A Railway Company is just in the same position. The London and North-Western Company, for instance, has a large establishment with workmen who are every day finding inventions by the aid of the expenditure of the Company of which they are the servants. But the Company stipulates that its officers shall take out patents only with the Company's leave or hold them for the benefit of the Company. It is competent for the War Department to make any regulation of the kind. The question raised in the case of the Small Arms Company was whether it might disregard a private patent covering a particular arm, as the Government might have done, simply because the Company had entered into a contract with the Government for the supply of a certain number of small arms; and the contractor was rightly defeated in the Courts of Law, as there was no question of public interest involved, and the War Office had made the contract without exempting the contractor from liability to pay for any patents he might use. All that is required is that the Government should not be checked in the use of any patent article by the demand of an exorbitant price for the use of it; and this Bill provides the means by which a patent can be used without stopping the course of manufacture. That will apply as much to cases in which the Government themselves manufacture as to cases in which they enter into contracts. The idea of referring this Bill to a Select Committee, which is to hear witnesses, appears to me to be one that can hardly be entertained, for if, after the full inquiries of the Royal Commission and of the Select Committee of the House of Commons, further evidence is still required, we are wrong in introducing this Bill and we ought to have issued a fresh Commission. We have got all the evidence we can receive; and the arguable points—preliminary examination, compulsory licences, and the position of the War Department—are matters of public interest which your Lordships are quite competent to discuss; while, if any improvements in the drawing of the Bill can be suggested, it will be my duty to have them made. I cannot see what advantage will be gained by having the points I have named discussed in a Committee upstairs instead of in this House. I hope your Lordships will not think I have any desire to proceed with undue haste; but, at the same time, I put it to your Lordships whether there is any necessity for further inquiry.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that if a Select Committee was not to receive further evidence upon certain points involved in the measure there would be no advantage in referring the Bill to such a Committee; and there was no reason why the points that had been raised should not be discussed in the full House.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday the 11th of March next.

RELEASE OF POLITICAL PRISONERS. QUESTION.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in view of the resolution in favour of amnesty to political prisoners passed on the 13th instant by a large majority of the Canadian Legislature, he intends to recommend Her Most Gracious Majesty to exercise Her royal clemency on behalf of persons confined for political offences in great Britain and Ireland?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he presumed the Question referred to certain prisoners whose case had been brought under his notice last Session. He then stated that he did not recognize those men as being political prisoners, nor did he now see any more reason than at that time to interfere with the ordinary course of the law so far as they were concerned.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER gave Notice that he would on an early day call attention to the subject.

THE EDUCATIONAL SYSTEM—COMPULSORY ATTENDANCE—LEGISLATION. QUESTION.

MR. DIXON asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill this Session to make attendance at School compulsory in England and Wales?

VISCOUNT SANDON: The subject, Sir, to which the hon. Member's Question refers is undoubtedly one of great importance; but it is also, as I think the House will readily believe, of the greatest practical difficulty when considered with a view to action. The hon. Member will not, I hope, expect that under these circumstances I can do more than say that Her Majesty's Government will give the earliest intimation to the House in case they should desire to make any proposal on the subject.

INSPECTORS OF MINES—LEGISLATION. QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Reports of the Inspectors of Mines for 1874 may be expected to be laid upon the Table of the House?

LETON CROSS, in reply, issued a second Circular, to Inspectors of Mines that their Reports should be table of the House as soon and he hoped there would be further delay in having led.

—ATROCITIES IN MONTE VIDEO.—QUESTION.

I'M asked the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, diplomatic relations continue between this Country and Uruguay whether Her Majesty's Government received any special information the atrocities reported committed in Monte Video on the 10th January; and, considering the unsettled state of that provision, if any, has by Her Majesty's Government the uninterrupted security subjects and interests?

RKE: Diplomatic relations, in this country and Uruguay suspended since 1871. Her Consul at Monte Video, on the 20th of January, reports that there were to have been held on the 10th of January; but owing to a conflict which occurred that day, the proceedings were postponed till the 10th of the month. On the 10th there was a conflict, in which nine persons were killed. A revolution followed, disturbances, and a new Government was established. Her Majesty's Squadron, under the command of Rear Admiral Randolph, was at Monte Video at the time of the conflict, and there was ample means at the disposal of British subjects for their protection.

LEGAL LAW—LEGISLATION. QUESTION.

FRID LAWSON asked the Member for Southampton, according to the intimation made last Session, he intends to introduce a Bill dealing with all Clerks in Holy Orders Law Ecclesiastical?

SELL GURNEY, in reply, said a Friend was probably not at the time the intimation was universally believed—and there was every reason to believe—that in the month of November last the Judge who was appointed under the Public Worship Act would be also the Dean of Arches, and would, therefore, have to decide all matters of ecclesiastical offence. It was then thought desirable that, in all cases over which he had jurisdiction, the process should be the same. In consequence, however, of the postponement of the Judicature Bill, such was not the case, and at present the Judge appointed under the Public Worship Act had jurisdiction only over questions for which that Act provided. He had had, he might add, communication with the noble and learned Lord who filled that office, and that noble and learned Lord deemed it exceedingly desirable that there should be some experience of the working of the present system, before any change was made with a view to the extension of the Act. Under those circumstances, it was not his intention to propose during the present Session any such Bill as that referred to by his hon. Friend, and in taking that course he would, he believed, be consulting the wishes, not only of the House generally, but also of those who, during the last Session, pressed upon him a contrary course.

TURNPIKE TRUSTS.

OBSERVATIONS. RESOLUTION.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON, in rising to call the attention of the House to the hardships caused to the ratepayers of various parishes by the present system of partial and piecemeal abolition of Turnpike Trusts, as well as the injustice of the present system of maintaining Turnpike Roads of which the trusts have been abolished, which is, moreover, constantly increasing as trusts expire, thus throwing a large additional burden on to owners and occupiers of real property only; and to move—

said, the time had arrived when it was necessary that some legislation should take place on the subject, after the many promises to that effect that had been made from right hon. Gentlemen on the front benches on both sides of the House. He had, in the course of last Session, presented as many as 32 Petitions in favour of early legislation in the direction he had pointed out. He had also on the 16th of June last placed upon the Paper a Resolution similar to the one he now asked the House to adopt; but owing to the exigencies of the Government at the close of the Session, he had consented to postpone the matter till the present Session. The great evil was, that legislation for the maintenance of roads on an equitable basis did not take place pari passu with the abolition of tolls, because their abolition threw the whole burden of the repairs of the great arterial roads upon one class of persons in the parishes through which the roads passed, although they had been made and used for Imperial purposes. The Turnpike Acts Continuance Bill came before the House every year so late in the Session, that it was impossible for the subject to be then fairly and adequately discussed; and he hoped the discussion on his Motion would show the country the interest that was felt by this House in the subject. The question had been investigated by several Committees of that House, and on each occasion legislation had been recommended. The first Committee sat in 1836, another in 1864, again in 1869, 1871, 1872, 1873, and in 1874; and the late Under Secretary for the Home Department (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen), and the present President of the Local Government Board, had spoken in favour of legislation. The former right hon. Gentleman said, that unless a remedy were soon provided, it would be impossible to provide one at all. The Select Committee of 1873 reiterated the regret of the Committee of the preceding year that, notwithstanding the frequent remonstrances of previous Committees, nothing had been done by Parliament in the matter. In 1870, when he himself brought forward a Resolution on the subject, he was strongly supported and seconded by the present President of the Local Government Board. His right hon. Friend was then in the cold shade of Opposition; but he hoped that now that he had got into the full sunshine of office, he would do something towards carrying out what were his views in 1870. He held in his hand a Return of the trusts which had expired during the last 10 years, and of the trusts which would expire during the next 10 years. The total number of trusts which had expired during the last 10 years was 429, representing 8,300 miles of road. During the next 10 years, there would expire no less than 166 trusts, representing 3,742 miles. That decrease in the number of trusts, of course, implied a corresponding increase in the rates paid by the rural parishes. Having endeavoured to convince his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board of the injustice under which the rural districts suffered, he wished now to make an appeal to the stony heart of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He hoped that his right hon. Friend would be inclined to give them relief by yielding to them some licences locally collected. He had specially in his mind the carriage licences, which, though they would not make up for the total increase of expenditure from the abolition of tolls, when complete would be a very great help in that direction. There would be no difficulty in collecting the licences, in passing them to the Treasury, as at present, and in the Treasury paying them to the county treasurers in the proportion in which they were collected in each county. Those separate amounts were somewhat considerable, being, for instance, £10,791 for Gloucestershire; £8,483 for Wiltshire; and the total amount of the licences collected for carriages in England and Wales was £476,294. If this sum were paid over to the treasurers of the different counties in that proportion, there would be no difficulty in distributing it under the auspices of the Courts of Quarter Session among the different parishes. They would also be very glad to receive the dog duty, which amounted to £294,000; but they would be grateful for the carriage licences, if they did not receive a larger sum. The expenditure of the different turnpike trusts on roads was £937,000 in 1870; and in 1872 it was £787,000. The expenditure had thus diminished in three years by about £150,000, which simply represented a called for a remedy on the part of the Government. The old plan was that those who used the roads should pay for them, and this had at least the advantage of simplicity. He did not say there might not be rural districts in which, from the parishes being of the same character, there would be a give and take between them, but that did not meet the case of such districts as he had alluded to, and if the Government thought that the old simple plan should be departed from it was for them to invent another which might be more complicated, but which would at any rate relieve the ratepayers from the exceptional burden now thrown on them. For his own part, he saw no objection to the re-imposition of tolls in some cases; but whether this was done, or the burden was thrown on the Consolidated Fund or the county rate, was for the Government to consider. He trusted, however, that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Local Government Board would give his early attention to the subject, with a view to relieve the ratepayers from the injustice of which they had at present reason to complain.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is expedient that legislation should take place, without further delay, dealing in a comprehensive manner with the future maintenance of roads,"—(Sir George Jenkinson),

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. PEASE said, the question introduced by the hon. Baronet opposite the Member for North Wiltshire (Sir George Jenkinson) had been so frequently debated that he had heard with considerable disappointment that the Government were not disposed at the present time to take any action on it. In almost every county recent legislation had established a state of things such as that described by the hon. Baronet, and in his own county (Durham) the farmers bitterly complained of having to maintain the roads in the neighbourhood of towns. Many of the farmers thought that the towns might fairly be called upon to contribute; but the towns, on the other hand, alleged, and with great force, that the amount of their obligations was already as much as they could sustain, and no one who had looked into the question would come to the conclusion that the towns could contribute. It could not be said that there was no grievance in the case of persons who were rated for the maintenance of roads which had only come upon them by the abolition of turnpikes, and his own view of a very difficult question was, that power might be given to the Quarter Sessions, or some other local authority, to re-establish tolls in various places of a temporary character, under the supervision of some Department in that House.

MR. GREGORY said, that in the part of the country which he represented there were three large towns, Brighton, Hastings, and Tunbridge Wells, which for a large portion of the year were for the most part occupied by large bodies of visitors, who came there for purposes of health and recreation. In the vicinity of Hastings and St. Leonards, for example, there was a highway district consisting of 21 parishes, 14 of which were more or less traversed by roads, which were formerly turnpike, and the whole of these parishes would have to contribute to the repair of such roads. It was an undeniable injustice that those parishes should be charged for the maintenance of those roads, the cost of which was double, or more than double, the cost of maintaining an ordinary highway, and much of this was in consequence of the carriage traffic and increased wear and tear caused by the influx of strangers to those fashionable watering-places, which contributed nothing whatever to the maintenance of the roads. He was averse, however, from making that anything like a question between town and country. On the whole, he was favourable to the solution of the difficulty suggested by the hon. Baronet the Member for North Wiltshire, and thought it but fair that the duty on carriages should be applied to the maintenance of the turnpike roads, or if the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not in a position to give up this, he thought there would be no great hardship in re-imposing the horse duty for the same object in the shape of an increased duty on carriages. At all events, he trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would see his way to afford some relief to the ratepayers.

MR. R. YORKE said, that agricultural gatherings of all kinds manifested an eager interest in the question of the management of roads and the extinction of turnpike trusts. He therefore thought it might be considered that turnpikes were doomed, although they represented a good principle—namely, the principle of a direct payment for a benefit directly received. What had proved fatal to turnpikes was the dislike of Englishmen, when riding along a road at a rapid pace, to be suddenly called upon to pull up, and to “stand and deliver.” If, however, turnpikes were abolished, the cost of maintaining the roads fell by common law on the ratepayers of the parishes, and it had been proposed by some to relieve them by spreading the burden over a larger area. As a ratepayer, he should lament the adoption of that course, and would much prefer, if there was only one alternative, that turnpikes should be maintained exceptionally in districts where the highway board did not at present exist, but he thought the Government would do well to consider the proposition of the hon. Baronet, whether the taxes on horses and carriages might not be applied in aid of the maintenance of the roads, and in relief of local taxation. The system that prevailed in South Wales had worked well, and its extension to England had been recommended on high official authority. He hoped the Government would make some concession on the subject, for they could hardly be aware of the uneasiness that at present existed on this subject, and the importance that was attached to the finding of a remedy for the grievance to which he referred. That was certainly the case in the part of the country he represented, and he should view with great satisfaction the introduction of a remedial measure by the Government.

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH said, the subject was of wider interest than might at first sight appear. Individual Members of the House were of small importance, yet the House was great and famous; and so, though one of those roads might seem of no moment, our national system of roads was of very great importance. It was too late now to advocate a return to the system under which those who used the roads paid for them. In England, while some road trusts comprised 100 miles, other insignificant trusts only covered four miles or less. The result was, that a former Home Secretary had to pay three tolls in going from his house to the railway station. He wished that at least one Member of the present Cabinet suffered the same inconvenience, and then the evils of the system would be clearly impressed upon the Government. While it was impossible to go back to the old state of things, he regretted that a general measure had not before been passed. Five or six years ago the Committee of which he was a Member expressed their belief that the roads would go thoroughly out of repair unless a general measure were introduced. It was impossible that parishes should keep in proper repair some of the great through roads, and in his part of the country roads had been allowed to get out of repair, under the impression that a general measure would be soon introduced. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had the good fortune to represent a county where the traffic was light, and road material was abundant. Some years ago Lord Eversley was boasting how good the roads were in Hampshire, and was met by the reply—“Yes, but then the soil in your county is fit for nothing but to make roads of.” In the Midland and Northern Counties it was of the utmost importance that a different system of management should prevail. He could only reiterate the hope he had often expressed, that the Government would soon take up the matter. It was no Party question, and he believed that both sides of the House would willingly assist the Government in passing a measure that would remedy the present state of things.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON said, as a Member of the Turnpike Committee, he could confirm what had been said by the noble Lord. The Highway Boards had worked well in his county. The cost of the highway system was £1 10s. a-mile, as against between £4 and £5 a-mile for the turnpike system. The parish system worked well where there was a light soil and good gravel; but on a clay soil, which necessitated the bringing of materials from a distance, it was impossible to carry on the system satisfactorily. In his part of the country they had tried it and failed. The failure of the highway system was owing to the fact that too great a length of road was often placed under one surveyor. Every surveyor ought to be able to look over his road once a fortnight, and should not have more than 250 or 300 miles of road at the outside. The House had been told that the Government did not mean to deal with the subject of local taxation this year. They might not be able to treat the subject comprehensively until they dealt with the question of local taxation. But, at any rate, they could make the Highway Act compulsory, and remedy the grievances which existed under a system by which the whole burden was thrown upon the parishes. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had told the House last Session that he intended to take up the question of the road system of Scotland. He (Mr. Wilbraham Egerton) trusted we should not have one system of legislation on this subject for Scotland and another for England. He admitted the Highway Act was not perfect, but a compulsory measure might be brought in which, without much difficulty or discussion, might make the working of the Act satisfactory. Such a measure could be easily passed before the close of the Session.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, that having been connected from the first with the South Wales system of maintaining roads, he could state that it had worked extremely well. The whole of the present difficulty strongly illustrated the great evil of taking a partial view of a subject. If a comprehensive system, such as that he had referred to, had been adopted several years ago, most of the evils of which people complained would never have been heard of. The toll system was founded upon a just principle—one that he highly approved of—that people should pay for what they got, in contradistinction to another principle which was much more popular—that of putting your hand into other people's pockets. There was one thing of which Chancellors of the Exchequer had reason to complain. The existing system having been found to be attended with some inconvenience, hard words were used of it; it was called "barbarous and antiquated," and people came to the conclusion that it ought to be abolished, and some other system adopted in its place. It was to that word "some" that he took objection. When people complained of the evil of the old system they ought to point to a specific remedy and not call upon the Government to find it for them. In South Wales they consolidated the trusts, and that did away with a great part of the evil. There was no injustice in making people pay for value received, but there was in extracting by a hap-hazard process perhaps more than one ought to pay. When some paid more than they ought, they were not to be consoled by the doctrine of averages. It was no consolation to a man who went without his dinner to know that others had eaten a great deal more than was good for them. In South Wales some assistance was granted to the county rate, but with very strict limitations, the burden was shared between owners and occupiers, and, what was of great importance, an Inspector was appointed by the Government, who exercised a general supervision over the roads. The Bill by which that was effected was brought in by one of the ablest administrators this country ever knew, Sir James Graham; it was framed with great care, a most efficient Inspector was appointed, Captain Harness, who held the post for many years, and all they had now to do was to work upon the lines which he had laid down. He did not think blame could be thrown on the present Government for not dealing with this matter, because the difficulty connected with it had been enhanced by the neglect of former Administrations.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND said, they could not expect the Government to deal hastily with the question, which, after all, was one inextricably mixed up with the larger question of local government. He thought some middle way might be found between the abolition and the retention of the toll system. Why should not parishes be grouped? It seemed to be admitted on all sides that mere parochial management as regarded roads was unsuited to the wants of the present day. The more closely he had directed his attention to such local questions as sanitary matters, the management of roads and education, the more he was convinced they would not be solved until landlords fairly faced the difficulty, by either taking on themselves permanent improvements, or a fair share of the annual charge upon the money raised improvements. The landlords; unwisely for the public and for the reason that if a magistrate, ex officio a member of the Board of Guardians, dared meeting to advocate any movement, he was immediately argument on the part of the—"You will not pay the rates: all fall on us; your property immensely benefited, and you attribute to the improvements tribute to that result." What consequence? The only way in which improvements could be made was by sending round the hat. If round the hat came to this, where liberal persons would pay, less liberal would not. Until the question of local government was raised as a question of enlarging and grouping the parishes, he said that there was no use in debates about turnpikes, or calling the Chancellor of the Exchequer subsidies from the public. Until then, it was idle to press the Government to deal with the subject, and he trusted they would take time to consider the subject of local administration in all cases, and give them a good system of government in another

Mr. SLATER-BOOTH said, he must not say what he had said on a former occasion, having regard to the many improvements which had already been made by legislation that year, and the time which must necessarily be allowed for the perfection of measures dealing with those subjects, though he did not think it expedient to alter the character of highway legislation proceeded with at present. He did not complain of the manner in which the hon. Baronet the Member for Shire (Sir George Jenkinson) had forwarded the question; nor did he complain of the very natural suggestion of the Government having been in force for nearly a year should they take the matter up. He did not complain of the referents of his in which he had given vent to the opinions he held, and still held, as to what should be done; but with reference to the seconded Motion in which he seconded the Motion in which on the then Government to make certain Amendments in the Highway Act, he must remind hon. Members that the question was not then as now mixed up with the greater questions of local administration and taxation in which the country was interested, and with which the Government was expected to deal. His hon. Friend had done justice to his subject; he had done good service in bringing the matter under the notice of the House, and he (Mr. Slater-Booth) was glad to have heard the opinions of hon. Members on the subject; but he trusted that the hon. Baronet would not, in the circumstances, press his Motion to a division. He did not think that the urgency of the question was so great as his hon. Friend appeared to suppose, while, at the same time, he believed that the question was beset with greater difficulties, and was of a more formidable character, than his hon. Friend seemed to imagine. The feeling as to the urgency of legislation on this subject was not, he believed, by any means so general as the hon. Baronet appeared to think. Moreover, it was evident that, in all human probability, the subject must occupy the attention of the House in connection with more comprehensive legislation. No doubt, in many counties, there was a feeling of anxiety and irritation at the burden cast on parishes by the rapid progress of the dis-turnpiking system; but that was no means universally the case. There were many counties—his own among the number—in which the turnpikes had disappeared, and the maintenance of the roads had been put upon the rates without any serious complaint on the part of the ratepayers, who had recognized the fact that, in many instances, there was no practical distinction to be made between a turnpike road and a parish highway. It was also felt that, under the Highway Act, a remedy was, to a certain extent, available to every county, because where highway districts were in force, it was provided that the charge of a dis-turnpiked road should fall on the district instead of on the parish. He did not think it would be advisable by a short Bill to make the Highway District Act compulsory, as had been suggested, for the proposal would be distasteful to many districts, and there was the greatest divergency of opinion as to what a district should consist of. In his opinion, unless by means of the district system, they could spread the repair of the roads over a larger area, nothing effectual would be done. But in connection with that, the question was, whether the result would not be to create confusion in local administration, unless the areas within which the roads were to be managed and charged were identified with the areas for the management of sanitary and other matters which were worked out under local management and by local means. If he could see his way to that identification, he should be very anxious to proceed without delay; but, as it was, he thought that an amendment of the law in the direction suggested by hon. Members who had spoken would rather prejudice the future decision of the question. Therefore, although the grievances complained of were serious, he did not think that, as compared with some other subjects brought forward by the Government, they called more urgently for immediate consideration. The question of local government was inextricably mixed up with highway management, especially within the last three or four years, and they could not deal with one without considering, to a great extent, what should be the future arrangements as to the other. Allusion had been made to the possibility of taking a tax—for example, the carriage tax—from the Imperial Exchequer, and applying it to the repair of the roads. But, if that were done, it would be extremely difficult to maintain the exemption now enjoyed by traders and agriculturists in respect to their carts and waggons. It might be true that the heavy engines of steam locomotives which passed over and injured the roads should contribute towards their repair; but, in order to collect the tax from them, there must be a uniform system of authorities throughout the Kingdom; and while people were far from agreed as to the area which should be adopted for the management of highways, they had got but little way towards the solution of the question. The limited proposal recommended by the hon. Member for Mid-Cheshire (Mr. Wilbraham Egerton) would not meet the case, but would rather prejudice any future and more comprehensive measure. From the expression of opinion elicited that night, and from the general growth of feeling in regard to local administration and local taxation, the hon.

Member for North Wiltshire might be satisfied that that question could not rest, but must come forward frequently, from time to time, until it was settled. In the case of South Wales the whole question connected with the highways must come before Parliament before long, while the question of locomotives on roads also called for speedy legislation. He hoped, therefore, that his hon. Friend would not press his Motion, especially when he assured him that the Government were most willing to deal with the entire subject as soon as they had the opportunity and the power to do so, for the pressure of Public Business was so great it was impossible to take it up in the present Session. His hon. Friend referred to the recommendations of Select Committees; but he did not draw a distinction between Select Committees appointed specially to consider the subject and those of the Turnpikes Annual Committee. In 1864 and 1867 the general feeling was in favour of rapid abolition of tolls, and the recommendations of those two Committees resulted in a change which gave the Turnpike Committee a much greater share in administrative matters connected with roads. Under their guidance a vast number of obsolete tolls had been swept away, in the majority of cases to the advantage of the community. He would not say that, in some peculiar cases, some modified system of tolls might not be established, though he could not say that he desired to see it done. There was no doubt that the heavy traffic to and from railway stations might, in some instances, press severely on the ratepayers of a particular parish, and all he could say was, that if counties would divide themselves into larger districts, that grievance would be, to a great extent, mitigated, and individual parishes would have much less to complain of. The representations which had been made, from time to time, by the Turnpike Continuance Committees, certainly deserved the very serious attention of the Government, as their recommendations came with great weight and authority; but, at the same time, there had been so much difference of opinion that he thought the delay of a year; and even of two years, which had been complained of by hon. Members who had spoken, would not be objected to if it should result in the production of a more complete and satisfactory measure than the Government could hope to be able to introduce that Session.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT said, that this was a matter that pressed very much on the poorer class of ratepayers, and a question that ought to be legislated upon as soon as possible. There was in his neighbourhood a very wealthy class of persons who used the roads very much, and who should contribute more to the maintenance of them; and with respect to the Manchester people, he might add that they used the roads very much indeed. He saw no good reasons why the farmers of a district should be compelled to pay for the repair of roads which were chiefly used by others, who could well afford to contribute to their maintenance. He hoped, therefore, the Government would, do something to obviate the injustice under which owners and occupiers, in that respect, laboured.

MR. WHITWELL said, he was disappointed at the course taken by the Government. He trusted the Motion would be pressed to a division so that the House might have an opportunity of recording its opinion that the time for legislation on the subject had arrived. A very strong feeling prevailed throughout the country that the question ought to be dealt with without delay.

MR. STORER said, that Agricultural Chambers had of late felt increasing interest in the question, since the maintenance of turnpike roads had been thrown upon the public rates. He was therefore not only disappointed, but he regretted that they had received no assurance as to any particular time when the matter would be brought forward by the Government. Members of the Government had made the subject of local taxation the ground for attacking the late Government; and they were most deeply pledged to deal with it when they came into office. Now, however, it was understood that the question could not be undertaken for some Sessions to come. This was one of the questions upon which the Government had met with much support at the last Election, and the country wished to know when it was to be dealt with. Great interest was taken in it, and he hoped they should receive some assurance from the Government with respect to it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he wished to advert to an impression which had got abroad that he had said that the question could not be dealt with for some Sessions to come. He did not know how that impression got abroad; but it was an entirely false one. His right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board was known by his antecedents, as well as by his official connection with the subject, to take a deep interest in the question, and he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) could bear him witness that it was one which he had brought under the attention of the Government in connection with other matters that were within his Department. Further, the subject was one to which he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had paid great attention, and it had also been under the consideration of the Government; and though it was impossible to bring forward a measure that Session upon the subject, yet the Government looked upon it as one which required the earliest attention after those which were now before Parliament. The Government had already before them quite as much work as they were likely to get through that Session, and it was not for the interest of the country that they should attempt to crowd more business into one Session than they could get through. Of course, if it should be found that in the present Session they were able to approach any other questions than those that were now before them, they would be ready to do so; but, at the present moment they did not wish to make promises beyond what they could clearly see their way to perform. Without any hesitation he could say that that was a matter that the House also recognized as one of very great and pressing importance, and as one that they would be prepared to deal with as early as it was possible to do so, though he could not hold out any prospect of dealing with it that Session, but he entirely repudiated the idea that the Government proposed to put it off for two or three years. He hoped the hon. Baronet would not deem it necessary to press his Motion to a division, because a false impression would thereby be conveyed to the country at large.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: I rise, Sir, for the purpose of suggesting to the hon. Baronet the Member for North Wiltshire

(Sir George Jenkinson) that he had better not divide the House upon this question. He is perfectly consistent in all that he has done and in all that he has said upon the matter, and I am not at all surprised that he is a little disappointed at the answer he has received from that bench. But then he must bear in mind that "a good many things have happened" since he brought this question before the House—and for that we have very high authority—and that which was perfectly fair, apparently, when he sat on this side of the House and we on that, can hardly be said now to be perfectly fair. I believe the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues are taking the right course—they are taking the course that we took. You observe that the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board are exactly the arguments which were used from that Bench when we sat there; and yet when hon Gentlemen opposite were on this side of the House they had no tolerance for us when those arguments were used. We knew perfectly well, as they know, that this question is a very great question; that what you have touched to-night is only the fringe of it; that no Government can go on giving large sums of money from the Consolidated Fund for all the various objects for which local taxation is raised, and that some Government will have before long to turn its attention to the great question of local government in counties. You have no difficulty in dealing with any matter in the boroughs, because in the boroughs there is a responsible and powerful administration, and by passing an Act of Parliament you can order the mayor and town council in every borough to do what you call upon them to do. But when you come to deal with the counties outside boroughs you are perfectly powerless. You have to deal with something like chaos, and until you remove that chaos and establish some wise and honest system based upon the election by the rate-payers of competent authorities you will be every Session in the same difficulty you are in now. Now, you Gentlemen on that side of the House behaved very unfairly to the late Government. There is no doubt on this question—I can say—having authority to speak and a perfect knowledge of the matter—that the late Government was as anxious as this Government can be to deal with the whole question of local administration, but they proposed to deal with it by degrees, working up through successive stages various Bills for the establishment of county administration. You would not give us time, you pretended not to believe us, you fought, and by a majority on one occasion of nearly 100 defeated the late Government, although that Government was as honest and disposed to do its duty in the matter as the Government which is now in office is. I will not deal with this Government as you dealt with us, and I hope there is no Gentleman on this side of the House who will do it. We know how difficult the question is, and we know it cannot be done this year or next; and the right hon. Gentleman did not go too far when he said the Government thought it might be two Sessions before the question could be dealt with. I shall be very satisfied if it be dealt with within two Sessions; and if the Government takes it up in the same spirit that we did, I shall be prepared to give them my hearty support. I would suggest to the hon. Gentleman not to divide the House, and so add to the great complexity in which this question is involved.

MR. DISRAELI: The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, whom we have not often heard of late, has addressed us in a style which generally characterizes his observations, not exactly with venom, but with a certain degree of acidity which is certainly unnecessary in this discussion. The right hon. Gentleman accuses us of having behaved with great unfairness to the late Government. He says—"When we proposed a policy such as you are now advocating, you defeated us by a majority of 100." [Mr. BRIGHT: Hear, hear!] "Hear, hear," says the right hon. Member; but as we were in a great minority in the last Parliament, if the late Government were defeated by 100 majority, it must be that they were defeated by their own Friends. It is their own Friends, then, who must accept all the invective which the right hon. Gentleman has just poured forth. It was their own Friends who prevented them from following the wise and prudent policy which—I must say, though many things have taken place since—I cannot recollect to have been advocated by the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues. The right hon. Gentleman has assumed that all those prudent and well-informed observations that have fallen from my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board were merely an imitation of speeches that were made by the right hon. Gentlemen with whom he was then acting in political connection. I must say for myself that I found much more novelty in the observations of my right hon. Friend than the right hon. Gentleman did. I have no recollection of those pleasing prospects from the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleague on which he has dilated with so much vehemence. I do remember an extraordinary proposition, brought forward in order to relieve the ratepayers of this country, and that was that we should appropriate to their use an ancient source of the Imperial revenue; and though the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues were then supported by a large majority, such was the adverse feeling of the House that the proposal never was absolutely and formally proposed by the Government who originated it. I entirely reject the version—the historical version—which the right hon. Gentleman has given of the conduct of the late Government and the late Parliament with respect to local taxation. I have shown to the House that if the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues were disappointed and defeated in their plans by this vast majority, it must have been because they had lost the confidence of their own Friends, and were pursuing a policy which those who ought to have supported them declined to countenance. I hope my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Sir George Jenkinson) will consider the intimation that has been given from both sides of the House, and not force the House, by a division upon the Resolution, to any declaration which might at all embarrass those who are not shrinking from the responsibility of dealing with the great question which is before us—namely, the local administration of the country—who have shown by the measures they have brought forward that they are advancing to a solution of that question, and who, perhaps, when they bring further measures forward will not be defeated, as the right hon. Gentleman was, because they lost the confidence of their own supporters.

MR. PELL said, he thought that the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Bright) had missed his mark when he said that the present Government had followed in the steps of the late one upon the subject. He (Mr. Pell) recollected perfectly well when the late Government gave their support to an attempt to pass an Instruction to the Turnpike Acts Committee, with the view of making highway districts compulsory throughout the Kingdom—an attempt to do indirectly by an Instruction that which should be sanctioned only with all the formalities of an Act of Parliament. Their action in the matter was most unconstitutional, and was only defeated by sheer obstinacy on the part of the Opposition.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, that after the very distinct assurance they had received from the Government, he would withdraw his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

JOHN MITCHEL—HIS TRIAL AND CONVICTION IN 1848.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. JOHN MARTIN, in rising to call the attention of the House to the Papers presented to the House on the case of Mr. John Mitchel, and to move for Copy of the List of Jurors, and of the panel selected therefrom, and of the Jury who tried John Mitchel, said, he should not ask the House to depart from or to modify in any way the Resolution it came to when the Papers were presented. He thought, however, that the subject referred to in the Papers was one which, if wisely and fairly considered by the House and the people of England, might produce results of the happiest kind for the best interests of Her Majesty's Crown and subjects both in England and Ireland. He knew that he could not enter upon that subject without stirring up burning questions—questions upon which the opinion of England was violently set against that of the people of Ireland. The questions he was about to raise would probably cause extreme impatience in the minds of English Members, because they had the force overwhelmingly on their side. As an Irish Member, however, he thought it his duty to raise those very questions, and to call the attention of the English and Scotch Members of that House to the manner and to the circumstances in which John Mitchel had been made a felon under English rule; and in doing so he trusted to the courtesy of the House for a fair hearing. The first of the Papers presented to the House was a certificate from the Clerk of the Crown in Dublin, to the effect that on the 20th of May, 1848, John Mitchel was tried on a charge of treason-felony—an offence, he it observed, which had been created by Act of Parliament three weeks before—and that on the following day, having been convicted, he was sentenced to be transported beyond the seas for a term of 14 years. In addition to the Papers which had already been laid upon the Table relating to that trial, he (Mr. John Martin) was about to move for the production of some more which, if he had them in his possession, would enable him to set forth and prove, in a somewhat more official style than he could adopt under present circumstances, that the so-called trial was, as he should venture to pronounce at the outset, a disgrace to English rule and the administration of the law in Ireland. He did not expect to carry his Motion; but, in spite of that, he had obtained from perfectly reliable sources information which would enable him to show clearly the character of the trial. At the period in question—1848—the Dublin Jurors' Book contained the names of 4,570 persons, of whom 2,935 were Catholics and 1,635 Protestants. The jury panel contained 150 names of persons summoned by the sheriff to serve on the Commission, but after the arrest of Mitchel, and during the progress of the same Commission, the panel was changed. The names of Catholics were taken out of the list, and for them were substituted the names of Protestants believed to be hostile to the prisoner. At the trial it was admitted by the sub-sheriff that about 100 of the names on the revised panel were supplied by Mr. Wheeler, clerk in the sheriff's office, and a notorious Orange partizan. Mr. Wheeler and Mr. Monahan, clerk in the Attorney General's office, were subpoenaed by the prisoner to give evidence which might have compelled the Court to pronounce that the panel had been constructed contrary to law; but both Wheeler and Monahan failed to appear, and the Court refused an application to postpone the trial until they could be produced. The panel of 150 was constructed so as to contain 122 Protestants and 28 Catholics. On the full jurors' list the Catholics were in a proportion of almost two to one; in the panel selected for the trial of Mitchel they were in a proportion of less than one to four. The panel, moreover, was so constructed, that in the first 80 names there were only those of eight Catholics; and in the first 28 there was only the name of one Catholic—a gentleman who was well known never to attend when summoned as a juror. The remaining 20 Catholics were distributed among the last 70 names on the panel, and it was of course to be expected that the jury would be struck before the first 80 names had been called. It was clear, therefore, that there were ten chances to one against a single Catholic being sworn on the jury, or even being called. The result, however, showed that many of these well-selected and carefully-sifted Protestants did not answer to their names. The Viceroy of that day—Lord Clarendon—was secretly paying a man named Birch, the proprietor of The World newspaper, then published in Dublin, for the publication of articles and placards in which Mitchel and his political associates were described as Jacobins and Communists, whose objects were plunder and massacre. This shameful fact was afterwards proved in the hearing of an action brought by Birch to compel his Excellency the Viceroy to pay the money he had engaged to pay. Notwithstanding these efforts to influence public opinion against the Irish Nationalists, many of the 122 Protestants selected for the panel stayed away, their souls revolting against the abominable duty required of them. This resulted in the fact that 19 Catholics were enabled to answer to their names. But of the 19 Catholics called in consequence of those abstentions, every one was ordered by the representatives of the Crown to stand by. And, as if it were not enough to have secured a jury consisting exclusively of Protestants, unless the Protestants selected were known to be hostile to Mr. Mitchel, even 21 Protestants were ordered to stand by. Of the jurors called, the prisoner had a right to challenge 20, and he challenged the first 20 of the Protestants who answered to their names. With that his share in the selection of the jury which was to try him came to an end. That was the way the jury was struck of 12 good men and true to go through the form of putting Mr. Mitchel on his trial before his country. That was the mode in which Mr. Mitchel was made a felon for speaking and writing the sentiments notoriously held by five-sixths—aye, seven-eighths—of his fellow-countrymen in reference to the particular questions at issue between him and the English Government, if not as to all his political views. Now, he would ask any English Member to put it to himself what he would think if, in this country, a man were to be tried with all the forms of law, and pronounced to be a felon, and sentenced to 14 years transportation for speaking and writing the sentiments of seven-eighths of his countrymen. They might thank God they were living under English rule, and that that rule was not a foreign rule to them. That solemn farce of justice was only a particularly flagrant case of the ordinary political trials in Ireland under English rule before and since. He now wished to refer to the state of Ireland at the time when Mr. Mitchel committed his felony. A great national movement, called "The Repeal Agitation," had been in progress for several years. Its object was to induce the English Government and Parliament to consent to the repeal of the Union Act, which had been passed unconstitutionally and fraudulently. That national movement had the adhesion of the vast majority of the people of Ireland, who felt that the kingdom of Ireland was entitled to its own national Parliament, and that the subjection of Her Majesty's subjects of Ireland to English rule by the operation of the fraudulent and unconstitutional Union Act caused great and unheard-of disaster to themselves. It was for that reason they desired the restoration of Home Rule. In 1845, the potato blight became very destructive, not only in Ireland, but all over Western Europe. But it was only in Ireland, under English rule, that the potato blight resulted in famine. All the countries that had Home Rule were able to bear the loss of potatoes without a single death by starvation. Those countries, as well as Ireland, had great resources independent of the potato crop. Not one of those countries had greater facilities than Ireland in ports, canals, railroads, and macadamized roads for receiving food and distributing it from place to place. And yet, under English rule, the potato blight in Ireland resulted in famine; famine raged for six consecutive years, and the population of Ireland became less by about 2,500,000. Part of that decrease was owing to emigration, but the deaths in Ireland from actual starvation and pestilence directly produced by starvation amounted to 1,029,552. The emigration to America during the six years of famine was 1,180,409, and the deaths among those emigrants within 12 months after they left Ireland were 25 per cent in the year 1847—the most pestilential of the six years. On the average of the six consecutive famine years, the deaths among those emigrants within 12 months after their removal from Ireland were fully 17 per cent; and the emigration of the six years having been 1,180,409, the famine deaths thus amounted among the emigrants to 200,668. This number added to the excess of deaths in Ireland (1,029,552) makes the famine slaughter of the six years to have been 1,230,220. The population of Ireland in 1845, at the commencement of the famine, was about 8,500,000; and thus it appeared that about one out of seven of the Irish population had been slaughtered in six years by famine. A famine lasting for six consecutive years was never before heard of in the world. There was no account of such a famine in ancient or modern history. He thought it was only possible in Ireland and under English rule. In every one of those six years there was produced by the Irish people, and upon the Irish soil, double the amount of food that would have been required for the consumption of all the population. At the time of the famine and since, he could not help remembering the words of the great English dramatist with reference to Scotland under the tyranny of Macbeth, which he believed must truly have represented the state of Ireland. Rosse, speaking on that subject, says—

"Alas, poor country;
Almost afraid to know itself! It cannot Be call'd our mother, but our grave: where nothing,
But who knows nothing, is once seen to smile;

Mr. John Martin

Where sighs, and groans, and shrieks that rent
the air,
Are made, not mark'd; where violent sorrow seems
A modern ecstasy; the dead man's knell
Is there scarce ask'd, for who; and good men's lives
Expire before the flowers in their caps, Dying, or ere they sicken."

Under circumstances such as these, and believing that the national Irish Parliament and Government of which Ireland had been deprived by the Union of 1800 could not be restored with the consent of England, Mr. Mitchel became an advocate for separation and revolution. He concluded that it was the fixed determination of the English Government and nation not to allow a national Parliament and constitutional freedom to exist in Ireland, and that the only hope for Ireland was separation from the English Crown. He thought it better that the Irish people, disarmed and weak as they were, and their country in a state of military occupation by England, should die by fighting than endure famine any longer. He (Mr. John Martin) was in Ireland at the time. He witnessed the famine, and had seen all its miseries. It burnt its marks into his breast, and they could never be totally removed. He thought, as his friend did at the time, that if the vast majority of the Irish people desired separation, they should stand loyally by their nation and take the consequences. He (Mr. John Martin) did not suppose there was any English Member in that House who could find in the British Constitution any such doctrine as that of unconditional allegiance. If Mr. Mitchel was a Separatist now—for that he (Mr. John Martin) could not answer—a Separatist he (Mr. John Martin) was not, neither were the Irish people Separatists. He was sent to the House as one of the 59 Irish Representatives who advocated the cause of Home Rule. The Irish nation, by its legitimately-appointed Representatives, came there to ask for the restitution of their national Parliament. There would then be between the two countries a happy connection, which would make Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland as firmly attached to her Crown and Government as any of her subjects in England were. The Irish people offered that on the single condition that the English should do them justice and cease to do them wrong. The Home Rule Representatives came to make that national demand, and they confidently expected that the Parliament and people of England would grant it, for circumstances had greatly changed since 1848. Up to 1832 English politics were under the control of the territorial aristocracy. The first Reform Act brought in money-owners and wealthy traders to share with them in the government of the country. Even at the time of the Irish famine, a change in English politics consequent upon the change in the composition of the governing powers was manifest. England still desired to rule, and loved to flatter herself that she was an Empire, though in his (Mr. John Martin's) esteem she was greater and nobler when she was satisfied with being a kingdom. In 1868 a new Reform Bill was passed which took in all the people of England, together with the former ruling classes, to form the governing classes of the country. And although but small change in English politics had up to the present resulted from this, yet, considering that they had household suffrage and vote by Ballot, the English people might at any time interfere potentially—nay, very potentially—in the government of England. It was reasonable to hope that with the feeling of responsibility arising from this change in their political situation the English people would inquire into the relations which Ireland held to England and the results of English rule in Ireland. He thought it reasonable to hope that the conclusions at which the people of England would arrive would be more just, more humane, more respectable for the name of England, and more happy for the people of Ireland. But besides such considerations, England had since 1848 adapted a new principle in her colonial and foreign policy. Years after suppressing a rebellion in Canada, she had seen fit to grant Home Rule to Canada; and yet England did not feel herself at all the worse, because the Canadians were masters in their own land, taxed themselves, spent the proceeds of their taxes, and made their own laws. The interests of the British Empire were not considered to be one whit injured by the Home Rule of Canada. Besides, Home Rule had been also granted to the Australian Colonies, and there was even talk of Home Rule being granted to that colony in which the case of Langelibalele occurred. Again, in the foreign policy of England there had been a very great change, which he would summarize by saying—and he did not wish to offer a discourtesy to any hon. Member—that it resulted from it that this country had taken, as regards Europe and the United States of America, the position of a large Holland. This was a position very different from that which England occupied some 30 years ago. England now felt that she had no real influence in Europe. She quietly allowed Russia to tear in pieces the treaty which she had obtained by the blood of her soldiers. She yielded in the case of the Alabama Claims. She had indeed made wars recently on the Abyssinians and the Ashantees; but English statesmen well knew that England would never land a regiment for war upon the European Continent again. England had given up the Ionian Islands, and probably at no distant date she would find it her best policy to give up various offensive stations she possessed around the coasts of Europe, such as Heligoland, Gibraltar, and Malta, and, passing over the Isthmus of Suez, Aden. In consequence of the change in the foreign relations of England—

An hon. MEMBER rose to Order, and asked the Speaker whether the hon. Member was in order in making such general remarks?

MR. SPEAKER ruled that the hon. Member was quite in Order, as he was speaking on the Question that the House do resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

MR. JOHN MARTIN said, he was simply going to remark that the Colonies had been allowed Home Rule, when it was denied to Ireland. He wished not to keep closely to the immediate subject of the Papers he was about to move for, but to dwell on matters which were of extreme importance to the people of England as well as to the people of his own country, and which, in his judgment, ought to be brought under the notice of English statesmen and of the English public. As a consequence of the changes in the foreign relations of England, it would henceforth be the desire of the English nation to act inoffensively towards all their neighbours, and to have united and contented subjects of the Crown in all

Her Majesty's Three Kingdoms. Besides, England had the examples of Hungary and Austria, of Lombardy and Austria, of Belgium and Holland, of Norway and Sweden, to encourage or to warn. But he would not detain the House any longer. The common sense of the English people would before long convince them that Home Rule in Ireland could harm England no more than Home Rule in Canada or in Australia. However that might be, the wishes of the Irish people could now be declared by the legitimately-elected Representatives of Irish national sentiment. The Irish, under these circumstances, would not rebel nor become Separatists, but they never could consent to the deprivation of their national rights and their constitutional and civil freedom. Great would be the day when an English Prime Minister advised Her Majesty to restore the Irish Parliament, and happy would it be for England and for Ireland when that day arrived. The hon. Member concluded by moving for the Papers referred to in his Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "there be laid before this House, a Copy of the List of Jurors, and of the panel selected therefrom, and of the Jury which tried John Mitchel,"

MR. CHARLES LEWIS said, that no one who knew the hon. Member could doubt his sincerity and enthusiasm, but he felt it would be a discredit to the House, and especially to the Representatives of Irish constituencies, if the answer to his speech were left to the Treasury Bench. He was an unworthy English Member for a prosperous Irish constituency, and in the name of five-sixths of that constituency, he repudiated the spirit of the speech which they had just heard. Composed as that constituency was of one half Protestants and the other half Roman Catholics, he told the hon. Member it was not necessary for him to appeal to that or the other side of the House to cease hating the sister country. To tell that House, and through the Press to tell the country that England or the United Kingdom was responsible for the potato blight was to ask them to believe what was simply ridiculous. The hon. Member had appealed to the case of Canada in support of his argument; but he (Mr. Lewis) objected to the spirit in which the appeal was made, and he must altogether repudiate the suggestion that Ireland should be turned into a colony or degraded to Canadian privileges. He had been sent to that House, an independent Member, to take part in the discussion of all suggested improvements, to put Ireland on exactly the same platform as to rights and privileges with Scotland and England. When the hon. Member addressed such suggestions to the House, it was necessary that the Government alone should not be called upon to repudiate them. What was the real basis of the hon. Member's speech? They were told that injustice was perpetrated in the formation of the jury panel, but what was the allegation on which that was based? Why, that six-sevenths of the people of Ireland agreed, not in general politics with John Mitchel, but in his particular section of politics and his mode of developing them—in other words, that John Mitchel being the advocate of revolution, six-sevenths of the people of Ireland agreed with him. If that was so, it would have been a gross dereliction of duty in the Law Officers of the Crown, if they did not take care, by the exercise of the right of challenge, that none of those six-sevenths should sit on the jury who were to try John Mitchel. That was the duty of the Law Officers of the Crown; and the same course had been taken in England in the case of the Chartist trials. He had heard it said there was no such thing as unconditional allegiance; but he maintained that, having regard to the constitutional conduct of Her Majesty, the allegiance due to the gracious Sovereign who then as now sat on the Throne became an allegiance which was unconditional.

MR. SULLIVAN rose to Order. He appealed to the Speaker, whether the House had, according to its Journals, not sent to the Tower men even for asserting outside that unconditional allegiance was the principle of the Constitution?

MR. SPEAKER here interposed.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS begged to withdraw the observation. He would not pursue the argument. He would only add that he believed that neither in the case of John Mitchel, nor any other case tried at that time, was there any oppression or persecution of the prisoner as the hon. Member had suggested.

MR. NEWDEGATE: When this subject was before the House a few evenings ago I voted with the noble Lord the Member for Radnorshire (the Marquess of Hartington), who explained his own vote by moving that a Committee be appointed to inquire into the circumstances under which Mr. Mitchel was returned for the county of Tipperary, and to search for precedents, as an Amendment to the Motion by which the House at once declared Mr. Mitchel's disqualification. I have voted in support of many disabilities, because I believed that these disabilities were necessary safeguards against the intrusion into this Assembly of opinions which the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. John Martin) represents. Such was the judgment of successive Parliaments, which passed these disabilities, and if any speech would justify their renewal, it is the speech which the House has just heard. I cannot believe that the hon. Gentleman who made the Motion desires that this House should supply the Papers contemplated by his Motion, because the whole tenour of his speech was to prove to the House that, according to his opinion and the opinion of those whom he represents, who he says are a majority of the people of Ireland, our consent to the production of these Papers would be construed into an encouragement of that national hatred of Ireland towards England, which the hon. Gentleman has done so much to foment. I wish to state briefly why I voted with the minority on the former occasion. The House had just then had before it another question arising out of the appearance of the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Kenealy) to take his seat. I, unfortunately, was not in my place at the time he appeared; but he appeared at the Table of the House, unaccompanied by two Members—without the sponsors, whom he ought to have had according to the ancient rule of the House. I did not hear the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), who appears to have spoken with the good sense he usually manifests on an emergency.

Mr. SULLIVAN said, he had risen to Order, when he found the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) asserting the doctrine of "unconditional allegiance," because every student of constitutional and Parliamentary history must know that this House not only would not allow such a doctrine to be mentioned here, but had, in the days of the Stuarts, sent men to the Tower for asserting the doctrine. The Solicitor General for Ireland had replied upon what must be allowed to be a painfully exciting topic with a temper and forbearance which did him honour, and it was not his (Mr. Sullivan's) desire that a word should be said in addition to what had been said by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. John Martin), upon a chapter of Irish history which was sorrowful in the extreme; a chapter of history which every friend both of England and of Ireland might daily pray Heaven might never be repeated. The hon. Member for Meath, however, had not raked up this subject without cause. It was because he had found his friend, the companion of his childhood and of his prison exile, charged with felony at the bar of that House, and that the Papers produced stamped him as an ignominious foe of his country and a gaol-breaker, without a word to make it clear to the House and to the public that there were circumstances behind those Papers relating to Mitchel that would at least distinguish him from the burglar, and the wife murderer, that he determined, as far as was in his power, that the case should be placed in a truer light. It was with that object alone that his hon. Friend had brought forward the Motion, and hon. Members on that side, as well as his hon. Friend himself, were grateful for the patient hearing which had been given him. At first it was intended that the only speech to be delivered in addition to that of the hon. Member for Meath was one from the right hon. and learned Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loughlen), now, unfortunately, absent, but who had been counsel for John Mitchel on his trial, and could prove that the jury had been selected as completely and effectually as if the Crown had a right to pick its chosen 12 out of the whole community. He had it from the lips of the right hon. and learned Member himself that, were he present, he would have stated a circumstance which had a bearing on this system of jury manipulation. Feeling ran high at the time, revolution was astride all over Europe, and some of Mitchel's sympathizers out-of-doors resorted to a course—he did not know how it should be described in Parliamentary language—but he might be allowed to call it "squaring a juror." An Orangeman was bought over, and when he was about to get into the box, "Here," said one of the prisoner's friends, "is a man who will split the jury." Mitchel overheard the remark, insisted that the man should be challenged, and would not allow him to go on the jury. That was the act it might be of a felon, but he would say of a high-minded and honourable man. John Mitchel's politics need not be referred to here; he stood apart from the attitude which almost all his countrymen had taken. But John Mitchel was a constituent of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry, and when his hon. and learned Friend rose to speak in the name of Ulster or Derry, and to tell the House to be of good cheer, because Derry was sound to the core and he was its Representative, he forgot that John Mitchel was a Derry man, and that whenever there was a crop of political felons and traitors in Ireland, it was Protestant Ulster that supplied the leader. John Mitchel was the son of an Ulster Unitarian minister, and John Martin, his comrade, was a staunch Presbyterian of "the Black North." He warned the House, in opposition to the hon. and learned Member for Derry, to beware of Ulstermen.

Mr. P. J. SMYTH said, that when complaints were made that Mr. Mitchel took leave of his jailors without due ceremony, it was obviously right that the House should understand the mode in which he was deprived of his liberty. Mr. Mitchel, in his early public life, was the ally of O'Connell in his legal and constitutional agitation for Repeal of the Union. When the potato failure occurred he took an active part in the deliberations of the Irish Council—a body composed of some of the leading landed proprietors of Ireland, whose object was to suggest to the Government practical measures to avert a terrible calamity. In 1848, believing the Government of the day had abandoned the people to their fate, he did preach the doctrine of rebellion, and thus forced the Executive to bring him to trial. But he (Mr. Smyth) contended that when he was put through the form of a trial, he should have received the reality of a trial, and the evidence adduced by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. John Martin) proved conclusively that he had no trial according to law, and that, guilty or not guilty, he was unjustly convicted and sentenced to 14 years' transportation. In pursuance of that sentence he was conveyed first to Bermuda, then to the Cape of Good Hope, and finally delivered into the hands of the authorities of the then penal colony of Van Diemen's Land. When he (Mr. Smyth) arrived in that country, in 1853, he found each of his friends—the Irish State prisoners—in the possession of what was termed comparative liberty, within the limits of a particular district assigned him by the Government. By this arrangement the Government was relieved of the necessity of guarding these prisoners, which would have been a work of enormous difficulty, and of the cost of maintaining them, and the parole made each of them, practically, his own jailor. While the ordinary ticket-of-leave holder had the range of the whole island, and might settle in any district where he could best earn his bread, and escape altogether whenever he got the chance, the Irish prisoner was his own jailor, within a limited district, where he was left to maintain himself from his private resources. The conditions of the parole contract were that either party might terminate it at any moment; but that while it endured, the prisoner should have all the freedom of an independent settler within the district, and should not attempt to escape. It was the right—it was the duty of man, a prisoner, to seek liberty, and military annals furnished them with several instances where strict military parole had been evaded. But he knew of no instance where a military prisoner on parole of honour was subject to surveillance. Two instances he would mention illustrative of the spirit in which the parole contract was interpreted by the convict authorities. On one occasion, Mr. Mitchel, his wife, sons, Mr. Martin, and himself (Mr. Smyth), were spending the evening at the house of a gentleman in Bothwell—a magistrate of the island—their host happening to open the parlour door, found an armed constable outside, evidently listening to the conversation within. That constable was there as a detective—a spy on Mr. Mitchel, and this while Mr. Mitchel was, presumably, free on his parole. On another occasion he (Mr. Smyth) was arrested at Spring Bay, opposite Maria Island, in mistake for Mr. Mitchel, the police magistrate of the place and his constables assuming that Mr. Mitchel could only be there for the purpose of escaping, and this while Mr. Mitchel was on his parole not to escape. To break a parole was one thing—to resign it, and to do so openly was quite another; and it were well if public writers in this country—and even some hon. Members of that House—would note the difference. The only evidence before the House—if evidence at all it be—that Mr. Mitchel ever attempted to escape from any place, was contained in the letter of Mr. Davis, assistant police magistrate of Bothwell. It was written immediately after their unwelcome visit to his office, and the poor man was naturally anxious to excuse himself as best he could for having allowed the prisoner to slip through his fingers. Mr. Davis was not now living, and he (Mr. Smyth) passed over the insulting expression in which he closed what he presumed he might call his despatch; but in justice to Mr. Mitchel and to himself, he felt bound to say that his statement that he could not peruse Mr. Mitchel's note to the Governor was untrue. What occurred was precisely this—Mr. Mitchel handed a copy of his note of four lines, open, to Mr. Davis, saying—"This is a copy of a note which I have sent to the Governor, resigning my parole." Mr. Davis read the note, then looked much confused. "The purport of that note," repeated Mr. Mitchel, "is clear. It is a resignation of my parole, and I am free now to escape." He (Mr. Smyth) then said—"Mitchel, you have done your part," and they turned and left the office, pursued by Mr. Davis, his clerk, and the office constables, shouting lustily. They reached their horses, and rode away furiously, as Mr. Davis said. Had Mr. Davis acted with ordinary energy, Mitchel would have been seized in the office, and a struggle would have ensued, in which the advantage in point of force would have been as two to one in favour of the magistrate. The plan thus executed had the approval of the late Mr. Smith O'Brien—for 20 years a respected and not undistinguished Member of that House—and of all Mr. Mitchel's companions. Throughout the Colony, where all the facts and circumstances connected with the escape were fully known and understood, its perfectly fair and honourable character had never been impugned. On the contrary, it was freely admitted on all sides, by the partizans as well as by the opponents of the Government of Sir William Denison, that Mr. Mitchel had given his magistrate a fair opportunity to arrest him, and that more he was not called upon to do. Three or four days after the occurrence, he (Mr. Smyth) appeared openly in Hobart Town, and no hand was laid upon him—a tacit admission that in the opinion of the Colonial Government the work was cleanly done, and that the blame rested rather on the shoulders of assistant police magistrate Davis, than on that of the person named Smyth. Before his arrival in Van Diemen's Land, Mr. Mitchel had no thought of escaping. The suggestion was his (Mr. Smyth's) the plan was his, the execution was partly his; and as, according to the Colonial Law, all the penalties of the escape attached to him, so before the House and the country he accepted all the moral responsibility of that act.

Mr. JOHN MARTIN said, that he was quite satisfied with the discussion of the subject which he had brought before the House, and he would therefore withdraw his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

METROPOLIS—CLEANSING OF PAVEMENTS.—QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What orders, if any, are given to the police as regards enforcing the cleansing of foot-pavements in the Metropolis; what steps are taken to enforce penalties against inhabitants for not obeying the Law; and, what means are used by the superior officers of the police to observe whether the constables do their duty? The hon. Baronet said, that owing to the snow-fall, they had, last Wednesday, a strong illustration of the inconvenience of the present system. There was understood to be a legal difficulty in regard to uninhabited houses, and there was also some obscurity in the law with reference to the foot-pavement in front of the Royal palaces; but in so far as the mass of the inhabitants was concerned, there ought to be no doubt on this subject.

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS said, it was quite true that the Act of the 2nd & 3rd Vict. did impose upon the occupiers of house property in London the duty of keeping the foot-path swept and cleansed—a duty which probably some of them were not fully aware of. But then his hon. Friend asked him why the police did not do their duty by enforcing that law. His answer was, that there was no such duty imposed upon the police by the Police Act. This matter was some time ago questioned, and the opinions of very eminent lawyers taken, and they, having regard to the different sections of the Act, gave it as their opinion that there was no duty imposed upon the police to see that the law was put in force. He might add, however, that another Act of Parliament did, to a certain extent, impose this duty upon the district boards or vestries. What the police really did was this—they did not see that the foot-pavement in front of every house was swept; but they issued notices warning the people of what was required of them by the Act, and they placed their services at the disposal of the district boards or vestries if they chose to put the law in motion. By the law as it present stood, the duty did not devolve upon the police, in the first instance, of setting the law in motion. He some time ago gave instructions that every possible facility should be given by the police for putting the law in motion, but beyond that, he had no power to go.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(1873) AMENDMENT BILL.

THE APPELLATE JURISDICTION OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

NOTICE OF AMENDMENT.

LORD REDESDALE said, that as their Lordships were anxious to know what course was proposed to be pursued, he had been requested by the Duke of Buccleugh to give Notice of his intention, on the House going into Committee on the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (1873) Amendment Bill, to move the following clause, in order to take the sense of the House upon the question of retaining their appellate jurisdiction :—

“That so much of Section 20 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, as provides that no error or appeal shall be brought from any judgment or order of the High Court of Justice or the Court of Appeal to the House of Lords is hereby repealed, and there shall be such an appeal to the House of Lords as is hereinafter provided.”

LORD PENZANCE : My Lords, in the event of the clause of which Notice has just been given being agreed to, I beg to give Notice that I shall move that the House resume, in order that I may propose the following Resolutions :—

1. “That this House shall henceforth adopt its ancient usage in appointing such Lords as it considers most able to discharge its judicial functions ‘triers’ of the causes referred to it for adjudication.”

2. “That legislative sanction be obtained for the hearing of causes by such ‘triers’ during any prorogation or dissolution of Parliament.”

3. “That provision be made whereby the House may obtain such assistance from the Judges of the Supreme Court of Judicature as may maintain its present and secure its permanent efficiency as the Court of Ultimate Appeal for the United Kingdom.”

METROPOLIS WATER SUPPLY.

QUESTION.

EARL CADOGAN asked, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take any steps or introduce any measure during the present Session with a view to obtaining a better and purer supply of water for the Metropolis? The noble Earl said, it was admitted that the water supply of the capital was not what it should be, and it would not be so till the water was obtained from other sources. The principal offender in respect to the quality of water supplied to the metropolis was the Chelsea Water Works Company. The quality of that Company's supply had been condemned in several official reports which had been brought under the notice of the Local Government Board. The Company had a Bill at present before Parliament for the purpose of enabling them to effect certain improvements in their works which would enable them, to some extent, to remedy the evils complained of; but he submitted that it was the duty of the Government to introduce a measure calculated to prevent the recurrence of such a state of things as now existed.

LORD BELPER said, that as one of the unfortunate persons supplied by the Chelsea Company he could endorse the statement that the water supplied by that Company was unfit for consumption; and he thought that pressure should be brought to bear upon them to improve the supply.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND replied that the question involved in the noble Earl's inquiry was a very large one, for it amounted to an inquiry whether it was the intention of the Government to take over from the Companies the water supply of the metropolis. In answer to that part of the Question he could say that it was not the intention of the Government to introduce any measure for the purpose. With regard to the Chelsea Water Works Company, the state of the water supplied by it had been for some time the subject of consideration by the Local Government Board, and the result of the communications which they had addressed to the Company was, that the Company had brought a Bill before Parliament to enable them to take their water from a higher, and therefore purer, part of the river and to construct a new reservoir, and thereby to improve both the quantity and quality of the water they supplied. Until the fate of that measure was ascertained, it would be premature for the Government to propose any compulsory powers with regard to the Company. He might remind their Lordships that the Bill introduced by this Company two years ago with a similar purpose was thrown out by their Lordships on the second reading. Residing in the same district, and being supplied with the same water as the noble Lord (Lord Belper), he could assure his noble Friend that he was quite as desirous for the improvement of the Company's water as his noble Friend himself could be,

COUNTY AND BURGH CONSTABULARY (SCOTLAND).—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF MINTO asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether they propose to introduce any Bill for the purpose of providing pensions and superannuation allowances for the county and burgh constabulary of Scotland? That was a question which frequently—almost annually since 1867—he put to the Government of the day; but to which he had hitherto always failed in getting anything like a distinct answer. When he first asked the Question, the noble Lord who then represented the Government in that House told him that it was a subject of great interest, and should be considered; and the next year he asked the Question again, when he was told that it had been carefully considered, or was in the course of careful consideration. A year or two afterwards, when he asked the same Question, the noble Earl (the Earl of Morley) who then answered for the Home Office, said, that the subject was under the favourable consideration of the Government. That, he believed, was in 1872; when in the following year he repeated the Question, his noble Friend stated that the question was one connected with the great question of local taxation, and that they were under the necessity of postponing the subject. Now, he fully believed the late Government were in favour of doing something in this direction, yet he could not help being under the impression that they had somewhat temporized on this question. He would remind his noble Friend (the Duke of Richmond) that all the late Inspectors of the Police and Customs, and a very large number of the present Inspectors, had reported in favour of granting these pensions and superannuation allowances.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he quite admitted the importance of the question, but he was afraid he could not go as far as the Earl of Morley had been able to do, and say it was under favourable consideration; all he could say was, it should be taken into careful consideration. He must remind his noble Friend that superannuation really meant adding to the rates. He knew very well that his noble Friend was a great advocate for granting these pensions; but he must bear in mind that it was an addition to the money taken out of the pockets of the ratepayers.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH OF SCOTLAND. QUESTION.

THE EARL OF MINTO having given Notice of his intention to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether they intend to introduce a Bill, or to propose the appointment of a Commission or Committee of Inquiry, or to adopt any other means for ascertaining, adjusting, and fixing with greater precision than the existing law admits of, the pecuniary liability of the lands in the various parishes of Scotland for the maintenance of the Established Church—

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that in the absence of the Lord Advocate from illness, he must ask his noble Friend to postpone his Question. It was one still more complicated than the last, and he would give an answer after due consideration.

THE EARL OF MINTO answered that, in consequence of this request, he would be glad to postpone his Question.

House adjourned at half-past Five o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

POST OFFICE—

PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY'S CONTRACT.

QUESTIONS.

MR. EUSTACE SMITH asked the Postmaster General, If he can state to the House how often during the months of November and December the Peninsular and Oriental Company delivered the outward Mails at Bombay after the contract time; the amount of penalties to which they became liable, and whether it is his intention to enforce such penalties?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that the mails were delivered at Bombay by the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company five times after the contract time during the months of November and December last. On three of those occasions the delay arose from damage to the vessel or machinery, and, consequently, in the terms of the contract, the company were not liable to penalties. The penalties incurred in the two other cases, amounting to £400, would necessarily be enforced, the terms of the contract leaving the Postmaster General no option in the matter.

MR. GOLDNEY asked the Postmaster General, If he will state the number of Mails delivered at Bombay since the 1st of August last under the Peninsular and Oriental Company's amended Contract of that date; how many of them have been delivered within the time prescribed and how many beyond it; if any premiums are due to the Company for early deliveries; and, whether in cases where penalties have been incurred for late deliveries, the Postmaster General has any information as to the delays having arisen from causes beyond the control of the Contractors, and which would have relieved them from penalties under the previous Contract of August 1870?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that the number of mails delivered at Bombay since the commencement of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company's contract of the 1st of August last (for which Official Returns had been received) was 20. In 14 cases out of the above number the mails were delivered within the prescribed contract time, and on six occasions after time. No premiums were payable to the company under their present contract for the delivery of mails within time. In three out of the six cases of excess of time the delay arose from accidents to machinery, and no penalties were leviable. In two other cases the delay arose from causes beyond the control of the contractors, which causes would, under the previous contract of August, 1870, have relieved the contractors from the penalties. In the sixth case the excess of time was six hours only, and no penalty was incurred.

POST OFFICE—DUBLIN AND LONDON MAILS.—QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Postmaster General, If it is true that quite recently the "Registered Letter Bag" between Dublin and London, containing, besides other remittance inclosures, the Dublin bankers' daily letters on their London houses, covering nearly £200,000 in drafts and securities, was lost in transit, having been quite overlooked on board the Mail Packet at Holyhead, where it was subsequently discovered; whether he is aware of the serious uneasiness which this occurrence, and the excuse given for it, have caused amongst the banking houses in Dublin; and, what special steps, if any, he proposes to take to give the bankers of Dublin confidence in the safety of the "Registered Letter Bag" which conveys their remittances to London?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Sir, on the night of the 16th of November last, the registered letter-bag from Dublin for London was accidentally left behind on board the packet at Holyhead, the night being very dark and a perfect gale of wind blowing at the time. The bag was sent on to London in charge of the guard by the next train, and the letters in it were delivered about 2 o'clock in the afternoon. A similar irregularity has not been known, at least, within the last 10 years. Nothing is known of the contents of the letters enclosed in this registered letter-bag. Only one complaint was made to the Department respecting it—namely, from the Royal Bank of Ireland; and after the matter was explained to the bank in question, nothing further was heard on the subject; and it is not known that any uneasiness exists among the banking-houses in Dublin in consequence. To prevent a similar occurrence, the responsible officer in the packet post office has been instructed on arrival at Holyhead at once to take the registered letter-bag himself and give it into the hands of the officer in charge of the travelling post office.

INLAND REVENUE ACT—GRAIN FOR CATTLE (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

MR. RICHARD POWER asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he has any objection to extend to Ireland the Clauses of the Inland Revenue Act, 33 and 34 Vic. c. 32, allowing the germination of grain for feeding purposes for cattle?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER in reply, said, that at the time the privilege was granted to England to germinate grain for feeding cattle, it was not thought it would be likely to be of much value in Ireland, on account of the abundance of green food obtainable there. There had never been much demand for either malt or grain for feeding purposes; but an objection had been made that, in consequence of the illicit malting in certain parts of Ireland, and the extreme difficulty of controlling it in regard to more distant parts of the country, it was considered that the permission might be abused, or, at any rate, very great vigilance would be required to prevent the privilege from being abused. He was afraid, therefore, that the Government could not safely recommend its extension from England to Ireland.

POLICE SUPERANNUATION.
QUESTION.

MR. BOLCKOW asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he intends to introduce, during the present Session, a measure for Police Superannuation?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the question was, no doubt, of some importance; but he did not think that the Government were yet in full possession of all the facts of the case, and it was therefore his intention to move the appointment of a Committee to consider the matter, in the hope of dealing with it that Session, if possible, after the Committee should have reported.

NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

MR. MELDON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he would state to the House what was the total amount earned by National School Teachers of all classes in Ireland for results fees in the year 1872, and what portion thereof was actually paid on or before the 31st December 1872; what amount was similarly earned in 1873; and, what was the total amount paid to teachers on or before the 31st December 1873 for results fees?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that from its expensive character, and on account of the time necessary to obtain it, he was sorry he could not give all the information desired by the hon. Member; but, as regarded the amount earned by National School teachers of all classes in Ireland, he might state that for the financial year, information was given upon the subject in the Reports already presented to the House by the Commissioners of National Education. For the financial year 1872-3, the amount paid for results fees to National School teachers was £76,028; for the financial year 1873-4, the amount was £101,620; and he believed that for the financial year 1874-5, it would be about £118,000.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—PENSIONERS.—QUESTION.

MR. MELDON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been directed to the complaints of the Royal Irish Constabulary Pensioners who retired previous to the year 1870, namely, that such Pensioners are not in receipt of the pensions to which they are legally entitled under sec. 3 of the Act 10 and 11 Vic. c. 100; and, whether it is intended by Her Majesty's Government to place such Pensioners on the same footing as Pensioners who retired in 1871 and 1872, or to remedy in any other and what manner the grievances complained of?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, so far as he was aware, the complaints of the Irish Constabulary pensioners had reference to one point—that those who retired before the passing of the Act last year retired upon a lower scale of pension than that which the Act of last year sanctioned. He did not precisely understand the Question of the hon. Member; but he might inform the hon. Member that those pensioners who retired in 1870 retired on precisely the same footing as those in 1871 and 1872.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT—
LOANS TO SCHOOL BOARDS.

QUESTION.

MR. TREMAYNE asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether his attention has been drawn to the unnecessary expense which is entailed upon School Boards in rural districts by the requirement of the Public Works Loan Board that all payments of principal or interest of loans, advanced by the Board for building or other purposes, shall be made personally at the Bank of England, either by the treasurer of such School Boards or by some banker or agent, in cash or Bank of England notes; and whether he will consider in what way this mode of payment may be simplified and rendered less expensive; and whether he is prepared to introduce measures which will diminish the expenditure (at present unavoidable) upon elections to School Boards, in rural parishes, and upon the audit of their accounts?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, with reference to the first Question of my hon. Friend, I beg leave to say that the Education Department will be glad to communicate on the matter, to which he has called my attention, with the proper authorities. No complaint has hitherto reached me on the subject, and the Government will be happy should it be able to meet the point to which the hon. Member has referred. In reply to his second Question—that is, the expenditure on the elections of rural school boards—I need hardly inform him that we have received serious complaints. I cannot, however, say that the Government are prepared to introduce a measure for the purpose of securing the desirable objects which he has mentioned; but I can assure him that the subject has been much considered by the Department, although no way of meeting the difficulties of it has been at present arrived at. I shall be glad to receive any suggestions which my hon. Friend or any other hon. Member may be so good as to favour me with on this subject.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT—THE MERCANTILE MARINE—CERTI-FICATION OF FOREIGNERS.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the President of the Board of Trade, If it is the fact that foreigners who are not naturalized as British subjects have been permitted to pass the Board of Trade Examination for masters, for mates, and for engineers in the Mercantile Marine of this Country, upon certificates of service in foreign ships, in contravention of the Merchant Shipping Acts which especially define the amount of service in the various grades in which the applicant must have served on board British ships before he can claim to be examined; if it is the fact that the Board of Trade is not in a position to verify the certificates of such applicants; if it is the fact that these certificated foreigners, owing allegiance to foreign states, are now serving as masters in command of British merchant ships, as mates in British merchant ships, and as engineers in British merchant ships, in considerable numbers, exercising authority under the Union Jack; and, if it is the fact that any of the above-named foreigners have been permitted to change their names and have had commissions in the Royal Naval Reserve conferred upon them?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: It is true, Sir, that foreigners not naturalized have been certificated as masters, mates, and engineers in the Mercantile Marine, and some on certificates of foreign service, chiefly Swedes and Danes. It is not true that this is in contravention of the Merchant Shipping Acts. The Board of Trade, by the Act of 1854, lay down rules for the qualification for certificated officers. The hon. Member for Gravesend probably has confused this with Section 135, which provides for certificates of service existing before the Act. This service must have been passed on board a British ship. No nationality is defined either in the competency or service examination. It is not the fact that the Board of Trade is not in a position to verify certificates of foreigners who pass their examination. The regulation requires testimonials which cannot be verified by the Registrar General to be verified by the Consul of the country or some recognized official authority. It is a fact that commissions in the Royal Naval Reserve have been granted to two officers of foreign birth. One became naturalized and changed his name. Another, a Swiss, had always sailed in British ships and his domicile was in England. Henry Count Bathyani is an honorary lieutenant in the Royal Naval Reserve.

EXHIBITION OF 1851—REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS.

QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851 have made any Report to him, for the purpose of being laid before Her Majesty for her approbation, since the last published Report dated August 15, 1867?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he was informed that the Commissioners in question had made no Report since the last published Report, dated August 15, 1867.

NAVY—SALE OF WOODEN SHIPS OF WAR.—QUESTION.

MR. E. J. REED asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true that the Admiralty has entered into a Contract with a firm of Shipbreakers for the sale of a considerable number of wooden vessels of Her Majesty's Navy; and, if so, whether any public notice of the intention to sell was given; and if he would state to the House why the ships were not offered for sale by public auction, according to the late practice of the Admiralty; whether the Purchase Department made the Contract in question, as usual; and, if not, who made the Contract; and, whether he would lay upon the Table of the House a list of the vessels sold and the contract prices?

MR. HUNT: Sir, the Purchase Department has agreed with Messrs. Castle for the sale to them of 35,000 tons of old ships at various rates per ton, according to the class of ship. No public notice was given of the intention to sell, except by statement in the House last year as to the desirability of disposing of unserviceable ships, which led to Messrs. Castle's proposal. No particular ships were named in the agreement with that firm; but a schedule of ships has since been made out, and will be part of the formal contract. Ships have been sold by the Admiralty of late years in three different ways—namely, by public auction, by tender, and by private treaty, and experience has shown that the best terms have by no means always been obtained by auction sales. If the hon. Gentleman likes to move for a copy of the contract, it will be laid on the Table.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY—EXTENSION OF SITE.—QUESTION.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the site for the enlargement of the National Gallery in Trafalgar Square has been acquired by the Government; and, if so, how long this site has been at the disposal of the Government, and what has been the total cost of its purchase?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: Sir, from the terms of my hon. Friend's Question, I hardly know what is the precise information he seeks for. I had, therefore, better tell my hon. Friend all that has occurred in regard to the site for the enlargement of the National Gallery. Mr. Barry was appointed architect of the National Gallery in 1868, and in 1869 he proposed plans for its rebuilding in sections. Between 1869 and 1873 a piece of ground containing 53,000 square yards was purchased, and, of this, 11,500 square yards were to be given up to the improvement of the approaches, and the remainder allotted to the two first sections of Mr. Barry's plan. The first, which occupies 25,000 square yards, is now completed, and the second, which occupies the remaining 17,000, is ready for the Government or Mr. Barry to work upon at any future period. With regard to the two remaining sections, they comprise the space now occupied by the barracks and the front façade of the Gallery in Trafalgar Square. Whether the barrack square is to be given up to the purpose designated in the Question will depend not so much upon the First Commissioner of Works as upon the Secretary of State for War.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he would remind the noble Lord that he had not answered about the cost.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he must apologize to his hon. Friend, but he fancied he was too æsthetic in his tastes to care much about the question of cost. [MR. BERESFORD HOPE: Very much, indeed.] In that case, he would tell him that the cost of acquiring the area for the first and second section amounted to £140,861.

Sir Charles Adderley

REGIMENTAL EXCHANGES BILL— THE REGULATIONS.—QUESTIONS.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will introduce a Clause in the Regimental Exchanges Bill to provide for the regulations which may from time to time be issued regarding exchanges from one regiment or corps to another regiment or corps being annually laid before Parliament; also a nominal roll of all officers permitted to exchange, with their rank, corps, and duties, and grounds on which the exchanges have been authorized?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, the Queen's Regulations referred to by the hon. and gallant Member were perfectly accessible to all the world. Therefore, there was not the slightest necessity for laying them on the Table of the House. With regard to the nominal roll of officers permitted to exchange, it had never been the custom to lay it before the House, and it was not his intention on the present occasion to vary the custom.

MR. O'REILLY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, if the Army Exchanges Bill becomes law, he intends to sanction exchanges between officers in cases in which payments for this purpose shall have been made by an officer junior to one of the officers exchanging; and, if not, what steps he proposes to take to prevent such payments being made?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, it was a little inconvenient to be asked Questions which to some extent involved argument. He did not altogether admit that what the hon. Member supposed to have occurred in times past would occur hereafter. The responsibility of making regulations for the exchanges, in case the Bill passed, would rest with the War Office, and they would be so framed as in every possible way to prevent anything in the shape of purchase. If this object was not attained, it would be competent for any hon. Member to call the attention of the House to the subject with a view to remedy.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—OFFICE OF SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.—QUESTION.

MR. PEASE asked the First Minister of the Crown, Whether, as various reports had got abroad in reference to the matter, he could give the House any information as to the reported resignation by Lord Charles Russell of the office of Sergeant-at-Arms?

MR. DISRAELI; Sir, the appointment of Sergeant-at-Arms is in the gift, and entirely in the gift, of Her Majesty the Queen. There is no person, whatever his position, in this House who has any influence whatever in that appointment; but I have been commanded by the Queen to state that, being aware of the strong, not to say unanimous, feeling of the House of Commons on the subject, Her Majesty, as a gracious favour to Her faithful Commons, has been pleased to appoint to the office the gentleman who is at present Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Orders of the Day postponed till after the Notice of Motion relating to the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Acts.—(Mr. Disraeli.)

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in rising to call the attention of the House to the Statutes generally known as the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Acts, and to move for leave to introduce a Bill, said: In conformity with a paragraph in Her Majesty's Speech, and with the undertaking given to the House by the Prime Minister last year during the debate on the annual Continuance Bill, I now rise to call attention to the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Acts, and to state to the House the proposals which Her Majesty's Government have to make with regard to that subject. I will not conceal from myself the difficult and serious nature of this question. I am convinced, on the one hand, that a feeling is entertained by every hon. Member of this House—and I can assure hon. Members from Ireland that it is entertained as fully by Members of Her Majesty's Government as by anyone else—that, as soon as possible, Ireland should be placed in this matter upon an equality with the rest of the United Kingdom. But, on the other hand, we feel that on us, as the Government of the country, rests the responsibility of maintaining peace and good order in Ireland, and we shall not shrink from any proposal which we may think necessary to secure that result. Now, I think it will be convenient to the House if I first direct their attention to the provisions of the Acts at present in force relating to this subject. I will do so without travelling into minute details. I will merely give them the main points of those measures. The Acts in question are four in number—first, the Crime and Outrage Act, 1847, amended and continued by various subsequent Acts of Parliament, and continued by an Act of last Session until the end of December of the present year; secondly, the Peace Preservation Act, 1870; thirdly, the Protection of Life and Property Act, 1871, both of which are now fixed to expire, I think, on the 1st of June this year; and, fourthly, the Unlawful Oaths Act. That Act, like the Crime and Outrage Act, was continued by the Continuance Act of last year to the end of the present year. Now, the provisions of the Crime and Outrage Act relate mainly to two matters. First of all, they enable the Irish Government to enforce, in certain proclaimed districts, restrictions upon the free possession of arms; and, secondly, that where in such districts it may seem necessary additional police may be sent there, and their expense may be charged upon the district to which they are sent. The provisions of the Peace Preservation Act, 1870, have, however, practically superseded the Crime and Outrage Act, 1847, with reference to restrictions upon the free possession of arms. The Peace Preservation Act is divided into three parts; one applies to the whole of Ireland, another is applicable to such part as may be ordinarily proclaimed, the third is only applicable to such part as may be specially proclaimed. The clauses of the Peace Preservation Act which are in force in the whole of Ireland relate to these matters—they authorize the Lord Lieutenant, after warning, summarily to seize the press and type of a newspaper containing treasonable or seditious matter, subject to the verdict of a jury after seizure; they impose restrictions upon the makers of gunpowder and the dealers in that article; they provide for the arrest of absconding witnesses, and they empower the Grand Juries to grant compensation to persons injured in the case of murder or injury from an agrarian or illegal combination. The parts of the Peace Preservation Act which apply to ordinarily proclaimed districts relate to restrictions upon the free possession of arms. They make the law on that point more stringent than the Act they supersede. They impose the necessity of special licences for revolvers; they increase the penalty for improperly having arms without a licence to so high a punishment as two years with hard labour; and they forbid gunpowder and arms to be sold to anyone except persons holding a licence for the possession of arms. There are also two other clauses—one empowering a magistrate in a proclaimed district in Ireland to investigate any felony or misdemeanour on oath, even although no person should be charged before him with the offence; and another empowering magistrates to issue search-warrants for handwriting in the houses of persons suspected of having written any threatening letter. These provisions are applicable to any part of Ireland proclaimed by the Lord Lieutenant in Council; and they are now applied to the whole of Ireland, with the exception of County Tyrone and portions of Antrim, Donegal, Down, Fermanagh, and Derry. The remaining portion of the Peace Preservation Act, 1870, contain provision which are only applicable to specially proclaimed districts. They empower the arrest of persons out at night under suspicious circumstances, the closing of public-houses in such districts by the Lord Lieutenant, and the arrest of all strangers unable to give a proper account of themselves. These latter provisions have been applied only to a few parts of Ireland. When the present Government came into office we found they were applied to the town of Belfast, to County Mayo, County Meath, part of County Westmeath, small portions of Cavan, King's County, Limerick, Tipperary, and Clare. We have, after consultation with the magistrates of these counties, revoked the special proclamation in all these places with the exception of Meath, Westmeath, those portions of Cavan and King's County which immediately border on them, and a small district in Clare. The third Act to which I referred, the Protection of Life and Property Act, applies only to Westmeath and portions of Meath and King's County, and it gives the Lord

Lieutenant the power of applying in that district its provisions, which enable him to arrest and detain in prison, without trial, persons suspected of complicity with the Ribbon system. The remaining Act, the Act against Unlawful Oaths, has been renewed from time to time, and it makes a connection with the Ribbon Society, or any of the other secret societies illegal. Having mentioned to the House the main provisions of these Acts, let me state shortly how they have been enforced. I think it will hardly be disputed that the law I have described is of a stringent and exceptional nature; but I also think it will be admitted that it has been prudently and fairly administered. I may speak not only on behalf of the present Government on this matter, but I think also on behalf of our predecessors. I think it is no more than my duty to express my sense of the personal care and attention with which Lord Spencer, the late Viceroy of Ireland, carried out the provisions of these Acts in that country, and having had the advantage of some experience in this matter, I may also say that my noble Friend opposite (the Marquess of Hartington) deserves all praise for the fairness and firmness of his administration, often under very critical and difficult circumstances. I will now state shortly, as far as that can be done by figures, what has been the operation of these Acts in Ireland during the past year. And, for a moment, I will refer to the Peace Preservation Act rather than to the Protection of Life and Property Act or the Unlawful Oaths Act. I will leave them to be dealt with at a later period. I find that in the whole year 1874 there were under the provisions of the Peace Preservation Act 144 cases of seizure of arms unlawfully carried or had; that for these offences 38 persons were summoned, 14 arrested, and 10 of these 14 were discharged; that of these cases 10 were prosecuted at the Quarter Sessions and 9 at the Assizes. Under the provisions of the 15th clause of the Peace Preservation Act there were 9 searches made for handwriting with reference to threatening letters in the whole of Ireland in 1874; 36 persons were arrested in a specially proclaimed district under the statute for being out at night under suspicious circumstances; 4 of these were committed to gaol under sentence of imprisonment, 12 strangers were arrested under the 25th section of the Act, and of these 2 only were committed to gaol. Four warrants were issued pursuant to Section 38 for the arrest of witnesses absconding, although they were bound by recognizances, and 3 of these persons were arrested. These figures, I think, at any rate show that during that year these Acts have been leniently and carefully administered; and with regard to the last quarter, ending December 31, 1874, I can state figures which show that this course is still being followed. During that quarter there were only 20 seizures of arms. Only 1 person was arrested for the offence of unlawfully having arms. Only in 1 case under these provisions was there a conviction at Quarter Sessions. There were only 4 searches for handwriting; 2 persons were committed to gaol for being out at night under suspicious circumstances; 4 strangers were arrested; and 1 absconding witness was arrested. No doubt those who will speak on this question will state—and I am quite willing to admit—that exceptional cases may be adduced in which, under these Acts, magistrates may have been injudicious, or the constabulary may have been overzealous; but I hope the House will not forget that whenever this has happened the most has been made of it by writers in the Irish Press and by speakers in this House. I do not believe, however, that, taking everything into consideration, any other instance could be adduced of a case where such stringent powers were placed in the hands of magistrates and constabulary and where they have been so little abused. I have quoted these facts with a view to place before the House the actual working of these Acts during last year; but I do not by any means intend to bring them forward as an argument for their further continuance. The question whether they should be entirely or to any extent further continued must depend upon the state of the country and the special necessity which exists for their continuance; and it is to that, Sir, that I shall now venture to direct the attention of the House. And first, with regard to ordinary crimes. Everybody connected with Ireland—and in saying this I may venture to anticipate the speeches which will, doubtless, come in large numbers from the opposite side of the House—may, I think, be proud and thankful to notice the small amount of ordinary crime in that country. Ireland, I am thankful to say, is comparatively free from cases of theft, from immorality, and from those cases of brutal violence which too often disgrace the criminal records of England. I do not say that such cases are unknown in Ireland, for I am afraid that recently, as, for instance, at the North Tipperary Assizes, we have seen calendars exceptionally heavy with serious charges, including cases where brutal murders have been committed for the sake of plunder. But I mean to say that such cases are on the whole exceptional, and that taking the whole country through, the records as regards ordinary crime are such as cannot but be satisfactory to the Government and to this House. Then as regards agrarian crime. When my noble Friend opposite last drew attention to this subject, he quoted figures showing the number of cases of agrarian crimes during the past few years. Those figures I will repeat, and let me begin with the year 1866, when agrarian crime had reached its lowest point in Ireland. In that year the outrages reported under that head were 87 in number. In 1867 they rose to 123, in 1868 to 160, in 1869 to 767, and in 1870 to 1,329; but in 1871 they fell to 373, in 1872 to 256, in 1873 to 254, and in 1874 to 213. These figures, as far as they go, are no doubt satisfactory; but, in spite of them, I think it cannot fail to be admitted that crime of this nature still exists in Ireland to a dangerous and an unsatisfactory extent. I find the sending of a considerable number of threatening letters among the offences in 1874, and I also find not a few of them cases in which nobody was brought to justice, while there are other cases in which no one was punished for the offence. These are facts which, in spite of the small number of outrages, cannot be overlooked by the Government in dealing with this question. I will now take, one by one, the provisions of the Peace Preservation Act, and state to the House the proposals which the Government have to make in regard to them. First of all I come to the part of the Act relating to restrictions upon the free holding of arms. Now, I do not wish to make too much of the recent election for the county of Tipperary. That matter is not of such a serious nature that in itself it need influence the House in dealing with this subject. If the electors of Tipperary choose repeatedly to return Members who are disqualified to sit in this House, they are more likely to make themselves ridiculous than to do any one harm by their action; and with regard to Mr. Mitchel himself, I am bound to say that since his return to Ireland neither his actions nor his speeches have in any way tended to any serious breach of the peace. In fact, he has himself distinctly repudiated the idea of any such intention. Still, I think this House may fairly remember the reason why the electors of Tipperary returned Mr. Mitchel as their Representative. I take his own words. He stated to an audience at Cork that they returned him as their Representative because he never would consent to have peace with England; and I regard the election for Tipperary as of no more importance than as merely showing to the public at large what I fear those who are most acquainted with Ireland must admit, that in many parts of the country there does exist to a very considerable extent something more than dislike of the connection with England. Now I would ask the House if that be admitted—and I think it cannot be denied—whether the restriction which has been placed in most parts of Ireland, since 1847, on the free possession of arms by the people, ought to be at once and entirely removed? I frankly own it is difficult to exaggerate the danger which might accrue from the free and unrestricted possession of arms by a people so liable to be inflamed by speakers and writers, and so ready to take part in such hopeless and unreasonable enterprizes as some of those which have been noted in the records of Ireland during the last 20 years. There is another point to be considered. Lately, the emigration from Ireland has very considerably diminished in comparison with former years, and in place of that we have returning to Ireland people of whom I fear it must be said that during their residence in America they have acquired a good many Western vices and forgotten a good many Irish virtues. I do not think it would be conducive to security of life and property in Ireland that the free possession of revolvers, for instance, should be given to persons of the class to which I allude. Again, there is a strange, but widely-extended, predilection in the North of Ireland in favour of the use and occasional discharge of fire-arms in party processions. Often, I am bound to say, these discharges are harmless, but occasionally and more frequently than we could wish they are productive of very serious consequences. I do not think, therefore, that in those parts of Ireland where party feeling is ripe and strongly divided it would be advisable to allow the unrestricted possession of arms. For these reasons, it is the intention of the Government to recommend to the House that the restriction on the possession of arms should be continued. We do not intend to take the exact provisions of the Act of 1870, for we think that they may be reasonably modified, and that it will be preferable in some points to resort to the provisions of the Crime and Outrage Act of 1847. For instance, under the Act of 1870, warrants to search for arms were allowed to be issued and to hold good for a period of three months. We think that term is unnecessarily long; we consider that the old period of 21 days is amply sufficient, and we intend to re-enact that provision. The punishment for the unlawful possession of arms was put by the Act of 1870 at a maximum limit of two years' hard labour. We think that is unnecessarily high, and we propose to revert to the old law, and to fix the limit at one year's imprisonment, without hard labour. Subject to certain limitations, we propose to confer summary jurisdiction upon the magistrates in this matter. Section 13 in the Peace Preservation Act, applying to proclaimed districts, authorizes the investigation of cases of felony or misdemeanour on oath, even though no person may be charged before the magistrates, and power is also taken—under Section 15—to search suspected places for evidence of hand-writing. We propose to re-enact both those clauses. The first of these provisions is already in force in Scotland, where the investigation is conducted by the Procurator Fiscal; and the power exercised under Section 15 is still necessary, owing to the fact that threatening letters continue by no means unknown. Then, with regard to those provisions of the Peace Preservation Act which are in force throughout the whole of Ireland, we propose to re-enact Clause 38, which authorizes the issue of warrants to arrest any person bound over to give evidence upon proof of his intention to abscond. We also propose to re-enact the power contained in the old Crime and Outrage Act, providing that when an extra force of police is sent to a district on any special duty the cost may be charged upon the district, and also Section 39 of the Peace Preservation Act, providing that on the presentation of a Grand Jury, compensation may be awarded to the representatives of the injured persons in cases where any outrage committed comes under the head of agrarian offences. I think I have now mentioned all the provisions in the Peace Preservation Act which, in the opinion of the Government, it is necessary to re-enact in the Bill I am about to ask leave to introduce. Sections 35-7 in that Act relate to licences for the manufacture and sale of gunpowder. We think these are provisions which may properly, as far as they are necessary, be made applicable to the whole of the United Kingdom, and such of them as appear necessary will be included by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary in a Bill he has already obtained leave to introduce for that purpose. Now I come to the other provisions of the Peace Preservation Act, 1870. First, with regard to the clauses which have effect in districts specially proclaimed, authorizing the arrest of persons suspected, the closing of public-houses by the Lord Lieutenant, and the arrest of strangers, we think it is unnecessary to continue those provisions, and unadvisable to do so, unless there is a fear that they are required by the condition of the country generally. We do not think they are generally required by the condition of Ireland; and with regard to certain parts of Ireland where the Ribbon conspiracy prevails, we think it has been satisfactorily proved by the course of events that those provisions are incapable of meeting the evil. Sections 30-4 relate to the summary seizure and suppression of newspapers. When these sections were originally proposed in this House, they formed the subject of a very serious and active debate, not only on the part of the Members from Ireland, but also on the part of English Representatives. There seemed to be something almost unprecedented in imposing such restrictions upon the freedom of the Press, and there were not wanting those who argued that these restrictions, if imposed, would not secure the end in view; because it would be perfectly possible that treason or sedition should be spoken as well as written; that it should be sent secretly in letters as well as in newspapers; that it should be insinuated covertly in newspapers which, under the provisions of this Act, would not be liable to suppression; and that, in many ways, those clauses might be evaded. I think it may be said that the clauses have proved sufficient for their purpose. They have been fairly and carefully worked. During the four years they have been in operation only five warnings have been given to newspapers, and in no case has a seizure been made. The tone of what is called—I think unfairly—the National Press of Ireland has considerably improved of late under the operation of this portion of the Act. During my term of office it has been my duty to watch the course of this Press, and I am bound to say that I have seen nothing to warrant the Government in proposing to re-enact these provisions. We therefore intend to allow them to expire; but, at the same time, if the liberty thus restored is abused, we shall not be wanting in our duty, and shall come to the House with proposals which, in our opinion, will deal adequately with the evil. I come now to the third of the Acts to which at first I alluded. It was originally called the Protection of Life and Property Act, and only applies to certain parts of Ireland. I would recall the attention of the House to the state of things which existed in Westmeath and the adjoining districts at the time of the passing of that Act, and which induced the Government to propose and the House to adopt this measure. That state of things was far more serious and more dangerous than mere political disaffection, because political disaffection sooner or later, under one name or another, will break out and can then be suppressed by the ordinary power and authority of the Government. But the Ribbon conspiracy, which was then satisfactorily proved to exist in Westmeath, was an intangible evil, a kind of secret terrorism, which paralyzed the energies of every one in that part of Ireland, and destroyed the future of the country by driving away resident landlords, foreign capital, and everything which was likely to improve the condition of the inhabitants. I remember it was fairly described in the debates of the time as a conspiracy which ramified through nearly all the strata of society, interfering not only between landlord and tenant, but between incoming and outgoing tenants, between employers and employed. My noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington), in alluding to this matter in 1871, described it in terms which I will venture to quote, because I think no language I can use would describe it so accurately. He said—

“The reports we receive [from Westmeath and the adjoining districts] show that such a state of terrorism prevails that the society has only to issue its edict to secure obedience; nor has it even to issue its edict, its laws are so well known, and an infringement of them is followed so regularly by murderous outrage, that few, indeed, can treat them with defiance. Ribbon law, and not the law of the land, appears to be that which is obeyed. It reaches to such an extent that no landlord dare exercise the most ordinary of rights pertaining to land, and no farmer, employer, or agent dare exercise his own judgment or discretion as to whom he shall or shall not employ; in fact, so far does the influence of the society extend that a man scarcely dare enter into open competition in the fair or markets with any one known to belong to the society.”—[3 Hansard, cciv. 994.]

What is the Report of the Committee which sat to inquire into this question? I hope I may be excused for troubling the House with some part of this Report, because it is essential to the case I am now presenting. The Committee unanimously reported—

“That there is at present existing, within the county of Westmeath and certain adjoining portions of the county of Meath and of the King's County, an unlawful combination and confederacy of a secret nature, generally known by the name of the Ribbon Society. That this Ribbon Society has existed for a considerable length of time, and has within the last three years, as compared with those immediately preceding, increased in power and influence. That, owing to the prevalence of this society, murder and other crimes of the most serious nature have been perpetrated within the district above referred to, and that by reason partly of sympathy with the perpetrators of such crimes, and still more by the terror created by the existence and action of this society, it has been found to be almost impossible to obtain evidence on which to bring offenders to justice. That such immunity from detection and consequent punishment has had for its results an encouragement to crime, the diffusion of a spirit of lawlessness, and a corresponding decrease of confidence in the power of the law among the peaceful members of the community.

That this society, originating in a desire on the part of its members to interfere in an unlawful and violent manner in matters relating to the tenure and occupation of land, has extended the sphere of its operations, and more or less prejudicially affects other relations of life. That the society, besides leading directly to the perpetration of the crimes already mentioned, has infused a feeling of terror into all classes in the district, by reason of which its objects are frequently brought about, without any overt act of violence."

The Report goes on to say that the ordinary law, however stringently enforced, and the special provisions of the Peace Preservation Act, were inadequate to cope with this great evil. Let me recall to the House how this Act has been administered. During the period it has been in operation, since the Session of 1871, only 19 persons have been arrested under its provisions. They have been detained in prison for various terms. No one has been arrested during 1874, and no one has been in prison under the provisions of this Act, since July, 1874. I may add I am aware that in every case of the arrest of a suspected person under the provisions of this Act the Lord Lieutenant, in conjunction with the Law Officers of the Crown, made a most careful inquiry into the facts. I do not think any Act could be more carefully administered, and its effect will be proved not so much by the number of cases in which it has been brought into operation as by the amount of crime which it has prevented. So far as regards outward manifestations of crime, Westmeath and the adjoining counties, the state of which induced Parliament to pass this Act in 1871, may now undoubtedly be considered as peaceable as any part of Ireland. As I have said, very few persons have been arrested, and these few were not punished as convicted prisoners; they were kept under safeguard to prevent them from committing crimes, and the effect of the Act has been such that, although since they have been released several of them have returned to the districts in which they originally lived, they have been deterred by the knowledge that this Act was hanging over their heads from repeating crimes in which they appeared to have been so active before. It will be contended that this Act, so far as regards the district to which it extends, is seriously at variance with the constitutional freedom of subjects of Her Majesty in the United Kingdom. I think for that reason it will require the most careful consideration on the part of this House before consenting to its re-enactment, and therefore I wish to call attention to a few matters which should be duly weighed in dealing with it. In the first place, it may be said that the Ribbon conspiracy no longer exists—that the fact that Westmeath and the adjoining districts are quiet, and that comparatively few outrages are committed, bears testimony to the extinction of the conspiracy. I think the Question which the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu) put the other night, to some extent indicated his disbelief in the existence of this conspiracy at all. But no one who will take the trouble to refer to the previous history of this matter will fail to admit that the Ribbon conspiracy in Westmeath and the adjoining districts is no modern innovation—it has existed for something like 90 years. The hon. Member for Longford (Mr. O'Reilly), whom I see opposite, admitted in previous debates that he had himself known of its existence in that district for 25 years; and the Crown Solicitors who gave evidence in 1871 before a Select Committee of this House on the question were corroborated by the evidence given before a Select Committee of the House of Lords in 1837, and of this House again in 1852. Can it, therefore, be supposed that a conspiracy so wide-spread as this has been shown to be should, after so lengthened an existence, be entirely extinguished by the repressive operation of an Act of not quite four years' duration? The Government have felt it their duty to consult, both confidentially and more or less publicly, the magistrates and police authorities of Westmeath and the adjacent districts on this matter. Of course, it is impossible for me to give in detail to the House the information which we have received on this head; but, speaking generally, I may say the magistrates and police authorities are unanimous in assuring us that this Ribbon conspiracy exists now as strongly as ever, and that its action has only been kept down by the repressive force of this law. We are told of cases where outrages of a serious character—in some instances murder—are only in abeyance on account of the existence of this Act. ["Oh!"] Hon. Members opposite may say "Oh!" but

I can tell them we have means at our command of obtaining accurate information which they do not possess, and the Government have adopted every mode of instituting fair and independent inquiries on this matter. What have the magistrates of Westmeath told us? At the request of the Lord Lieutenant, the magistrates of Westmeath, numbering over 50, met a few weeks ago to consider the necessity for the continuance of this Act, and they arrived at the unanimous conclusion that it was essential to the order and security of that county that the Act should be continued. But perhaps I may be told that English Members would not think of the application of a law of this nature to England. Well, I am bound to say that if magistrates in an English county to the number of 50—men differing in religious and political opinions, men selected not only from the upper, but the middle classes—had met, and unanimously informed the Government that the continuance of a law of this kind was necessary, the Government would incur a serious responsibility in rejecting their recommendation. Nor can these magistrates be accused of anxiety for their own persons. I have no doubt I shall be told that the improved condition of Ireland is, at least to some extent, due to the remedial measures passed by the late Government. That is an argument upon which at the present moment I do not care to enter. But, whatever security the Land Act has given to the tenant, it has so much the more made his position a coveted one in those parts of Ireland where people resort not to the operation of the ordinary law, but to violence, to settle the disputed question of the occupation of land. The fact that the occupation of land is coveted makes the position of the existing occupiers dangerous. The more secure a tenant is under the provisions of the Land Act the more likely will his situation be coveted by some who, perhaps at a remote date, have been evicted from the holding which he possesses; and in the county of Westmeath cases have been known where claims of this kind have been set up on behalf of families whose ancestors were dispossessed years ago. In fact, protection is not now so much required by the landlord and his agent as by the farmer, and even those below him in the social scale, and therefore nothing could be more unfair than to charge the magistrates at Westmeath with any class feeling, as far as regards the recommendation they sent to Her Majesty's Government. But it is not their recommendation only we have to consider. We are often told in the charges of Judges and Chairmen of Counties of the peaceable state of Ireland and the absence of crime. Well, let me direct the attention of the House to the charge of Chief Baron Palles at the last Summer Assizes at Mullingar. He said that the cases to go before the Grand Jury were of an exceptionally light character, and then he went on to say—

“He would be very glad if he could inform the Grand Jury that the state of the county was accurately indicated by the calendar. From the exhaustive returns furnished by the County Inspector he perceived, he was sorry to say, indications of a state of things which every person having the welfare and peace of the county at heart should view with great regret. In Westmeath county for some years the people were living under exceptional legislation, and although at present no persons were to his knowledge imprisoned under that Act, still no person could deny that its existence deterred parties from committing crimes which in years past were of such frequent occurrence. In point of number there was no comparison with the agrarian crimes of the present year and those of 1870 and 1871; but, at the same time, there were indications of the existence of a spirit that showed the wisdom of an act of exceptional legislation. Out of the 17 cases which occurred since last Assizes, there were six to which he should take the liberty of calling their special attention. Five of the cases were the sending of threatening letters, all of which were connected with the occupation of land. . . . Viewing all the cases as he did—that was to say, viewing them as indicating the existence of a spirit utterly opposed to the law—it occurred to him that it was only the existence of exceptional and strict legislation that averted some parties and prevented them resorting to actual violence. There were, he was sorry to say, indications of a spirit in the county Westmeath that would not have the land laws administered as the law directed, but as they themselves wished.”

Since I have come down to this House I have received a telegram informing me of the purport of the Charge just delivered by Mr. Justice Fitzgerald to the Grand Jury of Westmeath. That learned Judge said—

“When there should be permanent diminution of outrage, and not till then, could they look forward to giving up that power which the law gave them to preserve peace and order, or even abandoning those exceptional laws which to some extent interfered with the rights and liberties (he would not say the privileges) which were the birthright of all Her Majesty's subjects.”

Now, these are statements made after due knowledge obtained in the ordinary way by two of the Irish Judges, and I think the opinions I have quoted from the Judges, from the magistrates, and from the police authorities are sufficient at any rate to show that there exists still, in spite of outward peace, a state of things in Westmeath and the adjoining districts which cannot be dealt with by the ordinary law. Now, what is the best method of dealing with it? Let me, Sir, refer again to what was said by my noble Friend opposite in May, 1871. He said—

“During the last suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, though it was not at all directed against agrarian crimes, yet the people of these districts were hardly aware of that fact, and when they thought there existed an arbitrary form of arrest they almost entirely desisted from the commission of those crimes.”—[3 Hansard, cxxi. 725.]

And the facts I am about to state are sufficient to prove that my noble Friend was right. In February, 1866, the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended in Ireland, and its suspension was continued by the late Government till the beginning of the Session of 1869. During that time agrarian crime was lower than at present. In 1866 the agrarian outrages in Ireland numbered 87; in 1867 they numbered 123; in 1868 they numbered 160, of which 21 were in Westmeath, five in Meath, and two in King's County; but at once, when in February, 1869, the late Government advised the removal of the suspension, we find an enormous increase in those outrages. In 1869 agrarian crimes in Ireland amounted to 767, of which 130 were in Westmeath, 61 in Meath, and 17 in King's County. In 1870, the Peace Preservation Act was passed, with the result of an increase of these outrages to 1,329, of which the number was 103 in Westmeath, 95 in Meath, and 38 in King's County. I may also mention the evidence of Mr. Reade, an able and experienced magistrate, who stated to the Westmeath Committee that—

“In my district in 1866 and 1867 there were no outrages, except two or three attempts at murder. More outrages have been committed since the passing of the Peace Preservation Act. The Ribbonmen feared that the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act was to be brought forward again, and when they found out what the Act was their fear was removed.”

thought it necessary, after the Report of the Select Committee, to introduce the Act allowing the Lord Lieutenant to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act in Westmeath and the adjoining districts, and at once these outrages began to cease. In 1871 there were only 373 in the whole of Ireland, of which 40 were in Westmeath, 16 in Meath, and 24 in King's County. In 1872 there were 256, of which 25 were in Meath, 9 in Westmeath, and 15 in King's County. In 1873 there were 254, of which 16 were in Westmeath, 6 in Meath, and 12 in King's County. In 1874, of 213, 11 were in Westmeath, 8 in Meath, and 3 in King's County; so that, practically, that district was now in the same position in regard to this matter as it was in 1868. Well, now, looking at these facts, to the opinions expressed by the magistrates and police authorities, and judging from what I have stated to the House as to these outrages, and the danger of their recurrence if these restrictive laws were removed, I do not consider that the Government are proposing undue repression for Ireland if they recommend for a modified period of time the continuance of the Protection of Life and Property Act. Our proposal is to extend it for a period of two years. Our hope and expectation is, that during that period the state of the country may be—as it has not been during the last four years—such as to warrant the Irish Government in revoking the order under this Act, and thus in testing whether it is possible that these districts should continue peaceable under the ordinary laws. But we do think nothing could be more dangerous than that exceptional powers of this kind should cease in a district all, as it were, in a moment—that the Act should be suffered to expire in June, and that there should be no power, if these outrages should recommence in the winter, of applying any remedy sufficient to meet them. Therefore, we make the proposal which I have explained to the House. The only other Act to which I need refer is the Unlawful Oaths Act, which was continued by the Continuance Act of last year. That makes the Ribbon Society illegal, and it will be obvious from what I have already stated that it is our intention to renew it. We propose to renew that Act, and we also propose to renew such parts of the Peace Preservation Act as we think it necessary to continue for the period of five years. We do not think there is anything in that part of the Peace Preservation Act that is to be renewed which can fairly be called coercive, except the restriction on the free possession of arms. We do not think that for the period I have named it would be possible safely to allow the free possession of arms throughout the whole of Ireland; but, with regard to this, we propose by degrees to relax the law—to revoke, for instance, the proclamation of certain peaceable districts, and in other places to meet as far as possible complaints that are made on behalf of the farmers, by allowing the issue of licences not only to have arms in the house, but to carry arms on land occupied by persons holding a licence—in fact, making such gradual relaxations as may ultimately lead to the equalization of the law in the whole of the United Kingdom. I fear the statement I have had to make has proved wearisome to the House; but I am confident that, whatever opinion the House may entertain of our proposals, the Government will at least be credited with a careful and independent consideration, both of the state of the existing law and of the present circumstances of Ireland. We feel the responsibility which devolves upon us. We do not wish to shift it on to this House; but, acting as we do to a great extent on information which cannot be publicly communicated, we ask the House to repose in us that confidence and support which Government, under the circumstances, never demands in vain from the House of Commons. I may be told by hon. Members opposite that our cure for Irish discontent is a policy of coercion, but I can conceive no more unfounded charge. Hon. Members opposite, especially the hon. Members for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) and Meath (Mr. John Martin), have too often told us of the enslaved condition of their country—of the state in which it is kept under English rule—of the subjection of Ireland to an army of occupation. But if there be any truth in these statements—and I admit that some of the laws now in force with reference to Ireland are of a restrictive character—is it not all the more clear that those restrictions cannot be immediately and entirely removed, and that, whatever the present outward appearance of that country, a policy of gradual relaxation is the only policy which the Government could safely recommend? I hope that in considering this matter hon. Members will not forget the undoubted difference between the circumstances of Ireland and the rest of the United Kingdom. Ireland, from whatever cause, is, in this respect, years behind England and Scotland in the advance of civilization; that you cannot there trust entirely to ordinary law, as in England and Scotland, where public opinion makes every man, of whatever class, an ally of the law. You cannot argue from the records of crime, where injured persons decline to denounce those who have injured them; where criminals rather than those against whom they offend have the sympathy of their neighbours; where notorious offenders are too often sheltered and harboured by those who ought to denounce them; where, through timidity, ignorance, or prejudice, juries dare not convict even when evidence is placed before them. Will any one deny that to be too often still the case in Ireland? I am thankful to say that in this, no less than in other respects, the condition of Ireland within the last few years has steadily improved, and I think we may see the day not far in advance when a fair administration of the law will encourage all men to act in support of it; when the certainty that criminals will be punished will embolden juries to incur what risk they may now fear in convicting them; when material prosperity will assuage political disaffection; and when Ireland will be, in the matter of agrarian crime, as far advanced on its past history as it is in other matters to which I need not allude. I think that we have proposed all that Government could safely do under present circumstances in gradual relaxation of the existing restrictive laws; but if I may venture to look forward to the next time when this subject will be brought before the House, whether I should occupy my present position or whether it should be filled by some abler man, one thing, above all others, I would hope, and that is, that the circumstances of Ireland will then be such as to warrant the Government in at length proposing that there shall be the same laws for Ireland and the rest of the United Kingdom. I beg to move for leave to bring in a Bill embodying the provisions I have explained.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I do not think my right hon. Friend has at all exaggerated the difficulty of the task which he had to perform. It is true that he has been able to propose some relaxation in the Coercion Laws which now exist in Ireland, and I am sure that every hon. Member who sits in this House will join with me in heartily congratulating the right hon. Gentleman and his Government in so far as they have found that the state of Ireland justifies them in making any relaxation or modification of those laws. But, on the whole, it must be acknowledged that the statement which the right hon. Gentleman has made amounts in general terms, with the exception of those relaxations to which I have alluded, to the introduction of a Bill for consolidating the existing Peace Preservation Acts. I believe that while the right hon. Gentleman will mitigate the severity of some of the provisions of that code, he will probably make the code itself a more efficient and more generally useful one in consequence of the proposed consolidation of the different Acts to which he has referred this evening, and, although I believe that is a beneficial undertaking, still he cannot conceal from himself that it is one which will meet with very considerable difficulty and opposition in passing through this House. It is also one upon which I imagine no Government would have entered, if they had not been driven and absolutely compelled to do so by the proceedings which occurred in this House last year. Now, as to the necessity for the continuation of this Coercion code, or any part of it, I am willing to accept the proposition just laid down—that to a great extent the House must trust the Government for the opinion it may form as to the necessity that may exist for any such legislation as it is now proposed to continue. The Government, as my right hon. Friend has just told us, has, and must necessarily have, in their possession information which is not accessible to all of us. The Government can lay on the Table certain Returns, and give the House certain information; but there is, as I am perfectly aware, much information in their possession which it would be impossible for them to produce. Well, if the Government possess the confidence of a large majority in this House for the transaction of any political Business whatever, I think no one can doubt for a moment that this of all other subjects is one on which that confidence ought most fully to be extended to them. But I do not believe a Government ever sat on that Bench which for one moment dreamt of proposing measures of exceptional severity for any part of Her Majesty's dominions for which they did not believe in their hearts there existed an adequate necessity. Well, the necessity which exists for the re-enactment of these laws arises, it appears, from three different causes. There is still the fear of insurrection; there is still the prevalence of party disturbances; there is still a continuance of agrarian crime. As to the fear of insurrection, my right hon. Friend has scarcely referred to any circumstance except the recent election in the county of Tipperary. Now, I agree with him that that is a circumstance which cannot be omitted from the consideration of this question, for, as far as we knew, the great majority of the electors of Tipperary cannot possibly have any knowledge of the Representative whom they sent here the other day, except that he did take arms against the British Government, that he exhorted his countrymen to take arms also; and that, as far as we are aware, he remains still of the same opinion. Well, although the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. John Martin) the other night said he believed that a majority of the country did not agree with the verdict of Tipperary, these circumstances do show that in Tipperary, at all events—and probably it is not an exceptional instance—there exists a very considerable amount of disaffection towards the Government. But I think I may go further than my right hon. Friend, and say that if matters have not changed very much within the last twelvemonths, the Fenian conspiracy—whatever it may be in Ireland—certainly was not entirely extinct either in America or in England; that funds are being constantly raised for the purpose of that society, and that those funds—or at least so much of them as do not remain in the pockets of the collectors—are employed in the purchase of arms which are intended to be sent to Ireland or stored till an opportunity may arise for using them. I must say, then, that I do not think the Government are, in such a state of things, asking for excessive powers, when they

ask that means shall be taken to prevent unlicensed persons from being in possession of arms, or, in other words, when they ask that arms shall not be openly taken to Ireland to be stored there and used whenever circumstances may favour the outbreak of insurrection. As to party disturbances, I rejoice to think that within the last few years they have very greatly decreased, and I have reason to hope that they may very soon become almost entirely things of the past. Still, I must agree with my right hon. Friend that as long as there exists, especially in the North of Ireland, a tendency on the part of Protestants and Roman Catholics on certain occasions to come into collision, it is not an unreasonable precaution on the part of the Government to secure that arms should not be promiscuously in the hands of persons who are likely to make an improper use of them. Well, the most important branch of the necessity for legislation of this kind is the prevalence or continuance—if such be the case—of agrarian crimes. As far as the case may be proved by figures, it appears from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that the condition of Ireland as regards agrarian crime is scarcely altered from what it has been within the last few years. In 1872 the number of agrarian outrages reported by the Constabulary was 256, in 1873 it was 254, and in 1874, though it had undergone a slight diminution, it was still 213. That shows, practically, that, taking the test of figures, the state of things remains much as it was during the last two years under the late Government. But I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the case cannot be entirely proved by figures. This is one of those cases in which the Government is possessed of information which we cannot have, and the right hon. Gentleman has certainly brought forward some strong statements proving that in Westmeath, and I believe also in other parts of the country, Ribbonism still exists and agrarian crime likewise exists. The smallness of the number of outrages certainly does not prove that agrarian crime has ceased. It may be due to the efficiency of the Constabulary or the police, or to the exceptional legislation which is in force. What the House wants to know, and what I understand from the statement of the right hon.

Gentleman is the opinion of the Government, is that there still certainly does exist in Ireland a certain amount of crime that proves the existence either of secret societies, which seek by violence to impose a law of their own on the subject, or, in the absence of such secret societies, which shows a disposition on the part of large bodies of the people to substitute a law of their own—a law not recognized by the State—for the law of the land. Comparisons are often made between the amounts of crime in England and in Ireland; but the peculiarity of crime in Ireland is this—In England crime is an attack on the part of an individual on other individuals; but, in Ireland, it is an attack by society, or by a large part of society, upon individuals. It is the same in whatever shape it may show itself, whether the victim be the landlord who is using the rights over his property which the law gives him; whether it be the tenant who, having been lawfully inducted into his farm, is endeavouring honestly to make his living there; whether it be the employer of labour who chooses to exercise some discretion in the choice of the persons whom he employs; or whether it be the labourer himself who wishes to take his labour to the best market. You find that the spirit of agrarianism interferes in every one of these cases, and seeks to impose a law of its own—a traditional law, perhaps, but one which has never been sanctioned by the State, and which is in actual opposition to the law of the State. Well, as long as any crime exists in Ireland which shows the prevalence of such a state of feeling on the part of any considerable section of the people. I, for one, confess I do not think it would be safe altogether to abandon this exceptional legislation. So much as to the necessity which exists for the continuation of this code. ["Oh, oh!"] Let me remind hon. Members from Ireland who are about to oppose this measure, that exceptional legislation of this nature is not a new thing and is not peculiar to the English Parliament. The Irish Parliament itself first set the example of exceptional legislation. Nay, more, it did not deal with the question in the same wise spirit as the English Parliament did; but it enacted penalties of a much severer and harsher character. The Whiteboy Act, the Insurrection Act, and the Act for the Suppression of Rebellion were passed by the Irish Parliament, and the first-named provided that—

“Any person or persons rising, assembling, or appearing by day or night, armed or disguised, or wearing any unusual badge, dress, or uniform, or assuming any unusual name or denomination, to the terror of His Majesty’s subjects, are declared guilty of a high misdemeanour and liable to be punished by fine and imprisonment, whipping, or other corporal punishment, and to give such security for future good behaviour as the Court should order.”

And further—

“Any person or persons rising or assembling as above or otherwise (save peaceably), and wilfully shooting at, maiming, or disfiguring any person, or sending a demanding or threatening letter to any person . . . are declared guilty of a capital felony.”

That is the way in which the Irish Parliament—and the English Parliament for some time afterwards—dealt with such crime—by measures—that is to say, of severe and cruel punishment. Well, the next stage in this matter was the Coercion Act which was brought in by Earl Grey. There, it is true, there were several offences created or revived—offences of the same character as those which have been created or continued by the Peace Preservation Act—but the peculiarity of the Coercion Act of Earl Grey was, that it sought not so much to inflict punishment for the crimes as to insure a certainty of conviction. It was enacted that the offences in question might be tried by Military Courts formed for the purpose. After that Act was abandoned, the same object was sought to be attained by means of a measure enabling the Lord Lieutenant to order extraordinary Courts of Quarter Sessions to be held, with special powers for the trial of these offences. The next step was taken in 1847, when Sir George Grey introduced a Bill for the better prevention of Crime and Outrage in Ireland. By that measure, the Lord Lieutenant was empowered to increase the constabulary in proclaimed districts, and to make those districts bear the additional expense so caused. Those and the Acts relating to the carrying of arms have been the chief means which either this or the Irish Parliament have at any time attempted to bring into operation against the particular crimes to which I have referred. In my opinion, the most effectual part of this legislation has undoubtedly been the provisions relating to the carrying of arms, and next in efficiency I would rank the clauses enabling the Government to increase the Constabulary, and to charge the extra cost upon the district where the increase has been made. These powers the right hon. Gentleman proposes to retain, and they are powers which I hope this House will enable the Government to retain. The power with regard to the constabulary appears to me not only useful and salutary, but essentially just. Crime of the character which has been described could not exist if it did not meet with a considerable amount of approval, or, at all events, toleration from the inhabitants; and, although under this law cases of hardship may occasionally occur, it does appear to me, on the whole, just and right that in the case of a district, the great majority of the inhabitants of which, probably knows something about the crime which has been committed, or, if they do not know, might know, or who might easily take steps which would prevent the commission of the offence, the people ought to be made to feel in their pockets the effect of tolerating such crime, and ought, at all events, to pay the cost of the extra Constabulary required. The right hon. Gentleman spoke at the conclusion of his speech, in terms which I think were almost too gloomy, of the present condition of Ireland. He spoke of the sympathy with crime which still existed, and of the difficulty of obtaining convictions from juries, and altogether appeared to me to take an unnecessarily gloomy view of the question. Perhaps the House would be glad to know that the facts are not really so bad as might be imagined. The House ought to be reminded that the condition of Ireland has in this, as in other respects, enormously improved within the last 30 or 40 years, and when the facts are considered, it will be seen that it is far from a hopeless struggle in which we are engaged. Perhaps I may be allowed to refer for one minute to the statements made in 1833 by Earl Grey, when it was his painful duty to introduce the Coercion Bill. Earl Grey said—

kill, 328; of robbery of arms, 117; of administering unlawful oaths, 263; of resistance to legal process, 8; of turning up land, 20; of resistance to tithes, 50; taking forcible possession, 2; making altogether a total of 9,002 crimes committed in one year, and all crimes of a description connected with and growing out of the disturbed state of the country."—[3 Hansard, xv. 733.]

Compare this with the statement that last year the number of agrarian crimes in Ireland was 213, and everyone must allow that it is surely a great improvement, which ought to be borne in mind. In 1847 Sir George Grey gave, with reference to the six months ending October of that year, the following figures:—Homicides, 96; attempts on life by firing at the person, 126; robberies of arms, 530; firing into dwellings, 116. In one month of that year the number of homicides was 19; cases of firing at the person, 32; firing into dwellings, 26; robberies of arms, 118; total, 195—or very nearly as much crime in one month as there was in the whole of last year. As I before observed, we must not, therefore, following the gloomy apprehensions of the right hon. Gentleman, imagine that remedial or coercive legislation is a hopeless task for us to embark upon, or that the condition of Ireland has not greatly improved under its influence. From what I have said, I hope it will be seen that, in my opinion, this is no party question, and I believe that, with the same feeling, a large number of hon. Members on this side of the House will join me in giving the Government a most cordial support on this occasion. ["Hear, hear!"] I remember a speech—perhaps one of the most eloquent ever delivered in this House—in which my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), on the occasion of the introduction of a measure for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland in 1866, called upon the statesmen on both sides of the House to forget the policy of the past, and try whether, by some exercise of higher statesmanship, the necessity for continually applying to Parliament for exceptional coercive legislation with regard to Ireland might not be obviated. That appeal was not made in vain. My right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone)—whether rightly or wrongly need not now be discussed—has attempted to deal with that country in a higher spirit than had formerly been shown, and I am able to support the present Government with a clearer conscience, and with a better courage, than I could have done if I had not known that the British Parliament has done all that lay in its power to do substantial justice to Ireland. I do not wish to refer for a moment to the opposition given by right hon. Gentlemen opposite to the measures to which I allude. I have no doubt they honestly believed that those measures were not just or expedient. But I do think we have some reason to complain that right hon. Gentlemen opposite should while in Opposition, have made a party question of legislation with regard to Ireland. I remember the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), in addressing his constituents in February, 1874, said that he believed Ireland was, he might say at that moment, governed by laws of coercion of such stringent severity as was unknown in any other quarter of the globe. Now, those are the very laws which have been described to-night, and the material part of which is to be retained in operation by the Government of the right hon. Gentleman. But would anyone say, after hearing the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that these are laws of coercion of such stringent severity as is unknown in any other quarter of the globe? If the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government would take the trouble to learn how the laws in question have been administered, and how far they are really laws of stringent severity, he would probably entertain a very different opinion on the subject from that which he expressed at the last General Election. It is very much to be regretted that party feeling has been introduced into this matter. I hope that the example thus set by the right hon. Gentleman will not be followed by this side of the House, but that as far as we believe that the measures of the Government are just, expedient, and necessary—and of the necessity for such measures the Government must be the best judge—no party considerations will induce us to obstruct those measures with regard to Ireland which they are now about to introduce.

MR. W. SHAW said, speaking for himself, he did not regret having listened to the speech of the noble Lord who had just spoken, who had a right to complain that his peculiar privilege of introducing Coercion Laws for Ireland had been invaded by right hon. Gentlemen opposite. Every measure of this kind had been brought in by some Whig statesman whose natural mission seemed to be to place Ireland under such laws. On behalf of himself and those with whom he was accustomed to act, he entirely repudiated on this question the Leadership of the noble Lord who had just sat down, and he was not sure that the noble Lord led even the front Opposition bench on the subject—in fact, he should like much to hear the views of the right hon. Gentleman who sat next to the noble Lord (Mr. Bright) with regard to it, whose opinions on Irish questions were always statesmanlike and generous. He (Mr. Shaw) was a supporter of the Irish measures of the late Government, but he never looked upon them as dealing completely with the condition of the people of Ireland, but as steps in that direction, as removing obstacles, giving a clear space for the action of high statesmanship. However, it was not the intention of those with whom he acted in that House to offer any opposition to the introduction of the Bill, and he thought that this courtesy was due to the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of it. He, however, could assure the House that coercive measures were not the kind of government calculated to allay discontent in Ireland. He would only ask that the second reading should not be taken till after Easter, as many hon. Members from Ireland would be absent, attending the Assizes, and it would be well that all shades of Irish opinion should be present to discuss this subject. After listening to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, he thought he might state that he had made out no case for the continuation of these Coercion Acts. The number of cases in which these Acts had been put in force had been very few, and he considered that the Government ought to have looked at the state of the country, its peace and prosperity, and its gradual growth, and he expected that they would generously propose the repeal of these laws. But he had been disappointed, and he felt astonished that they should propose to keep some of these laws in force. If such laws existed in England and Scotland, how would the people deal with them? Why, there would be a revolution. They would not bear with them for a month. It seemed that these Coercion Bills were all that English statesmen could offer to Ireland. They thought they could keep down the dissatisfaction which existed in Ireland with them. The noble Lord the late Chief Secretary (the Marquess of Hartington) had told them that he and his late Colleagues had done everything in their power, when in office, to promote the welfare of Ireland; and the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had, both in his books and his speeches, advocated the claims of Ireland to just consideration, and now he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would put his speeches into action, and open up the resources of Ireland. But what had the right hon. Gentleman done for Ireland? The Government of which he was a Member supported the Galway contract, but every man of common sense saw that it must end in disaster; and last year the present Government devoted towards improving the fisheries a sum of money which belonged to counties in Ireland for other purposes. What the Government should attend to was the ameliorating of the condition of the people of that country. It would not do for the Government to suppose that putting down their feet in this manner would tend to pacify the people of Ireland. The case of Westmeath was one of considerable importance. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary said he was in possession of information regarding that county which was confidential, and could not therefore be disclosed to the House; but he would tell the right hon. Gentleman that the reports of resident magistrates and police constables were not of the most valuable kind, and were not always to be relied on. No doubt, those gentlemen were unwilling to exaggerate, but still they did so. They had nothing else to do but to write reports. The law in respect to the possession of arms was in a most vexatious state. The fact was, the people of Ireland were treated like children. It was considered that they might damage themselves or other people; but the people would have arms in spite of the Acts. As to insurrection, the thing was out of the question. No doubt, a spirit of dislike to English government existed in Ireland, for he did not think that looking at the history of the world, anything was more absurd than the system of English government in Ireland. The Government treated the people of Ireland in a spirit of oppression, dislike, and distrust; and such policy always had, and must continue to produce its natural result. If, in the county of Westmeath, there were reasons for this Act—Ribbonism being such a hateful thing—he would not offer the slightest opposition to that part of the Bill; on the contrary, he would support it. But the right hon. Gentleman had given them no information on the subject. Let them look at the crime and disorder which existed in England, and let the Government propose a Coercion Bill, and let the police put men into gaol and keep them there without trial, and very soon the whole country would be in an uproar. It was their determination to give the Bill their utmost opposition at its future stages. Now, when the right hon. Gentleman and the noble Lord gave the House their views regarding Ireland, he might ask who they were—what did they know of Ireland? Why, nothing beyond the reports furnished to them, reports upon which no reliance could be placed. They were taunted with what Irish Parliaments had done, and told that the present state of Ireland was their own fault, but they never had had an Irish Parliament. Let the Parliament give them the chance of having one now, and they would find that the distrust and dissatisfaction which existed would be got rid of, and that insurrectionary spirit which was found in Ireland would soon disappear.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he had the honour of representing the county of Westmeath, which had been, and still was to be, very hardly hit by the Coercion Acts under consideration. The right hon. Gentleman and the noble Lord the late Chief Secretary (the Marquess of Hartington) had both spoken of the Habeas Corpus Act as being no longer suspended in Ireland, but did they know it was suspended as far as Westmeath was concerned? And yet the Chief Secretary for Ireland spoke of that county as being as peaceable as any other part of Ireland. The English Government, in fact, maintained the Acts just as they might maintain an old gibbet or a cannon in the market-place, simply to irritate the people of Ireland. What was the justification put forward for maintaining the worst parts of the Coercion Acts in force? The right hon. Gentleman, in making his statement to the House, said that a meeting of magistrates, at which 50 gentlemen attended, was held to consider the propriety of renewing those Bills, and that they were unanimous in recommending the Government to do so. Under these circumstances, they had no choice, and the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that any such representation made in England must have been attended to. But he (Lord Robert Montagu) would remind him that the magistrates of England were Englishmen, while those of Ireland belonged generally to an alien race, who hated the people among whom they lived, and were always anxious to coerce and oppress them. He protested against a policy of coercion being always followed, and reminded the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government that, when he sat on the Opposition benches, he stated that it was the bane of Ireland, that the Irish people were demoralized by restrictive laws, and that a policy of consideration was the only one to be adopted. Such laws required force behind them, for without force they could not be carried into effect. The time might come when the Government of England would say to Ireland—“My father chastised you with whips; I will chastise you with scorpions,” and the result might be similar to that which followed the uttering of that sentence—a part of the Kingdom might be torn away. He had come down to the House fully expecting to hear a proposal on the part of the Government for the repeal of the Coercion Laws. He greatly regretted that such a course was not about to be adopted. It had been asserted that the laws in question had been prudently administered, but that fact did not excuse the existence of laws which were irritating and unnecessary. Coercion Laws made the people the slave of the Government. What was a slave but one who was at the mercy of another. Tyranny consisted in the fact that people were subjected to the caprice of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman, arguing in favour of the continued existence of those laws, had enumerated all the cases that had arisen under the Peace Preservation Act. How few they were. And let them remember that when they had laws so coercive that, as the Prime Minister once said, the like never existed in any part of the world, and no arrests were made under them—the result was to show the peaceable character of the Irish people. Given tyrannous laws and no arrests, what did the fact prove but that there was no one to take up? They might depend upon it that magistrates and policemen liked to exercise power; and yet, with all the power those laws placed in the hands of Irish magistrates and policemen, they could not succeed in getting prisoners to put into the prisons. “Oh, but,” said the Chief Secretary for Ireland, “we are reforming the Coercion Laws somewhat.” He would say to the Chief Secretary, in the words of Hamlet—“Reform them altogether.” Let them try a different policy from that which they had heretofore adopted, and say to the Irish people, not “We know you hate us, and want to get rid of us,” but “You are our fellow-citizens, and we will treat you as such. We will put you on an equality with the people of England and Scotland, and not treat you as an inferior race.” The right hon. Gentleman had admitted that the magistrates were sometimes injudicious, and the Constabulary over-zealous. But, notwithstanding that over-zeal and indiscretion, they had not succeeded in making out a case against the Irish. Why, too, should they place in the hands of injudicious magistrates and over-zealous constables weapons of coercion and irritation? It was not only unjust, but most unwise to do so. The right hon. Gentleman said that there was very little crime of an ordinary nature in Ireland, and none of that brute violence which disgraced parts of England. There had been no riots in Ireland like those which occurred in Sheffield, no sacking of police-stations and burning of adjoining houses. But what would be said if, on account of those occurrences, Coercion Bills were proposed for England and Scotland? There were, said the right hon. Gentleman, only 200 cases of agrarian crime in Ireland in the year 1874, and the greater number of these were threatening letters. But threatening letters were not confined to Ireland. Most of those who heard him received threatening letters, How often did shopkeepers receive threatening letters, if they only contained threats of actions at law? For his part, he could not see in the proposal of the Government anything that would tend to ameliorate the condition of Ireland. Two grounds had been put forward for the continuing of the Acts. The first was, that some Irish people desired separation from this country. Well, the people of Ireland had at the General Election an opportunity of sending to Parliament men who represented their views, and they did not return a single Separatist. They sent to Parliament those who desired Home Rule; but that was only another name for the self-government which the Prime Minister once called the “old Tory policy.” The only instance in which a Separatist had been elected was that which occurred the other day at Tipperary, and therefore that reason fell to the ground. The right hon. Gentleman gave as his other reason that emigration to America had almost ceased. He united with the right hon. Gentleman in rejoicing that the emigration from Ireland had ceased, because the strength of a country lay in its people. But the right hon. Gentleman said that these emigrants returned from the United States with ideas of violence which the people of this country did not sympathize with. But had they Coercion Acts in the United States? No; they enjoyed liberty there, and when the Irish emigrants had learnt to compare the freedom of the United States with that of Ireland, what would be the effect? Could we always expect to be at peace with all nations of the world? And when cruisers were fitted out by other countries, it was possible that the Americans might not trust to another Alabama adjudication, but declare war against us. We might then find that Ireland would be our weak point. He declared that this was a suicidal Bill, because it would make the Irish draw unfavourable comparisons between the Government under which they lived and that of the United States. He confessed that he had been deeply disappointed by the policy of the Leader of the Opposition. He expected that the noble Marquess would have given Notice of an Amendment directed against all exceptional legislation, except where urgent grounds could be shown for its necessity. The noble Marquess had been brought up in the traditions of a Whig House, and had been taught to respect liberty, and he expected him to declare his strong dislike to the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. But, so far from that, the noble Marquess said that the Government must be in possession of more information from resident magistrates and the police than the Opposition could have, and he therefore said—"Do not let us judge for ourselves. Let us trust the Government, and legislate in the dark." Some day, however, a bright morning would arise, and it would be seen that there was a split somewhere, and that the Government majority had disappeared. The noble Marquess would not then trust the Government, but would take another line, because he would want the help of Irish Members. He called that an ignoble policy, if the noble Marquess would pardon him for saying so. The right hon. Gentleman said that the English Parliament might be coercive, restrictive, and almost tyrannous in its legislation for Ireland, but that so also was the Irish Parliament. But was that Parliament elected by the Irish people? No Roman Catholic could sit in that House. It was, in fact, an English House of Commons sitting in Dublin, which allowed itself to be dictated to by an English House of Commons sitting in London. The Irish Members had decided that it would be uncourteous to offer any opposition to the Government Bill in its present stage, but they would not be doing their duty—and the Members for Westmeath would especially fail in their duty—if they did not offer it their most strenuous opposition on a future occasion.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, he wished to point out that the Bill would leave each one of his constituents liable to be imprisoned at any time without any allegation of crime being made against him; further, the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that for the advantage of a great number it was necessary to sacrifice the rights of a few, was a most dangerous argument, seeing that it had been used abroad to justify political assassination. With regard to the law prohibiting the keeping of arms in Ireland, it was no doubt true that a farmer might go to a resident magistrate and would sometimes obtain permission to keep a gun in his house. The farmers, however, disliked going to the resident magistrate, and, although the liberty of the Press was, no doubt, important, yet it did not come home to every man like the prohibition against keeping a gun in his house. The fact was, that this law against carrying guns was a rigid Game Law for Ireland. He was himself very fond of shooting; but that was no reason why he should support such a rigid Game Law. If every Irish Member would vote steadily against all Game Laws, in a year or two the law which prohibited a man from having a gun in his house would have to be repealed.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK said, he must enter his protest against the renewal of these unconstitutional measures. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland anticipated that if these coercive statutes were repealed crime would revive in Ireland. But the same argument would be equally good in two years time. There might then be the same absence of crime, but it might again be said—"If you repeal these Acts crime might reappear." If there had been any facts to bear out the apprehension that a sleeping conspiracy was lurking in Ireland that would have been a strong argument in favour of the continuance of coercive measures. The Government had simply furnished the House with the opinions of those who were prejudiced by the position they held in Ireland, and who, yielding to the ordinary incentives that influence human nature, would not relinquish their power unless they were compelled to do so. There were public bodies in Ireland that altogether dissented from the opinions at which the magistrates had arrived, and the town commissioners of Tullamore, in King's County, had met and passed a resolution affirming the total absence of Ribbonism in that county. There had been but one prisoner in the county prison in the course of the last few months, and, to prevent any use being made of that fact, a number of military prisoners had been sent down. In the county of Westmeath, at a meeting of the Catholic Bishop and his clergy, a resolution had been passed stating that in their opinion Ribbonism did not exist in the district at present; and he could not imagine what object they could have in passing

such a resolution, if Ribbonism really did exist, seeing that the men who were affected by it, when it did exist, were the farmers who were the most influential members of their own flocks. It would have been a most unpopular thing to do if Ribbonism really existed. The statement that a murder had been adjourned for two years until the Act expired would be a laughable statement if it did not relate to a murder; and seeing that such murders had generally been committed during the continuance of excitement, the story of deliberate postponement was not consistent with what he knew of the country and its people. If there were any truth in the story, why was not the intending murderer taken up under the provisions of the Act? The Chief Secretary had claimed credit for prudence and moderation in administering the Act. But as the object of the Act was to preserve life and property by imprisoning all persons whose liberty was dangerous to the peace of the country—to leave them at large would have been inconsistent with the spirit of the law. If it were fairly administered, it must be administered with all necessary rigour, and there could be no such thing as a claim to credit for prudence in carrying it out. The Tipperary election could not be a reason, though it might be an excuse, for the conduct of the Government, and it had no more bearing on the question than any other election—that of Stoke-upon-Trent, for example. It was not with reference to Tipperary these Acts were passed, but they were passed when agrarian outrages prevailed in Westmeath. These had ceased, the reason for the Acts had ceased, and therefore their continuance was unconstitutional and uncalled for. Although he should not offer any opposition to the introduction of the Bill, he would ask the right hon Baronet to give some time for its consideration.

MR. R. POWER said, he did not for many reasons regret the speech of the noble Lord who occupied the unenviable position of being a Leader without a party, but he regretted to have heard the cheers which greeted the announcement that a policy of severity towards Ireland was to be continued. His own county of Waterford had always been characterized by freedom from crime and violence, and he therefore felt bound to offer his protest against a system of legislation which tended to degrade the people, and to the abuse of all authority. In 1870 some facts were offered as an excuse for the course that was adopted; but now, not even the flimsiest excuse was made for the continuance of Acts that were detestable to the majority of the Irish people. Exceptional legislation could only be justified by exceptional circumstances; but the present tranquillity of Ireland had been admitted on all hands, and especially by Chief Justices Whiteside and Monahan and Judge Barry. Those learned Judges, in their Charges to their respective Grand Juries, had borne witness to the absence of Ribbonism, and since July last, no person had been imprisoned under these Acts. It had been said that that would be the result of coercion; but in Waterford, Limerick, and Cork, which were under these Acts, there had been an increase of ordinary crime; while in Tyrone, which was not under them, there had been a decrease. He therefore denied that that tranquillity had been brought about by coercive measures; but even supposing that they had done good, there was no necessity now for retaining these Acts on the Statute Book. When a patient was restored to health, medical men did not continue the administration of medicines. If they did, a disease far worse than that which had been cured might be the result. In the same way, he feared that coercion would produce a worse disease than it was intended to cure, and that it would foster disloyalty among the people. It was said that disloyalty was due to political agitators; but what was it encouraged the agitators? Why should the Constitution in Ireland be suspended, and why should that country be treated in a different manner from the rest of the world? Since the year 1800, the system of governing Ireland was a succession of Acts of Peace Preservation and Coercion, interrupted by homœopathic doses which gave no real satisfaction to the people, and ignored the fact that the safety and integrity of the Empire must rest upon loyalty in the hearts of the people, and not upon terrors produced by coercive laws. The way to make people disloyal was to treat them as rebels. If coercion were an effective remedy for disloyalty, Ireland ought to be one of the best governed countries in Europe. For one, he must protest against the Bill which the Chief Secretary for Ireland asked leave to introduce, believing, as he did, that in the present state of Ireland it was unjust, unconstitutional, and impolitic. By the course which they were taking, the Government admitted that the administration by England of Irish affairs was a failure, and proclaimed to the world that it was only by adopting measures of coercion that they were able to maintain their authority in that country.

MR. STORER said, it was extremely difficult for any Englishman to understand why it was that Irishmen wished to do away with laws which they must admit had the effect of preserving peace and order in Ireland, especially when they were told by the responsible Minister of the Crown that the resident magistrates, the justices, and the police, all considered their continuance necessary. For his own part, he could account for the necessity of dealing with that country on a system so totally different from that which was required in England, only upon the theory that the people of Ireland were naturally fond of sport, and took a delight in being shot at. He had been in Ireland once, and, when there, had heard of a gentleman there who was fired at so constantly that he got the appellation of "Woodcock." And if coercive laws now in force were completely repealed, he had no doubt there would be one general conflagration in Ireland; for it was clear that no concession or sop which might be given to that country—in the shape of a destruction of a Church or robbing the landlord for the benefit of the tenant—would conciliate the Irish people, so long as they listened to the voice of agitators who led them for their own special purposes. He hoped, therefore, the Government would endeavour to conciliate Ireland in that which was the only proper way—by treating her as part of this great Kingdom, and not dealing with the inhabitants as if they were children in long clothes, who could not walk by themselves, and required petting. He trusted that Ireland, under a system of government which treated them exactly like the people of other parts of the United Kingdom without fear, favour, or affection, would soon regain the use of its common sense.

MR. RONAYNE said, the fact that Ireland was legislated for by hon. Gentlemen like the previous speaker, who had only once been into the country, was sufficient reason why the Gentlemen with whom he was associated were asking for self-government. The result of the one visit the hon. Member had paid to that country, and the amount of information he had acquired whilst there, seemed to result in this—that he had heard somebody or another called "Woodcock." As to the hon. Gentleman's opinion that the people of Ireland should not be treated as children, but instructed in the art of walking alone, that was precisely what they wanted, but they protested against being followed about by policemen and arrested without any conceivable justification. It was no matter for surprise, he might add, that the wishes of the Irish people were not generally consulted in the passing of measures which related to them, since not only the right hon. Gentleman who was now Chief Secretary for Ireland, but the noble Lord who preceded him in office, had more than once expressed the hope that any mistakes which they might make in the discharge of their duties might be attributed to ignorance of that country, rather than to any desire to deal otherwise than justly by her. It was said the Irish people were disaffected; but if they were to be treated to nothing else but Coercion Bills, had they not, he would ask, some cause to be so? He recollected a speech of Archbishop Manning's, in which he said that Prince Bismarck had founded his charge of sedition against the Roman Catholic clergy in Germany on letters and documents which he refused to produce—secret information, he went on to add, on which no English Minister would found a coercion law. That, however, was precisely what an English Minister was doing in the present instance—founding a Coercion Bill on the authority of the police and magistrates, some of whom in many parts of Ireland were totally unworthy of belief. ["Oh, oh!"] Both in religion and politics the magistrates of Ireland as a class were hostile to the people, and hole-and-corner meetings of them could be got up at any time to vote for coercion. They got their information from the police, and the police in turn obtained it from persons who themselves committed crimes, and by accusing other people sought to put the police on the wrong scent. He thought that if the House had before it the documents supplied by the magistrates to the right hon. Gentleman, they would find they were all based on the representations of the police. The noble Lord the late Chief Secretary for Ireland had told them as the land of Ireland was Protestant, the magistrates representing the land must necessarily be Protestant. In his own county—Cork—there were 390 magistrates, and of these only 65, one-half of whom were absentees, were Roman Catholics. He did not make use of that argument in anything like a sectarian spirit, for every one who knew him knew that he had just as great a respect for Protestants as he had for Catholics; but the result of that exclusion of Roman Catholics from the list of magistrates was that every petty sessions bench throughout the country was occupied by a number of men who differed from the mass of the people to whom they had to administer justice, in religion, in politics, and in sentiment. In fact, they differed from them in every point that could inspire confidence in their decisions. The consequence was, the people had no confidence in them. They were not singular in that respect, as the Government itself had no confidence in them, for they associated with them the stipendiary magistrates to be their teachers, and even to be spies upon them. Again, as regarded the control of the police, the county magistrates had no authority whatever. On the contrary, they were controlled by the police, instead of the police being controlled by them. The House, he was afraid, did not understand the difference between the county magistrates of England and the county magistrates of Ireland. In Ireland, they were a class distinct in creed and hostile to the people, and whenever it was proposed to make any concession to the people, the magistrates were those who were the foremost in opposing it. In England, on the contrary, there was a community of religion and of sentiments between the people and magistrates. The country was too overrun by the constabulary. A magistrate was not satisfied unless he had a policeman to attend him to church on Sunday, or unless he had a police station at his lodge gate; and all because he had not to pay for them. If the House put the cost of the constabulary upon the landed property of the country, they would very soon find how few the magistrates considered were required for the preservation of law and order. When any extra police were quartered in a locality, it was the poor occupiers and not the landlords who had to pay for them, and that was a practice which gave rise to a great deal of oppression. Having said that much with respect to the county magistrates, he would now ask the House to consider who were the stipendiary magistrates who were to be their teachers. The Earl of Rosse told them that the men selected for the office of stipendiary magistrate were broken-down roués, men damaged both in fortune and reputation, and that the appointments themselves were jobbed away. Archbishop Whately said the same thing, and added that fitness was the only claim disregarded. They were men without any legal learning whatever, ignorant alike of law and of the principles of the Constitution, drunkards, and so involved in debt that they could not appear abroad except on Sunday. Some time ago the corpse of one who died in the town of Shenrone was seized for a debt which he owed his butcher, and he (Mr. Ronayne) had no doubt that if Government had acted upon the representations of that stipendiary, that poor butcher would have been locked up. The people of Ireland had no confidence in these appointments, and with regard to those whose opinions were taken on important questions for the guidance of Dublin Castle, the first question asked by them was, how the English Government would like to have them answered. He believed the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary went over to Ireland with the very best intentions, but when he got there he was entirely in the hands of the Castle officials. The right hon. Gentleman had indeed navigated the Shannon on an outside car, and in a week solved the great question of its drainage, which had puzzled the best engineers for the last 10 years or more, and came back with the great ornithological discovery that the partridges are 10 days earlier in Ireland than they are in this country, and he could not help thinking that if the right hon. Gentleman had stuck to the partridges, he would have done better for Ireland and better for the Government.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE said, that as he saw it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to have the Order discharged, and the Bill referred to a Select Committee, he hoped the course now adopted would not prevent the Bill from being so altered in that Committee as to make it extend to one year instead of two.

MR. LOCKE said, it would be impossible for the Commission to complete their scheme respecting Epping Forest in such time as would enable legislation to take place next year, and it was desirable, therefore, that this Bill should continue for a period of two years, as was proposed.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE wished to know on what grounds it was proposed to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. If it was a mere formality, he would suggest that on the present occasion the formality should be dispensed with.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, it was done on the suggestion of the Examiner of Private Bills, and in compliance with the Forms of the House, it being really a Private Bill. The Government was anxious to have the question involved in the Bill settled as early as possible, and if it was found that a continuance for one year would be sufficient, the necessary alteration could be made in the Bill at a future stage.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. W. H. SMITH moved that the Order that the Bill be committed be discharged:—That the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK said, he had no intention of opposing the Bill. The London police magistrates were well entitled to the proposed increase of their salaries. He thought, however, a similar act of justice should be done to the Dublin police magistrates, who had more work and less pay than their London brethren.

Motion agreed to.

LAND TITLES AND TRANSFER BILL.

(NOS. 11-27.) COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had thought it would be more convenient that he should explain the nature of the Amendments he intended to propose in Committee; but a question of very great importance—the question whether there should be introduced into the Bill a provision to render the registration of title compulsory—having been raised by his noble and learned Friend (Lord Selborne) he thought it would be more convenient that it should be brought forward on the Report rather than in the Committee. He had no objection to that course; and as the Amendments which he himself intended to propose in Committee were not such as to require explanation, and had been made in deference to suggestions from his noble and learned Friend and other quarters, and were in entire accordance with the provisions of the measure, he would move them without further observation.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, he thought that there were two conditions essential to all legislation on the title and transfer of land—first, that registration should be compulsory; and second, that a title once placed upon the register should be irremovable. In both these respects the present Bill fell short of its predecessors. He regretted that the noble and learned Lord had given no further explanation why the present Bill differed in such important points from those of 1873 and 1874. By the former it was proposed that after a period of two years, registration should be compulsory; while the Bill of 1874, which extended the interval from two years to three, was still a Bill for compulsory registration, although on its last stage the noble and learned Lord had introduced a provision to exempt from compulsory registration properties under £300. The Bill now before their Lordships fell short of these two Bills in two respects—namely, in not providing for a compulsory registration; and next, in containing a clause—the 21st—under which land placed on the register might be withdrawn at a subsequent time. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, in explaining his reasons for withdrawing the clause for compulsion said, that any compulsion provided by a measure of this kind must be at best only an imperfect one: but, as his noble and learned Friend behind him (Lord Selborne) had pointed out, it would be a compulsion co-extensive with the necessity of the case—namely, a compulsion applicable to all property coming into the market. If a property did not come into the market, it mattered very little whether it went on the register. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had said that the expenses of registration would press severely on the parties in the case of small transactions of sale and purchase, and that it was customary in some parts of the country to transfer small parcels for building purposes absolutely without any title whatever. He would ask whether it was not the present unfortunate condition of the law which drove the parties to the contraband practices which the noble and learned Lord had described in introducing the Bill? He was, however, unable to understand why registration should necessarily be made so expensive as the noble and learned Lord had described. The House had now an opportunity of removing a blot by doing away with the complicated arrangements connected with the tracing of title, and at the same time of removing an unfounded but widely-spread impression that real property was fenced round by artificial restrictions which were mainly in the interest of the class to which their Lordships belonged. Would this Bill effect that object? In 1859, Sir Hugh Cairns said that the grievance of the present system of tracing title had been felt for 200 years before. After 200 years of suffering on the part of those who had to do with the titles of land, and 16 years of consideration on the part of the noble and learned Lord, he thought they had a right to expect something more than this Bill. He hoped it would be amended, and that it would become law in the present Session. The Bill of last year, having passed through their Lordships' House, was dropped in "another place" to give way to a re-actionary measure, the greater part of which was, in its turn, subsequently abandoned. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack seemed to be playing towards the Prime Minister the part which the Sibyl played to Tarquinius Superbus. There was, however, this difference between the two cases. Unlike the Books of the Sybil, the former Bill of the Lord Chancellor was not destroyed, but reposed in the pigeon-holes of the noble and learned Lord, from which he entreated him to produce it, and to place it once more on the Table of the House.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was not surprised that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne), who brought so much intelligence to bear on all subjects in the discussion of which he took a part, should have desired to say something on this Bill; but as the noble Marquess had not refrained from introducing a matter which belonged to the domain of Party politics, and had stated that the Bill of last year, after passing their Lordships' House, had been withdrawn in the other in order to the introduction of a re-actionary measure, he would say that that Bill was not abandoned in any sense. What prevented the Government from proceeding in the House of Commons with the Land Transfer Bill of last year was the time occupied in the discussion on the Public Worship Regulation Bill. As to the Bill which he introduced into the House of Commons 16 years ago, the noble Marquess forgot that it was a Bill not for compulsory, but for voluntary registration. The more he considered this subject, the more convinced did he feel that in its voluntary character a measure of this kind would have the greatest chance of success, and in making a provision for compulsion in the Bill of last year, he did so rather out of deference to the course which was pursued the previous year by his noble and learned Friend (Lord Selborne) in the Bill introduced by him. When introducing the Bill now before their Lordships, he explained at some length why he did not make the Bill compulsory, and he was quite prepared again to state his reasons for that course when the distinct issue was raised. But, as he had understood from his noble and learned Friend that it would be more convenient for him to raise that issue on the Report, he had refrained on the Order for going into Committee from discussing the point in the manner suggested by the noble Marquess. With regard to the provision in this Bill for allowing lands once put on the register to be removed from it, he had no strong feeling on that point. He did not attach much importance to it; and therefore, if their Lordships should be in favour of striking out that provision, he should make no objection.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY thought that in consequence of the provision in the Bill which would enable persons to register a possessory title, the difficulties arising from a compulsory provision would not be at all so great as the noble and learned Lord seemed to apprehend. Looking at the Bill from the landowners' point of view, he thought the Bill would prove inopportune. No doubt, they had a strong desire to see titles simplified, and the expense of the transfer of land diminished; but, on the other hand, they had a very natural fear that any measure passed by Parliament would have the effect of superadding further trouble and expense to those which already existed. If only an absolute title could be registered, a great many would consider the inquiry incidental to placing the title in the register would be little different from involving themselves in a law suit; but he believed there would be an anxiety on the part of many of those persons to register a possessory title, with the view of obtaining the absolute title which registration for a certain time would confer. The noble and learned Lord was a high authority on these subjects; but, as a landowner, and one who knew the sentiments of landowners, he greatly regretted that the noble and learned Lord had abandoned the compulsory provision; and, without assuming the character of a prophet, he ventured to predict that a few years would show that the Bill would not effect the object the noble and learned Lord had in view.

LORD SELBORNE said, that he would give due Notice of the Amendments which he intended to propose on the Report.

House in Committee.

Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Monday, the 15th instant; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 27.)

EUROPEAN ASSURANCE SOCIETY ARBITRATION BILL.

PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in presenting a Bill for amending the European Assurance Society Arbitration Acts, 1872 and 1873, said, that as the Bill would have to be brought before the Standing Orders Committee and pursue the course which was usual in connection with Private Bills, it was unnecessary for him to detain their Lordships by any lengthy explanation. The European Assurance Company failed some years ago, and there were involved in it by amalgamation as many as 44 other Companies. The affairs of all these Companies had to be considered, adjusted, and wound up. For this purpose an Act of Parliament was passed authorizing the appointment of an Arbitrator. The Lord Chancellor for the time being was empowered to appoint a successor in the event of the Arbitrator's death, and any such successor was to be chosen among those who had been Judges of the superior Courts of Law and Equity. Under this power, he (the Lord Chancellor) was appointed the first Arbitrator; and afterwards, on his accession to the Woolsack, Lord Westbury was appointed to succeed him. Lord Westbury died in 1873, and the Lord Chancellor appointed Lord Romilly in his place. Lord Romilly died in 1874, and it was now necessary to appoint a successor to him. The amount of business still to be done was both large and irksome, and among those qualified under the original Act there was none who could be found to carry on the work. It had, therefore, become necessary to enlarge the area under which the choice of an Arbitrator could be made; and the matter was very important, inasmuch as, although the past Arbitrators had from time to time pronounced opinions on the cases which had come before them, all that had to be done in the shape of making an award still remained to be done. Inasmuch as some difference of opinion on certain points had been expressed by those who had acted as Arbitrators in this matter, it was thought desirable that, in the event of the Arbitrators differing from the decisions already given, there should be a single appeal allowed in certain cases to the Court of Appeal in Chancery, in order that a conflict of decisions might be prevented. He had defined these cases in a Schedule to the Bill. With that explanation, he should merely present the Bill to their Lordships, without asking them to read it a first time on that occasion.

Bill for amending the European Assurance Society Arbitration Acts, 1872 and 1873, presented by the Lord Chancellor, and referred to the Examiners.

House adjourned at a quarter before Seven o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

CRIMINAL LAW — SENTENCE ON A CHILD AT STALYBRIDGE.

QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true, as stated in the "Manchester Guardian," that a child of seven years of age was, last month, sentenced at Stalybridge to two terms of seven days' imprisonment each, with "hard labour;" whether a child of such tender years can lawfully be subjected to such punishment, and whether it might have been sent to a Reformatory; and, if he can state what was the nature of the "hard labour" ordered?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, it was true that a child was sentenced, not, however, of the age of seven, but of eight years, upon two charges of pocket picking to which it pleaded guilty. He was informed by the Mayor of the borough that hard labour was neither ordered nor inflicted, and that, under the particular section of the Act under which the charge was made, there was no power of sending the child to a reformatory.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I observe that there are on the Paper, in addition to the Question which has just been asked, other two relating to the same subject—one standing in the name of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory), and the other in the name of the hon. Member for Pembrokeshire (Mr. Scourfield). With the permission of the House, I will ask leave to answer all three Questions at the same time. It does not at all surprise me to see upon the Paper three Questions upon a matter which evidently creates great interest. I have put myself in communication with Dr. Andrew Clarke on the matter, and, with the permission of the House, I will state very briefly the facts as disclosed to me by him. Dr. Clarke had been in attendance upon Sir Charles Lyell for an affection of the brain for some time before the accident which befell him on the 9th of December last. At that time Dr. Clarke recommended the family of Sir Charles Lyell to call in Sir James Paget, as the accident was a surgical one. For some time afterwards Sir Charles Lyell was attended by Sir James Paget, Dr. Andrew Clarke, and the general practitioner who regularly attended the family, and to all appearance he recovered entirely from the effects of the accident. Afterwards the original affection from which he had been suffering increased upon him, and he was again attended by Dr. Clarke and his own regular practitioner until the time of his death, which did not occur until some 12 weeks after the accident to which I have referred. When it was pressed upon the family by the Coroner that an inquest should be held, Dr. Clarke expostulated with that official, to whom he presented a certificate of the cause of death in, I believe, his own handwriting. The Coroner, however, insisted upon holding the inquest, and I believe the facts made known in the public Press with regard to the inquiry are substantially true. If I were sitting as Chairman of Quarter Sessions, considering whether this inquest, held in the discretion of the Coroner, ought so to have been held and ought to be allowed in the accounts of the Coroner, I should strike it out of the list with the explanation that, in my opinion, it was a great outrage on decency and common sense. The House may perhaps be aware that the Secretary of State for the Home Department has no power over Coroners. The power to dismiss a Coroner rests with the Lord Chancellor. I have nevertheless thought it my duty, as being responsible for the due administration of the law, to write to the Coroner for an explanation of his reasons for holding this inquest. I have, in reply, received from the Coroner a letter in which practically he states no reason, so far as I can see, which in any way justifies the course he took. Feeling strongly in regard to this case, I have thought it my duty, as the Lord Chancellor has a certain jurisdiction over Coroners, to represent the whole state of the case to my noble and learned Friend, leaving it in his hands to deal with the question as he may think best. I can only say for myself that if such acts of discretion or indiscretion were at all common among Coroners, it would be quite necessary to clip their wings.

SPAIN—CASE OF MR. H. D. JENKEN. QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have taken, or intend to take, any steps in order to obtain compensation for Mr. H. D. Jenken for the injuries inflicted upon him at Lorca in Spain in 1869; and, whether there has been any correspondence on the subject with the Spanish Government since the date of the last Return in 1873; and, if so, will it be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. BOURKE: This matter was fully considered by the late Government, who, after taking the advice of the Law Officers, decided that they would not be justified in pressing the claim. In that decision Her Majesty's present Government concur, and therefore no further steps have been taken since the date of the Papers last laid before Parliament. There is no subsequent Correspondence on the subject, except one or two applications from Mr. Jenken asking for reconsideration, which have been answered in the manner I have stated to the House.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU appealed to the Chief Secretary for Ireland not to take the second reading of this Bill until after Easter, in view of the importance of the question, and the fact that many Irish Members were absent in Ireland at the Assizes.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he thought it would be to the general advantage that the second reading should be taken as early as possible. He proposed on Monday next to intimate on what day it would come on. At present he hoped the second reading would be taken before the Easter holidays. He expected the Bill would be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow.

MERCANTILE MARINE—THE EAST WINDS — ASSISTANCE TO SHIPPING. QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. GOURLEY,

MR. HUNT said, that in view of the detention of ships in the Channel by the East winds, orders had been given to send a steamer to Portsmouth to assist homeward-bound vessels which might be in want of provisions.

PRIVILEGE—UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE—"UNCONDITIONAL ALLEGIANCE."—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS: I wish, Sir, to make a few remarks on a Question of Privilege with reference to what happened in this House on Friday night last in the course of a Motion brought forward by the hon. Member for Meath, (Mr. John Martin). It will be in the recollection of many hon. Members that in the course of the few observations I made I dropped the words "unconditional allegiance." I was about to found an argument upon the proposition previously made with reference to this question, but before I had time to finish the sentence the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) rose and asserted that the mere utterance of the words was a Breach of Privilege, proceeding to say that instances could be found in the constitutional history of the country to show that hon. Members had been sent to prison for using the words out of the House. You, Sir, rose and said that the words were un-Parliamentary, and I submitted as I was bound to do. No one can have a more profound respect for your decisions than I have, or be more ready to submit to them. I was satisfied, however, that the exact expression I used did not reach your ears; and in consequence of what has since appeared in the public prints I wish to draw your attention, Sir, and that of the House, to the fact that as the case now stands, it appears to have been laid down by you that the simple use of the words "unconditional allegiance" is in itself a Breach of Privilege. I believe, with all deference, that that was not your meaning. I believe the words were misunderstood, and that it was not intended to lay down any such proposition confining the rights of speech in this House.

MR. SPEAKER: After the explanation of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry I have no hesitation in saying that I misapprehended the purport of his remarks on Friday last. I understood him to be imputing to certain Members of the House that they only acknowledged a conditional allegiance in such a sense as to charge them with disloyalty. Under that impression I interposed, as such an expression would have been clearly un-Parliamentary. But it appears now from the statement of the hon. and learned Member that he was about to found an argument upon unconditional allegiance. Such being the case, I have no hesitation in saying that he was perfectly entitled to enter upon that subject, and had I clearly apprehended the purport of his remarks, I certainly should not have interposed.

EDUCATION IN RURAL DISTRICTS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. FAWCETT, in rising to call attention to the present unsatisfactory condition of Education in the Rural Districts, and to move—

said, the present appeared to be an appropriate time for bringing this important subject forward, because there seemed to be some danger that the general question of national education would not receive the attention it deserved. He believed that almost all Members of that House, on both sides of it, would agree with him in the proposition that education was just as important for persons living in rural districts as for those who dwelt in towns. If possible, ignorance was a greater misfortune to the former than it was to the latter. The activity of town life might, at least to some extent, supply the wants of early defective education; but if the early education of a rural labourer was neglected, there was nothing to relieve the dull monotony of his existence. If unable to read, leisure time became a burden to him. But, viewing the question simply from a labour point, he held that there was no greater fallacy than to suppose that an agricultural labourer did not require intelligence, but simply needed a knowledge of rough and unskilled labour. The very processes of agriculture—at any rate, many of them—required more intelligence on the part of the labourer than did many of the monotonous employments of workmen in manufacturing districts. Looking at the subject in that point of view—first of the labourer and next of industry—the House, he thought, would accept the proposition that it was as important that the rural labourer should be educated as that education should be secured to the artisan, the operative, or the miner. It was absolutely impossible to separate the education of rural districts and the education of towns. There was at present a constant emigration from the country to the towns, and no inconsiderable portion of the town labourers had passed their childhood in the country; and if education in country districts was neglected, the effect, sooner or later, must be felt in towns. The interests of town and of country were in this, as in so many other respects, so inextricably intertwined, that it was impossible to separate them. He had sometimes dwelt on this matter, because the question had been occasionally asked—“Why do you borough Members trouble yourselves about the country, and not leave the country to take care of itself?” He hoped, for one, that such recriminations would never receive the sanction of that House. They all of them had to look to their constituents; but they were also bound to render what assistance they could to improve the condition of their fellow-countrymen wherever they resided, whether in towns or in the country, or whatever their occupation might be. Starting from the proposition, then, that education was as important to the rural labourer as to the inhabitant of towns, it followed that education in the rural districts was just as worthy the solicitude of the House as education in the towns. Let them, however, contrast the position of elementary education in the towns and in the country. So far as the provision of schools was concerned, it was unnecessary to point out that there was no distinction made between town and country. By the Elementary Education Act passed in 1870, and mainly through the assistance of the Party who now sat on the Ministerial side, not only every town, but every village was required to provide schools sufficient for the accommodation of all children between the ages of 5 and 13. He was not anxious to revive old disputes on the subject of his Motion. Whatever might have been the former opinion of his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), he was ready to admit that he was as anxious as possible to secure the attendance of children at school. When his right hon. Friend took a step in the direction of compulsion he was afraid—and he did not say that his right hon. Friend was wrong in fearing—that if he at that time attempted to go further in that direction a reaction might be the result. It was impossible at that time to foresee to what extent compulsion would be adopted by the town population. At the present moment every town with more than 100,000 inhabitants had adopted the principle of compulsory education; and he believed he was correct in saying that every town with 20,000 inhabitants and upwards which had a school board had embodied that principle in its bye-laws. Although it was said in the discussion of the Elementary Education Act that the principle of compulsory education was un-English, yet without the slightest influence from the Government it had been adopted in all the most important towns of this country. The borough population of England and Wales was already 9,800,000, and out of that number no less than seven-eighths were under school boards. But what was still more remarkable was this—that out of the whole number under school boards, though it was not obligatory to adopt compulsory education, 98 per cent of the population under school boards had adopted compulsory education. It might be said that this adoption of the compulsory principle was a sudden freak, and that there would one day be a reaction. There was no sign of reaction, and every fact which could be observed tended exactly in an opposite direction. If compulsion had worked with hardship on the people, nothing was so easy as to revert to the former state of things. He was told that if a Motion were now made antagonistic to the principle of compulsion it would not have a single supporter in the school boards of London, Manchester, Birmingham, or any other large town. But in the country districts, there were only a few school boards, and only a small number of these school boards had adopted compulsion. In the county of Wiltshire, with which he was intimately acquainted, there were only five school boards in rural districts, and only one had adopted compulsion. In Dorsetshire, 12 country parishes had established school boards, and only three had adopted the principle of compulsion; there was not a single municipal borough which had a school board; there was only one Parliamentary borough—Wareham—which had a school board, and that had not adopted compulsion. In Shropshire, an extensive county, there were only four school boards, and only one had adopted compulsion. In some counties he was aware there were a greater number of school boards; but even there they were not very numerous, and only a few had adopted compulsion. In Suffolk there were 31 school boards, and only three had adopted compulsion. In Essex there were 35 school boards, and only six had adopted compulsion. In Leicestershire there were 16 school boards, and only three had adopted compulsion; therefore, summarizing the contrast between the town and country districts, it came to this—that in the towns nearly the entire population were at the present moment under compulsory education; whereas of the rural districts only a small proportion had school boards, and only a small fraction of these had adopted compulsion. He wished the House to understand in the clearest manner that while making these remarks he was not advocating the establishment of universal school boards. All that he contended for was that at the present moment school boards were the only agency by which children could be got to school, and until some other agency was provided by those who were responsible for the education of the country steps should be taken to procure the attendance of children by that agency. He thought it was quite possible that there might be discovered some better way of getting children to school, and that the aid of the school Inspector might be most judiciously employed. But whatever might be the opinions of hon. Members upon that point no one could doubt that school boards in the country districts were extremely unpopular. He was not going to justify that position; but he would explain the reason. In the first place, it was supposed that school boards were expensive, and involved a heavy charge on the rates, and that they would interfere with voluntary denominational schools. With regard to the last objection, he had always been one of those who deemed it of primary importance to get children to school, and who thought it a secondary consideration whether they went to denominational or undenominational schools; but he thought that both extremes were equally to blame. He thought those were to blame who had resisted school boards where they were the only means of getting children to school, because it would slightly interfere with some denominational school; and as much to blame were those who held extreme opinions on the other side, and who would rather see a child grow up in ignorance, and have its prospects sacrificed for life, than allow it to spend an hour or two in a denominational school. Perhaps it might be urged that although compulsion was all very well for the towns, it was altogether unsuited for the rural districts. Now, what evidence was there on this point? If the opinion he had just referred to were held, it ought to have been proclaimed when the Elementary Education Act was passed; but he could quote authorities which could not be disputed, to show that it was impossible to expect education in the rural districts to be put into a satisfactory state without compulsion. Having already referred to Wiltshire and Dorsetshire, he would mention the remarkable fact that at a meeting held four or five years ago in the palace of the Bishop of Salisbury a resolution was passed affirming, in the strongest possible terms, that compulsion was necessary in order to put education in the rural districts in a satisfactory condition. If asked why compulsion had not been more generally adopted, he would reply that it was one thing to approve compulsion as a general measure, and it was another for a country gentleman or a clergyman to incur the responsibility of using his influence to get compulsion in one village when there was no similar provision in the surrounding districts. The Act passed last Session to extend the Factory Acts provided that no child should be employed in a textile factory until he was 10 years of age. It was a great error to suppose that all factories were in towns. Lancashire and Yorkshire were dotted all over with factories, and if they were not going to do something to complete that legislation it would be a positive misfortune; for previously, under the half-time system, children between the ages of 8 and 10 received a certain amount of education. Again, another Act, passed with the support of the Conservative Party, laid down the important principle that no person should receive out-door parochial relief unless he sent his children to school; and this, unless supplemented by further legislation, would result in the anomaly that the child of an honest hard-working parent might have its education neglected while another child would be having its education attended to because it happened to belong to a drunken parent who was a pauper. The Agricultural Children Act, with all its shortcomings, supplied an unanswerable argument in favour of the extension of compulsion. In that Act they said that a parent should not send his child to work until he had reached a certain age, and unless he had attended school so many times a year. If they interfered with children at work, what possible reason could there be for non-interference with children who were not at work? If the question was put to the great Tory Party what legislation it was they most prided themselves on, they would probably say that for 30 years they had been consistent supporters of the Factory Acts. Formerly it might, perhaps, have been urged with some plausibility that the educational restrictions of those measures had simply grown out of sanitary legislation as an indirect and a collateral consequence; but the cogency of such an argument had been utterly destroyed by the passing of the

Factory Act of last year, which, without any reference to questions of health, provided that if children employed in a textile factory had not at the age of 13 attained a certain standard of education they should be compelled to go to school till they were 14 years of age. With regard to the Agricultural Children Act, it seemed at first sight to secure a certain amount of protection to the children up to the age of 12, though he thought he could show that at the age of 10 years and four months a child might be quite beyond the operation of the Act. It enacted that a child between 9 and 10 years old might be employed in agriculture, if in the previous year he had made 250 attendances at school, and that between 10 and 11 years of age he might be employed if he had made 150 school attendances, or, in other words, been four months at school and eight months at work; but between 11 and 12 years of age he might be employed if he had made 150 attendances, or had been at school four months in the preceding year. Now, under this Act, a child who had attained the age of 10 years and four months might slip out of it altogether. He might give the 75 days' attendance after he had attained the 10 years of age, and thus might pass out of the operation of the Act. He asked if this was not a mockery of educational legislation? Under the present system it was not the children who were neglected, it was the educational efficiency of the schools, and nothing could be more fatal to a school manager. Moreover, in thus allowing education to be lumped together in one portion of the year you were acting in defiance of all principle. The same system was adopted in the Print Works Act, of which the late Mr. Leonard Horner, one of our most experienced Factory Inspectors, said it was a mockery as an educational measure. This opinion was endorsed by Inspector after Inspector, who stated that, as an educational measure, it was altogether useless. Under the Factory Acts, children could not go to work till they were 10 years old, and must attend school till they were 14 unless they reached a certain Standard. In the rural districts children might go to school at 8 and leave altogether at the age of 10 years and four months, while no Standard of education was enforced in their case, and they might leave school though unable to read and write. Nor was this the only point of difference. The Factory and the Mines Acts were enforced under strict inspection; but no one was responsible for carrying out the Agricultural Children Act, which must therefore inevitably become a dead letter. How could you expect clergymen, farmers, and country gentlemen to turn common informers against their neighbours and friends? From all parts of the country he had received communications to the effect that without inspection the Act was hardly worth the paper on which it was printed. Perhaps it might be replied that this point was met in the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell). Now, he considered it a very strange Amendment. It was not an opposition to his (Mr. Fawcett's) Motion. So far as the Amendment went he accepted it. He understood it to imply not only more school attendance, but that it should be secured by adequate inspection. Although he accepted the principle of the Amendment, he was not certain that Her Majesty's Inspectors would be the best parties to look after rural education. The Inspectors of Factories had other duties to perform—to look after the education of children was only one of many duties devolving on them. Possibly it might be better to say that the advantages of inspection should be secured in the case of rural schools through the school Inspectors. He wished particularly to direct the attention of the Home Secretary to what he was now about to say. The other night, in granting a Commission to inquire into the operation of the Factory Acts, the right hon. Gentleman admitted the injustice and impolicy of having different legislation with regard to juvenile labour affecting different competing branches of industry. If there was different legislation, what was the inevitable result? It naturally followed that labour was disturbed, and that produced an unfortunate effect on industry. Mr. Tufnell said, that nothing could be more unfair than to apply different legislation to trades competing in the same branches of art. Mr. Norris said there ought to be free trade in juvenile labour, adding that the Factory Inspectors were unanimous as to the educational advantages of the half-time system; but thought serious harm would be done by a large amount of juvenile labour leaving the restricted industries for industries which were less restricted. As far as possible, therefore, legislation ought to be harmonious, so that one industry should enjoy no advantage over another. There was no infallible barrier between town and country labour. There was a free interchange between them at present, and if a difference were made in town and country in the restrictions upon juvenile labour, manufactures and agriculture would not get their natural proportion. It was said that agricultural labourers were too poor; that it might be desirable to educate their children; but that they could not afford to sacrifice even a portion of their children's earnings. Now, he entreated the House to consider what that argument amounted to. It amounted to this—that in spite of all that they heard about agricultural improvements, and in spite of the kind things done by the clergyman, the country gentleman, and the farmer, the labourers in the most important of all industries were in a condition of such deplorable poverty that the minds of their children must be sacrificed to premature toil, and that intellect blighted which was the noblest work of God. That argument condemned the whole system of agricultural polity, and he would show beyond the possibility of dispute that there was no occasion to do injustice to the cause which hon. Gentlemen opposite advocated when they pressed such an argument. It was a mistake to suppose that all the agricultural districts were in the same position. There was one county in England—Northumberland—where the children were seldom set to agricultural work until they were 11 or 12, and not often until they were 13 or 14 years of age. What was the result of that state of things? Would any one acquainted with that county say that the sending of children to school until they were 12 years of age inflicted any hardship on the parents? Mr. Henley, son of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire, was an Assistant Commissioner appointed by the Government, to inquire into the condition of women and children employed in agriculture, and his Report showed a very different state of things in Northumberland. Speaking of one of the largest unions in Northumberland, Mr. Henley said that in that union children were not set to work until they were 10 or 11 years of age, and that in the summer months; and that they were often not set to work until they were 13 or 14 years of age—that there was no county in England in which agricultural labourers were so prosperous, and no county in which wages were so high; and that he found the cottages comfortable, and heard no complaints. Mr. Henley added that parents there looked upon their children's education as a great duty; that the farmers were great friends of education; that they urged that the children should be sent to school, and supported the schools themselves, because they recognized the simple but important truth that the most efficient and productive labour was intelligent labour. Another Commissioner said that, comparing Northumberland labourers with those in the South, if the Northumberland population had got into this happy position, why should not these advantages be secured to the labourers in the Southern, Eastern, and Western counties? To show that this premature employment of children did no good either to the employer or employed, he begged to direct attention to the words of another gentleman, who would doubtless be regarded as a high authority by hon. Members opposite. Mr. Stanhope was another of the Assistant Commissioners—he could refer to him now as the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire. That hon. Gentleman, who visited Dorsetshire, said that in no other county was there such an excessive amount of boy labour—that boys went to work at 8 years of age; and he made this very significant remark—that to this excessive employment of juvenile labour, and the insufficiency of food, he attributed the stunted growth and early decrepitude of the Dorsetshire labourers. Now, in arguing that something more must be done for the promotion of education in the rural districts, he admitted that this could not be done without producing some hardship. But it should be remembered that the restriction of juvenile labour tended to increase the value of adult labour. Did Gentlemen who supported the Factory Acts suppose they could restrict the labour of children in factories without bringing a bitter pinch to many a poor widow who depended on her children's labour? No great reform could be effected without cases of individual hardship; but that did not deter hon. Gentlemen opposite from carrying out alterations which they believed in the long run would be productive of magnificent results for the entire population. And though the extension of education in the rural districts might occasion individual suffering, still he would appeal to hon. Members opposite to say that, in their opinion, the welfare of the rural population was not less worthy of their solicitude than that of those who dwelt in towns. In conclusion, he would remark that the present Government had a great opportunity which might not occur again. Supported, as no Conservative Administration had been for the last 25 years, by the agricultural interest, they were naturally anxious to prove their desire to do something for their supporters. They accordingly promised to reduce the rates, to improve the administration of turnpikes, to give to tenants compensation for unexhausted improvements. But surely the Government and Parliament would not be so ungenerous and unwise as to give ground for the suspicion that they were anxious to do all these things for those who had votes, but nothing for those who had none. To reduce the rates, to compensate for unexhausted improvements, to administer turnpikes well—these were all advantages which could at once be understood; but it behoved our statesmen responsible for the Government of the Kingdom to recognize this truth—that the best guarantee for the welfare of the country and for the permanent prosperity of its industry, was to secure that those intellectual and moral faculties should be developed which enabled a man to take an intelligent part in the industrial economy of the country, and worthily to occupy his position as a citizen of a free State.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH, in rising to second the Motion, said, that nothing could be more anomalous than the state of society as shown in the West Riding of Yorkshire and Lancashire. The children in the towns were educated up to the age of 14, but if they lived outside the limits they were only educated up to the age of eight. He ventured to think that such an anomaly was most unjust, because the child who would enter upon the work of life uneducated had a heavy burden to carry. If that was the case when a large proportion of our population was uneducated, it was still more so now. Uneducated children now would be in much the same position as the smaller towns which our railway system had missed—their condition would be worse than they were before. With respect to the Resolution of his hon. Friend, he could scarcely imagine what objections could be urged against it. It might be said it was only an abstract Resolution, which, if carried, would do but little good. To that objection he would refer later on. Another objection was that it was unnecessary; and a further objection was that it was futile, because it was impossible to secure what was asked for. It was needless for him to enter at any great length on the consideration of these points. His right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) had provided the means of education for the agricultural child as well as for the factory hand—there were good and efficient schools for both. In that respect they stood on an equality; but what was their actual position? The noble Lord the Vice President of the Council, in moving the Education Vote last year, had stated it in these words—

“Thus, out of 2,200,000 on the books (of inspected schools) 900,000 had not attended for even half-a-year. If the attendance was so bad in the inspected schools, what was it likely to be in the non-inspected schools? . . . This irregular attendance of the children was the most important fact in the educational survey of the country, and it explained the poor results that were obtained from our immense expenditure on the children. What was wanted was both early and regular attendance.”—[3 Hansard, ccxix. 1640.]

What were the means taken to enforce attendance at school in the agricultural districts? No direct means whatever were taken. It was true that there were some parishes which had school boards, and in many of these probably compulsory bye-laws had been enacted, but these parishes were generally towns with a considerable population; and there were about 14,000 other parishes without school boards, and consequently without any provision for the compulsory attendance of children. Even the indirect compulsion which only provided for a scattered attendance of the children was very different from what was required from factory hands. He thought they might, in this respect, fairly hope for some improvements. Last year they had raised the age at which a child could work in a factory from 8 to 10, and he hoped the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) would amend his Act by also raising the age at which children should engage in agriculture from 8 to 10 years. But he had a still more serious fault to find with the present system—it was, in fact, a dead letter. No means were taken to enforce it. Who was to act as informer in case of the violation of the Act, and who was to prosecute? He hoped to-night to hear an answer to those questions. With respect to direct compulsion, what reason could be urged against extending that to the country districts which already prevailed in the towns? It might be argued that it was a very good thing to talk about, but that it had very little effect—that it was contrary to English nature, and people could not be compelled. If that argument were used he should answer it by the statement of the noble Lord the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, when he said that in London, Hull, Sunderland, and other towns, the school attendance, when made compulsory, had been improved 30 per cent. If that had been the result in the towns, why should they not have equally good results in the agricultural districts? In country districts the difficulties in enforcing the compulsory bye-laws would be much less than in town. He believed that in almost every such district, numbers of people would be found ready to pay the school fees for those children whose parents were unable to pay them, and therefore there would be no difficulty on the ground of poverty. Again, in town, owing to the transitory nature of the population to be dealt with, there was often difficulty in obtaining the ages of the children, but in the country, where everybody knew everybody, this difficulty would not exist. If it were objected that this was a mere abstract Resolution, his answer was that they wished to have a fair discussion of the principle apart from any question of mere machinery, and to know the reason, if any, why this great boon of education should not be extended throughout the country. Last year, in the discussion on the Bill of the hon. Member for Birmingham, the Government insisted, in spite of all that was urged, in regarding the measure solely as one for the universal establishment of school boards, and in disregarding its real object—namely, the universal application of the principle of compulsory attendance. They had been told by the noble Lord, in reply to his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, that as soon as the Government had decided to deal with the question they would make known their intention to the House. They might be certain, therefore, that the Government had not yet made up their minds to deal with the question; and yet he thought he might appeal to them. They called themselves the representatives of the agricultural interests, and he gave them the full credit of that honourable position; but he presumed that they would claim to be the representatives not only of the farmer and the landowner, but also of the agricultural labourer, and he trusted they would show at least equal care for labourers engaged in agriculture as for those engaged in factory labour. They had also told their constituents on the hustings that they were the only true friends of religious education. He was not prepared to yield to any body of Gentlemen in that House the sole credit of being devoted friends of religion; and he would appeal to hon. Members opposite not to allow, by their neglect of this great question, the idea to be sanctioned that the vital interests of education were neglected from some misplaced fear of injury to the religious character of our schools. He begged to second the Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is undesirable that a less amount of school attendance should be secured to children employed in agriculture than to children employed in other branches of industry."—(Mr. Fawcett.)

Mr. PELL, in rising to move, as an Amendment, to leave out all after "undesirable," and insert—

"To withhold from children employed in agriculture the advantages secured to children employed in other branches of industry by the services of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Factories," said, that the views held by Representatives of urban districts on this subject were very much the same as those entertained by Members connected with rural districts. A good deal of what had fallen from the hon. Member for Hackney

(Mr. Fawcett), therefore, met with a response on that side of the House; but the course he had taken was open to this objection—that he had proposed an abstract Resolution, and had imparted very little information to the House to assist it in handling the question. The hon. Member had told them that, as regarded education, there were no signs of reaction. That was, no doubt, true. Certainly, there was no reaction on the part of the Government. If any evidence were wanted to prove that, it was to be found in the new Code which had been issued that morning. Nor was there, he maintained, any sign of reaction in his Amendment, which he hoped would recommend itself to the House on the ground of its being practical, and calculated to bring many children employed in agricultural pursuits into school in cases in which, under other circumstances, they would probably remain away. The hon. Member for Hackney said, he was not an advocate for the universal establishment of school boards. What, then, was he an advocate for, which would come between school boards and the enforcement of the Agricultural Children Act? He had not sketched out any other way by which these children might be brought into the schools. He had said that individual responsibility could not stand in the place of school boards—which meant that in this country, with all our desire to see the children educated, very few people could be found to put the law into force where it was likely to give offence. He (Mr. Pell) regretted that there was so little feeling of individual responsibility in the country; but, as it had failed, it must be replaced by something else, and that something else had better be to apply the machinery we already possessed. The attendance of children at school was required under the Agricultural Children Act, but competent evidence had been quoted to the effect that the Act was useless, and that no one was responsible for its administration. Now, it was because he felt that to be so that he had placed upon the Paper the Amendment which he was about to move. He might be twitted with having said in previous debates that no inspection would be necessary, and that the Act would work by itself if left to the clergymen, the farmers, and the country squires. From the inquiries he had made throughout the country, right and left, he found that that had not been the case. Letters which he had received proved to him that it was now, above all times, desirable that some provision should be made on the part of the Government for securing the observance of the Act, for parents who were last year unselfish enough—and it required a great deal of unselfishness on their part—to give up the earnings of their children with a view to their going to school, now found that they were objects of ridicule to their neighbours when they saw the Act was not enforced. It was not well, in his opinion, that such a state of things should be allowed to continue any longer; but, at the same time, it was quite clear, he thought, that the feeling of the country was not in favour of direct compulsion in the rural districts. From the Minute of the Education Department for January, 1875, he found that the metropolis, with 3,266,000 inhabitants, was under direct compulsion; that 203 municipal boroughs, with an aggregate population of 6,500,000, were also under school boards, but not under compulsion; and that 13,000 separate parishes, with 1,000,000 of inhabitants, did not come under compulsion in any way. That showed that the feeling of the country was distinctly against compulsion. If that were the case, would it be wise in any Government to attempt to enforce compulsion? There was a great deal of beating about the bush as to the effect on the agricultural labourer of sending his children to school. It was believed that he was under the disadvantage of not being in a position to do so; but it should not be forgotten that agriculture had been to a great extent abandoned by women, and that little girls were not permitted by their parents to go out to work. Of course, the labourer found it very hard to make up the income thus lost to him, but it was partly done by means of the higher wages, and partly by means of some industry carried on in his house. The employment of young boys, he might add, was not much sought after by the better class of farmers. The machinery employed had become too heavy for them to work, while greater rapidity was demanded. Besides, there was a high sense of duty on the part of the majority of farmers as to what was owed to a child, and they began to see that it was not well he should work too young. He had some figures on the subject which were conclusive on the point. It appeared from the last Census that there were of children between the ages of 5 and 10 employed in agriculture only 3,400, and between 10 and 15 there were 94,000. Of girls, on the other hand, between the ages of 5 and 10, there were only 220, and only 4,500 between the ages of 10 and 15. He had in these numbers included girls who were employed inside as well as outside houses. It had been remarked that, in the first instance, children were not educated under the Factory Acts. He did not find that to be the case. He had looked at the very earliest Acts on the subject, and he found the title of the first one to be "Factory Health and Morals Act." And how did that Act provide for morals? In a rather extraordinary way. It was enacted that education was only to be given on Sundays, and that apprentices in Scotland between the years of 14 and 18 were to be carried to the parish church. Then, again, the Act of 1833 dealt with education as well as health, as also did all the Factory Acts in succession. Having said so much, he would give some of his reasons for pressing his Amendment. He did so, first of all, because he believed that the Agricultural Children Act, passed by the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), was a very reasonable measure. It did all it was possible to do at present for agricultural children. It made a very great change in the previous law, by declaring that children between the ages of 8 and 10 should not be employed in gangs. That being the case, having such an Act in operation—an Act that was almost universal, indeed, in its operation—he thought it ought to receive a fair trial, and that it ought not to be too hastily or heedlessly disturbed. Well, then, if they passed some such Amendment as he proposed, he thought they would be going a very great way to prepare the rural part of the country ultimately to accept something stronger in the shape of legislation than they were prepared for at present. Again, with respect to inspection, the Elementary Education Amendment Act enforced certain powers of inspection; but the Agricultural Children Act exempted pauper children from the operation of the former Act who were of a certain age. Coming more directly to his own proposal, he might say that there were something like a million of persons who came under the jurisdiction of the Factory Inspectors, and altogether about 42 officers were employed in seeing to the observance of the different Factory Acts. On the other hand, the number of children between 8 and 12 employed in agriculture was about 60,000, and it was believed that eight Inspectors would do all the additional work required, at a cost of something like £2,400. In this calculation it was not the number of children that had to be taken into account, but the number of inspection centres, because children employed in workshops or factories and agricultural children were often to be found living side by side in the same village. Under these circumstances, it frequently happened that children who would have benefited by the Factory Acts were put to agricultural work, in which there was no inspection in the interests of education, and in this respect the establishment of an uniform system for both descriptions of labour was desirable. Some misapprehension appeared to exist with reference to the way in which these Inspectors would work. It was supposed that they would go into every field, farm, and school, ask for the children's certificates, and harass them for supposed infringements of the law. That was an entirely fancy picture; the Inspectors would not work in that way at all. Their main duty would be to explain the law, and to point out to employers what the consequence would be if it was not complied with. By this means he believed the education of children employed in agriculture would be improved, without any vexatious action whatever being resorted to. He trusted the Government would give the House some assurance that these Acts would not be allowed to fall into desuetude, but that steps would be taken to enforce their observance, not only with the object of promoting health and education, but also of insuring respect for the law of the land generally. He also expressed the hope that hon. Members who represented urban districts would disabuse their minds of the belief or suspicion that there existed on the part of the owners or occupiers of land any disinclination whatever to see agricultural children educated side by side with the children of towns. Owners and occupiers knew well enough that the country was committed to the question of education. Nay, more, they recognized the principle that if the children were to have education at all, it could not be of too good a kind. Let it be as good and as thorough as it could possibly be. Above all things, let them impress upon the agricultural population that good education was not meant to fit them to become bad servants; that it was not meant to have the effect of driving or tempting them away from their villages under the vague and shadowy hope that they would be better elsewhere, but that it was meant to fit them all the more for their own proper work. Let their farm labourers know that it would be well for them to bring all the information they might derive from education to bear upon the industry to which they belonged; and that well-educated ploughmen, and even well-educated herdsmen, would, if they only worked patiently and waited patiently, in the long run have their reward. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Amendment.

MR. J. G. TALBOT seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "undesirable" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "to withhold from children employed in agriculture the advantages secured to children employed in other branches of industry by the services of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Factories,"—(Mr. Pell),—instead thereof.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I think it right, considering that the supporters, both of the Motion and the Amendment now before the House, have so often referred to the office I have the honour to hold, that I should thus early in the evening very shortly state the views which the Government entertain upon the question. And, first of all, I may say that I very naturally object to dealing with such a question as this in the form of an abstract Resolution. Taking into view how long and how often this question has been debated in the House, the Motion must be held to savour rather of the politico-economical view of the matter than of a view dealing with practical details, and giving us something upon which we could positively work. I look upon it rather as holding up a universal panacea for all the evils that may exist in our educational system, than as an attempt manfully and boldly to grapple with all the different and varying conditions of the trades and industries of the country, and to show how all these differences can best be dealt with in a practical manner in connection with factories, workshops, and agriculture. One point in particular, passed over by the Mover of the Resolution, is the danger that might arise, were children to be suddenly withdrawn from agricultural labour and sent to school, of their places being supplied by women. I do not believe that such a practice would ever be allowed to become so common as it formerly was in this country, but you would run a great danger if you suddenly took away the children employed in this branch of industry of their places being supplied as I have said. Having said that, I should like to call attention to the practical nature both of the Motion and the Amendment. The Motion calls upon the House to express its opinion that—

I should like to know what “other branches of industry” the hon. Member had in his mind when he framed his Motion. There are upon the Statute Book numberless Acts relating to different branches of industry. Does the Mover of the Resolution mean to say that the children of agricultural labourers are at once to be placed on precisely the same footing with the children employed in factories, under the highest educational standard applicable to such cases? If he does, then I am afraid he would find that such a measure introduced all at once would be extremely distasteful to the country and difficult to work. Or does he mean to say that the branches of industry to which he refers are the workshops? If he does, then I am quite sure that, upon reflection, he will feel that a great deal still will have to be done with the workshops in order to bring them into a proper state for such an arrangement. It will not do simply to say that the children employed in agriculture should be placed on the same footing as those employed in the workshops. I say that the Motion is not one that the House can assent to, because it proposes nothing definite. Nor, with all deference to the hon. Member its Mover, can it be said that he threw much light upon the real difficulty. Considering that school boards are in operation carrying out their work all over the country, and that they have not put their compulsory powers into force in the rural districts, it seems, at all events, that they do not think that compulsion would meet the wishes of those with whom they have to deal. I come now to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Leicestershire (Mr. Pell). That is very different from the Motion. The Amendment proposes that we should not alter the Act, but that we should appoint an army of Factory Inspectors. [“No, no!”] Well, a small army. [MR. PELL: Only eight.] Then a very small army. I do not agree that that would be the wisest thing to do under present circumstances; but while doing so, I entirely repudiate the notion that we are not interested in the education of children employed in agriculture. On both sides, of late years, the House has shown the greatest possible interest in matters of education, and in the education of agricultural children. In 1867, the Liberal Government appointed a Royal Commission to inquire into the condition of the agricultural labourers. In the same year an Act was passed prohibiting children under the age of 8 years—now extended to 10—being employed in agricultural gangs. In 1873, after the Report of the Commission to which I have just referred had been issued, the Agricultural Children Act was passed. It is only by proceeding step by step that factory legislation has advanced to the stage it has now reached. Public opinion, it is true, has greatly grown in favour of such legislation; but this result has only been achieved by gradual and progressive legislation. I am not even certain whether the Act of 1874 is thoroughly accepted by the country as far as its educational clauses are concerned. Some people, indeed, are inclined to think that it goes too far. No doubt, the factory legislation does compel a much more regular attendance at school than the Agricultural Children Act. But when we come to the Factory Acts, we find 240 attendances for 700 hours; we have the

Workshops Acts with 192 attendances for 480 hours; and we have the Agricultural Children Act, as regards children under 10 years of age, with 250 attendances, making 725 hours; and as regards children above 10 years, 150 attendances, making 432 hours. With reference to the actual hours of attendance, therefore, a considerable stride has been made in the education of agricultural children. What I want to put before the House is this. The Act was passed in 1873, but it only came into operation on the 1st of January, 1875. It is quite true, for all practical purposes, that it did come into operation the year before its actual date, otherwise a great number of children would not have been able to go to work on the 1st of January of the present year, if they had not complied with certain educational conditions which they were bound to comply with. The result has been, undoubtedly, that a very large number of children have gone to school under the operation of this Act, preparatory to the Act coming into force on the 1st of January. The Act having come into operation on the 1st of January, we are asked on the 2nd of March in the same year to have fresh legislation on the subject. I do not think that is wise. I think that when an Act of this kind has been passed—and with the best intentions, as certainly it has been—you would be disturbing the mind of the country from one end of it to the other if you were to repeal that law and immediately pass another. You are asked to adopt that course only for this reason, because my hon. Friend says he is afraid it will not work. I wish he would wait a little, and see if it does work. If then he thinks it does not, by all means alter it; but before repealing the Act now in force, let us see how far it works. I now come to the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. What my hon. Friend wants to do is, not to alter the Act itself, but to order an army of Inspectors. [Mr. PELL: No.] A small army. [Mr. PELL again dissented.] Well, then, a very small army, and not a large army of Inspectors. I do not agree with my hon. Friend that that would be the wisest course to adopt in the present state of things. Here is an Act of Parliament which, certainly in a very great part of the country, is looked upon as a very strong measure;

and there is very great discontent in some parts with regard to it. I firmly believe, for my own part, that public opinion upon this matter will change gradually. I believe it has very greatly changed already; but I am quite certain that, if you have got an Act which is distasteful, and if you, at all events, put it at once into full force and vigour, you may run this risk—that instead of fostering public opinion in your favour for the purposes of education, you are likely to set public opinion against you. When this Act was put into force, there was a Letter issued by my predecessor at the Home Office to the Factory Acts Inspectors, calling upon them to inquire how it was working, so far as they could do so; and the answer which the Inspectors very properly gave to the Letter was that they would do all they could to make inquiries into the matter. But time had not yet been allowed them really to show how the Act was working, and I intend to issue fresh instructions to those Inspectors—without the additional army of eight proposed by my hon. Friend, for the present number is quite sufficient—to report very shortly to me how the Act is working; where it is found to pinch too hardly, and whether any and what alterations can be made in it by way of improving its operations; and I hope to be able in the course of a little time to communicate to the House much more information than they possess at present. There is another point which I think I am bound to lay before the House. The agricultural labourer must of necessity be very much mixed up with the labourer employed in the workshops, more especially when you take into consideration the lower classes of workshops, such as brickfields, that are scattered up and down the country. There you find some children first going to one and then to the other, and there is no doubt that at the present moment they are not under the same law. The Government have, as the House is aware, recommended to Her Majesty to issue a Royal Commission for the purpose of inquiring into all these particular workshops in order to see how far they can be brought into harmony with each other, and to ascertain what Amendments are wanted to arrive at the desired result. Of necessity the Commissioners will have to inquire into the condition of the children employed, and the Government and the House will have the benefit of their advice. We shall then be better able to approach the subject, and to see how far the condition of the agricultural labourers differ from that of persons employed in workshops. I cannot help thinking, therefore, that before we stir further in the matter it will be wise to have before us the Reports of the Inspectors of Factories, and also the Report of the Royal Commissioners, in order that we may work safely as well as surely. I believe the object of every person in this House is to do what he can for the purpose of education; but I am sure it is not the wish of anyone who has that at heart to do anything which would raise public feeling against him and check instead of encourage the progress of education.

MR. DIXON said, the professions of the right hon. Gentleman were admirable, but his performances were distant, and would, he feared, be of the smallest possible value. The hon. Member for Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) had reminded the House that he had taken part with the present Secretary to the Local Government Board in the introduction of the Agricultural Children Act, and that he had stated that if that Act were not found in its operation to carry out their intentions they were prepared to ask the House to strengthen its provisions. Well, the Act, according to the hon. Member (Mr. Pell), had failed to meet the hopes of those who introduced it, and the time, according to the hon. Member, had come when it should be amended and strengthened. That, however, was not the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary. He had caused investigations to be made within the last few days in a district containing 20 parishes, not far from the estate of the hon. Member for Norfolk. There was no school board in these parishes, and the average attendance was about 900 children. If the proportions were the same there between the numbers in and out of school as in other places, there would be 900 outside the schools. He would admit, however, that education was advanced in this district, and he would suppose that the number outside the schools was only 500. Children of school age were in other cases those between 5 and 13, but the Agricultural Children Act only applied to those between 8 and 12 years of age. There would therefore remain only 250, and he would take the number as between 100 and 250. Now, a gentleman who had made personal inquiry found that in 11 of these parishes there had been no increase of attendance in consequence of the introduction of the Act, and that in the other nine parishes the total increase of attendance could not be placed higher than 30. It was not even certain that more than six attended in consequence of the Act. Now, if the Agricultural Children Act might be expected to work well and satisfactorily, it would be in the district in question. These inquiries corroborated the assertion of the hon. Member (Mr. Pell) that the Act was a proved failure; that there had been ample time to test its provisions; and that something ought to be done to remedy its defects. One reason for the failure of the Act was that it was neither known nor understood. One schoolmistress living within a few miles of the hon. Gentleman's estate said that she had never heard either of the Act or its author. Another reason was that, in exactly the same proportion that the Act was known and understood, it was discovered that it was so weak as to be utterly ineffectual and to be disregarded with impunity. Many children between 8 and 12 were employed by farmers; and it was known that this was illegal; yet no effort was made to bring those farmers to justice. At the time those inquiries were made farm-work was slack, and it was stated that there would be an increased number of these children employed later on, yet there was no intention to put the Act in force. In many parts of the country, no doubt, children between these ages were sent to school; but if it were found that no action was taken and that no penalties were enforced for breaches of the Act, the attendance would diminish and would in time entirely cease. Would not the Government, then, do something to improve an Act which their own friends told them did not and could not work? He was, like his hon. Friend (Mr. Fawcett), in favour of direct compulsion in education. Now, he would assume that the time had arrived when the Government had inquired into the operation of and had strengthened the Act so as to make it a real working Factory Act in the agricultural districts. The children between 8 and 12 would then be sent to school for half their time—say for 250 attendances—and their families would be to that extent deprived of their earnings. But it was between 8 and 12 that they were able to begin work, and up to the age of 8 it was rare for children to be employed in farm labour. The House would then be told that it was wise and proper to deprive children between 8 and 12 of half their earnings in order that they should be educated, but that it would not be proper to send those children to school, who were under the age of 8, and who were not able to work at all. The early education of children was of the utmost importance, and though up to the age of 8, children could not learn much, they ought to be able to learn to read and write, and they might also acquire habits of order and obedience and aptitude for learning. They would be far better able to take advantage of the half-time system between the ages of 8 and 12, if they went to school before 8, than they would be if they had not been to school previously. Yet it was said we should continue to deprive children between 8 and 12 of half their earnings, and send them to school for half their time, but that up to the age of 8, when they were of no use to anyone, we should refrain from exercising any power of compulsion at all, and leave them to run about and waste their time, doing no good to any one, and infinite harm to themselves. In the county of Norfolk, where the children were well cared for, the introduction of school boards had increased the demand for certificated male teachers, whose salaries had risen, and school managers found themselves driven to employ mistresses young, timid, and inexperienced, who had not sufficient control over rough boys of 10, 11, and 12. Instances had occurred in which mistresses had been turned out of school by the boys, and had had to call in the assistance of managers to enforce discipline. These things showed the importance of getting children to school early. It was said the Resolution was vague, and such criticisms were usual; but, at all events, it served the purpose of those Bills which the Prime Minister defended the other day as useful in forming opinion, though not intended to pass. He believed the Resolution was definite enough, for it said we ought to have a perfect instead of an imperfect factory system, and that it ought to be supplemented by direct compulsion. He hoped the factory age would soon be 10 instead of 8, and he would say that up to that age there should be everywhere direct compulsion, which should secure that all children who were not at work should be at school. He was glad to hear the hon. Member for Leicestershire say that the cost of education was not a difficulty in agricultural districts, and, if that were so, why should it not be made imperative to send children to school? For children above 10 the Agricultural Children Act should be as stringent as the Factory Acts were in towns, and both should be as stringent as possible. It was once said the people would rise up against compulsion, but they had not done so in the large towns, where they could have resisted it most easily; and in rural districts, where the influence of the farmer, the parson, and the squire was irresistible, he could not but think that compulsion would work as beneficially as it had done in the towns. He knew of one small agricultural town in which there had been a Church school and a British school, stimulated by mutual rivalry, and the average attendance in the two did not exceed 200. A school board was formed, and a board school built, and in an incredibly short time the average attendance in the town was doubled. He knew of two other places in which the attendance had been doubled or trebled by the establishment of a school board. He was glad there were some country gentlemen who admitted that the present education in rural districts was unsatisfactory, and he hoped that both sides of the House would endeavour to remove the great disgrace which they all admitted.

MR. FLOYER cordially united with the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) in hoping that the country Gentlemen on the Ministerial side would join with the Members on the opposite side of the House in promoting a really good education for the children of agricultural labourers, and, indeed, for the children in all parts of the Kingdom. But he hoped the hon. Gentleman would forgive him for not accepting his invitation to join with him in attempting to entirely alter, so soon after it had been enacted, the legislation with regard to education in this country. He thought the argument of the Home Secretary on the point was conclusive. Why did not the hon. Member for Birmingham state the deficiencies of the Agricultural Children Act when it was under the consideration of the House? [Mr. Dixon: I did.] He knew the hon. Member did take exceptions to it; but he did not remember that the hon. Gentleman proposed that the Factory Inspectors' services should be called for to enforce the Act. Upon an array of facts which for the most part were hypothetical, the hon. Gentleman invited the House after the Act had been in force only a few months to take a course which would affect almost every household in the country. The hon. Member said the country gentlemen showed a laudable anxiety that the children of persons employed in agriculture should be educated from the ages of 8 to 12, but that they were utterly regardless whether they received education or not before the age of 8. Such a statement was purely imaginary, and he was surprised that it should have been made by a Gentleman of the position and experience of the hon. Member for Birmingham. Long as he (Mr. Floyer) had sat in that House he did not think he had ever heard in it a statement so groundless as that. But there was some excuse for the hon. Gentleman's statement. The hon. Gentleman's life, as far as he (Mr. Floyer) knew, had been passed almost wholly in large towns. What, then, did he know about children in country districts? If he lived in a country parish he would know that there was every disposition in almost all parents to send their children to school at an early age. The hon. Member for Birmingham objected to the allegation of the Home Secretary that the Resolution proposed by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) was vague. He (Mr. Floyer) thought it was a vague Resolution. It proposed that all the Acts with regard to the education of children employed in factories should be applicable to children employed in agriculture. It did not define in plain language what the hon. Member for Hackney meant, but sent the House back to previous Acts for his meaning. He (Mr. Floyer) did not carry Acts of Parliament in his head, and it was impossible for the House to know what the hon. Member really asked. The occupation of the agricultural labourer was not one which tended to produce any deterioration of mind; and, indeed, it was one in which he could learn, perhaps, quite as much as in some schools. In the field of nature, at all events, a man could learn to apply what he had been taught at school. He quite admitted that boys should not be employed in agriculture at too early an age; and there was among farmers a growing feeling in favour of such a proposition as this. Ten years, for commencing work, was perhaps a reasonable age. The education of a boy did not consist simply in that which he learned at school; education was that which would fit him for his future course of life, and show him how to earn his livelihood. It was a popular thing at some meetings to declaim about a miserable boy following the plough through a winter day; but it was very doubtful whether he would always be willing to exchange his occupation even for superior employments. A boy would never become a good agricultural labourer or manager of horses unless he began early. For his own part, he in no way undervalued the education imparted in the school-room; but he thought a system which carried on both educations pari passu was most likely to make the best men in that particular department of life to which most of them would be called. Non cuius homini contingit adire Corinthum. Every boy, indeed, had the means of raising himself; but nevertheless we must legislate, not for the very few, but for the large proportion who would not be able to raise themselves above the position in which they were born. The hon. Member for Hackney had quoted from a Report made by his hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope); but he must be allowed to say that his hon. Friend's acquaintance with Dorsetshire was hardly sufficient to justify him in making so broad a statement as he had done. His hon. Friend was in Dorsetshire for a few days. [Mr. E. STANHOPE: Weeks.] Well, his hon. Friend no doubt used his time with great care and zeal; he visited many of the cottages, and saw the people at home; but his visits were generally made in the daytime, when most of the labourers were away from home. Of course his hon. Friend saw some of them, but still the House would hardly be warranted in relying on his information. He (Mr.

Floyer) could assure his hon. Friend that for some things Dorsetshire was celebrated. He believed, for instance, that they thatched better than any other county, while the fact that their land was unusually well tilled—which, of course, depended upon the ploughmen—showed that they were not so much behind other counties as his hon. Friend seemed to imagine. As he had stated before, he believed that the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary were conclusive, because there was no doubt that if they wanted to improve the education of this country they should try and carry the people with them; it was no use to attempt to drive them, because they would not be driven. Nothing could be more painful than to have to send to prison any parents under compulsory powers; and though these compulsory powers might exist in the towns, the question was how far they were carried out there, and what discretion was used in applying them. He cordially supported the view of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary in thinking that both these Resolutions were, at the present time, uncalled for.

MR. PHIPPS said, he was glad the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) had, through his agents, been taking a tour through the southern counties, because the experience thus acquired had shown that the condition of the villages was better than the hon. Gentleman expected, and that the attendance at the schools was in the average good. If the hon. Member had made the tour 50 years ago he would have found a deficiency of school accommodation in each succeeding village, and that it was an exception to the rule to find a school in any of the country villages well cared for. But now throughout the length and breadth of the land there was in almost every village a school which was declared by Government Inspectors to be sufficient in point of the education given and in point of accommodation. In those schools where religious education was given it was not given at the expense of the State, but at the expense of private individuals; and, therefore, all who desired civil and religious liberty would find it provided for so far as education went in those schools. In a great majority of cases the schools had been raised by the efforts of the members of the Church of England and were sustained by their contributions; and, so far as he could understand the advantages of education, taking into consideration the requirements of the different localities, it was as good in the villages as it was in the towns. He agreed with the hon. Member for Birmingham that every child ought to be educated, and that eventually compulsion must be employed. He believed it was no use going on building board schools unless there was a power of compulsory attendance. He could not agree with the hon. Member, however, that even where there was an efficient school a duplicate should be erected to do the same work. The Education Act of 1870 was one of the most important and beneficial measures connected with education that had ever been passed, and he looked upon it as the work, not of one Party, but of the whole House. If that Act were carefully administered and compulsion enforced it would be found to work well. He also considered the Agricultural Children Act to be a step in the right direction, and it would be wise before setting it aside to give it a fair trial. On every side he had seen a good desire, especially on the part of the farmers and the clergy, to do all in their power to make that Act a complete success. The great defect in the measure was that it did not give powers of compulsion to any particular person. It would be unfair to throw on the clergyman the task of enforcing the Act. That would be to put him in the invidious position of a kind of public prosecutor. A proper officer ought to be appointed for the purpose, and no fitter person could be named than the Inspector of Nuisances, for the simple reason that no greater nuisance could exist in the community than an uneducated child.

MR. M'LAGAN said, he would like to give a little Scotch experience as to the subject under discussion. The Resolution had been described as vague, abstract, and indefinite. It might deserve all these epithets; but he did not think any hon. Member who had spoken had denied, nor did he think it could be denied, that the assertion made in it was true—namely, that it was undesirable that children in rural districts should receive a worse education than children in towns. He agreed warmly with the proposition. He agreed also with the Amendment, if such it could be called.

Mr. Floyer

He did not think that it was opposed to the Motion at all; but, on the contrary, he regarded it merely as a suggestion thrown out by the hon. Member to enable the proposition contained in the Motion to be carried out. He had heard it stated by several hon. Members—and amongst others by the Mover of the Amendment (Mr. Pell)—that the education of the agricultural population of England was not in an unsatisfactory condition. He was surprised to hear that; for, on reading the Report of the Royal Commission, which inquired into the employment of women and children in agricultural labour, he found it stated that the agricultural education of England was in a most unsatisfactory condition. It might be that since that Report was issued, it had improved to such an extent as to have entirely changed its character, and coming as the statement did from so high an authority as the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) he was bound to believe that now, at all events, it was in a satisfactory condition. The Commissioners also stated another fact, which had been denied to be a fact in the course of the debate—namely, that one of the causes of this unsatisfactory state of education was the low wages of the labourers. He had heard it stated that the agricultural labourers of England were quite able to educate their children, and that it was a mistake to suppose that they required to keep their children from school and send them to work in order to eke out their resources. He had been surprised to hear that any one supposed a worse education was required for an agricultural labourer than was required for workmen who lived in town. The machinery now used in agricultural pursuits was of such a kind as to require great skill and no little insight on the part of those who had charge of it, and necessarily exercised their mental faculties to no inconsiderable extent. Without detracting from the skill and enterprise of the Scotch farmers, who had raised the agriculture of their country to its present superiority, he ventured to say that they could not have accomplished what they had done, had it not been that they had the agricultural labourers of Scotland to execute their orders, who received a first-rate education at their parochial schools. It would further be found by those interested in the subject, that in those districts where they had the highest education, there also they had the highest wages, and, notwithstanding that, the cost of labour per acre was less, because that labour was directed by the education and intelligence of the labourer. The cost of labour, he said, was less per acre there than it was in those districts where the labourer was ill-educated and badly paid. But the rural population might be called on to perform other duties besides those connected with agriculture. For instance, the rural population of England, Scotland, and Ireland, was the great nursery of our Army, and as more attention was being paid to the education of our soldiers, it was absolutely necessary that the rural population should be educated up to the position which would qualify men for military service. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), moreover, had referred to the great emigration there was going on from the country districts to towns, and if those who came from the country were to have any chance of holding their own with town labourers, it was perfectly obvious that they must be put on an educational level. Since the Commissioners had proved—though it was denied in that House—that the education of agricultural labourers was in an unsatisfactory condition, it was for them sitting in Parliament to consider what was the remedy. The hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) had shown that the Commissioners were correct in their statement by introducing the Agricultural Children Bill three years ago. That Bill embodied a mild form of compulsory education. He was sorry to hear that the Bill had not come up to the expectations of its promoters, which fact was quoted as a reason for further legislation. The question they had to consider was whether they should not go further than they did then, and provide a complete system of compulsory education. The Home Secretary had spoken strongly on the subject, and said that compulsory education was so repugnant to the feelings of the people, that it would not do to force it upon them. Speaking from experience of Scotland, he ventured to say that objection had no force at all. Since compulsory education had been introduced there in 1873, there had been no child of school age who was not sent to school, and this applied not only to children in towns, but also to children in agricultural districts and in the Highlands. Let the Government but introduce a simple clause into the English Act, providing for compulsory education, and they would have as great a success as that which had attended the introduction of the system in Scotland. In the City of Glasgow there was an immense number of children attending no school whatever; but immediately after the Act came into operation, and the people became aware that an officer had been appointed who would insist upon the children being sent to school, the number of children on the roll rose from 52,000 to 59,000; so that 7,000 children yielded to the pressure of the compulsory clause inserted in the Scotch Education Act. Again, only six months ago, in a mining hamlet, the industry was stopped, and the people were sent away. On the revival of trade, the people came back to the hamlet, but the school remained closed. The school officer in the parish visited the hamlet, and insisted that the people should send their children to school. Without any greater compulsion being exercised, the people went to their employers, and asked them to reopen the school, as otherwise they would be obliged to send their children two or three miles to school. They were as anxious to have their children at school as the district officer himself could be. He had thought it proper to mention these facts to the House—and possibly other Scotch Members might have similar facts to adduce—because it appeared to him that they were in need of the adoption of some compulsory system of education in England. With respect to the Education Act as it affected pauper children, of whom they had heard much that night, he trusted that the Government, who were giving so much attention to all social subjects, would not limit the education of those children to the Third Standard, but would extend it to the Fifth, at which it previously stood. If there was any class of the community whose children required looking after, it was the pauper class; and at the present time these children were thrust upon the agricultural population only half educated, which arose from no fault of their own or of the population, but from the legislation of that House, which ought to be remedied. He trusted that the few observations which he had made on the subject of the system of compulsory education would be considered by the Government, and that they would, before this discussion closed, give the House an intimation that they were prepared, at all events, to improve the existing Act in the direction that had been pointed out.

COLONEL BRISE said, the debate had made clear two points. First, they had testimony from both sides of the House that they would never again hear the inadequate or insufficient earnings of the agricultural labourer pleaded as an excuse for his not being able to afford to send his children to school. Secondly, that there was not anything like the opposition in the country to compulsory education that there was a few years ago. He was one of those who never expected very much from the Agricultural Children Act of 1873, and thought it both insufficient and incomplete, and a patchwork piece of legislation, that it was going in the right direction, but not in the right way, harassing employers of labour without any adequate security that the object wished for would be attained, inflicting pains and penalties which might not after all have the effect of sending the child to school. He looked upon the parents, in the first place, as the responsible persons for the education of their children, though he admitted a certain amount of responsibility rested upon everyone who cared for the welfare of their fellow-men; but there was nothing in the Act to make a parent send the child to school, if not allowed to work, and a parent might make use of his services until he was 12 years old, when he would be free. He thought the Bill would be inoperative; but he was bound to say it had proved quite as useful as he anticipated, and give it time to work, it might do good; but it was monstrous now to say it had failed after a trial of only eight weeks, and therefore they must again legislate to provide a public officer to proceed against all delinquents. Next year or the year after, if no direct compulsion could be brought to bear, then would be time enough to consider what further legislation was required. It was often said that the employers of labour in agricultural districts were opposed to education; if that be so, if they were going to harass them by these persecutions, it would make them very much more so, but he denied that such was the case; if it was so in former times it was not so now. It was the late Bishop of Winchester who once said to a clergyman who complained to him that the farmers would not subscribe to his schools: "You must remember that the farmer only makes his money by sixpences at a time, and therefore you can hardly expect him to pull out his sovereigns for education as freely as the man who makes his money with much more rapidity." It was not surprising that there was a strong feeling against school boards in the country. He knew two adjoining parishes in his own county in which he was interested; in both of them education was carried out to its fullest requirements; in the one there was a school board, in the other the voluntary system; in the one there was a rate required of 1s. in the pound, in the other a voluntary gift by the large proportion of occupiers of 10s. for every 100 acres. The education was of as good a quality in one as in the other; but in the school board parish the farmer might be called upon for £6 or £7 for every 100 acres of land. No wonder he did not like a school board. Certainly the school board parish had this advantage, that it could secure the attendance of every child at its school—the compulsory clauses of the Act had been put in force, and one or two parents summoned before the magistrates at the commencement of the system, and a nominal fine of 6d. inflicted upon them had been quite sufficient to show them that the law must be enforced. But why should they not have direct compulsion without school boards? Why not have an elected body in every parish? He knew there were difficulties to be got over, and magistrates, not being elected, were not the proper persons to do this work; but they had an elected body of men in every parish in the persons of the Poor Law Guardians. Why not entrust them with this matter—not, perhaps, as individuals, but as a board—they had already gone a great way in that direction. Under the Elementary Education Act they had given them power to enforce the attendance at school of pauper children. They were carrying out that work very well and with satisfaction to the country; they had in their employment an officer—the relieving officer—much better qualified to assist them in that matter than any other public officer they could lay their hands on. He believed they—the guardians—might safely be entrusted with this work; but one thing was very clear, that if they were to accede to the proposal of his hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), and send a little army of Factory Inspectors to lay informations and to worry and harass the employers of labour, they would have the whole country against them, and do more to injure the cause of education in the rural districts than anything that could be conceived. On those grounds, he should certainly vote against the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, and he should also vote against the Resolution of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), because he did not understand by his abstract Resolution how far he meant to go.

MR. DODSON said, he was in hopes that the hon. Member was going to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Leicestershire (Mr. Pell). The House had had three views upon the question put before them—namely, that of the Member for Hackney, that of the Member for Leicestershire, and that of the Government. He had heard with regret from the Home Secretary that the question was to be indefinitely shelved to wait for the Report of a Commission which he believed had not yet been appointed. Now, last year, the Home Secretary passed through Parliament an extension of the Factory Acts, and therefore his right hon. Friend could not feel any surprise that there should be a desire to extend some of the advantages of that Act to the agricultural districts. The Home Secretary asked, were the agricultural districts to be suddenly put on the same legislative level with manufacturing districts which had been gradually accustomed to such legislation. But the Resolution of his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) dealt simply with attendance at school. In allusion to that his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary asked the House—though he could hardly have been serious in doing so—to consider that if children were forced into the schools there would be a return to the employment of female labourers in the fields. He thought that every one must feel that there was not the slightest danger of that. It was urged that the Act of 1873 had been only two months in operation; but it was from the 1st of January, 1874, that the children had to be brought into the schools in order not to be disqualified from employment on the 1st of January last; and if the Act had proved inoperative thus far, it was not likely that it would prove less so hereafter. The Home Secretary objected to the Amendment that it was too practical, and to the Resolution of his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney that it was abstract. He (Mr. Dodson) saw no harm in passing such a Resolution. For himself, he had not that contempt for abstract Resolutions which was often professed, especially by Members of a Government, because he had seen many important results flow from abstract Resolutions. This Resolution might cause the Commission about to be appointed to consider in what way effect could be best given to compulsory attendance in agricultural district schools. He had not expected any very great or immediate result from the passing of the Act of 1873, for it was no one's business to see that it was put into operation. He had rather looked upon that Act as an abstract Resolution, affirming a principle. He denied that agricultural labourers, as a rule, were not anxious to have their children educated. Though ignorant themselves, they knew how valuable education was, and they could distinguish good from bad or indifferent schools, and would make efforts to send their children to the best in their districts. Children in the agricultural districts could, however, earn from 2s. 6d. to 6s. a-week; that was not a contemptible addition to the family income, and so long as attendance at school was not general throughout the parish it was hard to expect that some labourers should send their children to school while their neighbours sent theirs into the fields, and profited by their earnings. If all children were sent regularly to school the wages of labourers might rise, and that would be some compensation for the loss of their children's earnings. As to the farmers, they had been threatened with strikes, wages had risen, and labourers had emigrated; it could not, therefore, be expected that they would be very anxious to send all the children to school, and to raise the price of labour against themselves. It was justly said that high-priced labour was, generally speaking, good labour. That, in the long run, it was not dearer than low-priced labour; was an economical principle which had been singularly illustrated in the book on the life of the late Mr. Brassey, who knew the valued price of labour in all countries. Educated agricultural labour would no doubt, though dearer, prove better labour. For a while, however, the effect of compulsion might be to make labour dearer without its being better. There were three difficulties which had to be overcome in seeking to educate the masses of the people. First, sufficient school accommodation had to be provided; secondly, a sufficiency of good teachers had to be got; and thirdly, good attendance had to be secured. Adequate school accommodation, if not already obtained, was in course of being provided, so that the first problem might be looked upon as solved. For the necessary number of teachers we must wait, but they would come in time. The important and pressing difficulty was the bad attendance of the children, especially in the agricultural districts. The complaint was repeated and re-echoed throughout the Reports of the Inspectors. There was only one remedy—namely, compulsion. It was an ugly word, and expressed a foreign idea; but it was wonderful how much the idea had become acclimatized among us. For his part, he accepted it as a temporary evil; because he believed that when a new generation of parents and employers should have grown up, the necessity of sending children to school would be so recognized, that compulsion would only have to be applied to the waifs and strays of society. In connection with almost all the branches of industry in the country, we had practically, although indirectly, adopted compulsion. Indirect compulsion seemed to him weak in two respects. First, it prevented a child working until he had been to school, but it did not prevent him from idling in the streets and lanes; secondly, it seized upon a child who was just coming of working age and sent him to school, while during those earlier and more valuable years for education, when he was not capable of work, it did not send him into a school. For that reason, he (Mr. Dodson) most distinctly preferred direct to indirect compulsion, for it secured education better than indirect compulsion, whilst it did not interfere with work one single bit more. Then arose the question, to whom should the compulsory powers be entrusted? He thought there was a general agreement that neither the guardians, who had charge of paupers, nor the magistrates, who had to deal with criminals, should be chosen for this purpose. Another suggestion had been made—namely, that the authority should be given to the Inspectors of Nuisances; but it was hardly likely to meet with much favour. As to the school boards, he knew they were looked upon by some Gentlemen as the embodiment of all human wisdom; but while admitting that there were a great many which were doing excellent educational work, and that they might be suitable enough, as a whole, for large towns, he thought it would be inexpedient to force suddenly the same machinery upon the rural districts. Unfortunately, there were considerable facilities for men of one idea—in other words, men who were antagonistic to every one else—becoming connected with these boards, and it sometimes happened that the members acted pretty much in the style of the Kilkenny cats. But there were other objections to the general establishment of school boards—namely, that it would be multiplying elections, that it would be adding another local body to those already existing, and would increase the confusion and chaos which at present impaired all efforts to promote wholesome local administration. He wondered sometimes what would be the state of England a few years hence if they continued to legislate in the present theoretical manner. Everybody would be examined, everything would be analyzed, and every day and every hour would be engaged in electing somebody or some board. A main difficulty in the way of establishing a proper system of education throughout the agricultural districts, as of many other improvements, was the want of municipal institutions in our counties and rural districts equivalent to those which had been set up in the United States and in our Australian Colonies. He was not in favour, in the meantime, of indefinitely delaying the practical enforcement of education in agricultural districts, and he thought the Amendment gave some practical assistance towards obtaining that object. He was prepared to support both the original Resolution and the Amendment. Like Captain Macheath, he could be happy with either, if only the other were away, and he should be glad to see them embodied into one substantive proposition.

Mr. E. STANHOPE said, he was extremely sorry the hon. Member for Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) had allowed his little squad of eight Inspectors to interfere with the consideration of the more important proposal of the hon. Member for Hackney. The varied interpretations which had been given by that proposal showed its extremely wide and indefinite scope. Seeing that the Act could have been enforced only in 1875, and therefore that practically it had only come into operation during the present year, he regretted that any attempt should have been made to interfere with it before it had had a trial of more than eight weeks. Had the Resolution of the hon. Member for Hackney merely gone to the extent of affirming the necessity for the attendance of children at school in agricultural districts, as had been asserted by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Dodson), he should have had much pleasure in going into the same lobby with him; but, unfortunately, the hon. Member's Resolution, if carried, would establish a much more dangerous principle—namely, that the employers of labour in agricultural districts should be placed under exactly the same restrictions as to children's labour as the employers of labour in factories were. But surely the hon. Member would scarcely contend that the employers of in-door were in exactly the same position as the employers of out-door labour were? The factory owner could get his work done at all times of the year, and at every hour of the day and night equally; but the farmer's work was entirely dependent upon the weather or the season, and if not done at a particular season, might not be done at all. The restrictions imposed by the Factory and similar Acts were a compromise between different claims, and in the case of farm labour the compromise was between school and work; but in the factory a third claim came in, that of health. It appeared to him that the proposition of the hon. Member was based upon what the Bishop of Manchester had recently termed "an entirely mistaken analogy."

He ventured to submit that these two propositions had been established by indisputable evidence—first, that there was a necessity in certain parts of the country and at certain seasons, for the employment of boys' labour in agriculture; and, secondly, that advantage, both mentally and physically, accrued to the boys from such employment. He believed that he might make out a very strong case in support of his first proposition, from the circumstances of the county which he had the honour to represent (Mid Lincolnshire). In that county employers felt very strongly the necessity for the employment of boys' labour not being too much restricted, inasmuch as without such labour it would be impossible for them to carry on their business. He, however, did not rest his case upon the claims of the employers; he also rested it mainly upon the claims of the children. In the second Report to the House of the Commissioners on this subject, one of the most able of that body, Mr. Tremeneere, stated that while, on the one hand, there were no reasons upon physical grounds for excluding boys from farm labour, there were, on the other, the very strongest reasons why they should be allowed to work at a reasonable age, and it would be a very serious thing to take away the earnings which they carried home to their parents. The Report of the Education Commission of 1861, which was signed by men of undoubted educational reputation, and which was marked by moderation and good sense, very strongly expressed the opinion that when the children arrived at an age when their labour became really important to their parents, it would be impossible for Parliament to resist the claim of the latter that their boys should be permitted to contribute towards the expenses of the household by means of their labour. The hon. Member for Hackney had warned him against resting his argument on the ground that the parents of agricultural children were unable to pay the school fees; but it was not merely the school fees that were in question, there was also the amount that the boys might earn to be taken into consideration, and it was the latter that occasioned the main difficulty in dealing with the case. The hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Floyer) referred to a Report of his (Mr. Stanhope's) relating to that county; but it was surprising that the hon. Member, having paid so much attention to the subject, had allowed six years to pass before calling attention to it. This was not the time to dwell upon that subject, but in reference to a passage in his Report which had been quoted by the hon. Member for Hackney in support of his argument, he might explain that it had been written with the object of showing that the practice of sending boys out with horses all the year round was to be deprecated, and might easily be put an end to by requiring the boys to be sent to school at certain periods of the year. In the manufacturing parts of the country great difficulty had been experienced in obtaining proper technical training for our labourers, and fears had been expressed that, unless we succeeded in giving them such training, we should lose our superiority among nations. But in agriculture that difficulty was not felt, and it was to the skill of our agricultural labourers, as well as to the ability and capital of their employers, that our success was in a large measure due. Had the House forgotten the old workhouse schools? In these an excellent education was given to boys up to the age of 13, but they were then found to be useless for any practical purpose, and to show no disposition to earn an independent livelihood. He yielded to no man in the desire to give to these children, a real, practical, sound training, and he was glad that this question had been brought forward, because it was always useful that the weak points of a system should be exposed. There were, however, two objections he had to the proposal of the hon. Member for Hackney—first, that he was endeavouring to go a little faster than the country was yet prepared for; and, secondly, that the present machinery had yet hardly been tested. He was not now referring to the Agricultural Children Act alone, but to the Education Act of 1870. We had not yet tried all the means at our disposal under that Act for getting young children into the country schools, and, in his opinion, the first great necessity of the day was that of getting all children under the age of labour to school. What would be the result if they could be brought into those schools? The Bishop of Manchester said it was quite possible to teach a child soundly and thoroughly all it was necessary he should know by the time he was 10 years old. In this opinion, he (Mr. Stanhope) could hardly agree, believing that if a child were left alone after he was 10 there was great danger of his forgetting all he had learnt before. But this House had gone beyond that. They had, by means of the Agricultural Children Act, shown their intention to keep children partially at school till 12 or 13. And as to that Act, on the whole there was a desire in the rural districts to carry it out in the spirit in which the House had passed it. Some prosecutions had already been instituted under it; but unless a little time was allowed to the farmers and others in those districts we should run the risk of losing their co-operation altogether. He did not believe in a whole army of Inspectors. You could not carry out such a system unless you carried the people of the country to a considerable extent with you. As was said on one occasion by the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), he preferred in these matters steady progress to a great rush, because by taking the latter course they ran a risk of creating reactionary feeling which would defeat the object they had in view; and he feared that if the hon. Member (Mr. Fawcett) stirred up this question so soon he would be like those statesmen of whom it had been said that they pulled up the plant every morning to see how it was growing. The danger pointed out by the Home Secretary was a real danger. If too great restrictions were imposed upon boy labour, we might run the risk of re-introducing female labour. Hon. Gentlemen might reply that if the people were only educated we need not be afraid of female labour in the future. But the fact was, that in Scotland and Northumberland, where the labouring population were the best educated, female labour most prevailed. If he were called upon to choose between the moderate employment of boys and female labour, he must choose that which would the best secure domestic training. He thought, too, that the moral duty which every boy ought to feel of endeavouring to earn an independence and help his parents in maintaining the home was, at least, as essential to real education as any mere book learning. Believing that the Motion would alienate employers without conciliating parents, that it would undermine independence, and tend to destroy skilled labour in agriculture, he should certainly vote against it.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had seen with some alarm the hon. Gentleman rise to oppose the Motion, thinking that as he had already shown such ability and had studied this question so closely he would probably produce some strong arguments in support of his views. It did not appear to him, however, that the hon. Member had in the least degree weakened the case made out for the Motion. Indeed, the hon. Member seemed to mistake the object and purport of the Motion. He said we ought not to do anything to interfere with the moderate employment of the children of farm labourers after they were 10 years old. It was not the object of those who supported the Motion to do anything of the kind. What the hon. Member for Hackney looked forward to was the combination of work and schooling after 10 years of age. It was desirable that there should be a moderate amount of employment; but it was also desirable that there should be a reasonable amount of education. Two objections had been taken to the Resolution—one to its form, and the other to its object. The Home Secretary and other hon. Members had stated that it was inadvisable to deal with matters of this kind by an abstract Resolution; and, quite independently of the form, they thought that for the present there had been enough legislation for the agricultural districts with regard to education, and that it was premature to attempt to do more. His hon. Friend (Mr. Dixon) said truly, that whenever a grievance which it was desirable to remedy was condemned by a Resolution the Government of the day—and probably the Government to which he had belonged was equally liable to the reproach—generally pronounced such a Resolution inexpedient. But in submitting this Motion his hon. Friend (Mr. Fawcett) was only following out the hints given by the Government themselves last year. His hon. Friend (Mr. Dixon) then submitted no abstract Resolution, but a Bill carefully framed to meet this difficulty in what he believed to be the best way. The Vice President of the Council met him not by complaining of compulsory education, but of the machinery by which it was obtained. The supporters of the Motion did not want to hear the same objection this year. They admitted that the machinery was of great importance, and that it would be better for the Government to frame it than for a private Member to do so; and they therefore now very naturally laid down merely the general principles on which they thought the evil should be remedied. As to the object of the Resolution, his hon. Friend had been charged with what he was neither attempting nor desiring to do—the application of the Factory Acts, as they stood, to the education of children employed in agriculture. Now, his hon. Friend had no such absurd idea as to take hold of the agricultural child and say that the same regulations should apply to him as to the factory child. But he did say that, somehow or other, we should secure to the agricultural child as much education as was already secured to the child of the factory worker. Was that an unreasonable demand? Surely county Members should be as anxious to fulfil it as borough Members were, and Members on both sides should unite in bringing about such a result. He could not help thinking that hon. Members opposite were hardly aware of the great difference between the legal position of the agricultural child and the child of factory workers as regarded education. He did not think they could be aware how very much more the law neglected the farm labourer's child, and how very much more it interfered with the master manufacturer and employer of almost every description of artizan. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. E. Stanhope) said how unfair it was to compare factory work, where the mills were going day and night, with farm labour, which was subject to the variations of the weather. Now, the fact was that under the Factory Acts since 1844 no child could be employed at night. The Home Secretary had not quite the acquaintance with the subject which he should have expected; but, of course, having been under the operation of the Acts ever since he was 22 or 23 years of age, he (Mr. W. E. Forster) ought to know something of it. The right hon. Gentleman, however, conveyed the impression that it was only recently, and step by step, that the law had interfered with factory employers as regarded the education of children. It was true that the Act had been improved last year. But when he (Mr. W. E. Forster) first began business as a manufacturer 30 years ago or more, he found an Act in existence which compelled him to secure the education of all children he employed up to 13 years of age, and to see that in any week before a child was so employed, he should have received 12 hours' or schooling. Let the House look at the position of the master manufacturers at the present moment. Under the Act which applied to them they would be unable in a year or two to employ any child under 10, though at present the Act only prevented the employment of children under 8. Between the ages of 10 and 13 the employers must secure for every child an attendance every morning or afternoon except Saturday, and that would go on, indeed, unless a certain Standard was attained, until the child was 14 years of age. But what was the case as regarded the farmer? He might employ any child, without any interference whatever, after 12. He would, indeed, comply with the provisions of the Act if the child went to school from the time he was 10 years old to the time he was 10 and a quarter. The Home Secretary told the House that this had been a strong measure for the agricultural districts—so strong, indeed, that the House had better let it alone, and must take care not to go too fast for the country. But if the House had attempted to secure the education of the factory children in this manner it would have been neglected up to the present moment. He could not admit that the difficulties in the way of agriculture were greater than those in the way of the children employed in manufactures. The House had been told to-night that children were not wanted in farm labour until the age of 10, and that 8 might be very well replaced by 10 in the Act. The way education had been obtained for factory children was, that factory employers were made to go a little faster than they wished. The House would not listen to the arguments of the factory employers, and what he desired to see was the same kind of pressure applied to the farmers. Last year his Colleague in the representation of Bradford (Mr.

Ripley) appealed to the Home Secretary to change the age at which children might be employed under the new Factory Act from 10 to 9. The House, however, refused to listen to that appeal, and the House did quite right. His Colleague told the House, and no doubt correctly, that it did not know the exact circumstances of the trade of Bradford. It was very probable that those who supported this Motion did not know the exact circumstances of the farmer or the farm labourer. But special knowledge was very often special pleading, and there would have been very little reform if the House had listened to the arguments of the interests specially affected. It happened that the question of factory labour was the first upon which he spoke in public. He was one of the supporters of Lord Shaftesbury; and he felt at that time that if it depended solely upon the employers in the factory districts whether there should be compulsory education for the factory children or not, they would never get it, and that their only chance of ever obtaining compulsory education was in the assistance of the country party, who certainly did not know so much about the matter as the employers, but who had more sympathy with the children. The supporters of the present Motion had perhaps the same knowledge of the agricultural children as Lord Shaftesbury had of the factory children; but whether they knew the exact position of farmers and agricultural children or not, they at all events knew that the farm labourer's children were growing up without the same amount of education as the artisan's children, and that they ought to get it in order to enable them to fight the battle of life. At all events, the matter should not be left where it was. The hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Read) said, when he brought this question forward that in fixing the age at 8, he simply did so because it was the age at that time fixed by the Factory Act; and the hon. Member for Leicestershire, when his Colleague at Bradford was arguing against "10," said that the age of 10 would be a good age for the farm children too. Why did not the hon. Member say this while the Agricultural Children Act was being passed? For himself, he admitted that he was glad to get that Act, even weak as it was; and he acknowledged his obligation to the hon. Members for South Norfolk and Leicestershire for that Act, but simply because it introduced and established the principle that work and school should go on together in the agricultural districts. Those hon. Members might now claim from the borough Members the same assistance which was so creditably given in former days by the country Members to Lord Shaftesbury and the advocates of the Factory Acts. Those who supported this Motion had a right to claim the assistance of the Home Secretary, with the tone and purport of whose speech that night, however, he confessed he was disappointed. He did not expect that the right hon. Gentleman would so completely adopt the laissez faire position and argument. When the hon. Member for Paisley (Mr. W. Holmes) the other night showed the inconsistencies in the different Workshop and Factories Acts, and how unfair it was to the children that they should be less cared for in one case than in another, the right hon. Gentleman at the close of his speech said that—"He was determined that all children employed in manufactures should, as soon as possible, have the benefit of such education as legislation could secure them."

He did not know when he had felt more delighted, and he jumped up to express his gratification at the words which had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman. He could not, however, for a moment suppose that the right hon. Gentleman did not refer to all the children in the Kingdom, whether engaged in agriculture or manufactures. The Home Secretary could not have conceived that legislation had done all that could be effected by what had been called the patched-up work of the Agricultural Children Act. Whose vocation was it to look after the interests of the agricultural population? If ever there was a Government formed of the country or county party it was the present. Of the six Members of the present Cabinet in this House, four were county Members, and not one a borough Member; and he could not but suppose that the Members of the present Cabinet were anxious to promote the interests of their future constituents. It might be that the parents were not their constituents yet; but they were always anxious to let it be understood that non-electors as well as electors were their constituents; and scarcely anyone had any doubt that when a child who was now 12 or 13 came to be of age he would in all probability have a vote. Whatever the Government might say to-night, he could not imagine they were satisfied with the Agricultural Children Act. It was not by any improvement of it or by any other plan of indirect compulsion alone we could hope to secure to the child of the farm labourer as much education as was given to the child of the artisan in the town. He wished to "take stock" of our educational position compared with what it was four or five years ago. As regarded school accommodation our gain was great. The Education Report of 1869 stated that there was school accommodation in Government schools for less than half the number of children of school age. In towns at least that deficiency had been largely met, or was in process of being met. The average attendance in the quarter ending August, 1869, was a little over 1,000,000; in the year ending August, 1873, it was a little under 1,500,000, and he should be much surprised if the Vice President had not this year to propose Estimates for an average attendance of at least 2,000,000. We were making rapid progress—a progress exceeding the growth of the population; but we must not rejoice over much, for we had a great deal to do. Hon. Members were apt to forget what an enormous gap remained unfilled. While in 1869 there were on the registers a little over 1,500,000, and in 1873 a little under 2,250,000, the last Report of the Department stated that the number of children of school age in the country who ought to be at school was 4,000,000, exclusive of the children of the upper classes. The difference between 2,250,000 and 4,000,000 of children who ought to have been at elementary schools represented an enormous number of children who were untaught and who were in inefficient schools. In other words, the number of children on the school register was 57 per cent of the total number, as against 43 per cent, or 7 per cent less than half as against 7 per cent less than half. In 1869 he moved for an Educational Estimate for Great Britain of £850,000; in 1874 his successor moved an Estimate for England and Scotland of £1,600,000; and he should be very much surprised if the Estimate of 1869 had not to be doubled this year. The amount was large, but the inhabitants of the country as distinct from the towns were not getting their fair share of it, because their children did not go to school as the children in the towns did. The Act of 1870 brought into operation two influences—the provision for new schools and the making endeavours to get children to attend them. The first influence had almost exhausted itself, and we had now to look to the second, in respect of which the towns were beating the country. The hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Floyer) seemed to imagine that compulsion did not exist because school boards were not actively putting bye-laws into force; but he really was quite mistaken, for bye-laws had been put into force most stringently. In Leeds the average attendance in August, 1869, was about 14,000, while now it was 28,000; and in regard to the number on the books in Leeds, there were on the register of the Government schools 44,000, and that, with a population of 260,000 in 1871, would, according to the usual calculation of one-sixth, make out that there were 100 per cent in Leeds on the register of the schools. The fact was that in Leeds they had really almost solved the problem by getting all the children to attend. In Sheffield, according to the last Report, there was an average attendance of 23,000—an increase of about 14,000 since the enforcement of the bye-laws; and upon the rolls there were about 40,000, which would also, in the usual calculation, give 100 per cent of the total number of children of school age. At Stockport they had not found it necessary to build fresh schools, but they had gone about securing the attendance of the children in the most systematic and successful manner, and, by almost house-to-house visitation, they had increased the average attendance until there was less than $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the children between 5 and 13 who were not at school, and some of these were excusable on account of mental or physical disability. These towns by making use of the power of direct compulsion, had nearly accounted for all their children. He hoped the Home Secretary would remember that fact when he endeavoured to obtain for agricultural children all the education legislation could provide them. It was not merely in the large towns that direct compulsion had succeeded, as was shown by the hon. Member for East Essex (Colonel Brise), whose speech, really a strong one in favour of the Resolution, had stated how effectively a school board had secured attendance in a country district. What was compulsion by law? It was merely a declaration by the State that it was the duty of a parent to see that his children had the merest elementary education. It was not denied that we had a right to compel a father to feed and clothe his child; and surely we had now arrived at a point of civilization at which we could declare that it was his duty to see this amount of education given. The sole meaning of compulsion was, that that was the duty of the parent, and then that it was the duty of the State to see that he fulfilled that duty, and, if he was unable from poverty, to help him either through the rates or from Imperial funds. If it was essential to declare that to be the duty of the parent in a large town, was it not equally essential to declare it to be the duty of the parent in the agricultural village? Was it not the duty of the parent in Norfolk and Dorsetshire as well as anywhere else? As a native of Dorsetshire himself, and born in one of its thatched cottages, he would ask what was there in the position of the Dorsetshire cottager which made it less his duty to send his child to school than it was the duty of any of the persons whom he employed at Bradford? How could we go on declaring it was crime in the town parent not to send his child to school, and not a crime in the villager? Surely that which was a crime in the crowded city was a crime in the hamlet, and what was a crime on one side of the ditch should be a crime on the other. In Scotland they had compulsion all over the kingdom, and yet no parent complained in that country. But he might be told that he must wait for public opinion. Well, public opinion had declared itself, for almost every town that was able to do so had put the compulsory system in force. If, then, hon. Gentlemen opposite were to show anything like the same courage in stimulating public opinion throughout the country districts that had been already shown in stimulating it in towns, they would find that they would have little difficulty in the matter. He wished the clergy were asked to give their experience on the subject, for he was sure they would say that public opinion was ripe and ready for the Act. If hon. Gentlemen opposite were to ask their own wives and daughters they would, he had no doubt, be led by them to the same conclusion. There was another argument in favour of direct compulsion which had hardly been alluded to in the course of the discussion that evening, and that was, that without it the country could not get the value of the grant which it gave for education. A good deal of that money was wasted because it was given to children who attended irregularly, and who had, therefore, little or no chance of obtaining an education which was really worth having. But the fact was that the arguments in favour of direct compulsion were almost overwhelming; and he did not think there had been any attempt in reality to answer them, except a mere statement that so much were hon. Gentlemen opposite afraid of the farmers that because they did not at the present moment like it, we must wait until they did. He might be asked why, with so strong a feeling in favour of compulsion, when he was in the Educational Department, he did not bring in a Bill on the subject? Now, it was, he believed, well known that he was prepared to bring in such a measure; but at the end of last Session the strength of those who sat on this side of the House was more apparent than real. There were, he must acknowledge, two grounds on which he regretted leaving the Education Office. He had hoped to have stayed there long enough to raise the standard of education as it had been done in Scotland; and, in the next place, to secure, by a general law, the attendance of as many children throughout the Kingdom at school as had been done by bye-laws in the case of the large towns. His successor in office enjoyed great advantages for the attainment of both those objects, and he hoped he would, notwithstanding the speech of the Secretary for the Home Department, endeavour to achieve them. As to the first object, his noble Friend had shown in the Paper which hon. Members had received that morning, how anxious he was to secure it, and he could not help envying him the production of his Code, although he could not, of course, pledge himself to every item which it contained. But, generally speaking, it seemed to him that it was a most wise and judicious endeavour to raise the standard of education, and to have children instructed not only in reading, writing, and arithmetic, but in such knowledge as during the period of their attendance at school they could acquire. But it had been asked why, if he was so anxious to secure the attendance of children at school, he did not produce a Bill to give effect to that desire. Well, if he thought it would be any service to the Government to take that course, he should not hesitate to do so; but he believed he would, in adopting it, be rather embarrassing than helping them. Whenever a plan was brought forward, as he hoped one would be at an early day, to secure the attendance of children at school throughout the country, great difficulties would, no doubt, be involved in connection with the machinery; and he felt that any independent Member, in attempting to elaborate the details of a Bill on the subject, might prejudice any machinery which his noble Friend might hereafter propose. That remark applied especially to the machinery for enforcing attendances in the rural districts. School boards had been alluded to; but while there was no doubt a willing school board was the best tool to be used, an unwilling or reluctant one might be the worst. He wished, however, those who were opposed to the extension of school boards throughout the country to remember this fact that every year that the Government put off bringing in any measure for compulsory attendance was making the argument in favour of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon's) Bill the stronger, because if they could only have compulsion with school boards, whatever might be their disadvantages, it would be better than no compulsion at all. And now he might observe that, although he was not prepared with an exact plan for compulsory attendance throughout the country, he thought there were certain principles which might be aimed at, which he should be glad to be allowed to state. They were the result of close study while he was at the Education Office, and he had since reflected upon them. He was of opinion, in the first place, that to abide by the principle of indirect compulsion without direct was not only likely to be inefficient, but very often likely to do harm. Again, they really must see that indirect compulsion ought to be applied to all trades and employments. It was unfair to the employer and unjust to the child in one trade that it should be interfered with, while another trade was left untouched. They had also arrived at a time when they might say not only that they would allow work and school to go on together, but that, if a child did not go to work it must yet go to school. All these points involved compulsion up to a certain age—he hoped the House would decide upon 10, but, at any rate, 9—until which time there should be school, but no work. Then, after that time, up to 13 or 14, unless a certain degree of proficiency were attained, work and school ought to go on together. What was wanted in order to attain these objects was not a mere improvement of the Agricultural Children Act or the consolidation of the Factory Acts, but also a general law for direct compulsory attendance throughout the Kingdom. He could not fail to be aware of the desire felt by his noble Friend to carry out the work of education. He now enjoyed great power for the purpose, for he had the confidence of those who represented the agricultural party. There were, at the same time, great difficulties in the way of working the matter out. It was, however, the business of his noble Friend to try and meet those difficulties. The honour to him would be great if he succeeded in doing so, and he felt assured his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), as well as himself, was prepared to give him every assistance in his power in achieving that object.

VISCOUNT SANDON thanked his right hon. Friend who had just sat down for the handsome way in which he had spoken of the Code that he had been able to lay upon the Table, and assured the House that he fully appreciated the approval of so high an authority. With respect to the compulsory attendance of children at school up to a certain age, that was a much more serious question. With regard to it, he might say he believed such was the feeling entertained by hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House that they had all an equal desire to secure that the children should spend a proper time at school. The point of difference was how that school attendance was to be secured. He would not enter into the many large questions which had been opened up by his right hon. Friend in the course of his speech, because they related rather to the question of general education than to that which had been raised by the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett). The question before the House had, in his opinion, been reduced to a very narrow point. Hon. Members representing counties—such as Dorsetshire, Mid Lincolnshire, and Essex, and other parts of the country, had strongly expressed their desire to get the children of the agricultural population into the schools, and had thrown out many valuable suggestions as to how that end should be attained. The opinion of the Government had been sketched with great accuracy by the Home Secretary. The fact was, they could not shut their eyes to the circumstance that the Agricultural Children Act had really only been in operation for eight weeks, although certain provisions of it came into force last year; and only that short period had been allowed them to judge as to the bearing of the Act upon the education of the children whom the Act was intended to benefit. The right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) had alluded to his long experience of the operation of the Factory Acts, and then referred to the circumstance that the Legislature had only touched the agricultural population during the last two years. Surely that statement of itself furnished a sufficient reason why they should not be over hasty in pressing changes upon a great interest like the agricultural interest, as to which the experience was so short compared with that in connection with the manufacturing interest in towns. The legislation with regard to the latter interest began 20 or 30 years ago, and it had been worked up gradually, first touching one branch of it and then another, until it had reached its present condition. That, he thought, was a good argument in favour of more time than eight short weeks being devoted to the experience of an Act before venturing to amend it. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had proposed "to call attention to the unsatisfactory state of education in the rural districts;" but he had refrained from alluding to the quality of the education there supplied. In point of fact, the education afforded in the rural districts showed results fully as good as that given in towns, as was proved by official Returns. For the year ending the 31st of August, 1870, the rate of grant given per head in inspected schools in England was as follows:—Rural districts, 9s. 7½d.; in town districts, 9s. 7d.; mixed districts, 9s. 6½d. It thus appeared that the somewhat despised rural districts were able by their intellectual exertions, to earn more than the towns, where the education was assumed to be so much superior. In Scotland the results were even more remarkable, the grant per head in that part of the Kingdom being 9s. 7d. for rural districts, 8s. 5½d. for town districts, and 9s. 5d. for districts mixed. He thought the hon. Member for Hackney must have had no inkling of the facts, otherwise he would not have passed over the state of rural education so lightly. Last summer he (Viscount Sandon) selected 60 rural and an equal number of urban schools at hap-hazard, in order to ascertain the proportion of scholars who passed the upper Standards in each division. He found that in the rural districts more than one-fourth of the full timers and more than one-half of the half timers passed the upper Standards; while in the urban districts only one-sixth of the full timers and one-sixth of the half timers attained the same grade. With regard to attendance, he had only to point out that the whole matter as yet rested on assumption, and that the rural districts had certainly not been proved to be so deplorably backward. Before further action was taken on this subject he hoped hon. Gentlemen would study carefully the Reports of the Commission which inquired into the employment of women and children in agriculture some years ago. The Commissioners in question, Messrs. Tremeneere and Tufnell, inquired particularly how far the provisions of the Factory Acts could with propriety be applied to the rural districts, and after hearing a vast deal of evidence extending over three years, they came to totally different conclusions—a fact which proved the difficulty of forming a correct judgment on the subject. The more those Reports were studied the more serious appeared the difficulties in the way of carrying out the scheme before the House. One of the chief difficulties arose from the different character of agricultural occupations in various parts of the country. In one part children were employed in the winter and not in the summer; in other parts during the summer and not in the winter; in another they were employed from 7 to

10 years of age, and in a different district from 10 to 12; while in another part of the country they were not wanted until the age of 14 years. That variety was an element which must be considered in regard to this question. Another point of serious difficulty was that a large number of small freeholders and occupiers of land would be unable to spare the labour of their children. Then again the wages of children might be thought to be a trivial affair; but when cases had to be dealt with in which children earned 4s. or 5s. a-week, while their parents themselves only earned 12s., it would be seen that the subject was one which ought not to be hastily treated. The opinion of the agricultural labourers as a class was fast turning in favour of education, and it would be a misfortune to arrest it by any inconsiderate action on the part of the Legislature. The feeling of the country itself was also a matter worthy of attention. Of the 1,039 school boards that had been formed only 335 had passed laws in favour of compulsion; while in 1874 out of 408 there were 91 that had passed such laws. His own belief was that on this question the feeling of the country was in a state of poise; and under these circumstances, the most advisable policy in his view was not to push compulsion further at present, but to retain the support of the country in carrying out the great work of giving all children a good education. It might be asked, what was the Government doing in the matter?—and, in reply, he would say that, in the first instance, they were watching—as they were bound to watch—the working of the Agricultural Children Act. Before the hon. Member for Hackney gave his Notice, instructions were given to the officials in the Education Department to watch the working of the Act very carefully, so that by the end of the year they might be in possession of trustworthy reports, from which to judge of its working in an educational point of view. A similar instruction issued from the Home Office, in order that the operation of the Act might be judged from the Factory Inspectors' point of view; and in the meantime the Education Department was closing up the supply of efficient schools for every part of the land. By the end of another year he hoped this great work would be completed; and in the meantime, in order to put within the reach of every child a thoroughly good school as soon as the school buildings were completed, the Department had revised the Code. By this means, they hoped to infuse fresh life and spirit into every school in the land. The new Code provided for rather extended teaching, and also made certain provisions to meet the cases of very small schools where they could not have school boards, and which could not get good teachers without additional aid. Here, again, the Government was assisting in the work of providing good schools for agricultural children. He quite acknowledged—looking to the Report of the Royal Commission on the Employment of Women and Children in Agriculture, that the difficulty of finding a proper solution to this great question was not slight. Still, he had no doubt that they would in time succeed in achieving the great object they had in view. Whether it would be obtained by direct or indirect compulsion he could not pretend to say, nor did he feel himself called upon at the present time to express any personal opinion on the matter. He saw on all sides the most hopeful symptoms. Public opinion in the country was more active than ever upon the question. This was shown by the enormous voluntary contributions which were pouring in for the assistance of schools, by the zeal of the school boards, by the Reports of the Inspectors of Schools, and by the unanimity which existed upon both sides of the House, which showed that whether hon. Members represented rural or urban constituencies, they were alike determined to push forward the great work of the general education of the country. In the meantime, Her Majesty's Government would give no opinion as to the proper course of action necessary to be pursued hereafter. A year's trial of the Agricultural Children Act would afford them considerable information, and they would watch very closely the progress of education generally in the country. Of one thing he was quite clear; neither the House nor the Government must at the present moment be bound by any Resolution whatever, whether abstract or concrete. The Government must throw themselves upon the confidence of the House with regard to the subject. They had, as a Party, given ~~an~~ ^{no} ~~advice~~ ^{pledge} in the matter. They had ^{pledged}

the Factory Acts from the very beginning. A Royal Commission appointed by the late Lord Derby investigated to its very depth the whole question of the condition of agriculture. As a Party, they passed the Agricultural Children Act, and as short a time ago as last Session they passed a law affecting factory education. They had every right, therefore, to claim the confidence of the House upon this question. It would be impossible for them to belie the whole former career of the Party, strengthened as it was by a support of the Education Act of 1870. Theirs would be the very last hands to check the rising aspirations of the agricultural labourers—aspirations daily growing in strength—that they should be placed on a par in the matter of education with their brethren of the operative classes throughout the land. This was a great aim to be kept in view; but in order to its accomplishment, caution was positively necessary—a caution which would be guided by the experience which every day would give them of the working of the great Acts now in operation.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, no one on that side of the House would wish to deny to the noble Lord and his Party credit for the part they had taken in promoting the cause of education, or the proposition that they were anxious to see the education of the agricultural classes improved. What was wanted of them was that they would show the same energy and zeal in reference to the last-named branch of education that had marked their conduct in relation to the education of dwellers in towns. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary objected to the proposal of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) on the ground that it was an abstract Resolution. He had noticed that the feelings of hon. Members in that House on the question of abstract Resolutions differed very much in accordance with the side of the House on which they happened to sit. Hon. Members on the Ministerial Benches entertained no very great horror of abstract Resolutions when they sat in Opposition. It must be admitted, as a general rule, that the discussion of a question was not very much advanced by the passing of abstract Resolutions; and although a most useful discussion had been raised by the proposal of the hon. Member for

Hackney, he might have been tempted to request the hon. Member to re-consider his intention to divide the House, if they had received from the Government anything like a definite assurance that they were seriously considering the question, and that they had any intention of proposing to the House a measure which would in any manner meet the views and intentions of those who had supported the hon. Member. No such assurance had been given. All they had done had been to promise that they would watch the working of the Agricultural Children Act of two years ago. If there was anything which the Members of a Government liked in an adverse ratio to their dislike of abstract Resolutions, it was the Reports of Royal Commissions; but the right hon. Gentleman not being able to appoint another Royal Commission to consider a subject which had been very carefully considered already by one such body, had announced his intention to await the Report of a further Commission, which had yet to be appointed to inquire into another matter. It was not very difficult to foretell the result of the working of the Act which the Government had announced their intention to watch with so much care. The hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell)—himself one of the fathers of the measure, and therefore not unlikely to take a sanguine view of the case—had that evening expressed his opinion that the Act in its present form was quite certain to prove a failure. Supposing, however, the Government were to find the working of the Act satisfactory, he would like to know whether they would regard the fact as satisfying either their own aspirations or the aspirations of the country. If the Government had answered this question in the negative, he might have been disposed not to defend the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney; but the Government had told them nothing of the sort. From all that had been said, the House might fairly assume that in the opinion of the Government, a satisfactory working of the Agricultural Children Employment Act would be a satisfactory solution of the question; and that although they were the authors of a measure which fixed 14 as the age up to which the children in manufacturing districts should be educated, they thought 10½ years a suffi-

10 years of age, and in a different district from 10 to 12; while in another part of the country they were not wanted until the age of 14 years. That variety was an element which must be considered in regard to this question. Another point of serious difficulty was that a large number of small freeholders and occupiers of land would be unable to spare the labour of their children. Then again the wages of children might be thought to be a trivial affair; but when cases had to be dealt with in which children earned 4s. or 5s. a-week, while their parents themselves only earned 12s., it would be seen that the subject was one which ought not to be hastily treated. Members represented rural or urban constituencies, they were alike determined to push forward the great work of the general education of the country. In the meantime, Her Majesty's Government would give no opinion as to the proper course of action necessary to be pursued hereafter. A year's trial of the Agricultural Children Act would afford them considerable information, and they would watch very closely the progress of education generally in the country. Of one thing he was quite clear; neither the House nor the Government must at the present moment be bound by any Resolution whatever, whether abstract or concrete. The Government must throw themselves upon the confidence of the House with regard to the subject. They had, as a Party, given great pledges in the matter. They had steadily supported

the Factory Acts from the very beginning. A Royal Commission appointed by the late Lord Derby investigated to its very depth the whole question of the condition of agriculture. As a Party, they passed the Agricultural Children Act, and as short a time ago as last Session they passed a law affecting factory education. They had every right, therefore, to claim the confidence of the House upon this question. It would be impossible for them to belie the whole former career of the Party, strengthened as it was by a support of the Education Act of 1870. Theirs would be the very last hands to check the rising aspirations of the agricultural labourers—aspirations daily growing in strength—that they should be placed on a par in the matter of education with their brethren of the operative classes throughout the land. This was a great aim to be kept in view; but in order to its accomplishment, caution was positively necessary—a caution which would be guided by the experience which every day would give them of the working of the great Acts now in operation.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, no one on that side of the House would wish to deny to the noble Lord and his Party credit for the part they had taken in promoting the cause of education, or the proposition that they were anxious to see the education of the agricultural classes improved. What was wanted of them was that they would show the same energy and zeal in reference to the last-named branch of education that had marked their conduct in relation to the education of dwellers in towns. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary objected to the proposal of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) on the ground that it was an abstract Resolution. He had noticed that the feelings of hon. Members in that House on the question of abstract Resolutions differed very much in accordance with the side of the House on which they happened to sit. Hon. Members on the Ministerial Benches entertained no very great horror of abstract Resolutions when they sat in Opposition. It must be admitted, as a general rule, that the discussion of a question was not very much advanced by the passing of abstract Resolutions; and although a most useful discussion had been raised by the proposal of the hon. Member for

Hackney, he might have been tempted to request the hon. Member to re-consider his intention to divide the House, if they had received from the Government anything like a definite assurance that they were seriously considering the question, and that they had any intention of proposing to the House a measure which would in any manner meet the views and intentions of those who had supported the hon. Member. No such assurance had been given. All they had done had been to promise that they would watch the working of the Agricultural Children Act of two years ago. If there was anything which the Members of a Government liked in an adverse ratio to their dislike of abstract Resolutions, it was the Reports of Royal Commissions; but the right hon. Gentleman not being able to appoint another Royal Commission to consider a subject which had been very carefully considered already by one such body, had announced his intention to await the Report of a further Commission, which had yet to be appointed to inquire into another matter. It was not very difficult to foretell the result of the working of the Act which the Government had announced their intention to watch with so much care. The hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell)—himself one of the fathers of the measure, and therefore not unlikely to take a sanguine view of the case—had that evening expressed his opinion that the Act in its present form was quite certain to prove a failure. Supposing, however, the Government were to find the working of the Act satisfactory, he would like to know whether they would regard the fact as satisfying either their own aspirations or the aspirations of the country. If the Government had answered this question in the negative, he might have been disposed not to defend the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney; but the Government had told them nothing of the sort. From all that had been said, the House might fairly assume that in the opinion of the Government, a satisfactory working of the Agricultural Children Employment Act would be a satisfactory solution of the question; and that although they were the authors of a measure which fixed 14 as the age up to which the children in manufacturing districts should be educated, they thought 10½ years a sufficient limit for the children in agricultural districts. The Government had said that they must not go faster than public opinion, which, in the agricultural district, was not in favour of direct compulsion. He would like to know on this question the nature of the steps they had taken in order to ascertain the exact direction in which public opinion tended? It was not, perhaps, to be expected that public opinion would, in the first place, be favourable to compulsion. As had been candidly acknowledged by his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster), public opinion in the manufacturing districts was against the principles of the Factory Acts when they were first introduced, but now they admitted the wisdom of the legislation. The noble Lord had stated that public opinion on this question was in a state of poise. If that was so, let steps be taken to ascertain the direction in which the balance of opinion tended. If the Government were not prepared to assent to the abstract Resolution of the hon. Member for Hackney, why did they not, at any rate, say that they would not be satisfied until education was provided as amply for agricultural children as for children in manufacturing districts? But they had said nothing of the kind. The House might be told in a few years after the working of the Agricultural Children Act had been carefully watched, that it was in fair operation; that the intentions of the Legislature had been executed; and that nothing more remained to be done. After the unsatisfactory declaration of the Government, he should not feel justified in asking his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney to withdraw his Resolution, and he trusted that he would divide the House upon it.

Mr. FAWCETT, in replying, said, he had brought forward an abstract Resolution with the object of raising a debate upon direct compulsion, and, if possible, of extracting from the Government some plain and positive declaration that they could understand. Last year an attempt was made with a Bill, but they studiously avoided any declaration upon the principle. Of all places in the world from which complaints could come of abstract Resolutions, the strangest certainly was Her Majesty's Government. A year or two ago the Prime Minister tried to turn out a Ministry by supporting an abstract Resolution on the subject of economy. Had they forgotten the abstract Resolution on local taxation, moved by the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes)? Why, they lived upon it for two years; they gained county seat after county seat by it, and he fancied all that the farmers would get out of that abstract Resolution were the few words which it contained. With regard to the Amendment, he was not opposed to it as far as it went, but it only touched one of the three essential points which were dealt with by the original Resolution. If, however, his Resolution should not be carried, he would accept the Amendment.

Mr. W. EGERTON said, that in the event of the hon. Member for Leicestershire's Amendment being put as a substantive Motion, he should move a further Amendment declaring the undesirability of further legislation at the present time.

The House divided:—Ayes 149; Noes 229: Majority 80.

Question proposed,

"That the words 'to withhold from children employed in agriculture the advantages secured to children employed in other branches of industry by the services of Her Majesty's Inspector of Factories,' be added, instead thereof."

MR. DISRAELI expressed a hope that his hon. Friend (Mr. Pell) would allow his Amendment to be negatived, as there then would be a clear issue before the House.

MR. PELL said, he thought that if his Amendment were now negatived, the Resolution would stand in a very strange position. The better way, he thought, would be to allow his words to be added, and then to take a division on the whole Resolution as so amended.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON expressed a hope that the hon. Member would allow the Amendment to be negatived.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the Motion, if carried, would inflict upon the country districts an inspection for which no reason had been made out. He trusted, therefore, that the hon. Member for Leicestershire would not press it to a division.

MR. W. EGERTON said, he hoped that the Motion would not be proceeded with. If it was pressed he should move, as an Amendment, that, considering the limited experience of the working of the Agricultural Children Act, it was undesirable to legislate further on the subject at the present time.

MR. WALSH moved the adjournment of the debate,

Motion made, and Question proposed.
"That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Walsh.)

Question put, and negatived.

Question again proposed,

"That the words 'to withhold from the children employed in agriculture the advantages secured to children employed in other branches of industry by the services of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Factories,' be added, instead thereof."

MR. W. EGERTON again rose to move his Amendment, but—

MR. SPEAKER said, that as he had already spoken, he must place the Amendment in some other Member's hands.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the Motion was merely to add words to a Resolution in order to enable it to be put, because at present the Question before the House was simply "That, in the opinion of this House, it is undesirable." He trusted, therefore, that the hon. Member would press his Motion, because it was simply intended to provide some machinery to put the Act in operation. He would remind the House that the Workshops Acts were not properly carried out until after the appointment of Government Inspectors.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he thought the best thing that could be done was for the words to be added, so that there might be a substantive Motion before the House, and then that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cheshire (Mr. W. Egerton) might be moved, so that the House might not be put in a false position. The Government were quite as anxious as hon. Gentlemen opposite that agricultural children should receive a good education; but what they said was, that an Act with reference to the subject had only been passed last year, after due consideration, and therefore it was not expedient to re-open the question so soon. They objected to being forced to deal with an Act in a way they disapproved of.

MR. SPEAKER said, that if the words proposed by the hon. Member for Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) were added to the original Question, no Amendment could be proposed except in the form of an addition to those words. Now would be the time to amend the Motion.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON rose to move the Amendment which Mr. W. Egerton had suggested.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the sentence proposed was not an Amendment—it was a substitution. If the Amendment of the hon. Member for Leicestershire were negatived, it would be competent to the hon. Baronet to submit his Motion.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 150; Noes 226: Majority 76.

Amendment proposed,

After the word “undesirable,” to add the words “considering the limited experience of the working of the Agricultural Children Act, to legislate further on that subject at the present time.”—(Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

MR. LOCKE complained that this was the first time they had heard of the Amendment. It would be very unbecoming of them to go to a vote on a question of which they knew nothing. He therefore thought the debate should be adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Debate be now adjourned.”—(Mr. Locke.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER begged the House to consider to what it would be committing itself if it agreed to the Motion of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. W. Egerton). It would be to this—that whereas the Government were anxious to improve the present provisions for the education of children not in agricultural employment, those provisions being very much stronger than any which applied to agricultural children, nevertheless, the House pledge itself not to legislate further for the latter. He did not see how the Government could support this Amendment, seeing that they had asked that they might not be fettered as to their future conduct.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, that having supported his hon. Friend (Mr. Pell) in the Amendment which had been negatived, he wished to explain his views on the subject. He was quite ready to vote for this proposal (Mr. Egerton's), as he did not want more legislation on the question, but merely wished the existing Acts to be carried into effect. There was no necessity for an adjournment, because the matter had been fully discussed.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 144; Noes 227: Majority 83.

Question again proposed, “That those words be there added.”

MR. MACGREGOR moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed “That this House do now adjourn.”—(Mr. Macgregor.)

MR. DISRAELI: The House has had such a quiet Session that I was unwilling to throw any difficulties in the way this evening, which has turned out to possess a character of a less tranquil kind. The hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke), who first introduced these tactics to-night, and whose grave humour I always recognize on these occasions, has received considerable attention from us. We have divided on his Motion. With regard to the new Motion which is now made for the adjournment of the House, I am not disinclined towards that Motion. I think one of the best things the House could do at present would be to adjourn. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) has brought forward a question upon which the House has given a grave decision—a decision by a large majority. We have now got into this situation—that we are wasting our energies, and in no degree advancing any public policy. The business for which the House met to-night has been amply discussed and decidedly treated, and I do not think there is an hon. Member present who can ascribe to these frequent divisions that character of gravity which ought to belong to our proceedings. Therefore, Sir, I will not oppose this Motion.

MR. SULLIVAN objected to that Motion because, if carried, it would preclude the bringing on of a Motion that stood lower on the Paper, to which the Irish Members attached importance—namely, for the production of a document on which would depend the qualification of Mr. John Mitchel, and it was essential that that point should be decided, if possible, before the nomination at Tipperary on Thursday. He might be out-voted; but he would certainly divide the House against the present Motion for its adjournment if they were to be prevented from moving for the Return to which he referred.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 224; Noes 41: Majority 183.

House adjourned at a quarter

UNIVERSITIES (SCOTLAND) (DEGREES TO WOMEN) BILL.—[BILL 6.]

(Mr. Cowper-Temple, Mr. Russell Gurney, Mr. Orr Ewing, Dr. Cameron.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that it would remove from the four Universities a restriction imposed on their discretion by an unexpected construction of the law. It would take away the illegality that had been stamped upon a course taken by all the authorities of Edinburgh University at the suggestion of the medical faculty. The Scotch Universities Act gave a power to the University Court, with the consent of the Chancellor, after communicating with the Senatus, and the University Council, to make internal arrangements for the improvement of these institutions, and it was in the belief that those internal arrangements thus authorized included such a subject as the extension of the examinations and degrees to women, that the authorities of the University of Edinburgh made regulations for that purpose. Those regulations were deliberately considered, and received the sanction of the high legal authorities connected with the University of Edinburgh. The present Lord Advocate was the person who made the Motion in the University Court that led to the regulations, and he therefore gave the weight of his legal authority to these regulations. The Lord Rector of the day was Lord Moncreiff, and the Chancellor of the University was the highest legal dignitary on the Scotch Bench, and they both sanctioned these regulations. Therefore, it was with the full weight and consideration of legal authority that it was assumed that one of the Scotch Universities had the power, under the existing law, to admit female students to the benefits of University training and education. After two years, however, those in the University who did not approve of these regulations raised doubts as to the legality of conferring degrees. The question was raised by an action in the Courts of Law in Scotland, before the Lord Ordinary, and the decision was substantially in favour of what had been done by the University authorities. But, on an appeal to the Court of Session, the Judgment of the Lord Ordinary was reversed, and the regulations were declared to have been ultra vires, and it was stated that, if such a power be desirable, it must be obtained either from the Crown or from the Legislature, thus pointing to such a remedy as the one which he now proposed—namely, an amendment of the Universities Act to declare that it was, and ought to be, in the power of the authorities of the Universities, if they should think fit, according to their discretion—with which the Bill did not purpose to interfere—to extend the benefits of the Universities beyond the male students to female students. The object of the Bill, therefore, was to remove the badge of illegality and invalidity which had been stamped upon the proceedings of the University by the decision of the Court of Session. In the Preamble it was recited that—“Whereas doubts have arisen”—and, surely, he was justified in saying that the state of the law was doubtful, when they saw ranged on the one side the highest legal authorities, who believed that the Scotch University Act gave this power to the Universities, and when on the other they found that decision reversed on appeal by a majority of 7 Judges against 5, and in the minority were found the names of the Judges of highest position, of greatest experience, and of the most recognized ability. The judgment of the Court of Session was not final, and might have been reversed by an appeal to the House of Lords; but the parties who felt aggrieved were not wealthy, and could hardly be expected to incur the expense of a third suit, and they might fairly hope that their object would be attained in the manner suggested by the Court, and without resorting to further legal proceedings. There were reasons to suppose that the Judgment of the Court had not placed the question beyond the region of doubt. But, at all events, whether the doubts referred to in the Preamble were well founded or not, still the enacting part of the Bill ought to take effect, which declared that henceforth the authorities of the Scotch Universities might, if they thought fit, extend the benefits of the education given in these institutions to female students. He did not propose to interfere in any way with the discretion or the constitution of the authorities of these institutions in this matter. Some might think that the University Court was not the best body to exercise such a discretion as that; but then the Act of Parliament that created the University Court had already committed to it the responsibility of making internal improvements subject to the veto of the Chancellor, and to communication with the Senatus and the Council. If the University Court was qualified for its other duties, it was fit for this discretion, and there was no ground for assuming that its members would decline to pay any attention to the opinions and arguments of the other bodies in the University whom the law compelled them to consult, and would disregard any deliberate and well-considered Judgment of the Senatus and Council; and the Court was subject to the assent of the Chancellor. The Bill was really only an enabling measure, which would in no way interfere with that which was the proper business of the University—namely, the management of its own affairs. All he proposed to do was to remove from the Universities the bar which the decision of a Court of Law had put against their doing that which one University had thought right to do. It might be said, if this was merely an enabling Bill, and did not interfere with the discretion of the Universities, why should they have Petitions sent up from the Universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow against the Bill. He thought that those who had sent up Petitions against the Bill were occupied less with the particular provisions of this Bill than with the general question of female education. Indeed, the question of extending the benefits of the Universities to female students was one which had been strongly debated, and which gave rise to great division of opinion in the University of Edinburgh. In that University, as in the Universities of Cambridge and London, there were many Professors of large sympathies and extended views who were quite prepared to take their share in that great movement, which had originated in England, of extending the benefits of University education, by means of the Oxford and Cambridge Local Examinations, to persons of both sexes. The Universities were accepting the great mission of satisfying the hunger after higher education amongst all classes and both sexes. Edinburgh had instituted local examinations similar to those set on foot by Oxford and Cambridge, and those examinations had done an immense deal of good, as hon. Members must know, in stimulating the middle-class schools, and encouraging both teachers and scholars to advance towards a higher education. These examinations had been as successfully applied to girls' schools as to boys' schools. At the present moment, the lectures which were delivered by Professors of Cambridge and Oxford in the large towns of the North of England were producing great effects in stimulating the artizan class in the acquirement of knowledge. Professors of Edinburgh University were instructing the members of the Ladies Educational Association in literature, philosophy, and science, with most successful results. Twenty-seven Professors in Scotch Universities had petitioned in favour of the Bill. Nine eminent Professors who lectured in the School of Medicine had urged the House in their Petition to place University education within the reach of women. There was evidence that in the University of Edinburgh a desire existed among the more enlightened, active, and energetic of the Professors to extend the benefits of University teaching according to circumstances to female students. The Petition of the Senatus was adopted by a majority of medical Professors, the majority of the non-medical men being in favour of University education for women. It was therefore impossible to disguise from oneself that the opposition to the Bill mainly arose from the medical Professors—he did not mean from all of them, but from the majority of their number. To show that the opposition did not proceed from all, he might remark that there was a Petition on the Table of the House, in favour of the Bill, from the extra-mural lecturers on medical science, who had been in the habit of teaching female students, and who stated that they found an aptitude, a patience, a perseverance, and an intellectual power in the female students quite equal to those of their male students, and that they had every reason to be satisfied with the conduct of those students. The opposition to be encountered was not against the admission of women to a higher intellectual culture, but to their admission into medical practice; and this opposition came from the medical profession. Amongst the pleas of objection was a warning against the association of the sexes in the same classes. But there was no prospect of the two sexes being taught together in the classes of anatomy and surgery. The regulations that were framed by the University of Edinburgh did not sanction any mixed classes, but made provision for separate classes; and he thought the House might entirely dismiss the probability, or even the possibility, of any such mixture. The combination would only take place at the examinations, and he could hardly conceive that any mischief would arise from female students competing by examination for degrees, any more than at present arose from their competing for certificates of honour. Objections were urged against the capacity and competence of women for the medical art. Let that objection be tested by experience. But it was already disproved. The four ladies who were practising in London and provincial towns had plenty of patients, and cured as high a proportion as other practitioners. But the prevailing objection that influenced the majority of the medical profession who objected to women receiving medical degrees arose from a dread of competition. No profession liked an increase of competition; yet he could not think that there was any ground for supposing that this competition was likely to be of a formidable character, because there was ample room for the admission of female medical practitioners without interfering in any important degree with the male practitioners. There were large spheres of action on which female practitioners might enter which at present were not occupied. There were numberless cases of young women who shrunk from applying for advice at the commencement of a disorder or in small ailments, who yet would at once have recourse to a competent practitioner of their own sex if they were allowed to do so. Again, there were large openings for female practitioners in India. There were in India millions of native ladies shut up in the zenanas, who, however ill they might be, were not willing to receive any help from male practitioners. Here was a sphere which was now opening to female doctors. The zenanas of the Upper Provinces of India were shut against the assistance of medical men. A physician in India had written to say that from his own personal experience he knew the sickness and suffering within these zenanas to be immense, and that had he a hundred medical ladies out there, he could find plenty of occupation for them. The Native gentlemen would gladly avail themselves of European skill for their wives and daughters through female doctors. A number of American medical ladies connected with missions had arrived, and had more practice than they could manage. English women would go; and it surely must be undesirable that ladies should go out there without any official and authoritative stamp as to whether they had got the knowledge and experience requisite to make them competent medical practitioners? Did they not by their present system bring discredit upon English science, by declining to give to the Natives of India that security which they might fairly expect in the case of women going from England to practise there as doctors? Some people were incredulous of the power of women to make use of the advantages which the Universities offered, and of their capacity to successfully apply themselves to scientific studies. If, at present, there was a deficiency of mental power and capacity among women, as compared with men, it arose to a great extent from the deficiencies of their education. The weaker the minds, the more they required to be strengthened by careful and appropriate training. Though nature had established fundamental differences, it had prepared for each sex a line in which it was fitted to excel. The experience of Girton College, and of Merton College, Cambridge, proved that women could pass examinations equally with men, when equally taught. Of this he felt convinced—that women would continue to practise medicine, and it was unwise to compel them to go abroad to get that teaching and those degrees which we refused to grant them at home. Why should we send them to Paris? At the present moment there were six English young women studying in Paris, and in course of time they would obtain their degrees. In other countries of Europe, Universities were open to both sexes. Even Russia, the youngest in civilization, was in advance of us in this respect. In that country there were special schools of medicine for preparing young women to go to those countries where there was a large Mahometan population, to whom their services were as acceptable as those of English women would be in India. It was a harsh and cruel thing that when these young women had duly qualified themselves as practitioners, our law should be so arranged as to make it impossible for them to obtain legal recognition of the proficiency they had been encouraged by legal authority to attain. He would not enter into the question of the difficulties that might arise in the Universities if they chose to exercise the power which the Bill would give them. That was a matter left by the law to the discretion of those bodies; but he was quite sure that they were not of such a formidable character that they might not be overcome. If the present lecturers were not able to give a second lecture to women, nothing was more easy than to have supplementary teachers. The feeling of Edinburgh had declared itself so strongly in favour of extending the benefits of University education to women, that money had been amply contributed for every purpose for which it had hitherto been required; the Town Council had petitioned in their favour; and he thought the ground upon which he might fairly ask the House to give a second reading to this Bill was, that it was desirable to remove from the Universities of Scotland the disability under which they at present laboured. The Scottish Universities were the only ones where regulations were made under an Act of Parliament, for the English Universities were governed by charters; therefore, it had become necessary to ask the assistance of Parliament for an extension of power; and if granted in the shape of the Bill, it would give to the Universities the power of increasing the scope of their action and their usefulness, and of extending the dissemination of knowledge and of culture of the highest order to both sexes, according to the circumstances under which they desired to attend these institutions. The Universities would thus be made stronger and better adapted to meet the wants of the day. A desire was now prevailing for the improvement of female education, an object which many people in Scotland most ardently desired to accomplish. By opening the door for competent women to become medical practitioners—an honourable profession for which nature had fitted them—they would remove an obstacle at present in the path of many young women who were anxious to earn their own livelihood, and who did not desire any longer to burden their families. It would occupy other young women who, although not absolutely obliged to take up a profession, yet were anxious to rise out of a life of uselessness and frivolity to one of practical work in curing disease. 16,000 women last Session had petitioned Parliament to allow them to be treated medically by their own sex. Surely that was a want to which some attention might be paid. He thought they, who were elected by only one sex, were more bound than they would otherwise be to pay attention to the wishes and wants of the other sex, in regard to a matter of a social and domestic character, not one touching politics, but affecting the comfort, the health, and the welfare of that sex in the community. He conceived that, whether they looked at the case of the Universities, whether they looked at the case of young women, or at the large class of women desirous of having medical practitioners of their own sex, there was every reason why they should more widely open the portals of the Northern Universities, and restore to them the freedom they had been supposed to possess, of educating any of Her Majesty's subjects. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Cowper-Temple.)

MR. MATTLAND, in rising to move, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, it was with the greatest pain that he felt it to be his duty to put upon the Paper that Amendment. It was painful to him because he yielded to no man in the House or the country in a sincere desire for the improvement of the higher education of women; but while he most decidedly thought the House ought to do all they possibly could to that end, he altogether objected to the Bill. He had no doubt it had been introduced with the very best intentions; but he thought he should be able, before he sat down, to show the House that it had been framed by persons altogether unfamiliar with Scottish Universities. That was the sole objection he had to the Bill. He was not one of those persons who thought that women ought not to have degrees in the medical, or in any other faculty; but his objection was this—that if the Bill passed, the Scotch Universities would become subject to a constant and perpetual popular agitation. The first point to which he wished to draw the attention of the House was the Preamble, and he ventured to say that a more extraordinary statement than was to be found in it had never been made. The Preamble stated, for instance, "that doubts had arisen as to powers of the Universities of Scotland to admit women," and then it added that it was expedient those "doubts" should be removed. If the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Hants (Mr. Cowper-Temple) thought there were any doubts on the question existing at present, he could assure him that he was totally misinformed. In admitting lady students it had been decided that the University Courts had acted in ultra vires, and gone beyond their power. It was true certain ladies were admitted to one of the Scotch Universities, and admitted by the University Court. The matter was taken into the Law Courts of Scotland, and the decision of the full Bench of Judges went against the right hon. Gentleman and his friends. They acquiesced in the decision; they did not, as they might have done, carry the matter to a higher Court, but instead they now came to Parliament to ask for legislation. He had no objection in the world to that; but he had every objection to their stating that there were doubts as to the power of the Universities to admit women. He must therefore argue the question on the basis of there being no doubts whatever as to the present legal position of the Universities in reference to the admission of women. Women were now, and always had been, excluded altogether from the Universities. He was the last man in the House to say that he was not willing to hear arguments on the subject; for, on the contrary, he was exceedingly anxious to hear arguments. He objected to the Bill because it was permissive, and because it asked Parliament to hand over its powers to a body called the University Court, about which they knew nothing. Upon that body would devolve the duty of making arrangements for the admission of women, and in reference to the point, he must be allowed to make this remark—that of great social questions like that, a question affecting the higher education of women, and one which was subject to constant agitation, not in Scotch and English Universities alone, but throughout the whole country—Parliament alone were the proper judges. Again, Parliament was the only recognized authority as judges of great financial changes. If the Bill became law, Parliament would be in this position. They would hand over authority to the University Courts to admit to the Universities, which could not be done without a great amount of expense. For the purpose new classes would have to be formed, and for them separate buildings and an extra teaching staff would be required; but as the University Courts had no power to tax the rate-payers they would be obliged to come to Parliament and say—"You must pay £100,000 or £200,000." He must admit that if it had been a proposal in regard to the University of Oxford, of which he was a member, he should have objected to handing over to the Governing Body of the University, powers which were entirely Parliamentary; but he would have felt that, to a certain extent, the Council of the University of Oxford was a real bond fide representation of the University, for it consisted of some 30 or 40 persons, who were elected by the resident graduates, consisting of 200 or 300 in number, all of whom took an interest in the proceedings of their University. But that was not the case with the University Courts in Scotland. Those Courts in Scotland consisted in one University of members, and in no University more than eight. The English Members would, he had no doubt, suppose that those persons were elected, because they had been Professors or at least graduates of the University, and knew something about it. Nothing could be further from the case. The Rector of most of the Universities had three votes, and virtually the control of the Court was in his hands. He must call the attention of the House to the election of the Rector. The Rector was generally a man of letters or a great statesman; no doubt, always a gentleman of great eminence, but not, in the least degree, a man of whom there was any security of the possession of practical common-sense. One of the Universities, St. Andrews, for instance, had elected Mr. John Stuart Mill, an eminent man, but that he was a person to be trusted with the absolute management of a University was a proposition that neither he, nor, he thought, the House would approve of. Then, again, Mr. Carlyle had been elected a Rector. He was the most eminent living man of letters in this country; and he was probably elected because the students wanted to see so eminent a man, and to hear him make a speech. Mr. Ruskin was another eminent man whom the students had elected Rector, and he was probably the greatest art critic in the world; but as to his practical sagacity and common-sense—that was the last thing the students were thinking about. All the men that he had mentioned were Englishmen or Scotchmen, but he would give an instance of a gentleman who, though not elected, had a very close contest with no less a person than the Prime Minister. That gentleman was not an Englishman, but an American. That gentleman was Mr. Emerson, an eminent writer and philosopher, but a person regarding whose sagacity and fitness for deciding the questions that would be referred to him under the Bill, they really knew nothing, and the students less. He might be told that he was taking a very decided line in that matter, but he must call the attention of the House to the composition of the University Court. In the University of Edinburgh there were eight members of the Court. The Lord Rector had three votes—two votes counting his own vote and that of his assessor, and a casting vote—and two other members were the Lord Provost of Edinburgh and the Assessor of the Town Council. He ventured to say that no University could possibly think that the Lord Provost of Edinburgh and the delegate of the Town Council were, in any sense, to be considered University authorities. He considered them municipal authorities, and it seemed to him a most extraordinary thing such gentlemen should have such power over the Universities. The House would then see that the officers he had mentioned had altogether five votes in a Court of eight members, and had, therefore, complete control over the University Court. The majority of the Court, to his mind, consisted of outsiders. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would be surprised to hear that not only were the public not admitted to their sittings, but no reporters for the newspapers were allowed to be present. They might issue a decree one day and cancel it the next, and all that the country would know was that the decrees had been issued. But the duties of those Courts under 21 & 22 Vict. c. 83, were set forth in the Act, and they were of a merely subordinate character. They could rusticate and expel students, or enforce discipline, but in no way did the statute appear to contemplate granting them a power to regulate the University. Their powers were either disciplinary or administrative. Again, if the Rector might have complete control over the University, Parliament would be handing over to him, if the Bill passed, the settlement of the question. Who, then, elected the Lord Rector? Not those who had taken their degrees, but young men who were at the time at the University—young men, to his certain knowledge, varying in age from 14 to, perhaps, 21, in statu pupillari. Those young lads, in their choice of a Rector, were generally influenced by political considerations, and they decided, for instance, whether the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, or the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, was the better. It was a monstrous proposition to think that those young lads should decide as to the control and management of the Universities, and he thought they would be better occupied in learning grammar than in discussing and taking part in what really was a high legislative function. Therefore, he did not think the University Courts were fit to decide the question which they would be asked to decide if the Bill passed into law; and, further, if they were to arrive at a decision, they would not give, if he might use the expression, anything like a fixed tenure to the women whom they admitted. But if the Bill passed, what would be the result? Why, if the Courts decided to admit ladies, the latter might find they were refused admission the following week. He proposed his Amendment with regret; but the provisions of the Bill introduced ran contrary in every respect to his ideas of what University life and University management ought to be, and he trusted the House would support it.

SIR WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER seconded the Amendment. It had already been decided by the Courts of Law in Scotland that women could not be permitted to matriculate or to graduate in the Universities of that country, and the very fact that the supporters of that policy now asked for special legislation in their favour was an admission that they had no case. He thought it a very good general rule to judge of the position of men, however honourable, rather by what they did than by what they said. A question of doubt had been raised, and he wished to recapitulate the fact of the matter. In the year 1869, a woman applied to be allowed, as an experiment, to study in the University of Edinburgh. She stated that if there was any difficulty experienced during the course of her medical education she would at once withdraw. The Senatus Academicus received her application favourably, but the University Court decided that it was not advisable for the sake of one woman to attempt to make the necessary arrangements. A short time afterwards the lady renewed her application in company with two other ladies, and the Senatus and Court of the University, on the express understanding that all that was required was a permission to begin, in order to see what would come of admitting women to the medical education afforded by the University, passed some purely permissive and tentative regulations allowing Professors to teach women medicine, provided they did so in separate classes. The University Court held that the women attending such classes must be under the same rules as the male students, and called upon them to pay the matriculation fee. As there was some misunderstanding as to what "matriculation" meant, and as considerable capital had been made out of that at the expense of the University, perhaps he might be allowed to state what "matriculation" was in the Scotch Universities. It was different from matriculation in English Universities. It consisted in the payment of a fee of a guinea, which entitled the student to attend the lectures of the Professors for one year, and the use of the University library. The student also received a ticket, declaring him a civis of the University. At the end of the year he must matriculate again, pay the fee of a guinea, continuing it for every year he remained at the University, and if he pleased he might remain at the University for the whole term of his natural life. Nothing was conceded to the ladies except the privilege of attending the lectures of Professors, who thought fit to teach them in separate classes, and the question of graduation was expressly reserved. The ladies knew very well when they commenced their studies that they could not proceed to graduation. After staying at the University for the period of two years, they applied to the University Court to make certain special and exceptional arrangements by which they might be permitted to take degrees. The University Court then did what it ought to have done long before, and what it would have done if the Court could have supposed that the women would have departed from the understanding on which they were admitted to the University—it consulted counsel whether they were legally entitled to do so. Counsel's opinion was adverse to the ladies, who then proceeded to law, and after much litigation the question, so far as the Scotch Courts were concerned, was decided against them. The charters of the Universities of Glasgow, Aberdeen, and St. Andrew's, distinctly showed that the admission of women to these seats of learning was never contemplated. It was thus apparent that the women were admitted by favour and by a mistake—by favour in a pardonable anxiety on the part of the University to meet their request, and by mistake because the University Court exceeded its powers. On what was granted to the ladies as a favour, they laid the foundation on which to claim a right. That right was tested and found untenable, and now Parliament was asked, under a pretext of alleged doubt, to positively legislate, and that adversely to the decision of the highest Court of Law in Scotland. Seeing that the ladies were very well supported by enthusiastic members of the sterner sex, he could not help saying that he thought it would show more respect to Parliament, if the decision of the House of Lords had been taken before their supporters had flaunted this theory of doubt before the House. If the question of the higher education of women pressed for legislation on its merits, in that capacity let it be brought before the House, and he was sure every hon. Member of the House would give it the fullest and the fairest consideration; but he objected to make a great national change in the system of teaching in the Universities—a change that would surely affect the great medical schools of Edinburgh and Glasgow—under a mistaken pretext and by a side-wind. It was said the Bill was a permissive Bill. That was true; but if it became law, instead of removing doubts it would create doubts. The Bill made no provision for female education, even if the University authorities were prepared to avail themselves of the permissive powers granted by the Bill. The demand of women would entail a double staff of Professors, and, as far as Edinburgh was concerned, he believed a hospital would be required to be constructed. The cost of all that would be very great, and he thought it would be far better if the ladies and their friends would establish a female medical college or University in some of the larger towns, where the hospital field was not already occupied by a medical school. The remedy which the women sought was altogether disproportionate to the grievance they complained of. That grievance was not want of instruction. They could get that, on their own showing, on the Continent, or by extra-academical teaching at home; but what they could not get was the status of being recognized medical practitioners under the Medical Act of 1858. By Schedule A of the Act only those who were qualified, and attained the qualification mentioned in the Schedule, could be put on the register. But, surely, that was no reason why they should subvert the constitution of the Scotch Universities. The Legislature could supply a remedy far short of this. Any one, or more of the Medical Corporations mentioned in the Schedule, might be compelled to give licences to women if found qualified after examination; and by such simple means the grievance would, at once, be removed.

DR. CAMERON rose to support the second reading of the Bill. It seemed to him that the arguments which had been brought against it by the two hon. Members who had last spoken were, if properly considered, rather arguments in its favour. The hon. Member for Kirkcudbright (Mr. Maitland) had laid great stress on the composition of the University Court, and had told them that if the powers proposed to be entrusted to it were given, it would be practically placing those powers in the hands of one man, it might be unconnected with the University, and that man the Lord Rector. Now, the fact was that the Lord Rector rarely interfered with the conduct of business of the University. The very case the hon. Member adduced in support of his argument proved that fact. When he showed that Mr. Emerson was brought forward as a candidate for the Lord Rectorship of Glasgow University, he knew that Mr. Emerson could never have undertaken the duties, and never could have outvoted the rest of the Council. The present Lord Rectors of the Scottish Universities were Lord Derby, the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, Dean Stanley, and Professor Huxley. And when the regulations were passed admitting lady students the Lord Rector of Edinburgh University was Lord Moncreiff, and one of the members of the court was the Lord Advocate. Certainly none of them were remarkable for that want of common-sense which the hon. Member appeared inclined to attribute to the average Lord Rector of a Scottish University. The arguments as to the composition of the University Court which had been directed against the Bill were really arguments against the Scottish Universities Act, which it was intended to amend. It seemed to him that the hon. Member had made far too much of the revolutions likely to be effected in Scottish Universities by the Bill now under consideration. All it intended to do was to place the Universities in the position which they occupied before the adverse decision which had been referred to. It was imperative that the law should be declared, and in a sense on which the opinion of the House could be definitely taken upon it. The argument of the hon. Member for South Lanarkshire (Sir Windham Anstruther) was upset by the fact that the adverse decision in the case of these female students against the University authorities was given on the ground that the regulations to admit female students into the Universities were ab initio, ultra vires. Had this not been so, there was not the smallest doubt the Court of Session would have required the University of Edinburgh to provide such facilities for female students as were necessary to enable them to become undergraduates. They were told the Bill proposed to make a corpus vile of the Scotch Universities, in order to extend the system of female education. The answer to that was, that one of the Universities had chosen to make a corpus vile of itself, and another was extremely anxious to do so. When Edinburgh University opened its gates to female students, however, it certainly did not think that it was doing anything to be ashamed of. On the contrary, it boasted loudly of its superiority to vulgar prejudices. In fact, its conduct then, and since, was exactly described by the satirist.

"Like to a dog which lighteth on a bone,
His tail he waggeth, and his joy makes known;
But if the boneum to his tail you tie,
He then is frightened and away doth fly."

The University, however, had found that it was an easier matter to enter into a contract of this sort, than to get rid of it; and it was not until after this system of female education had been carried on for two years that the ultra vires was thought of. Having been discovered, it was important that the defect should be remedied. If Edinburgh would not avail itself of its powers, St. Andrews would. If Edinburgh would not get rid of the injustice and hardship inflicted on these ladies, another University would. Another argument which had been brought against the Bill was that the Scotch Universities were very poor, and that the admission of female students would add a great deal to their expense. But it was one of the most noteworthy features in connection with the history of the student-life of these ladies that they had never gone to the University authorities hat in hand. They had always been prepared to pay whatever expenses might be necessary. Even in regard to the expense of additional class-rooms, the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) last year mentioned that when it was said, as an objection to their admission, that additional class-rooms would be required, a subscription was entered into, and £65,000 was raised to supply the necessary accommodation. There was no need, therefore, to anticipate any of those unconstitutional forms of taxation which had been referred to by the hon. Member for Kirkcudbright. Another argument used last year against the measure was, that Professors would not be able to bear the strain of the extra teaching; but in Edinburgh many of the Professors found time to give separate instruction to ladies, and in Glasgow some of the Professors had to teach in more than one branch of science—the Professor of Natural History being also Professor of Geology, and the Professor of Moral Philosophy teaching also Political Economy, and yet they found time to pursue researches, and to give extra-academical lectures to ladies besides. A system which could not be carried out without quite as much labour as would, if properly directed, afford female students all the instruction necessary to enable them to graduate. However, it was not proposed that any compulsion should be exercised. They were told that if the Bill became law, there would be nothing to prevent the admission of women at one time and their exclusion at another, but all matriculated students would be entitled to enforce the completion of the contract for graduation; and, subject to that, it was a merit of the measure that the authorities would have the opportunity of re-considering any decision they might come to on the subject. He should certainly vote for the second reading of the Bill.

MR. FORSYTH said, that when this question came before the House last Session, in the form of a Motion which could lead to no practical result, he took no part in the discussion. On the present occasion, it had taken the form of a Bill, the second reading of which he should unhesitatingly support. The necessity for legislation on the subject arose in consequence of the judicial construction which had been put upon a certain section of the Scotch Universities Act. In consequence of that decision, Parliament was now asked, not to compel the Universities to admit women to degrees, but to enable the Universities to so admit them, if they thought fit, under certain regulations. What could be fairer than that proposal? The hon. Gentleman who moved the rejection of the Bill (Mr. Maitland) spoke in contemptuous terms of the University Court, and had described the Lord Rectors as men without common-sense.

MR. MAITLAND explained that what he had said was that Lord Rectors were not elected for their common-sense, or their practical acquaintance with the affairs of the Universities.

MR. FORSYTH said, that the hon. Gentleman had referred to Mr. John Stuart Mill and Mr. Ruskin as not distinguished for their common-sense. The Universities of Scotland Act provided that the University Courts should make improvements, provided they obtained the consent of the Council and the Chancellor. Therefore, the whole Governing Body of the Universities had to give their assent before any steps could be taken. What was the interpretation that had been put upon the Act by the Courts of Scotland? In 1869, five ladies entered a University in Scotland. They went through their examinations, and had every reason to believe that they would be admitted to take their degrees. But some time afterwards "a change came o'er the spirit of their dream," for a resolution was come to which practically stopped them from taking their degrees. An appeal was made to a Court of Law which supported the views of the University authorities. The ladies felt, however, that it was a great hardship that they should be prevented from taking a degree by an accidental barrier arising out of the construction of an Act of Parliament. Aberdeen and St. Andrews might be in favour of the admission of women. Edinburgh and Glasgow might be opposed to it. Was it not a hard thing that those Universities which were willing to make arrangements should be debarred from doing so, simply because Edinburgh and Glasgow objected? It was perfectly well known that arrangements could be made for separate classes, especially in the medical department, so as not to mix young men and women together. In the opinion of the lecturers of the University of Edinburgh, there was no reason, in justice or expediency, why women should be refused to practise medicine, especially among their own sex. [MR. LYON PLAYFAIR: Not the University.] It was the lecturers in the School of Medicine in Edinburgh. There was the Petition of 27 Professors of the University—including among them Professors of Rhetoric, Moral Philosophy, Public Law, History, and Mathematics—which said there was a general and growing opinion throughout the community that women who desired to have scientific education ought to have the way open to them, and ought to be encouraged rather than discouraged in their honourable pursuit. He might rest his case in favour of the measure on the fact that this was an enabling Bill, and not a compulsory one. It left things as they were, and merely took away an artificial barrier. If the authorities of the Universities did not wish to admit ladies, they need not do so; but the Bill gave the authorities power to admit them if they thought fit.

Although the Bill, if passed, would open the University examinations generally to female students, permitting them to take all degrees—and he was quite prepared to go that length—he believed they would confine themselves almost exclusively to the study of medicine, and the only arguments that could be maintained against their being allowed to do so must be based either on their intellectual unfitness, or disability on the score of sex. With reference to the first argument, he would only say it reminded him of the argument of the sophist that there was no such thing as motion, and his challenge to the philosopher to prove it. The answer of the philosopher was soloitur ambulando. They had only to look to the Continent of Europe to find that in most European countries—notably in Italy, France, Switzerland, Saxony, Sweden, and Russia—women were admitted to the practice of the medical profession, and many of them had attained to great eminence. Similar instances—few, unhappily, in number—were to be found in this country; but he did not think Englishwomen were so far behind the women of the Continent that they could not practise with equal ability? Take the case of Mrs. Garret Anderson and Miss Blackwell, whose names had been put on the register, and who had a large and extensive practice. It was surely a narrow and bigoted view to take of any question like the present that England and Scotland should refrain from taking a forward movement, until they had received an example and an impetus from foreign countries. In reference to the argument of sex, he said that women constituted the majority of the population, and that in many diseases they shrank from the attendance of a male doctor. In that view, who were more fitting attendants on women than women themselves, if they were properly qualified? The object of the Bill was to enable them to get the best education the Universities could supply with regard to medicine to enable them to practise. If they were fitted intellectually, and not unfitted by sex, what reason could be urged why they should not practise? We lived in times when it was very often most difficult even for an educated man to obtain a livelihood. Nothing could be more painful than to see that when a place, with a very small salary, the duties of which a man of education could perform, was advertised, an immense number applied for that place. But if the competition was intense with regard to posts that men could fill, what was it with regard to women? They formed, as he had said, a majority of the whole population. What were the careers open to women of education? He was not talking of women employed in shops or in factories. He was talking of women of education, who had faculties which God had given them, and which might be employed in a useful and honourable career. We all knew what miserable salaries were paid generally to governesses and schoolmistresses. It might be said that authorship was open to women of education, but a man or a woman that was not a successful writer could not live by authorship. One of the greatest writers of modern times (Sir Walter Scott) said—"Never regard authorship as a crutch, but only as a staff to lean your hand upon." If women of education could earn a livelihood in an honourable and useful career, he thought it was a cruel injustice that that career should not be open to them. For those reasons he would vote most assuredly for the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. BERESFORD HOPE said, he would not have risen at that point of the debate if it had still continued in the hands of Representatives of that part of the Kingdom with which the Bill substantially dealt; but the hon. Member who represented him (Mr. Forsyth), and who was also at the same time one of his (Mr. Beresford Hope's) constituents, had transferred the question to a larger ground, and he had now a right to say a few words on it. His objection to the shape of the Bill this year was an objection which he ventured to bring before the House last year. It was this—that the persons who were engaged in a crusade about a great question had taken advantage of a small issue upon an alleged local grievance to introduce a much wider subject. Why had his right hon. Friend entered into a local squabble? What did his right hon. Friend care particularly about Scotland? Scotland was a very active, intellectual, money-making, and picturesque, not to say patriotic, portion of the United Kingdom; but yet it was hardly fair, under the pretext of a Scotch grievance, that an attempt should be made to snatch a precedent from Parliament on a matter in which the whole of the United Kingdom was concerned. If that were not the case, why should his right hon. Friend rush from the Solent to the Forth? It was really an instalment of the question of women's grievances. His right hon. Friend could hardly conceal from the House, could hardly conceal from himself, that in fighting the battle of these young ladies of Edinburgh he was fighting the battle of a great many other ladies—young, old, and middle-aged—all over the United Kingdom. The question was, the graduation of these ladies in a medical degree, but his right hon. Friend could not conceal from himself, neither could the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth), that the question really was, whether women should graduate in every branch of art and science, and follow any profession. The grievance was not only that ladies had not been able to practise as doctors of medicine. It was equally a grievance that they should not be barristers or attorneys-at-law, and he supposed his right hon. Friend would quite as logically complain that they could not be able to deliver an occasional sermon in Westminster Abbey. What were the arguments employed by the supporters of the Bill? A certain number of women had been disappointed in their hopes of obtaining a medical degree in Edinburgh, and now it was proposed that the Universities in Scotland should not be allowed to make their own terms with these women, but that these women should make their own terms with the Universities, and come in on the basis of an alleged claim. The claim was that as to all professions, all means of livelihood, women should be put on an absolute equality with men; but what he (Mr. Beresford Hope) contended, was not that the career of women was not identical with, but parallel with that of the men. A pamphlet which had been sent from Edinburgh University, which, no doubt, hon. Members had read, appeared to him conclusively to dispose of the grievances which women were alleged to have endured there or elsewhere. The medical profession, which had originally been practised generally as the healing art, had now become divided into numerous special branches, and had ramified among us in a remarkable manner. In old times there was simply the healing man, who was both surgeon and physician. But now one physician might be consulted on one branch of disease, and another man on another branch of disease. Why should not the ambition of those women who desired to do good to their fellow creatures in some branch of this healing art develop their unrivalled speciality in the art of nursing? The duty of prescribing and dictating the course of treatment had, by instinct and common sense, fallen to the share of the men. The carrying out of their orders, the watching and tending of a patient, were admirably suited to the gentle patient temperament of the female sex. Let them follow the example of Florence Nightingale and Mary Stanley, women whose names were household words in the history of the art of healing. Was it not better to be a nurse like one of those noble women than to make one of those she-doctors elbowing their way in the world with a masculine activity? He strongly objected to the Bill, with its slippery enabling faculties, when it was really a pistol put to the head of the Scotch Universities. Talk of enabling—it only enabled a mass of odium to be thrown on the Universities, if they would not accept the invitation of his right hon. Friend and carry out his behest. Let them develop in women that which could be well developed in them—the faculty of nursing. Provide a college of nursing if they liked in London, Edinburgh—where they pleased. Nursing now required many high, not to say scientific, qualities. The Florence Nightingales represented a very different nurse from the Sarah Gamps of former generations. But they put the whole movement in respect to women in a wrong groove if they attempted to make women the rivals and antagonists of men, instead of giving them a specific province founded on the eternal difference between men and women. So much for the question of medical degrees. If they went into the question of the professions altogether, were they prepared to see women admitted to plead in the Law Courts; to have their sisters and daughters engaged getting up evidence for the Divorce Courts, and what not—the necessary work of a solicitor? If they did not do that, the argument of the supporters of the Bill was an unreality, a false security. Either women must go in for everything or nothing. They must fight it out with men, the weakest going to the wall, the strongest to the fore, or no plea remained in favour of the Bill. The impossibility of women being men, and unsexing themselves in the unnatural struggle to follow up the other sex, carried with it the whole state of the case. He contended for the development of womanly careers, for opening up professions to women could follow; but he was utterly opposed to this epicene policy in breaking down the distinctions between women and men and producing this result—that, if all professions be thrown open without discrimination, the strongest would be the winners. The strongest were men. There would be a short, feverish excitement; perhaps, for a time, a sentimental feeling in favour of giving the advantage to the woman who was plucky enough to enter for the stakes. That would not last long; common sense and self-interest would assert their sway. Selfishness would play the part it always did, and men would in a generation or so win all the prizes, and women would find themselves out of those means of livelihood which were acknowledgedly theirs, and which might have been made more strongly theirs. Thus they would lose their real chance—they would be disappointed, baffled, and reduced to a worse condition than they were in now. They would become what they were not now, the failures of the world, because they had not tried to hold their own as women, but had entered into a race in which they were overweighed by those whose strength, both physical and in some respects intellectual, armed them for the battle of life as women by the eternal order of the world were not armed. On these grounds, and as an advocate of the development of a true womanly education, and of the movement to find for women every honourable career for which they were suited, he must give his decided vote against the Bill.

MR. NOEL said, he desired to bring the House back, after the speeches of the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope) and the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr.

Forsyth), to the fact that this was a Scotch question. They had been travelling away to the general rights of women, and their usefulness when engaged in certain occupations. They were forgetting that the Bill exclusively concerned Scotland and the Scotch Universities. He would yield to no man in his interest in the higher education of women, and in his anxiety to promote such an education as would give their intellectual faculties the greatest scope possible, so as to qualify them for any post for which they might be fitted. He even went further, and said he agreed with much that had fallen from the hon. Members, who believed that women might be perfectly fitted for the profession of medicine, and for many other professions. But they were not asked to express an opinion upon that subject that afternoon, and he begged English Members to come back to the thought that they were dealing with a question which touched only the Scottish Universities. Those institutions were more to Scotland than were the English Universities to England; for while the latter attained to a higher degree of scholarship, as far as general education went the Scottish Universities had a much greater influence on the mass of the population than had the English Universities. The House ought, therefore, to be very careful before they did anything that might in the slightest degree interfere with the efficiency of these great institutions. Evidence had been advanced during the debate to show that in the judgment of those who had the best right to form an opinion on the subject—namely, the large majority of the teachers in the Universities concerned—such a Bill as this, if carried, would be injurious to the Universities. The House was bound to turn aside altogether from all the considerations that had been brought before them that afternoon as to the necessity of women being educated in medicine for service in India. He quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Hants (Mr. Cowper-Temple) that there was such a want, a great want, in India. But the subject before them was not the want in India of women who had been educated as medical practitioners. What they had to discuss was whether the Bill would be useful or not? Would it interfere with the prosperity of the Universities to which it related? On that point, the opinion of those most nearly concerned should have the greatest weight. It had been argued that this was merely an enabling Bill; that it forced nothing on the Universities; that it was only an extension of the Act under which they now existed. It was, however, something far more than that. The hon. Member for Kirkcudbrightshire (Mr. Maitland) had pointed out that the University Courts were not the best bodies to decide what, in a case of this sort, was for the best interests of the Universities. But the case would not be the same in the future as if this Bill had not been brought in. It would not be as if this was an old law which had remained dormant, and was only now for the first time brought before the Courts, and not forced on their attention by an Act of Parliament. If the Bill should pass, the Courts that refused the demand which must be immediately made upon them would be placed in a most invidious position. It would become at once a question as to what the Lord Rector would do, for his influence would be very great. Allusion had been made to the late Mr. Stuart Mill. However much they respected that gentleman's memory, and agreed with many of his views, the strength of his opinions on this particular point would have rendered him an unfit guardian for the interests of the Scotch Universities. The House must see with what force Mr. Mill's arguments would have come in the University Court if this Bill had been passed during his Rectorship. The majority of the House were not personally interested in this question, and he therefore begged them to regard it from a Scotch point of view; not to vote as upon the higher education of women in the abstract, or upon the question whether female doctors would be a great benefit or not, but upon the question whether, after hearing what the Members for the Scottish Universities had to advance, they were of opinion that the Bill would be for the advantage of those institutions, whose prosperity they desired to promote. Much as he regretted appearing to oppose the higher education of women, he felt bound to vote against the Bill on the grounds he had stated.

MR. ORR-EWING said, for the most part the remarks of the hon. Member for Kirkcudbrightshire (Mr. Maitland) were directed against the University

Act for Scotland and the constitution of the University Courts. The hon. Gentleman stated that had the hon. Gentleman who introduced that great measure for the establishment of the University Court in 1858 been more conversant with Scotch Universities and education, he would never have ventured to introduce such a Bill. The House would be surprised when he (Mr. Orr-Ewing) informed them that Lord Advocate Inglis was the Gentleman who introduced that Bill—one of the most distinguished lawyers of the day, and now the Lord Justice General; who was educated at the University of Glasgow, and was thoroughly conversant with all the Scotch University arrangements; who carried off the highest prizes there, and thus was enabled to go to Oxford, and there distinguish himself. But more than that, he was supported in his efforts by Lord Moncreiff, a Gentleman whose eloquence had repeatedly charmed that House, and who now stood second in the Court of Session as Lord Justice Clerk. For a Gentleman to pretend that he understood Scotch affairs, and to tell English Members that they knew nothing about Scotch matters, and then to display so much ignorance on the subject, was to him (Mr. Orr-Ewing) very surprising. But besides that, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Maitland) gave an exposition of those University Courts so incorrect that he (Mr. Orr-Ewing) would like to state to the House how really the University Courts were constituted. He had had the honour of a seat in the University Court of Glasgow for six years. He was first elected as the Assessor of the Lord President, who was then Lord Rector, and for the three last years he had been elected as Dean of Faculties by the Senate. The Court consisted of seven members. The Chancellor was the late Duke of Montrose, and he hoped that the hon. and distinguished Baronet the Member for Perthshire (Sir William Stirling-Maxwell) would be his successor. The Lord Rector was a member, and had the power of appointing an Assessor, as also had the Chancellor. The Chancellor made it a point to name as Assessor so distinguished a man that he was made generally the Clerk of the University Court. The Senate elected two members. The Council of Graduates elected one. Now, he said that, although English Members might fancy that was a complicated way of electing a Governing Body of a University, he could inform them that he had never heard a single objection to the action of the Courts in the Universities of Scotland. Nay, more, the Councils of the Universities had lately been agitating for power to elect a greater number of members to the Court, not that they were dissatisfied with the action of the Court, but in order to give the graduates a greater interest in the Universities; and there had never been one statement at any meeting of the graduates complaining of the action of the University Court. The hon. Gentleman said that the Lord Rectors had the sole control of the University Courts, and that they were elected by boys between the ages of 14 and 21. He would say that they had always displayed great wisdom in the decisions they had come to. They had invariably elected men distinguished in science, literature, or statesmanship. It was not correct to say that the Rectors had an overwhelming power in the University Courts. The Lord Rector was satisfied to be represented by his Assessor, and therefore his own power was of the smallest description. Another member of the Court was the Principal of the University, who was always one of the most distinguished men in the country. Although he (Mr. Orr-Ewing) intended to vote for the second reading of the Bill, he did not agree with all the objects desired to be obtained by it. He agreed with that part of it which, from its title, one would suppose was its real object—namely, the granting of degrees to women. But he did not agree with what he considered the more important part of the Bill—namely, that the University Court should have the power of insisting that women should be taught in the Universities. He thought it was a great hardship that ladies who had qualified themselves by education received beyond the walls of our Universities, should not have an opportunity of getting that distinction which alone gave them the power of pursuing the profession to which they wished to attach themselves. They would not get such distinctions on easier terms than men, so why should they be deprived of the privilege? At the same time, he objected to the admission of women as students in our Scotch Universities. In the

Mr. Orr-Ewing

University of Glasgow the number of male students was 1,400 or 1,500. Would it not be dangerous, for the sake of the education of the youths, to introduce a disturbing element into our Universities? Some ladies were so masculine, and some men so effeminate, that between such there was not much danger. But, unfortunately, the mass of mankind was differently constituted. They were all subject to an elective affinity, which was greatly promoted by proximity and opportunity. He was very much afraid that if ladies were admitted, the peace and quiet so necessary for a student's life would be greatly disturbed. That, however, was no argument against their giving women the means of obtaining a degree for which they had qualified themselves by an education beyond the walls of the University. He also objected to the Bill because it gave increased powers to the University Courts. By the 12th clause of the Act of 1858, the University Court had power over the internal arrangements of the University, but it had no power over the modes of teaching or the selection of students, which was left entirely in the hands of the Senate. The Bill was, therefore, by a side-wind, endeavouring to overturn the Act of 1858. It might be an expedient and wise thing to do, but before doing it he thought they should have a Commission of Inquiry on the subject. He also objected to the Bill on the ground of its permissive character, and because it would only change the scene of agitation from Parliament to the Universities if it became law. If the proposals of the Bill were right and proper, they should be made generally compulsory. If they were not right and proper, they would not be made more so by being permissive. However, he was so anxious to give the ladies an opportunity of becoming medical practitioners if they wished—and nobody would be obliged to employ them who did not choose to do so—that he should vote for the second reading of this Bill.

MR. MARK STEWART said, it appeared to him very probable that the hon. Member who had just sat down, although his name was to be found on the back of the Bill, was not very fervent in his desire for its success. For himself, he thought, its permissive character was highly objectionable.

One argument which had been used, and which would probably carry conviction to the minds of many persons outside was, that a number of worthy ladies, who at present had no great object to which to give their attention, would be benefited by the Bill by being enabled to become medical practitioners. He, however, would ask the supporters of the measure, when within the circle of their acquaintance they found many persons who, in case of serious illness, were content to have recourse to a female doctor? In such cases it was not the loving attendant and careful woman who was called into requisition, but a practitioner of the sterner sex. The so-called rights of women were often advocated in that House in a vague fearless sort of way by hon. Members who, in their amiability of character and their desire to do good to others, did not in the least foresee the consequences of their agitation. The House was asked to agree that it would be a good thing to admit females as medical practitioners, and hon. Members would come into the House without having heard any of the arguments and give their votes on the question. That was not the way in which legislation should be carried out. Indeed, he thought they had too much legislation altogether, for they were constantly moving new laws and changing old ones. It was absurd to suppose they could make the education of men and women identical; or that they could fit women, however excellent and deserving, for duties for which the nobler and sterner sex alone were suited. Nature, in the end, would no doubt right herself, but, meanwhile, they should endeavour to avoid making laws which were opposed to Nature. He was willing women should have a good education, and be admitted to the hospitals and infirmaries to perform such duties as they were qualified for; but they could not expect to rank with physicians, whose whole life was generally spent in the study of some particular phase of disease. A great evil in connection with the admission of females to study at the University, if the Bill became law, would be that they would have to meet with the 1,400 or 1,500 young male students. If as had been stated, plenty of money could be found to pay for the medical education of ladies, why not establish a special University, with a special staff of teachers especially for them? and to this he would have no objection whatever. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth) had quoted the opinion of some University Professors in favour of the plan which the Bill sought to legalize; but the gentlemen he had named were only Professors of Rhetoric, History, and Logic; whereas 10 out of 12 of the Professors in the Medical department of the Edinburgh University had signed a protest quite the other way. He should decidedly oppose a second reading.

MR. M'LAGAN said, there were three points to consider—First, was there any demand for female medical practitioners? Secondly, was it expedient to have them? And thirdly, if expedient, how were they to be educated? The existence of a demand was proved by the circumstance that Petitions signed by thousands of persons in favour of the Bill had already been presented to the House, one Petition alone being signed by 16,000 people; whilst it was also a fact that female practitioners had practised in London for some time past with great success. The very existence of the demand made it to his mind expedient that these lady practitioners should be allowed. There were many diseases specially applicable to women, and which could be best treated by female doctors, who were gifted with a keenness of perception which enabled them more readily to discover the diagnosis of such cases. There were many female complaints of a delicate nature, where women either were afraid to call in a medical man at all, or, if they did call him in, did not give him sufficient information as to the symptoms to enable him to understand the case. In such instances female practitioners would be a great public advantage. Then, premising that it was expedient to have such practitioners, he came to the question of how they were to be educated. Surely, if they were to have them at all, they should have them well educated; they should be allowed to enter the first Universities of the land, and if they did not allow them to do so, they must expect to be troubled with quacks and empirics; because if there was really a demand for female practitioners, they would assuredly practice in spite of all opposition. The hon. Member who moved the rejection of this Bill had told them he was a member of the University of Oxford. He (Mr. M'Lagan) had not the honour of belonging to an English University; but he had passed through the whole curriculum of one in Scotland, and was a member of the Council of the University of Edinburgh. If the hon. Member (Mr. Maitland) had been one of the Council, and had received more of his education in Scotland, he would not have fallen into some of the mistakes which had characterized his speech. He had in that speech condemned the University Courts in a manner which his hon. Friend had twice proved to be unjustified. He would not refer to his remarks as to the non-possession of common-sense by their Lord Rectors, but the hon. Member had also, in speaking of the Lord Provost and his Assessor, ridiculed the idea of their being members of a University Court. Did the hon. Member know that the eminence the Edinburgh University had achieved had arisen entirely from the past management of the Lord Provosts and the Town Council? For centuries the University was governed entirely by those municipal authorities, and under their management attained a celebrity it could never in future surpass. It was for that reason that, when some years ago the laws relating to its management were altered, the Town Council was still allowed to send its representatives to the University Court. His hon. Friend thought there would be a great expense attending the admission of ladies to the Universities of Scotland; but if the ladies of England and Scotland wished to enter any of those establishments, and the University Court gave them the privilege, he did not doubt that all the necessary funds would be forthcoming. The hon. Member forgot one point—namely, in the University of St. Andrews there was not a single medical student. [An hon. MEMBER: Two.] At all events, there was plenty of scope there for the ladies. His hon. Friend had spoken as if they were going to make an attack on Edinburgh University; but the hon. Member who introduced the Bill explained that he had his eye on St. Andrews, where there was plenty of room for the ladies without having mixed classes. It had been well remarked that all the principal avenues to wealth and position in England were closed against women. That was a misfortune, inasmuch as its effect was only to drive them to frivolous occupations to which they were so improperly condemned. He trusted that the House would now decide to open the medical faculty to ladies, and give the University Courts the legal powers necessary to that end. He agreed that the Preamble of the Bill was decidedly wrong in stating there was a doubt as to the power of the University to admit women. He thought the fact that they had not such power could not be doubted, and he supported the Bill all the more strongly on this account. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Mark Stewart) complained that they were always making and altering laws. Well, he always understood that that was the business of a Legislative Assembly, and it was certainly for such a purpose that he was sent there, even if the hon. Member for Wigtown was not. The discussion that afternoon had been confined mainly to the question of women studying medicine; but there was almost as much to be said in favour of their being admitted to the Universities to study other branches of knowledge, and it was singular that, although almost every speaker had announced himself favourable to giving higher education to women, yet many of them seemed disposed to shut against them the doors of those great Universities where the higher education was to be obtained. He cordially supported the second reading of the Bill.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR: All the speakers who have addressed the House in favour of the Bill have spoken as if it were limited to a single question—the admission of women to the profession of medicine. That is not the limited scope of the Bill. Its scope is to admit women to instruction and graduation in all Faculties—those of Arts, Law, Medicine, and Divinity. No one could have gathered this from the speeches delivered. My right hon. Friend who introduced this Bill, the Member for South Hants (Mr. Cowper-Temple), gave two minutes to this general part of the subject, and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth) gave exactly half a minute. All the rest of their long and able speeches was devoted to the rights of women to practice medicine. But that is a question for the reform of the Medical Act, not a justification for the abrogation of Royal Charters. I decline to discuss this general question, as I wish to confine my remarks to the essence of the Bill. My right hon. Friend had the advantage last year of a pretty full discussion of this question, and might then have learned some of the difficulties connected with the proposal to admit female students or graduates to the Universities of Scotland. But he takes up the subject again, and introduces a Bill in a spirit of admirable simplicity, as if he approached it for the first time in a state of ignorance of the character and constitution of these Universities. The form and provisions of the Bill make it absolutely useless for his purpose. It begins with a legal misstatement. What does he mean by the words in the Preamble—"Whereas doubts have arisen?" My right hon. Friend has had long experience in Parliament, and he must know that the only interpretation of such words is, that there is a legal doubt and unsettled law on the subject-matter of his Bill. No such expression can refer to the doubts of individuals; it is only applicable to doubts of law. Now, there are no such doubts. The Supreme Court of Scotland has decided that the Charters of the Scotch Universities do not empower them to graduate women, and there has been no appeal against that judgment. Again, who asks this House to legislate on the subject? Certainly not any of the constituted authorities of the Universities. There are three of these—the General Council, or body of graduates; the Senatus Academicus, or body of Professors; and the University Court, a body of half-a-dozen representative men. Has this House received a Petition in favour of the Bill from any single constituted authority of one of the four Scotch Universities? Petitions from some of them have indeed been laid on the Table; but they are all against the Bill. Who, then, are the clients of my right hon. Friend? No doubt, they are the promoters of women's rights, desirous that there should be equal chances of education and graduation for women as well for men. Such a claim is comprehensible, and has no small amount of arguments in its favour. But to advance it openly and honestly, my right hon. Friend ought to have begun his Preamble thus—"Whereas it is right that our national Universities should be equally available to men and women." We could all understand the magnitude and importance of such a claim. But with an honest Preamble of that character, my right hon. Friend knows the House would not listen to him. Parliament is too sensible of its own responsibilities to pass over a question of this character to be legislated upon without reserve by a few gentlemen in a Scotch town. Is the House prepared to pass this great change in our University system on the Bill of a private Member? My right hon. Friend has tried to excite the sympathies of the House for a few meritorious ladies who entered the University of Edinburgh as students, but who were unable to become graduates. Personally, they were most meritorious, and deserved any academical honour. But they entered the University as a mere experiment, the result of which was always doubtful. They were not invited, nor were they desired by the University. With wonderful persistency and courage they knocked at the gates till they secured admission. They had certain sympathizers among a few of the Professors, who made voluntary arrangements for instruction in classes separate from the male students. These Professors had classes of a couple of hundred male students, and at great inconvenience they repeated their courses of lectures to these half-dozen ladies. They made the experiment for one year, and no consideration would induce one of them to repeat it again. The work was found incompatible and injurious to the general work on which they were engaged, and in several cases their health broke down in the attempt. The University Court had authorized the experiment to willing Professors, but all became unwilling to repeat it. Then arose the question of powers of graduation, and the Supreme Court declared that the University Charters did not confer them. The case is a hard one to the individual ladies; but the law is often hard when it is assailed in ignorance. And what does the Bill propose to do? I am quite sure that my right hon. Friend does not in the least know what a strange and arbitrary measure it is, and to what extent it violates all academical safeguards. Graduation in the Scotch Universities is governed by statute (21 & 22 Vict., cap. 82), and by ordinances made under it. Now, by these, no changes—even in regard to existing degrees—can be because it was permissive, for it recognized that the admission of women to medical degrees might be expedient at one University, and not at another. He admitted entirely that if it was the opinion of that House that the doors of Universities should be closed to women, then let them not agree to the second reading of this Bill; because, if they did so agree, it would be held to carry with it the expression of the opinion of Parliament that the medical profession ought to be open to women, that being the purpose of the Bill. It had been said that, provided the Bill was passed, the University of Edinburgh would not see its way to adopt its provisions. That might be so; but did anyone mean to say that the University of St. Andrews would not accept the measure? Both the frame and form of the Bill had been objected to; but these had been decided upon in reference to the history and facts of the claim of the ladies to petition Parliament for justice. From that history, it appeared the University of Edinburgh allowed, if they did not induce, these ladies to enter upon a course of study with the well-founded expectation that they would be permitted to graduate, and he held that the University was bound in honour to carry out the engagement. Instead, therefore, of petitioning against an alteration of the law which would enable them to fulfil an honourable contract, they ought to be the first to come to that House and ask for help in carrying out the contract into which they themselves had chosen to enter. To show that he was not for a moment overstating the case, he would appeal to the words uttered by the Lord Rector of Edinburgh University (Lord Moncreiff), who said he did not think that the regulations of the University Court admitted of any other interpretation than that they enabled women to qualify for graduation. He also said that on the faith of those regulations the "pursuers" went through a considerable part of the prescribed curriculum, and that to deny them the degree which was essential to their entering the profession for which they were studying, on the pretext that no such end was ever contemplated, was in his opinion unjust and unwarranted. The question before the House was this—The Supreme Court in Scotland had decided that the admission of these ladies into the University of Edinburgh was ultra vires, and the Bill proposed to put such admissions within the power of the Scotch Universities. The judicial decision applied to those Universities only, and that was the reason the Bill was confined to them. It contained the minimum of legislation, and if, as he hoped, some of the Scotch Universities acted upon the power it would give them, and came to that House hereafter for a grant in aid to enable them to carry out the power, he, for one, should be quite ready to support such a grant. Believing that the Bill would remedy an injustice and confer a right, the exercise of which would be for the public advantage, he should cordially support the second reading.

MR. ROEBUCK: I approach this subject quite as an outsider, though I have been told since I entered the House that it is entirely a Scotch question. Now, I am not one of those who are friends of what are called strong-minded women, and I rise to take part in this debate simply as a man of the world, asking himself what the Bill does, and whether what it proposes to do will be mischievous to the community or not. This question has been, I am sorry to say, mixed up with various subjects. We have been told a great deal about the Scotch Universities, and of the difficulties which would be incurred by them if the Bill were to pass. In one breath we have been told that the Bill does wonders, and in the next breath we have been told that it does nothing. As I understand the question, in the present state of the world there is great competition amongst us all for the powers of life. That competition greatly exists amongst men, but still more amongst women; and it has been considered by those whose thoughts have been devoted to the good of their fellow-creatures, that some means might be provided for the better employment of women's time, in order the better to provide for their subsistence. Now that is not simply a Scotch question, but a large and general question which I wish to consider. Under the circumstances to which I refer, it has been proposed that women should direct their attention to medical science, so that they may employ the energies and abilities which God has given them for the benefit of their fellow-creatures. Some of these ladies have accordingly endeavoured to learn the science and art of medicine, and have devoted themselves to its study with great intelligence and unwearied industry. They have gone down to Scotland, because they knew that that country has within itself a great teaching body of medical science, and that there they would learn that science well. Well, they go down there, and after being admitted they are all of a sudden met with difficulties, and it is found that their time has been thrown away. They not unnaturally ask their friends—"What are we to do?" Their friends inquire of men learned in Scotch law, and they tell them that what has been determined against them in a Court of Appeal in Scotland if it goes to the House of Lords will be sustained, and that in opposing it, they will probably lose both their time and money; but, they say, there is a power in the world above the final Court of Appeal, and that is the Court of Parliament, and this Bill is brought in to remedy what was said to be the state of the law. Is there anything so wrong, or is there anything to find so much fault with, in the Bill brought in under those circumstances? The Bill enables Scotch Universities to give ladies degrees, if they desire them, and it confers no more nor less than medical degrees on women. What objection is there to that? You may hide it as you like, you may cover it up with fine phrases, you may speak of it in the strong language in which it has been spoken of to-day, but at the bottom the opposition to the Bill is a Trades Union opposition. It is seen by the medical profession that they will have more competition, and that women will be their competitors, and therefore they oppose the Bill. But I would ask, what harm can possibly be done to any class of human beings by granting the powers asked by the measure? What possible danger can arise to any human being from its becoming a law? The answer must be, that there can be none; and if that is so, how can you possibly refuse to pass it? We are here a body of men, deciding upon the interests of the community, and we ought not to forget that in spite of ourselves the feeling of our own sex rises up, and men's interests are preferred to women's interests in spite of all the soothing words we hear, and men will desire to do that for men which they will not do for women, you may talk for a month, you may bring great law to bear upon this question, you may quote names great in history, arts, and science; but you cannot rub out the stain which will be on this House if it refuses to do justice to women, and prevents them using that intellect which God has given them in a fair, honest, and upright manner for their own good.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he must repudiate with scorn all the allusions which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Stansfeld) and by the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, about the opposition to the Bill proceeding from a spirit of Trades Unionism. He could only say that the movement in favour of the medical education of women in the University of Edinburgh took its origin in the Medical Faculty, and that they were the great supporters of the movement; therefore, it was in vain to say that their present opposition now proceeded from a spirit of Trades Unionism. On the contrary, the Faculty engaged to give private lectures to enable ladies to obtain medical education, and they did give the lectures as long as they could do so. It was only after they found that the experiment could not be worked, without exposing themselves to a state of circumstances, which prevented them from doing justice to the ordinary students, that they said they could no longer continue these private classes. Originally, it had been proposed that there should be classes established in which instruction could be given both to male and female students at the same time; but that was at once objected to by the University Court, who said that they would be no parties whatever to such an arrangement. But the present Bill proposed to give power to the Universities in Scotland to give instruction to women, either "in separate classes or otherwise;" so that what the House was asked to sanction was, the education of women and men separately, or together in mixed classes. On that head he would merely quote the opinion of one of the Scotch Judges, who was one of the minority in favour of the ladies. He said he felt it to be his duty to state his decided opinion that the promiscuous attendance of men and women in mixed classes, with concomitant participation in the administration of medical exposition, was a thing so unbecoming and so antagonistic to the delicacy of the female sex, that the law and constitution of the University, which was bound to seek to promote the 'advancement of morality as well as learning, could not sanction or accept such a proposition. And yet one of the provisions of the Bill was, that the Universities might be allowed to give instruction to females in "separate classes or otherwise." He was a member of the University Court at the time the experiment he had referred to was made. When it was found that the Professors were unable to continue their private instruction—which was the only mode of imparting the kind of education required sanctioned by the University Court—and when it was found that the scheme had broken down, an intimation was received to the effect that the ladies claimed to have instruction in the public classes of the University. That being so, it was found that the question required to be tried in a Court of Law, to see whether there was power in the University Court or in any other body connected with the University to confer a degree upon a lady. That was tried, and the result was, that all the Judges came to the unanimous conclusion—and he admitted it was contrary to his first impression (but lawyers often found it necessary to change their first opinion, after hearing the arguments of the case)—came to the conclusion that there was no original right of admission to females in the Universities of Scotland. Such a right did not exist in this country, and it existed only to a very limited extent in any foreign country. That being so, the only argument that could be brought forward by the legal advisers of the ladies was, that their case should be rested on the resolution passed in 1869. The Court with regard to this special ground, held, by a majority, that there could not be any right given to the ladies, because if there was no right of graduation under the original charter, it was ultra vires in the University authorities in 1869 to pass their resolution. Well, this was the position of matters when, instead of making a general proposal with regard to the education of females in England as well as Scotland, a Bill was brought forward for the purpose of enabling all the

Universities in Scotland to give degrees to ladies. The first question that arose was, what was the spirit of this legislation? It appeared to him to be rather intended to enforce a supposed contract with certain ladies which was made by the Edinburgh University in 1869. If that were the spirit of the Bill, why apply the Bill to the other Universities? The Universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen, which he represented, had nothing to do with the contract at all. They never entertained the question, and, therefore, it was he said the Bill went beyond the evil which it was intended to remedy. Then why should the Bill apply to the Universities of Scotland only? It was a great question involving Imperial interests, not only Scotch; and it so happened that all the ladies, with one exception, were English ladies, who went down to Scotland for the instruction they wished to obtain. Why did the Bill not say, then, that the same principle as that suggested for Scotland should apply in England—that in all the Universities of Scotland and England women should be entitled to graduate as well as men? He was not arguing at all, and he said so in a spirit of sincerity, against the higher education of women in Great Britain. On the contrary, he had shown that he was actuated by no motives of that kind by what he had done when he was a member of the University Court in 1869. But they had experience since then, and had found that the difficulties which beset any attempt to educate ladies, especially in connection with Colleges or Universities which were originally intended for male students alone, were too great, and they feared there would be great difficulty in carrying out any such arrangement as that proposed in this Bill. If it was right that this Bill should pass, it should be made compulsory; certainly as regarded those Universities which were parties to this arrangement in 1869. Why, however, should it not apply to the London University, which was not a teaching University, but an examining University; so that none of the difficulties, which arose in the Scotch Universities with regard to the teaching of women, would apply? Why was it not applied to the London and to the Oxford and Cambridge Universities? The Bill, he thought, was an attempt to bring on legislation in favour of women without having duly considered what might be the consequences, especially as regarded those questions affecting the Scottish Universities which had been referred to in such glowing terms by the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Noel). He (the Lord Advocate) prayed that the House would not by its present procedure, introduce that which he feared would be unfortunate, and which would sow an element of discontent and argument amongst those who had the management of the Universities.

Mr. COWPER-TEMPLE, in reply, said, that the question at issue was whether women might have a share in the highest education or be restricted to inferior teaching, and whether they should be excluded by law from the practice of medicine. The House ought not on this question to be guided by the wishes of the majority of the medical profession, and it was just and reasonable that the House of Commons should have regard to the desire, the feelings, and the interests of that large portion of the community who were not represented there.

The House divided:—Ayes 151; Noes 194: Majority 43.

PUBLIC WORSHIP FACILITIES BILL.

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Cavley, Mr. Couper-Temple, Mr. Norwood, Sir Henry Wolff.)

[BILL 22.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Salt.)

MR. MONK said, he must protest against the Bill being proceeded with on that day, as he had been given to understand by the hon. Member who had it in charge that it would not be brought on; indeed, the hon. Member for Stafford had told him he should put it down for Friday next. He admitted that a more convenient course would have been to move the rejection of the Bill on the second reading; but he had been taken by surprise by the statement that the Bill had been so materially altered from that of last year as to induce his hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) to withdraw his opposition to the second reading. He found, however, on examination, that, clause for clause, line for line, and word for word, this Bill and that of last year were identical. He thought the Bill one of a dangerous tendency. It interfered prejudicially with the parochial system of the country, and would introduce strife and animosity in half the parishes of England. It would interfere in the most unjustifiable manner with the rights both of parishioners and incumbents, and place irresponsible power in the hands of the Bishops. He looked upon it also as a great interference with the rights of patrons. It was, in fact, so mischievous in its provisions, that if the hon. Member for Stafford succeeded in carrying it, he would most effectually do the work of the Liberation Society and drive another nail into the coffin of the Church of England. It was desirable to know what the views of the Government were on the subject, and if he met with any support from that quarter, he should take the sense of the House as to the desirability of proceeding further with the measure. He would move that the Committee be postponed for six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Monk),—instead thereof.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he would move the adjournment of the debate. He also had been taken by surprise by the Motion of the hon. Member for Stafford to proceed with the Committee that evening. He certainly understood his hon. Friend had agreed to fix the Committee for Friday next, and had never imagined such a Motion would be made in so thin a House, and nearly at the close of the sitting. He protested against such a proceeding, and must press the Motion for adjournment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Beresford Hope.)

MR. SALT said, he was sorry if his hon. Friends had misundersood him. A few hurried words had certainly passed between himself and them, but he had no idea that he had pledged himself not to bring on the Bill that afternoon. On the contrary, he thought he had been most guarded in his conversation with his hon. Friends, and the impression on his mind was, that he had not definitely named any day on which he would go on with it. Last week he missed a capital opportunity for going into Committee to oblige the hon. Member for Cambridge University. Now the Bill had been placed on the Paper for the present evening not by his own action but by the ordinary Rules of the House. If, however, he had left any false impression on the minds of his hon. Friends, he apologized for it. He thought himself justified in going into Committee on the earliest opportunity ;

but as the Bill was opposed, he would not go on with it now.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

(1873) AMENDMENT BILL.—(Nos. 10-29.)

(The Lord President.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH, who had given Notice to move to insert a clause which would in effect restore to that House the appellate jurisdiction of which it was deprived by the Act of 1873, said, he thought that this would be a convenient time to announce to their Lordships that on mature consideration he thought it would be, perhaps, better to postpone till a future stage the Amendment of which he had given Notice. That future stage, the Report, was not likely to come on until after Easter, and he should reserve his arguments in favour of his Amendment until the Report, when he would propose an Amendment not perhaps in exactly similar terms, but to the same effect, as that of which he had given Notice.

LORD PENZANCE said, that the Amendment of which he had given Notice was only to be moved in the event of the Amendment of the noble Duke being agreed to by their Lordships. If the noble Duke's Amendment was carried on the Report, he should move his Amendment in substantially the same form as it now stood on the Notice Paper.

LORD REDESDALE hoped it would be understood that this postponement meant nothing in the way of an abandonment of the opposition to the taking away their Lordships appellate jurisdiction on the part of either the noble Duke or himself. On the contrary, there was a great change in public opinion on the subject, and he thought the delay was desirable in order that the change might be more strongly developed in favour of retaining that jurisdiction.

House in Committee accordingly.

Amendments made: The Report thereof to be received on the first Thursday after the recess at Easter; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 29.)

House adjourned at half past Five o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPHIC SERVICE (SCOTLAND).—QUESTION.

MR. MARK STEWART asked the Postmaster General, Whether his attention has been called to the desirability of establishing telegraphic communication between New Galloway and Dalmellington; and, if such is the case, what decision, if any, has been arrived at on the subject?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that the Government had had under consideration a proposal to establish such a telegraphic communication, but that they did not think the results of the undertaking would justify the outlay which would be required to carry it out.

INCLOSURE OF WASTE LANDS—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. WALSH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is his intention, this Session, to introduce a measure to amend the Law of Inclosure of Waste Lands?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the subject had been under the consideration of the Government, but that it would depend on the state of Public Business whether he could introduce a measure respecting it this Session. The matter would not be lost sight of.

INDIA—THE BENGAL FAMINE. QUESTION.

MR. T. E. SMITH asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he will, at the earliest possible date, lay upon the Table of the House the Reports on the Indian Famine, with the Viceroy's Minute, with a view to their being printed and circulated?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, all the despatches on the subject of the recent famine in Bengal are in the Library of this House. The date of the last despatch was the 9th of October, 1874, and a final Report was then promised, which has not yet arrived. We have learnt from a recent telegram that the Famine Reports and the Viceroy's Minute thereon have been published in India. When we receive these documents they shall be laid upon the Table of the House.

NAVY—ROYAL NAVAL RESERVE—THE REGULATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. GOSCHEN asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, during the past year any new regulations have been issued with respect to the Second Class Naval Reserve; and, if so, whether he will state their purport; and, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the present regulations of the Royal Naval Reserve?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, that no new Regulations had been issued during the past year, but some of the existing Regulations were now under revision; and as soon as the proposed alterations had been settled, the new or modified Regulations would be laid upon the Table.

AMENDMENT OF THE LABOUR LAWS—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. COWEN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill this Session, to amend the Criminal Law Amendment Act, the Master and Servants Act, and the Law with respect to Conspiracy?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Yes, it is the intention of the Government to deal with this Question in the present Session.

EMPLOYMENT OF CHIMNEY SWEEPERS ACTS—CLIMBING-BOYS AT LIMERICK.—QUESTION.

COLONEL CORBETT asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a letter in "The Standard" newspaper of the 27th of February, wherein it is stated that all the chimneys in Limerick are swept by climbing boys; and whether any steps can be taken to ascertain the truth of that statement, and, if found to be true, of putting a stop to the practice?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that his attention was first called to the letter by the Notice of his hon. and gallant Friend. The statement it contained was considerably exaggerated. From inquiries he had made, however, he had reason to believe that the law prohibiting the employment of boys in chimneys was evaded to a considerable extent in Limerick, and he had directed the Constabulary to put a stop to the practice. The Mayor and magistrates of Limerick had been communicated with on the subject.

NAVY—PROMOTION IN THE MARINE CORPS.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If his attention has been called to a letter in the "Army and Navy Gazette," in which it is stated—

"That the last two officers of Marines who were promoted from Captain to Lieutenant Colonel had each to pay several hundreds of pounds to purchase out the officers by whose retirement they gained their promotion, these not having the slightest intention of going unless they had been bought out, and that these facts are as well known at the Marine Office as on the Marine Parades;"

whether it be the fact that the Captain recently promoted would have reached compulsory retirement in about a month, whereas his promotion gives him six years' longer service; whether it be the fact that the Lieutenant Colonel whose retirement made room for the above promotion did not need to retire for about one and a half years; whether, in the inquiries which have been made, these officers have been required to make declaration on their honour that no inducement was held out to cause the Lieutenant Colonel to retire so long before his time; and, whether in these inquiries the two officers at the head of the Marine Office were asked to declare on their honour that they have no knowledge, officially or otherwise, in this or in any previous case, of the practice of paying officers to retire, and thus depriving the force generally of part of that promotion which the retiring scheme of the late Government was intended to secure?

MR. HUNT: Sir, since the Question of the hon. Member was placed on the Paper I have seen the anonymous letter to which he refers. With regard to the second and third Questions I find that he is correct with regard to the period of the compulsory retirement of the two officers alluded to, and as to the promotion of a captain enabling him to continue in the service. I have not called upon those officers, nor those at the head of the Marine Office, to make any declarations on their honour. There is no regulation in force forbidding Marine officers to offer pecuniary inducements to their seniors to retire, there having been no knowledge at the Admiralty of the gard to the proposed Exhibition in the United States as had been done in other cases, and therefore a Vote would be submitted to the House for a contribution in support of the Philadelphia Exhibition. But Her Majesty's Government were of opinion that this was a sort of system of which it might be possible to have too much. They did not think it would be desirable without notice to put an end to it. They wished, however, to express their own opinion as to whether the present would not be a good opportunity for closing the era of contributions in support of the expenses of Exhibitions in foreign countries, and probably this would be the last occasion on which such a Vote would be submitted by the Government to the House.

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce any measure on the subject of intermediate education in Ireland during the present Session?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that, looking at the great importance of the subject alluded to in the Question of the hon. Gentleman, he thought it necessary that before any proposal was submitted to Parliament in relation to it the matter should be thoroughly considered by the Government in all its bearings. The hon. Member would scarcely be surprised, therefore, to learn that the Government would not be prepared to introduce any measure in reference to the question during the present Session.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS— ANNUAL STATEMENT OF LIABILITIES.

QUESTION.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he will inform the House if, owing to the large amount of the debt incurred by the Metropolitan Board of Works, any steps have been recently taken to induce the Board to prepare and present annually to Parliament a statement of its liabilities; and if, in the event of a refusal on its part to do so, he intends to take any further steps on the subject?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, the accounts of the Metropolitan Board of Works were presented annually to Parliament, showing in a complete form the existing liabilities. There had recently been a correspondence between the Board and the Treasury with reference to further borrowing powers, which the Board desired to obtain. There would be no objection to lay the correspondence on the Table of the House if the noble Lord would move for it.

ARTIZANS DWELLINGS BILL—EXTENSION TO SCOTLAND.—QUESTION.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he intends to extend the Artizans Dwellings Bill to Scotland; and, if so, when he expects to submit the Clauses specially applicable to Scotland?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that it was his intention to extend the provisions of the Bill to Scotland, and the necessary alterations had been framed for the purpose. He thought, however, that it would be best to allow the Bill in its present form to pass through Committee, and then to introduce a fresh Bill applying the same provisions to Scotland.

In reply to MR. CAWLEY,

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he would put down the next stage of the Bill for Monday next; and if, on that day, he saw no reasonable hope of bringing it on at an early hour, he would name another day for its consideration.

NAVY STORES—PRISON LABOUR.

QUESTION.

COLONEL BERESFORD asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether some of the stores for which tenders were invited in the newspapers of February 25th last, including amongst other articles 3,100 yards of cocoa matting, 600 cocoa mats, and over 158,000 brushes and brooms of various kinds, could not be obtained direct from the several Government or other prisons at less cost than that paid to dealers, who buy such-named articles from the prison authorities and sell them to the Government at a profit?

MR. HUNT: Sir, the supply of stores for the use of the Navy from the convict prisons has been the subject of communication between the Home Office and the Admiralty, and is still under consideration.

MEDICAL ACT, 1858—EFFICIENCY OF MEDICAL PRACTITIONERS.

QUESTION.

MR. A. MILLS asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether, under the authority conferred by "The Medical Act, 1858," (21 and 22 Vic. c. 90), it is in the power of the Privy Council to establish one uniform test of efficiency for all medical practitioners in the United Kingdom; or, whether further legislation would be required in order to effect that object?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, in reply to the Question of my hon. Friend, I beg to state that the Privy Council has not the power of enforcing a uniform test. But it may, if set in motion by the General Council of Medical Education, take measures for securing that none of the existing bodies empowered to grant certificates shall do so without securing a proper standard among the candidates, by the process of refusing registration to the candidates certificated by any examining body in default.

MONASTIC AND CONVENTUAL INSTITUTIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the documents and translations relating to the Laws of Foreign States with respect to Monastic and Conventual Institutions will be in the hands of the Members of this House?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, the Papers he had received would be laid on the Table that evening. He hoped they would be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow or on Saturday.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD ACT—ADULTERATION OF BEER.—QUESTION.

MR. PEMBERTON asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce in the Adulteration of Food Act any special provision with respect to the adulteration of beer?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Sir, in answering this Question, I may take the opportunity of stating that I propose to go into Committee on the Adulteration Bill this evening pro forma, in order to introduce Amendments, and the Bill will then be re-printed. I think my hon. Friend will find that the Bill provides everything as regards beer that was provided in the adulteration clauses of the Licensing Act of 1872. Those clauses were omitted from the Act of last Session, to the satisfaction of all parties, in order that the subject might be dealt with, not by special legislation, but under the general law. It is not, therefore, intended to introduce any special provisions applicable to beer into the new Bill, but the language of one of the clauses will be so extended as to secure that a compounded article of food shall be supplied in accordance with the demand of the purchaser.

PROPOSED LIGHTHOUSE ON BURY HEAD.—QUESTION.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he is prepared to give an answer to the petition of Memorialists, presented to him last Session, praying that a Lighthouse should be placed on Bury Head?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, the answer sent by the Board of Trade to the memorialists was that their request would be referred to the Trinity House, who are the proper lighthouse authorities, and without whose concurrence no lighthouse can be erected. The Elder Brethren have answered that they are of opinion that a lighthouse on Bury Head must be looked upon strictly as a local light and of no advantage to the passing trade, though it might be useful as a guide, under certain circumstances, into Torbay.

SANITARY LAWS—UNFIT HOUSES. QUESTION.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK asked the President of the Local Government Board, If the power to prevent the use of houses which, from their contiguity to other houses or from structural defect or other causes, are unfit for purposes of habitation, rests with the Board; and, whether the Board have the power to compel local boards of health and urban sanitary authorities to provide proper hospitals for contagious diseases?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Sir, there are several provisions of law applicable to houses unfit for habitation, but it rests with the local authority, and not with the Local Government Board, to enforce them. As to the second Question of the hon. Baronet, it is within the discretion of local authorities to provide hospitals for contagious diseases, but the Local Government Board has no power to compel them to do so.

THE EXPEDITION FROM BURMAH TO CHINA.—QUESTION.

MR. W. C. CARTWRIGHT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether there is any foundation for the report that the expedition which had been sent out with a view to opening up a mail route from India to China had been encountered by Chinese forces?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I regret, Sir, to state that a telegram received yesterday at the India Office informed us that the expedition alluded to by the hon. Gentleman was attacked on the 22nd of February by several hundred Chinese and by a large number of the hill frontier tribes at a place called Manwine, in Chinese territory. The main body of the expedition escaped with a loss of three wounded; but I am afraid they have lost the greater part—if not the whole—of their baggage. I regret to add that Mr. Margary, a distinguished consular officer, who joined the expedition at Bhamo, having made his way overland from Peking, was, with five Chinese servants, surrounded and killed.

PRIVILEGE—DR. KENEALY—REFLECTIONS ON A MEMBER OF THIS HOUSE. OBSERVATIONS.

DR. KENEALY: I rise, Sir, to ask the hon. and learned Member for Poole (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) a Question of which I have given him Notice—and, having seen the hon. and learned Gentleman in the House, I presume he is in his place. I have read in a newspaper called The Isle of Wight Observer, of the 27th February, a report of a speech purporting to have been made by the hon. and learned Gentleman, which report I shall now read to the House. It is as follows:—

“The Hon. Evelyn Ashley said they might hear, perhaps, among their Conservative friends a moral drawn from a notable election which had recently attracted considerable attention—that for Stoke-on-Trent. (Applause.) He had no doubt a great deal might be said to them about that, but he would only give them one answer, which was that it was the Conservative Party and not the Liberal Party which swamped the constituencies by the Reform Bill which brought in such a large body of the residuum. (Hear, hear.) The whole history of that election in his opinion was this:—Three candidates went down, and the man with the glib tongue got in. (Laughter.) The fact was that where they had a very large working-class constituency they must no longer trust to the old party points, but they must, if there were a man with a ready tongue to tell his own story, take care that somebody else came down on the other side who could tell the other story. (Applause.) The history of the Stoke election was simply this, that the working men of Stoke only heard one side of the question, and therefore he did not blame them for what they did. He blamed those who had the management of the election, and who did not take care that the gentlemen who opposed Dr. Kenealy were men who had the power and the will to come forward on the platform and state their own side of the question. Had that been the case Dr. Kenealy would not have been a member of Parliament. He was sorry for this, because Dr. Kenealy was where he was not fit to be. (Hisses.) He did think the man who put a witness in the box whom he knew to be a false witness was not fit to be there. (Hisses, and a Voice. ‘How about the Pittendreich forgeries?’) Well, he thought it best to go to another subject.”

I wish to ask the hon. and learned Member for Poole whether that report is substantially correct.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: I wish to begin by correcting the hon. and learned Member for Stoke in what he has said about giving Notice of the report to which he has called attention. He has done no such thing. I have now for the first time heard that report read by him from a newspaper. The only notice that I have received is, “I am desired by Dr. Kenealy to say that he will bring before the House on Wednesday your speech as reported in The Isle of Wight Observer of the 27th of February, 1875.” But I do not complain of this—because a man ought always to be ready at a moment’s notice to answer for anything he may have said in public. Before I proceed any further—and what I say shall be a very few words—I wish to express to the House my very deep regret that anything that I may have unwittingly done has brought on them the annoyance, at the beginning of this Session, of another personal explanation. I can assure the House that nothing I can do shall be wanting to make the solution of this difficulty—if there has been any breach of Parliamentary privilege, of any Rule easy to the House, I shall or put myself entirely at the disposal of the House and at its order. In answering the Question put to me, I say that that report, as read by the hon. Member, is virtually correct. But I must claim the indulgence of the House for a few minutes, while I tell them the circumstances under which the speech in question was delivered, and the exact words I used, so far as my memory serves me—

DR. KENEALY: I rise to Order. I apprehend, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. and learned Gentleman is not entitled to discuss a Question. I intend to conclude with a Motion, and upon the discussion of that Motion the hon. and learned Gentleman will have a full opportunity of giving his explanation. The only matter before the House, I submit, is one of Question and Answer.

MR. SPEAKER: As the House is aware, the House is specially indulgent in a matter of personal explanation. The hon. Member for Poole is now entering into a personal explanation of the words attributed to him in the Question of the hon. and learned Member for Stoke, and is perfectly in Order.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: It was impossible for me to answer the hon. Member for Stoke Yes or No. It was absolutely necessary for me, if I answered the Question to which he desired answer, to request the indulgence of the House while I briefly recounted what I did say and what really occurred. I was attending an anniversary dinner of the Liberal Working Men's Association at Ryde, and among other topics I alluded to the Stoke election, and I virtually did say, so far as I can remember, almost exactly what the newspaper report attributes to me. When I came to the point when I said, "If the working men at Stoke had heard both sides of the question, I venture to believe the result would have been different," strong expressions came from a small lot of persons to my right. I turned round to this small lot, and with some indignation I said these words—not the words reported in the newspaper—"What! do you think that man would make a good representative who is Editor of The Englishman and who put a false witness into the box?" I own that I said these words hastily, but I said them on the spur of the occasion, and not without a certain underlying feeling and conviction that it is necessary in these days to speak out the truth now and then, even at the risk of encountering annoyance and trouble afterwards. Well, as to the first part of that assertion, I suppose it has a basis broad enough to support it, and that the hon. and learned Member will not rise in his place and deny that he is Editor of The Englishman. As to the second part, I would merely say this—that the hon. Member has only himself to blame, if the opinion I expressed was the opinion which I had formed. I wish to say no more about it than this—that I was not speaking from mere hear-say or from the talk of the streets and newspapers, but from what had come under my own personal observation. As a member of the Oxford Circuit, I was present at a meeting of its members on whom devolved the painful task of deciding whether the hon. Member should be removed from the list of the bar mess; and the hon. Member did not appear at that meeting to give any explanation of points which demanded explanation. But, after all, the question before us to-day, and the question on which I submit myself to the House is, whether I was justified or not in speaking as I did. I assure the House that I shall be ready to make any reparation which is in my power if I have exceeded the privileges of Parliament. But I venture to ask the House, before they proceed to decide upon this question and, so to speak, to pronounce sentence upon me, to remember that one of the most admired maxims of our Courts of Equity is that he who comes to seek redress must come with clean hands. Will it be said in the High Court of Parliament, which is more abundant in its remedies than the High Court of Chancery, that it does not signify in what condition the hands are that are extended to claim protection and redress? I humbly submit to your decision. I can only state that in what I did say I spoke with no personal feeling, for I have never been in collision with the hon. Member for Stoke, but merely from a keen sense and jealousy of the dignity of the House, which, though a young Member, I have learned is a desirable quality. I am ready to bow to the decision of the House, and to make any retraction and any apology I am called upon to do.

DR. KENEALY: I will not discuss this matter now, but I will give Notice that on Friday next—that is, to-morrow

—I will call the attention of the House to the speech of the hon. Member for Poole as reported in The Isle of Wight Observer of February 27, 1875. With reference to the hon. Member's complaint that I did not give him notice, I submit that the letter which he read was notice.

MR. LOWE: As I understand—

MR. SPEAKER: I wish to point out that there is no Question before the House. The hon. Member for Stoke has given Notice that he will bring this matter under the consideration of the House to-morrow. That being so, there is no Question before the House.

MR. LOWE: I intended to point out that this is a Question of Privilege, and the question is whether the hon. Member can in this manner, at his own will, adjourn a question of Privilege. We give precedence to a question of Privilege in order that it may be at once heard and decided. After having heard an answer to his Question, the hon. Member for Stoke does not make a speech, but informs the House he will adjourn the question of Privilege till to-morrow. Is that a course which the House will approve? If I am at liberty to discuss the question whether this is a breach of Privilege, I am ready to do so.

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman will place himself in Order if he concludes with a Motion. [Cries of "Move."]

MR. LOWE: I move that the House do adjourn. I do not wish to say a word on the question at issue between the hon. Member for Stoke and the hon. Member for Poole. What I want to point out—because I feel it very strongly—and the more I think of it the more I am afraid that we are gradually embarking in a very dangerous course. The matter has grown upon me by degrees. I cannot say I saw it when the mischief first began; but I think it my duty, as I have a very strong opinion on the matter, to lay the opinion I have formed before the House. There is no doubt about our Rules and Orders with regard to debate. We have a Rule that no Member shall be guilty of indecorum or use language offensive to another Member. If a Member uses such language, that language may be taken down, he may be censured, and the House may do what it thinks proper. That is evidently a Rule strictly limited to the order and decorum of our debates in this House. It is evidently pointed at our order and procedure. We do not inquire in such a case whether the statement is true or otherwise. The whole object contemplated in that Rule is simply the order and decorum of our proceedings. If a Gentleman makes use of offensive or unbecoming language—although what he says may be perfectly true, he nevertheless infringes the Rule, and makes himself properly liable to the censure of the House. What appears to me to have happened and to be happening is this—this Rule which, within certain limits, seems perfectly wise and correct, we are now gradually and almost imperceptibly extending, and the House is making a most injurious and galling instrument of oppression for itself. Take as an illustration of what happened a few days ago in the case of the hon. and learned Member for Frome. He was called to account for language spoken by him five months ago, and his language was read from a newspaper. That having been done, we glided somehow or other almost imperceptibly into a course of proceeding which we should have adopted had that hon. Gentleman made use in this House, in the course of debate, of the language he was charged with having made. That is to say, we were guilty of the anomaly—if not the absurdity—of having language “taken down” which was read to us out of a printed newspaper, as if it had been used in this House. That process was meant to be applied only in the heat of debate, when language may have been used, in order to prevent controversy afterwards arising as to what had really been said. Happily, in that case, the hon. and learned Gentleman made an apology, and nothing more was done on that point; but I cannot help feeling that that was the beginning of something which, if we go on, will become very serious indeed. To allow Members to feel themselves aggrieved by language used outside the House, in public meetings or otherwise, to come to this House and interrupt our proceedings, and to call upon the House to treat as a sort of criminal the person against whom they bring their charges, will in my opinion be a most dangerous innovation. I say an “innovation,” because, having taken the trouble to look into the precedents, I am unable to find any precedent of a Member of Parliament being brought up for a breach of Privilege before the House for any statement he had made at a public meeting against another Member of Parliament, with a single exception. There was the case of Mr. O'Connell, who stated that an Election Committee, which was a body appointed by the House, with high judicial functions, had grossly perjured itself. The matter was brought before the House, and the House held—as I think most properly and justly—that that was language which could not be tolerated, and Mr. O'Connell was publicly reprehended by the Speaker. But that is no authority whatever for a Motion like this made to-day. There is a wide difference between the two cases, as the House will see. The hon. and learned Member for Poole charged the hon. Member for Stoke with having done something not in his capacity of Member of this House, but in another capacity. There is no occasion for the interference of this House. It is a matter of slander. The hon. Member for Stoke is charged, no doubt, with an indictable offence; but if he wants redress, he can seek it in a Court of Law. The hon. and learned Member for Poole will then be able to plead justification; whereas, if the charge is brought before this House as a matter of Privilege, we cannot go into the question of its truth—we can only look at the question whether it was proper for the hon. and learned Member for Poole to speak in such a manner of a Member of this House. Thus the merits of the question will be entirely put aside, and we shall have to adjudicate on an issue without having any means of information. Another thing I would point out. If we do not stop short in the course upon which we are entering, another result will be that, whereas every other man in the Kingdom will be at liberty to discuss with perfect freedom the words and the conduct of Members of Parliament, Members of Parliament themselves will be the only persons unable to do so. They will be placed under restrictions under which none of the rest of Her Majesty's subjects lie. Therefore, I do earnestly entreat the House to watch these proceedings, by which matters which are not matters of Privilege are sought to be dealt with as matters of Privilege, by which our proceedings are interrupted and irregularities introduced, and by which hon. Gentlemen gain the power of forcing themselves on the attention of the House without going through the form of giving Notice, which all other persons are subject to. I beg the House to consider these things carefully, and think whether they ought not rather to draw back than to go forward in the course they are pursuing; that they will come to the conclusion that if persons do speak of Members of Parliament in a manner which is disagreeable to them at a public meeting out of this House, and having no connection with this House, we will not throw our sword into the scale, but will leave the Members of Parliament who are spoken against to do what they ought to be well able to do—to fight their own battles. I am conscious of having taken very little part in discussions respecting the Rules and Privileges of this House, and it may be that I may have been guilty of some presumption in interfering on the present occasion. It appears to me, however, so clear that we are entering upon a perilous course, and that this is a matter that requires watching, that I could not rest satisfied without laying my views before the House. There can be no objection, if an hon. Member feels aggrieved with anything which may have been said against him, that he may offer a personal explanation to the House. There was no objection to this in the case of Sir James Graham, when charges were brought against him by Mr. Ferrand. Sir James Graham brought the question before the House, a long debate ensued, and Mr. Ferrand was censured; but the affair was not treated as a matter of Privilege. That is the distinction. The House should always be ready to hear complaints from its Members, but it ought not to permit matters that are really not matters of Privilege to be foisted upon it under the all-atoning name of Privilege, and thus interrupt the order and regularity of our proceedings. I beg, Sir, to move the Adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 “That this House do now adjourn.”
 —(Mr. Lowe.)

MR. DISRAELI: It is well, Mr. Speaker, that the House should remember that it is in the power of the House to decide what is Privilege; and although we do always listen with respect to any opinion which may be expressed from the Chairs, still that is a function which this House never must give up. With regard to the question which is before us, it appears to me that it would be convenient for the House to decide that question at once. We have already had two discussions on personal complaints, and it is intolerable that we should have another. Personal attacks are not necessarily questions of Privilege. To make it a question of Privilege a personal attack must be made in this House, or it must be made against a Member of this House in his capacity as a Member of this House. Now, the question which was raised the other night with regard to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Frome (Mr. Lopes) was one which I felt at the time was to a certain degree strained; still it was founded on a principle. An hon. Member opposite complained that the conduct of himself and of other Members of this House had been attacked out of this House, and that they had been held up to public reprobation for their conduct as Members of Parliament. I expressed my own personal feeling on the subject. I said at the time I thought the matter was not of that significance that it need have been noticed, but that it afforded some foundation for an appeal to the House and the Chair. Indeed, as long as the precedent of the O'Connell case is on our Journals, it is impossible to say there was no element of Privilege introduced into the question with reference to the hon. and learned Member for Frome. But in the present case I do not find even the shadow of Privilege. The hon. and learned Member for Stoke comes forward and says he has been accused, outside the House, of conduct which certainly is as disgraceful conduct as can well be conceived. But the words were not spoken in the House of Commons, nor at that moment was the hon. Member for Stoke a Member of the House of Commons. Therefore, I think it is very clear that the course which the hon. Member for Stoke should take, if he be suffering under this criticism and these allusions, is to appeal to those Courts of Law with which he is so intimately acquainted. In a book of authority with which we are all familiar, I find the principle well laid down. In this work on The Law and Usage of Parliament it is written:—

“Libels upon members have also been constantly punished: but to constitute a breach of privilege they must concern the character or conduct of members in that capacity. Aspersions upon the conduct of members as magistrates, or officers in the army or navy, or in private life, are within the cognizance of the courts, and are not fit subjects for complaints to the House of Commons.”

Sir, under these circumstances, my opinion is that we ought to make some Motion which would show the feeling of the House upon this subject. If the right hon. Gentleman opposite will withdraw the Motion for Adjournment I will propose a simple one which I think would express that feeling. I shall move that having heard the charge and the defence we do now proceed to consider the Order of the Day.

DR. KENEALY: Sir, I cannot disguise from myself the fact that this House is now inclined to act rather upon feeling than upon justice. [“No, no!”] I state this without having any desire to wound the feelings of any hon. Gentleman. With the highest respect for this great Assembly—which I shall always treat with the deference it deserves—I respectfully ask from the House a hearing of the reasons why I think the present Motion is not a Motion which ought to be pressed, and why I ought not to be deprived of the Privilege appertaining to Members of the House ever since the law of Breach of Privilege was known. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Poole substantially admits the correctness of the report. He denies it, however, in some very material particulars. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) says the issue between him and me cannot be tried here. I respectfully controvert that position. It is perfectly competent for the House to inquire whether the version of the speech published in the newspaper or whether the hon. Member's version of it now is a correct one—for there is a most material difference between the two. In the newspaper report, which the hon. Gentleman never contradicted or set right, he distinctly charges me with conduct unworthy of a gentleman—unworthy of a man who represents as intelligent a constituency as there is in England, and who is proud to represent that constituency. He represents me as wilfully and knowingly putting into the witness-box a witness whom I knew to be false. That is his speech. To-day he alters it, and says I put in the box a witness who was false. There is a material and a vital difference between the two statements. The most honourable man at the Bar might unwittingly put in the box a witness who was false. But the hon. and learned Member for Poole, at a time when every newspaper in the country was fulminating anathemas against me, said I put a man into the box knowing him to be a false witness; and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London thinks it right and honourable to tell you—what he would not have told you if he had been well acquainted with Parliamentary history—that we have not the means of trying that fact here. We have the means, and I ask the House to grant me the means. The hon. Member for Poole puts into his speech, as he now delivers it, something about The Englishman. Well—when anyone who has a right to do so questions me about The Englishman he shall get his answer. The hon. Member for Poole has never been mentioned in its columns, and he has no right either here or anywhere else to question me about The Englishman. Let any man who has been mentioned in that paper question me and I will answer him. And now I come to the speech of the right hon. Member for the London University. I have followed exactly the precedent in the O'Connell Case. Lord Maidstone asked in his place whether the report of Mr. O'Connell's Dublin speech was substantially true or not;—he said it was;—and Lord Maidstone then did what I have done—gave Notice, in almost the same terms as I have used, that he should bring the matter before the House. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) says my conduct is without precedent. I can only say, then, that his reading in Parliamentary and Constitutional history is not as extensive as I imagined it was. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that if Motions of this kind are to be allowed, the matter will become serious. Sir, it is a most serious matter already—and cannot be more serious than it is—that any hon. Member of this House should get up in a public meeting, called by himself or his friends, and dare to denounce the conduct of another hon. Member as ungentlemanly, dishonourable, and disgraceful. That is what has become serious; and if we wish to preserve inviolate the character and honour of this House we must put down with a strong hand what I will venture to call a system of American rowdyism. A few nights ago we heard that an hon. and learned Gentleman had charged a body of Irish Members with dishonourable conduct. Now the hon. and learned Member (Mr. E. Ashley) ventures to charge me with dishonourable conduct. This is a most serious matter, and I am perfectly astounded at the strange obliquity of vision which prevents the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) from seeing the thing in this light. He has addressed to the House an ad captandum argument—that this Motion of mine is calculated to interrupt our Business. Sir, I say it is a most proper interruption of Business; because life in the House of Commons will become intolerable if one Member is entitled to assail the private or professional character of another Member on public platforms without being amenable to the censure of the House; thus putting the libelled and slandered man, who has given him no provocation, to the necessity of going to the Courts of Law for redress. I was sorry to hear the First Lord of the Treasury make an allusion to me in reference to these Courts of Law. As he challenges me, I will tell him that I have no respect for our Courts of Law, and will never seek a remedy in one. If the right hon. Gentleman knew as much about these Courts as I do, probably he would not recommend any man to seek justice there. I think, too, such a recommendation came with exceeding bad grace from the First Lord of the Treasury, because his avocations during the greater portion of his life have been dedicated chiefly to poetic fiction and romantic fable. ["Order!"] If I am out of Order, and you, Sir, so decide, I will bow with humble deference to your decision; but I entirely dissent from the notion that any private Member is to call me to Order unless backed by you, Sir. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) has thought fit to call this a dangerous innovation. I respectfully dissent from that opinion. It is not an innovation. It is simply asking this House to do what it has never hitherto refused to do—resent attacks made upon one of its Members in his Parliamentary capacity. I believe the First Lord of the Treasury is entirely mistaken in the construction he has put on the passage of Sir Erskine May's book. I shall read the passage to show he is entirely wrong. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for London University says—and it seems to me a sophism unworthy to be presented here—that every man, according to constitutional practice, is entitled to discuss the conduct of a Member of Parliament, and that it would be a hard thing if a Member of Parliament were alone precluded from exercising the right. Whoever wanted to interfere with the right of discussing the conduct of Members of Parliament? What I want to put down is the practice for one Member of Parliament to slander another behind his back. That is not fair discussion. It is slander; and I want to put down slander if I can. ["Oh!"] I want to put down a system which, if persisted in, will render existence in this House perfectly intolerable. I disregard the right hon. Gentleman's sneer that I wanted to force myself upon this House. I did not mean to do so; I do not want to do so; and I think it is extremely ungenerous and ungracious on the part of a Member of his experience and standing to fling that taunt at me upon the first occasion when I have had the honour of addressing this House. If young Members—young, I mean, in their standing here—are to be put down and sneered down in this way, I can only say that it is an entirely different state of things from that which hitherto has been the time-honoured custom of the House of Commons, where I have always understood that young Members are rather encouraged. At all events they are not, and I respectfully submit ought not, to be put down by sneers of this description. The First Lord of the Treasury read a passage from Sir Erskine May's book—I shall show that he was entirely mistaken in his interpretation of it. Here is the passage—

In what capacity did the hon. and learned Member for Poole mention me except as a Member of this House? In no other capacity whatever. He commented upon the conduct of the constituency of Stoke-upon-Trent in returning me to Parliament, and said I was not fit to be in Parliament. What is that but commenting upon my conduct as a Member of this House? ["No!"] Some Gentlemen may entertain a different opinion, and they have the advantage of the support of the First Lord of the Treasury; but anybody who fairly reads the passage in the speech of the hon. and learned Member will see that it refers to me as a Member of this House, and in no other character. The right hon. Gentleman proceeded further, and read from Sir Erskine May's book what he conceived to be his great point—"Aspersions upon the conduct of members as magistrates"—I am not aspersed as a magistrate—"or officers of the army or navy, or in private life, are not fit subjects for complaints to the House of Commons." Of course not, because these are reflections upon the conduct of Members in an entirely different capacity from that of Members of this House. The whole tenour, however, of the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Poole shows that he attacked me in this character; and his attack was none the less forcible and none the less a breach of Privilege because I was not sitting in the House at the time, though I was actually a Member. I say, therefore, that his speech, fairly and judicially construed, is an attack upon me as a Member of this House. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) invites me to defend myself. Now I have always understood it to be the law—and I should have thought the right hon. Gentleman recollected enough of law to know—that it is the accuser who establishes his charge and not the man accused who defends himself. I ask the House, then, to call upon the hon. and learned Member (Mr. E. Ashley) to establish the charge he has made. That was what was done in Sir James Graham's case. Mr. Ferrand was there called upon to establish the charge he had made against Sir James Graham; and as he failed to do so the House did what I respectfully ask it to do in this case—it branded him as a calumniator and a slanderer. To me it is a matter of indifference whether the House so brands the hon. and learned Member or not. My character for honour is safe notwithstanding his attacks. He has made an attack upon me which no one ever ventured to make before. I should have thought the whole dictionary of attack had been exhausted by the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench when he summed up against me. ["Order" and "Question!"] I am keeping to the Question. Every form of attack which could possibly be made upon me by any person was contained in that memorable summing-up. ["Question!"]

MR. BROMLEY-DAVENPORT: I rise to Order, and ask you, Sir, whether the hon. Member is in Order in reference to the Courts of Law and the Lord Chief Justice.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is approaching the limits of propriety which confine hon. Members, in speaking, to that which is relevant to the subject in hand. I shall not interrupt the hon. Member, but I hope he will be careful to confine himself to that which is relevant.

DR. KENEALY: I can assure the hon. Gentleman opposite that if he had only restrained his vehement impatience, he would have found that I was saying nothing out of Order. I repeat, Sir, with confidence, though with entire readiness to bow to your judgment, that everything which could be possibly brought against me as counsel in the Tichborne Case was brought against me in the summing-up, and that no one ventured to charge me, as the hon. and learned Member for Poole has done, with any guilty knowledge in the production of this witness. The Benchers for Gray's Inn have brought charges against me, but they never suggested that I was guilty of that charge. It is, therefore, an atrocious thing that, when neither the Judges of the land, nor the Benchers who carefully considered the whole of my proceedings in that case, thought it right or expedient to make such a charge against me, the hon. and learned Member should be the first to do so. Sir, I never saw that witness until weeks and weeks after he had been examined. Long before I called him, the witness had been examined by one of the most eminent Queen's Counsel at the Chancery Bar, assisted by another counsel of almost equal eminence and experience; and, having placed myself in their hands, those two gentlemen assured me and my junior and Lord Rivers, who personally interested himself in this great case, that they were as perfectly certain of the truth and bona fides of the witness as they were of their own existence. Nay, further,—when I rather shirked the possibility of danger in calling this witness, they were willing to take upon themselves the responsibility of advising me to do so. I will furnish the First Lord of the Treasury with the names of these two counsel. After taking all the pains I could to discover whether the witness was reliable or not—backed as I was by the authority of two gentlemen of the highest eminence in the Court of Chancery—it is too bad that the hon. and learned Member for Poole should think himself justified in levelling at me so unscrupulous a charge. I shall not detain the House any longer. I am perfectly indifferent as to the decision it may come to—whether it gives the go-by to the question or otherwise. I have no doubt the sorry calumny against me will fall to the ground—that it will recoil upon those by whom it is thrown. Of one thing I am certain—that any slur which that decision may be supposed to cast on me I shall shake off as the lion shakes the dewdrops from his mane. [Laughter.] I am glad I have afforded the House an opportunity for so much innocent mirth. I am not at all angry; I assure you I am quite satisfied with the reception the House has given me. I know the vast amount of prejudice which may exist against me in the minds of many hon. Members. I believe before many months elapse I shall show that I do not deserve to be regarded with that prejudice, and I trust I shall never do anything which shall make a single Member of the House of Commons ashamed of my presence.

MR. BRIGHT: I wish, Sir, to make a few observations before any decision is come to on the subject before the House. I agree in the course proposed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli). It is founded upon his agreement with the arguments used by my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London. I think every man in the House will feel that if in future Sessions we are to adopt the course taken during the short period of this Session, we shall have a good deal of work before us—therefore, I shall be entirely willing to support the Prime Minister in the course he has recommended. There is one other observation which I wish to make. The hon. and learned Member for Poole has fairly and exactly repeated all that he said on the occasion referred to, and I do not think it differs much in effect from what he was charged with having said by the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent. But no one can deny that it was a very serious charge to make. It was however made with reference to a time when the hon. Member for Stoke was not a Member of this House. He was a Member when the words were spoken, but they did not refer to anything which had occurred since his election, to what he had done as a Member of Parliament, but to something done by him as a barrister in a Court of Law. Still, the charge was a very serious charge—one of the gravest and the worst that could be made against any man, and one that might be fatal, if it were true, to the character of a barrister pleading in a Court of Justice. I think, then, after the statement which the House has heard from the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent, it will probably feel more than it did at the beginning of this discussion that the charge ought not to have been made. Of course, I am not about to say in the slightest degree whether the charge is true or untrue; but after the answer which has been made by the hon. Gentleman who has so recently come into the House, I do not think that justice would be done to him or the House be treated fairly unless the hon. and learned Member for Poole were at least to say this—that the charge was one which he made hastily, on the spur of the moment, that he regretted it had been made, and that he had no objection, in deference to the feeling of this House, to withdraw it.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: I feel it will be necessary to say a few words in the position in which I am placed. I do not wish the House to assume that I should make so serious a charge in an inconsiderate manner. I do not feel that I am able or that it would be right in me to enter on the question now; but in making that charge I assure the House I was acting upon knowledge which was not trifling, and which was contradistinct to something that was said with reference to the conduct of the junior in the case to which the hon. Member for Stoke has referred. But, at the same time, I feel that, however much I may be convinced of the truth of the charge, such a charge ought not to be made at a political dinner. I therefore feel that it would be consistent with my feelings of honour and truth that I should so far follow the course suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham as to say that I regret much having made the accusation on that occasion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. DISRAELI: I do not think, Sir, the proceedings of this evening should terminate exactly in this manner. This question has been brought under our notice as a question of Privilege, and it is only with reference to that issue that I thought it my duty to appear in the matter. I believe we may assume that the general opinion is now that this is not a question of Privilege. The hon. Member for Stoke who has had an opportunity of addressing the House—and he has had no right to complain of the manner in which his speech was heard—did not meet the objection I made, that the comments to which he referred were not made upon his conduct as a Member of Parliament, and that the House could not touch anything except what referred to the conduct of Members of Parliament. Then the whole argument of the hon. Member was founded upon the precedent of the case of Mr. Ferrand and Sir James Graham. I remember that case very well, but it would not bear out the course adopted on the present occasion. That was not a case of Privilege; and if the hon. Member had chosen to bring his case before the House according to that precedent, he would have received the same fair treatment which was accorded at that time to Sir James Graham, and the matter might have been generally discussed. But the hon. Member has brought forward his case as a question of Privilege, and it is as a question of Privilege only that we ought to consider it to-night. It was open to the hon. Member to follow the precedent of Sir James Graham's case if he thought fit to do so—but he did not. The question of Privilege is so high and delicate a question that it ought never to be approached without deliberation. Therefore, to mark our sense of the inconvenience of the course pursued, I think it my duty after this discussion to move that the House, having heard the statement of the hon. Member for Stoke and the explanation of the hon. Member for Poole, do now proceed to the Orders of the Day.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Entirely concurring with what was said by my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London and the right hon. Gentleman opposite, I rise to second the Motion. It has been pointed out that the words complained of were not spoken of the hon. Member for Stoke in his capacity of a Member of Parliament. I will go even further; it does not appear to me that the hon. Member, if he had been a Member of the House at the time, could complain of what had been done. The act to which reference had been made not having been committed in his capacity of Member of Parliament, the question would not become a question of Breach of Privilege.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That this House, having heard the statement of the honourable Member for Stoke and the explanation of the honourable Member for Poole, do now proceed to the Orders of the Day."—(Mr. Disraeli.)

MR. ROEBUCK: There is one word I wish to speak. I suppose the object of the right hon. Gentleman is that the House should mark its opinion in some respect with regard to Privilege. The word "Privilege," therefore, ought to enter into the Motion, and the Motion ought to be—

"That the House, having heard the statement of the honourable Member for Stoke with regard to Privilege, and the explanation of the honourable Member for Poole, do now proceed to the Orders of the Day."

I move that the words "with regard to Privilege" be inserted.

Amendment proposed, to insert, after the word "Stoke," the words "upon a question of Privilege."—(Mr. Roebuck.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. DODSON: I hope the House will not accept the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member, because it is so ambiguous in its wording that it may be left in doubt, if the Amendment be accepted, whether or not the House does not affirm this a question of Privilege. In order to make the sense of the House clear, it would be necessary to insert the words that it is not a question of Privilege.

MR. ROEBUCK: I will not trouble the House to divide, and will withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That this House, having heard the statement of the honourable Member for Stoke and the explanation of the honourable Member for Poole, do now proceed to the Orders of the Day.

(Mr. Secretary Hardy, Mr. Stanley.)

[BILL 3.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Gathorne Hardy.)

MR. GOSCHEN, in rising to move—

"That this House is of opinion that Regimental Exchanges may be properly allowed under official control; but that any legislation permitting a public officer to pay a sum of money by way of profit or bonus to another officer in respect of a bargain for the exchange of their offices would be injurious to the public service," said, he doubted if many Members of that House would object to a moderate system of regimental exchanges under adequate official control. Most of them would be in favour of such a system, provided they could be certain that it would be equal in its bearings upon all officers in Her Majesty's service; but what he feared with regard to the Bill before them was that while it would effect exchanges in many cases, it would make them dependent on money payments and on a system of bonuses, and that, therefore, officers who were unable to pay bonuses would not be placed in the same situation as regarded exchanges as their more wealthy brethren in arms. In fact, the principle of the Bill was not to facilitate exchanges, but, as was most apparent from the debate the other night, to sanction the sale and the purchase of the difference in value between various commissions and appointments. The House would perceive it was clearly laid down that there was something to sell: it was not the exchange only that was to be made, but it was to be a money question. That argument had not been met on the other side of the House; and it was to bring his adversaries to close quarters on this matter that he now proposed his Resolution. Hitherto, the argument had been that this was a Bill which, for the first time, systematized and legalized the traffic in appointments to commissions; and the answer to that was that exchanges were so beneficial. It was said—"Here is a Bill which, for the first time since 1809, goes against the system laid down in that Act," and the answer again was, that exchanges were so beneficial; and when it was urged that it was a Bill to bring back the spirit and the power of the purse, which had been dethroned and exorcised, the same answer was given. The principle of the Bill was to enable money payments and bonuses to be passed; but to listen to the language of the Secretary of State for War, one would think this was a Bill to enable him to pay less attention to exchanges than had been done in times past. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the inconvenience of knowing of these money payments, and proposed to remedy that inconvenience by making them legal in the future. What was the origin of the Bill?—that was not to be forgotten in this discussion. The Bill originated in the demand of officers for compensation. It was not the spontaneous act of the Government; it had been wrung from them by the officers. The right hon. Gentleman himself told them that he brought forward the Bill in consequence of the recommendation of the Royal Commission. Although he was at the head of the Army, the right hon. Gentleman shielded himself behind the authority of the Commission. What grievance was it intended to remedy? How did the Commissioners treat the question themselves? Did they look upon it as a question of convenience to the officers, and to enable the military authorities to pay less attention to these exchanges in the future than formerly? They looked upon it simply as a pecuniary matter. In their Report they said—"the prohibition of the practice of exchanges has seriously affected the poorer officers." Then, if so, hon. Members opposite must admit that it was a money exchange. Indeed, the Report grounded its recommendation on the averment—"that it would enable officers of slender means to serve in India or elsewhere for a consideration," but not a word about relieving the War Office from the necessity of considering, on military grounds, whether or not exchanges should take place. But the Commissioners took evidence, and he (Mr. Goschen) would be content to rest his claim upon the House to reject the Bill upon the evidence of the officers in its favour. What was that evidence? The memorial of Captain Rickards was to this effect—

"I declare that I did pay in respect of an exchange from the 6th Regiment of Dragoon Guards to the King's Dragoon Guards a sum of £750, and I say I paid such sum of £750 for such exchange in full faith and confidence that I should receive the same again by an exchange to some regiment in India, and that the sum of £750 was advanced to me in such faith and confidence, I engaging to exchange to India in order to repay the same. By the abolition of Purchase I am unable to carry out this engagement, and my memorial prayeth that, in calculating the value of my commission, the sum of £750 may be added to the sums which I have paid for my promotion, and be allowed when I retire from the service."

Captain Spottiswoode, of the 21st Hussars, said—

"My power of exchanging to the Infantry, and thereby receiving a considerable sum of money, has been taken away. Prior to the 1st of November captains in my regiment have been offered £1,500 to £1,700 to exchange. Now we can get nothing but our expenses."

Here was Captain Gonne's case—

"Under the old system I could have raised about £2,500 by an exchange as a major to India." He was asked, "Was that a thing which could be obtained merely by going into the market and asking for it?" His answer was, "I have never known anyone search for it in vain. I could have borrowed £2,500 upon the certainty of being able to repay it by an exchange."

Colonel Legh, Grenadier Guards, explained that he had paid £2,500 for exchange into the Guards, and complained that he was debarred from recouping himself of that sum by the sale of the value of it. Captain Backhouse said—

"I also had a right to exchange if I thought proper, receiving or paying money according to the part of the world in which my regiment was situated."

Colonel Burnaby complained "of the non-existence of that same freedom of exchange which previously existed, coupled with the custom of selling the intrinsic value of the prestige of commissions in the more privileged regiments, such as the Guards, Household Cavalry, Heavy Cavalry not quartered in India, and Light Cavalry inter se, and as compared with the Infantry of the Line; or, in the event of officers having purchased such an exchange, their inability now to sell it, and thus recoup themselves." Sir Percy Herbert asked this Question—"You have the right and privilege, which I believe was never disputed, to exchange from one regiment to another?" Captain Campbell answered—"I have." It was, in point of fact, the money question—compensation for a money right—that was brought before the Commission; therefore, he dismissed from his mind the idea that the Commission simply intended to relieve the Secretary for War from the necessity of controlling exchanges. Another point was that forced upon the Commission was this. The officers complained that the poorer officers had lost the means of eking out their pay by bonuses—again a money question. Major Goldsworthy said—

"I do not see how a poor man is to get on at all in the Service if exchanges are to be prohibited, because that was the only way which enabled poor men to get on."

That, he thought, would be news to the country; and if the country believed it—as the Commissioners and the Government apparently believed it—he maintained that other means ought to be taken to enable poor men to get on in Her Majesty's Army rather than that their pay should be supplemented by bonuses from their brother officers in arms. Again, it was perfectly possible under that system to assign the actual money value of the different ranks. Colonel Bray said—

"Exchanges in every rank vary; there was a certain market price; it altered according to the number of regiments in India and the number at home, and according to whether there was war or peace. The market varied, and poor men were obliged to watch the market."

He did not know whether those words grated on the ears of the House; but, to his mind, they were inexpressibly sad. Could they not fancy the poor officer watching the ups and downs of the market, scanning the lists of regiments to see how many sons of fortune were in them who were likely to buy his services, and saying to himself—"So many regiments are ordered home from the Colonies, the market will fall; so many regiments are ordered out to India, the market will rise." That was not a state of things with which the country would be satisfied. The Secretary of State for War stood behind the Commission as behind a shield. Would he, then, deal with the evidence in the same way as the Commission did? Did he recognize that grievance of the poorer officers; and if exchanges were in future to be regulated on military grounds alone, how could it be said that that Bill was founded on the evidence and the Report of the Commission, or that it would meet the grievance of the poorer officers? But the fact was this, whatever the views of the right hon. Gentleman might be, the officers would say that the Bill would be ultimately worked through the military authorities; that, notwithstanding every possible regulation which might be made, those transactions would be recognized, to a certain extent, the same way as before; that the Secretary of State for War was not a man to create a grievance when he intended to redress it; that he must have meant that that traffic in the market should go on, and surely would not by his regulations so curtail it that they could not get the compensation they sought. The House had to look at that question not from the money point of view only—the sole light in which the Commissioners regarded it; and he did not blame them for not taking into consideration matters that were not referred to them, although he did regret that if they saw their way by any money payment or other arrangement to meet that grievance, they did not bring the matter so clearly before the public that it should be known where the shoe pinched. What, he asked, would be the effect of the measure upon the Army generally? There was very little about that in the evidence, but there seemed to be three points urged—namely, that it would help promotion; that it would secure on occasions in England the presence of an efficient officer who might not otherwise be there; and, lastly, that it was important on considerations of health. With regard to the second point, it might be said, with equal truth, it might secure the absence of officers from England who would otherwise be here, but who for a money bonus had gone where the Commander-in-Chief did not intend them to go. As to health, the argument put forward, at first sight, made a considerable impression on one; but that impression was weakened when they remembered that it was only on the condition of the sick officer having money enough to pay his passage home that he would be able to avail himself of those exchanges. If there were no other argument against the Bill but this one, the Liberal Party could never assent to it. The argument should be put in this form: there were two officers in India who were both desirous of coming home, the one being rich and the other poor. Under a natural system of exchanges, it would be equally open to the poor officer to come home as the rich; but, under the bonus system, a market was created where the poor man could sell, but where he could never buy—a market where the export trade was always of the poor, and the import trade was always of the rich. Call this a Bill for facilitating exchanges! He called it a Bill for prohibiting exchanges for poor men. As to the argument about promotion, it must be obvious that the system of exchanges would facilitate promotion only by means of shuffling the cards. The poor man would probably go into a regiment where promotion was slow, and it would often happen that a senior captain would be at the bottom of the list of captains—a state of things which was not conducive to the efficiency or contentment of the service; and was it not clear that the more this Bill would tend to stimulate promotion, the greater would be the danger of a practical recurrence to the purchase system, which they had spent £7,000,000 to abolish? It was certainly not on the ground that it would facilitate promotion that such a measure ought to be passed. These were the three arguments put forward as to the benefit to the Army; but it seemed to him the weight of evidence was on the other side, and that it might be shown that the system was detrimental to the Army at large. As regarded the evidence, indeed, it was perhaps not unnatural that they had much testimony from those who wished to sell, but little from those who wished to buy. Still, in the same way as the sellers claimed the privilege to sell, those who bought became impressed with the idea that they actually had a right to buy. It was clear that there was on the part of many officers a distinct notion that they had a right to move or not move or to alter their movements at their own discretion, tempered only by the length of their purse. There were officers who held that they had a right to select the country in which they were to serve the Queen, and the argument had culminated in the celebrated letter in which Major Arbuthnot maintained that it would be a breach of the liberty of the subject to prohibit an officer from buying a substitute to perform the duties which he had himself been appointed to perform. Major Arbuthnot had gone farther, and appeared to think an officer justified in resigning his commission if he could not find a substitute, even without suggesting urgent private affairs or bad health. He would ask the Secretary of State for War whether there were many officers in Her Majesty's service who would resign their commissions if they were not allowed to find substitutes to go where they themselves had been ordered. But perhaps he had better not ask the question; better draw a veil over that part of the subject. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. and gallant Gentlemen might think he was speaking but as a mere prejudiced civilian; he was glad to think that if it was a prejudice it was very largely shared in by the country. And if it was a prejudice on his part, it was a prejudice which had been deepened by his connection with the sister service. The privilege claimed for the Army officers had never been set up on behalf of the Navy officers. The motto of the Navy was "Go, and he goeth." Naval officers went wherever they were ordered, under whatever circumstances, whatever might be the service or irksomeness, without question or parley, or exchange, or barter—without for a moment thinking of the balance at their bankers, or the length of their purses. That was the state of affairs in the Navy. He did not wish to draw a contrast between the two services. The officers of both services were made of the same stuff. The officers of the Army were actuated by the same spirit of devotion as their naval brethren; they were as zealous for the honour of the profession to which they belonged, and in time of war they were equally ready to go to whatever part of the globe to which they might be ordered. Nay, more, that self-same purse which was emptied to buy off in time of peace was always equally ready to spend its treasure to buy in, in time of war. Those were no fancy soldiers, such who, scattering to the winds the warnings of health, and the breaking through the spell of domestic remonstrance, carried to the Gold Coast their spontaneous services to face the deadliest climate of the world, and paid with their young and noble lives the price of their soldierly alacrity. And if, in time of peace, on peace service, though peace service was often more irksome than service in the field, British officers still thought they might buy ease at home and pleasant quarters for a money payment; if others thought they might still carry their services to market, or barter a popular appointment for a post abroad and a purse of gold; it was not the fault of the officers themselves, as high-spirited a body of men as ever officered an Army. It was the fault of the system, of that fatal system of purchase, which they fondly hoped they had exorcised for ever, but which had so eaten into the heart and core of the British Army, that it was still thought right and becoming, and worthy of the Army and the State that the length of the purse, and not the orders of the Commander-in-Chief should determine the whereabouts of the officers of the Queen. For his own part, he objected to substitute the power of the purse for the fiat of the Commander-in-Chief, to substitute a market where service could be bought and sold for the rules, regulations, and commands of the service, and to sanction barter openly in one of the great professions of the State. Having said so much with respect to the rich officer, he would only say a word with respect to the poor one. This Bill purported to be introduced to benefit the condition of poor officers; but see how under its influence a poor man might be crushed out of the service. Suppose his regiment was in India, or in one of their unhealthy colonies, and he lost his health, or became disabled by sickness, and was unable to get money to enable him to come home: he must resign his commission or leave the Army, and this Bill raised the price against the poor man and prevented him from availing himself of a natural exchange. There was another argument against the Bill that had not yet been brought forward upon which he desired to make a remark. Suppose a rich man exchanged with a poor man, and the poor man were sent abroad. Suppose, further, that shortly after this bargain had been completed war broke out, and an expedition was fitted out in England against the enemy, the man who had exchanged and remained in England might be appointed in connection with the expedition, and he would get promotion and honour, whereas the poor man who had gone abroad would lose all, and have no chance whatever. Would he not naturally complain that he had first lost all the pleasures of peace and then all the glories of war? Would he not curse the system of exchanges and his bad luck? Would he not exclaim—surely the English Army is no place for poor men! He, in common with his hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan), regretted that they must speak as they did of richer and poorer officers; but they spoke as the evidence had spoken—that evidence which contained the words that without exchanges the poorer officers could not get on at all. To him it seemed that the Army was not for rich or poor men—not for the rich that they might remain at home in the garrison towns, and not for the poor, that they should be placed in a worse position than those who were rich, but it was an Army in which the rich and the poor should take their fair share in the varied service that fell to the lot of the Army in the vast dominions of the Queen. An hon. Gentleman had the other evening spoken of the effect of the Bill on the efficiency of the Army, but they had heard little on this head. He would like to put some questions with regard to it. Would the system proposed tend to create two classes of officers—one which would be able to purchase what he would call homeward exchanges and the other the outward exchanges? Would such a system be for the public benefit? Would it not tend to accumulate at home officers of less experience than those who went abroad? Was it desirable, looking at the professional spirit of the Army, that officers should be allowed to exempt themselves for many years, if not for the whole of their lives, from serving in India or on foreign service, which was admittedly the best school they could have in which to learn the practical part of their profession? In reference to the regimental system, he would merely say that it appeared extraordinary that the colonels of most regiments should not agree with the views of Lord Clyde in that celebrated passage in which he spoke with regret of the young officers who left him when the active service of the field was over. He should have thought that the colonels would have wished to keep their officers together when their regiments were abroad—this would appear to be but common sense; but the House had been told that the laws of human nature and of common sense did not apply to military matters. What would be the effect of this system upon selection and promotion? The House would remember that one of the objects for which purchase in the Army was abolished was to enable selection to be exercised among Field Officers, and that that principle had been embodied in the Royal Warrant. Parliament expected that that principle would be carried out, and it was in that expectation that it had consented to pay £7,000,000 to set the Army free. He believed that Parliament would assume that the Royal Warrant was being acted upon, and that it was the rule of the service. Of course, the system of seniority still existed to a considerable extent, but seniority tempered with selection. Before he referred to the case of the Field Officers, he would advert for a moment to the more humble subject of first commissions. It was well known that colonels in the Guards retained their privilege of nominating for first commissions in their regiments, on the condition that they should make their selection from among those who had been successful in their competitive examinations. Now, he wanted to ask whether, when this Bill had passed, those fortunate young officers who had been thus selected would be able to sell the prestige of their regiments for a sum of money? The right hon. Gentleman had read a letter in which the ecstasy of a tailor who had had his bill paid in consequence of an officer having received a sum of money for exchanging had been depicted, and he read it with such cheerful unction as showed a thorough sympathy on his part with the fortunate tailor and afforded marked evidence that the system of exchanges was not a question of convenience, but of money. The Commander-in-Chief also had the power of appointing to regiments from a certain list. Would the favours of the Commander-in-Chief be open to be carried into the market for sale? The evidence showed that prestige was carried into the market, and if it should be allowed under this Bill, cash would be thus obtained for the benefit of tradesmen. He contended that that would be a state of things which the public would not sanction. Then, again, were the Field Officers who were appointed by selection to be permitted to sell their appointments? He wondered whether the Government would accept the Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Bath (Captain Hayter), for it was clear that a system of selection and one of exchanges for money bonuses would be incompatible—they could not co-exist, and it was their duty to strengthen the hands of the Commander-in-Chief by refusing their assent to any measure which would indirectly bring principles opposed to the system of selection to bear upon him. Then as to the system of promotion. It was said in the course of the former debate that promotion would no longer be bought, but that the prospects of it would be bought. That was very well expressed. It might be expressed differently. Exchange would be from one regiment to another, and though a man would not be able to attain his point directly he would do so by tacking. They would buy promotion through a system of zig-zags. Officers perfectly well understood that that might be done. For instance, there were eight captains in a regiment. Now, suppose three of them at the bottom to have money and to wish to buy out some of those above them who were possessed of only slender means. A purse would be made for the purpose of dealing with them, and they would say, Where was the harm? Now, Parliament had refused its sanction to payments of money bonuses; but if this Bill should be passed officers would take a different view of the matter and say that it enabled them to enter into these transactions, and that the present Minister for War would not take any notice of them. They would not perhaps buy out the captain at the top of the list, but they would buy out some, and thus assist their own promotion, and by that course they would get back to the purchase system through this new system of exchange. Work the Bill as they would, he maintained that there was no answer to this part of the case—namely, that through promotion and these exchanges, men would be able to assist their own advancement in the Army; and if they should be allowed to buy promotion this Bill would bring back to a certain extent vested interests. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War might deny that. He, no doubt, believed that no vested interests would grow up. They did not grow up in a day. It would, however, require strong argument to show that they would not grow up in time. Why, it was through a claim of vested interests that this very question had come before the Commission. The officers would say that the system had been sanctioned and encouraged by Parliament; that a large majority of the House of Commons had declared that exchanges ought not to be illegal; and that they knew from experience that even over-regulation prices had been treated as vested interests. The law of human nature would show that officers who for a long series of years were encouraged and allowed to indulge in this traffic would come to regard it as giving them a vested interest as arising out of it. His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief had stated in evidence that there had been great difficulty in checking the payment of over-regulation prices; and if the history of that system were studied, it would be seen how easily vested interests sprung up. On the other hand, they had the declaration of the Secretary for War that exchanges would in future be dealt with only on military grounds. But how were those military grounds to be combined with the claims of the officers? Did the right hon. Gentleman mean that military grounds were to decide whether an exchange should be made or not, or that the exchange might be made unless there were military grounds against it? Were exchanges to be allowed where military grounds could be pleaded in favour of them, or where there was no objection to them on military grounds?—because the one case was very different from the other. Was it, he asked, consistent with human nature to think that an officer who had paid a large sum of money for the privilege of remaining at home would not regard it as a grievance to be ordered abroad within a month or two of that transaction? He would, of course, so look upon it. ["No, no!"] The right hon. Gentleman said "No," and he thought he caught the words from an hon. Member, "It has been done over and over again." But how often did the War Office know that sums of money had been paid under such circumstances? [Mr. GATHORNE HARDY: They never knew it.] They did not know it officially. But would they not know it as a matter of fact? Would they make a regulation against War Office officials frequenting a military club? Did they not know, as private individuals and as a matter of common conversation, that such sums had been paid? Did the right hon. Gentleman, in contradistinction to the evidence given before the Duke of Somerset's Commission, to the effect that it was necessary to wink at the payment of over-regulation prices, mean to say that such things were not known at the War Office? He should congratulate his right hon. Friend very much on his sturdiness if he secured that not only in his own time, but in the future, vested interests would not arise from that system which the Bill would legalize; for they should remember that they were not legislating for a limited period. He would ask the House to consider what the effect of allowing the payment of bonuses for privileges would be likely to be on the efficiency of the Army, and on that point he would not repeat the arguments so ably put forward by his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe). It was sought to be justified on the ground that it would allow officers of slender means to eke out their incomes. Why would not the same ground apply to the Navy as well as to the Army? The answer sought to be given was that naval officers were appointed to ships for three or four years only; whereas officers of the Army went abroad for longer periods. He was not at all sure that three or four years in a ship was not equivalent to a much longer period ashore in India. But even if it were not so, the right hon. Gentleman could not rest the argument upon the ground of hardship in the case of the Army, because service abroad was equally hard in the case of officers who could pay and of those who could not afford to pay. He must always remember in his argument that some officers were poor and some rich, and why would not that argument apply equally to officers in the Navy? Suppose that a poor naval officer said to a rich officer in the same service—"I am appointed to a good ship bound for a healthy station—you are appointed to a bad ship going to an unhealthy station. I am in debt, you are not, pay me a few hundred pounds and I will take your bad ship and go to your bad station." They would ask themselves why they should not have official sanction for such an exchange. And to whom would they go to ratify it? To the First Lord of the Admiralty, and with the knowledge that the First Lord was one of the three Commissioners who had sanctioned that very proceeding in the case of the Army. And how could the right hon. Gentleman, who was both kind and logical, refuse to grant to the Navy that which he had recommended for the Army? But the right hon. Gentleman had stated that he would not allow the passing of a £10 note in the case of the naval service; and yet he was a part of the shield behind which Her Majesty's Government sought to shelter themselves, because they fell back upon the authority of the Commission, of which the right hon. Gentleman was a Member. Had it, he asked, struck the House that they had not heard what the views of Her Majesty's Government were with regard to all the other recommendations of the Commissioners, or why they had selected one point only for legislation? The Army Estimates had not been introduced, and all the House knew therefore was that the Government had exercised their discretion with regard to this one point of exchanges. The Government had referred the other recommendation of the Commissioners to another Commission. Why had they not referred this also, which was a question of compensation and was not a question of administration? For his part, he was surprised that the Government had sheltered themselves as they had done behind the Commission at all; but how they could do so without recognizing the authority of the Commission with respect to the other matters referred to them he could not understand. He did not blame the Government or impugn the motives with which they had introduced this Bill. The Secretary for War, no doubt, believed that the Bill would be a boon to the Army, and that it would cost the country nothing. The purchase system cost the country nothing till it was abolished, and then it cost £7,000,000, and he maintained that if they allowed the system of payment for exchanges to be re-established, although it would cost them nothing at the present time, it was impossible to say what it would cost them hereafter. The House, for these reasons, ought not to depart from the principles of the Act of 1809, and ought not to repeal the Army Brokerage Act. His Resolution declared that the operation of the Act would be "injurious to the public service." He would also declare that it would be injurious to our national credit. What would foreign nations say when they saw us harking back to the state of things which was put an end to four years ago when Parliament abolished purchase? They would say—"Four years ago you wanted to reform your Army. You made a gigantic effort. You found vested interests blocked the way of every reform. You bought up those vested interests. It cost the country a cruel sacrifice. It cost the Army a cruel wrench. But so engraven in the minds of English officers is the idea that they are entitled to carry into the market the prestige of their regiments and the value of their commissions, that after abolishing one market you are now consenting to set up another. Oh! nation of free-traders, must you have free-trade even in your exchanges." He did not believe that the Liberal Party would be participes criminis when such a charge as this was laid. He could assure hon. Members opposite that he and those around him opposed this measure in no spirit of mortification that their work was about to be undone, and in no spirit of antagonism to the Army, whose reputation was equally dear to both sides of the House. They opposed it on the broad principle that to legalize barter in public offices was contrary to public policy, contrary to the expectation of the country, and injurious to the honour and credit of the public service. That broad principle was embodied in the Resolution which he now submitted to the House. It would be somewhat extraordinary if in the year 1875 a majority of the House of Commons should say "No" to such a Resolution; but, however that might be, he was well assured that, in the opinion of the nation, the "Ayes" would have it. The right hon.

Gentleman concluded by moving his Amendment.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK, in rising to second the Amendment, said *: I rise to ask the patience of this House for a short time while I put before it, as briefly as possible, the grounds on which I feel compelled—having the highest interests of the Army in view—most unhesitatingly to oppose the passing of this Bill. There never probably was a Bill laid before this House which was pregnant with such grave and wide consequences, while appearing to contain so little. There has seldom been a Bill the future operation and effect of which could so little be gathered from that which it shows on its innocent surface. What apparently can be more unobjectionable than a proposition that officers should be allowed freely to exchange with each other, so that each individual, suiting his own convenience as to the climate and the circumstances under which he will serve, the whole Army should be contented, and the service benefited? And let me say, Sir, at the outset, that I have no objection whatever to exchanges as such. I think that exchanges, under proper limitations, are beneficial both to the officer and to the State. I go still further. If it can be shown that the present scale of “necessary expenses” is too low—if it can be shown that it has unduly hindered exchanges, then by all means let it be revised. I am decidedly in favour of every facility for exchange consistent with the best interests of the service. But I have the strongest possible objection to the re-introduction of purchase—under any colouring, or in whatever shape. And, Sir, as soon as you begin to examine this Bill in detail—as soon as you begin to forecast how it will work—then the cloven foot of purchase peeps out again, so that I have no hesitation in designating it as one of the most questionable, dangerous, and retrograde measures ever brought before this House. I give the right hon. Gentleman opposite the Secretary of State for War full credit for the excellence and the purity of his intentions. I place implicit confidence in his integrity, as everyone in this House who knows his frank and honourable character will do. But he has been misled in this matter. He little knows the dangerous inevitable effects of what he is introducing, and, what is more, he cannot guard against them. I say—without fear of contradiction—that if it pass in its present shape, it will re-introduce purchase in one of its worst forms. It will reverse all the beneficial legislation of four years ago, and it will cause all the money which this House has voted, and the country has spent, for improving the administration of promotion to be as much and as wantonly wasted as if it were deliberately thrown into the sea. Sir, I had hoped when this Bill was withdrawn at the end of last Session that on its re-introduction this year the Secretary of State for War would have so modified it as to deprive it of its worst feature—its power of making exchange for which money is paid, the means of buying promotion. I ventured to make a proposition to the right hon. Gentleman for a modification in that sense, which appears to have entirely escaped his memory, but which I shall now have the opportunity of moving as an Amendment. Had the Bill re-appeared in that improved shape, confining its action solely to exchanges, and giving this House and the country that which it has a right to—a guarantee that it should never be made the means of re-introducing purchase, I should have been prepared to give it a certain amount of support. As it stands now—containing no such guarantee, but, on the contrary, containing provisions which will, as I will presently show, be inevitably used for the purpose of restoring purchase—I have no option, in the best interests of the country, in the highest interests of the poorer officers of the Army, but to give it, by every means in my power, an unqualified opposition. There is one point I should like to clear up. It has been implied, rather than directly stated, in the course of this debate, that this power of exchange will be made by officers the means of avoiding active service. Sir, that is an assertion to which I cannot even lend the tacit acquiescence of silence. I repudiate the insinuation with the contempt it deserves. Such a case never has occurred amongst the officers of the British Army, and I will venture to say it never will while British officers are—what they have ever been—the true leaders of their men. But to return to this Bill. I said, Sir, that it would re-introduce purchase. But, Sir, before touching on that point, I would first object to this Bill that it is wholly unnecessary. Anyone reading this Bill, and listening to the speech with which it has been ushered in, would naturally suppose that exchanges between officers had been prohibited when purchase was abolished, and that they have never since been allowed. But what is really the case? Exchanges between officers never have been prohibited; they never have been suspended for a moment; they take place daily, to the great advantage, as I freely admit, both of individual officers and of the service. The only limitation that has been made—and this, be it marked, is what this Bill is intended to reverse—is that, instead of officers being permitted, as previously to 1871, to give and receive sums of money without limit, for these exchanges now, and since 1871, every officer wishing to exchange is very properly obliged to submit to the Military Secretary a statement of the sum proposed to be paid, of the items that compose the total, and then only what are deemed the necessary expenses of the exchange are sanctioned. And, Sir, this practice of proper supervision and limitation of the sums to be paid for exchanges is what this Bill proposes to put an end to. The right hon. Gentleman said he thought it a “pernicious thing” to recognize these payments of money. But, then, what does he propose to do? Does he propose to put a stop to these payments? On the contrary, he proposes to recognize them on the largest possible scale. For his Bill will remove all legal restriction whatever upon them, a legal restriction that has existed for three centuries, and will leave officers free to pay just whatever they please, on the sole condition that he hears nothing about it. Depend upon it, Sir, the officers of the Army will gladly take him at his word. They will pay just what they please, and he will certainly never hear anything about it. But they will re-introduce purchase in the process. They desire nothing better than this tacit recognition; and they will not be slow to profit by it. Sir, this is not a Bill to permit exchanges, for exchanges are daily permitted, and have never been prohibited. It should properly be called a Bill to permit officers to make money by exchanging their duties, and I have yet to learn that that is a traffic which the public opinion of this country, when rightly informed as to its results, will either approve or tolerate. I have said that my first objection to this Bill is that there is no necessity for it, and as one example is worth a dozen assertions, I would recall to the memory of hon. Members a letter that has recently appeared in The Times newspaper on this subject. An officer of Artillery—an ex-Member of this House (Major Arbuthnot) who lately sat for Hereford, writes to endeavour to induce the public to prejudge this case in favour of this Bill, by telling a pathetic tale of how, finding himself at one and the same time thrown out of Parliament and under orders to proceed to Rangoon, he was under the necessity of either finding an exchange or going on foreign service. I offer Major Arbuthnot my respectful sympathies on this combination of misfortunes. But I may remark, in passing, that foreign service is not altogether so unusual and exceptional an incident in a military career as to be considered as a hardship by soldiers—at least, the working officers of the service have not been in the habit of so regarding it. Then Major Arbuthnot goes on to tell us of the difficulty he had in obtaining that exchange, because, as he says, of the stringent rules in force; and then he relates how at last he found an officer at Rangoon, who was willing to remain there for “a consideration,” and finally how he was permitted to make the exchange, and both parties to the arrangement were equally pleased. I congratulate Major Arbuthnot upon the happy termination to his difficulties. I am sure the House must feel much indebted to him for taking us all into his confidence with such charming frankness. But there is just one little matter connected with this case which he omitted to tell us—no doubt in the hurry of writing—and as that is a point somewhat material to the discussion now before us, I am glad to be able to supply the omission. Major Arbuthnot forgot to tell us what he was allowed to pay for that exchange. Will this House believe, after all this outcry about the stringency of rules, and the hardship of money not being allowed to pass, that in this very instance, and under existing regulations, Major Arbuthnot was allowed to pay £400 for that exchange to the officer who replaced him? And when I tell the House, moreover, that that large sum was paid solely for the passage to Rangoon of that officer's wife, family, and servants, whom he had left behind, then, I think, many hon. Members will be disposed to agree with me that the existing regulations, on which so liberal an interpretation is allowed to be put in practice, are almost sufficient to answer all the reasonable demands, both of individual officers and of the public service, in the matter of exchange. I say with confidence, that if, as I have shown, the present regulations have so wide a margin that under them not only can an officer be allowed to be indemnified by his successor for all the expenses incidental to a change of country—such as cost of new uniform, of horses, and of passage out to his new station—but that, when the occasion requires it, he may receive instead a large sum of money for the passage of his wife, family, and servants, as was done in this case of Major Arbutnot's, then, I say, there has been no case made out of proved necessity for any great further relaxation of the rules, and no argument produced in favour of the introduction of this dangerous and doubtful measure. But, Sir, even if there is not sufficient facility already for an officer to choose the climate he will serve in, there is another easy remedy for that without resorting to so extreme and retrograde a measure as exchange by purchase. Let the Government carry out the system of linked battalions in its integrity as regards the officers, as they have already done as regards the men, and that will entirely do away with any necessity for this Bill. As the House knows, the 141 battalions of the Infantry of the Line, are now grouped in couples, called linked battalions, and intended, I believe, eventually to form one regiment. One battalion of each couple is at home, the other abroad. If proper advantage is taken of this system exchanges will rarely, if ever, be necessary. For where it is desirable, as it often is, from long service in tropical climates, ill-health or any other cause, that an officer should have a temporary change of station, it will be in the power of the authorities to transfer him to do duty with the home battalion; and as this could be done without altering his regimental standing by simply arranging a list of the relative ranks of the officers in both the battalions, it would be done at much greater advantage to the individual than the present mode of exchange; for he would not by such a transfer go down to the bottom of his rank. Then the transfer being made by authority for reasons which the authorities approve, the next senior officer for foreign service would proceed out as a matter of course: and no officer could complain of a system by which he was sure to be benefited in his turn. The same principle is applicable to the Artillery, as three new brigades are about to be formed. And this principle has the advantages of having precedent in its favour, for it has worked well for many years past, in the transfers between the dépôt and the service companies of regiments. The right hon. Gentleman has said in his speech he desires to regulate those exchanges for the future, partly on "military grounds," from which pecuniary or private considerations shall entirely be excluded. Sir, that is a most laudable desire. Therefore let me respectfully commend to his consideration the mode of exchange which I have just sketched out, which can be carried out entirely on "military grounds," and without costing either officer concerned one single penny or deranging his regimental standing. Sir, I said that this Bill would be made the means of re-introducing the purchase of promotion, and I will proceed to prove it. In the lower ranks, in the grades of lieutenant and captain, it will only do so to a minor extent; because in those ranks as each officer exchanging has to go to the bottom of a somewhat long list of his rank, the process of making up a purse to get promotion by getting men to exchange out of a regiment will be a rather slow one. It will, however, I have no doubt, be done even in those grades, as it was in the Indian Army. But in the higher and more responsible grade of major—a rank, be it remembered, that is next in succession to the command of a regiment—a grade, be it remarked, that since the abolition of purchase is intended to be bestowed by selection—this Bill will immediately and inevitably re-introduce a direct means of buying promotion. For instance, a rich man is now the junior major of a regiment in India. He is there very much against his will. He has a lieutenant-colonel and a major over him, both of whom are comparatively poor men. They like the high pay of India. Neither of them intends to move—or “give a step” as it is called—for the next 10 years. Our rich young major sees no chance of promotion. He is bored to death, he hates the country, he hates the Natives, he has no alleviation to his hard lot except driving away the mosquitoes by night and anathematizing the Radicals who “have abolished purchase and ruined the Army” by day. But, let this Bill once pass, and you revive that bored and languid major at once to new energy, from the tame pursuit of cursing the Radicals to the far more exciting pursuit of promotion by purchase. He will at once see his way—I use the vernacular of the Army—to “getting out of this beastly country, sir,” and buying promotion at one stroke. He will get a medical certificate, of that easy and convenient shape, that “a change of air to England will be highly beneficial to him.” He will look for an exchange to a regiment in England, and he will wisely choose one in which the lieutenant-colonel is within 18 months or two years of completing his time for retirement. Then, once exchanged—for which he will pay £800 or £1,000—he will begin to work upon the major senior to him, who alone stands between him and the lieutenant-colonel, the “falling in” of which I have said is a certainty in two years. He will represent in glowing colours the advantage of the higher pay of India. He will offer that major £1,000 or £1,500 to exchange out of his way, and in 10 months, by having paid £2,500, he will command his new regiment. Take another instance: An officer is junior major of a regiment of two battalions in India. He has, therefore, three majors and two lieutenant-colonels over him, or five field officers. As soon as this Bill passes, he will be at liberty, by paying a fancy sum of money, to exchange to a regiment of only one battalion at home. That at once reduces the number of field officers senior to him from five to two. In other words, he buys three steps of promotion at one operation of so-called exchange. But still further. If he makes a wise selection he will choose, as before, a regiment in which the lieutenant-colonel is within a short time—say two years, 18 months, or a year—of his time for retiring. In that case his one operation of exchange reduces the number of those senior to him at one stroke from five to one. That is, practically, he buys four steps of promotion at one payment. And he buys, moreover, the chance of at any moment succeeding to the lieutenant colonelcy by a death vacancy, and it would be well worth his while paying for this bargain from £1,500 to £2,000, as was formerly constantly done. But take yet another case—that of a lieutenant-colonel, who is under the new rule, by which the command of a regiment is only to be held for five years. He has served four out of his five years. Then he will be positively overwhelmed with money offers to exchange into another regiment by majors who want, and can afford to buy, promotion. It will be well worth while to give him £1,000 to exchange, and to give their own lieutenant-colonel, who has four or five years to serve, another £1,000 to exchange with him, for it is certain that in 12 months he will give a step in the new regiment to which he goes, and this is always worth paying for. Will anybody tell me that this is not buying promotion? But I shall be told, of course, that there is a fallacy running through my argument, because promotion is now ruled by selection, and that, therefore, it would not be worth any man's while to buy such a chance as I have pictured, because, after having paid the money, he would have no certainty of succeeding to the vacancy. To that, I answer, that though as a matter of supposition or theory, since the abolition of purchase promotion is supposed to go by selection, this is only a matter of theory. I should not exaggerate if I said that, in practice, selection is a pure delusion, a fiction. It does not exist as regards any practical effect on the promotion of the Army. I will give the House a few figures to show what selection amounts to. Sir, I hold in my hand a Return carefully prepared, and by it I find that from the 1st of November, 1871—the date when purchase was abolished—to the 31st December, 1874, out of 149 vacancies that have occurred in the Infantry of the Line in the rank of field officer, only 20 have been filled in the slightest degree otherwise than by strict regimental succession. But this is not the whole case. Of these 20 even, there were but three that could be called instances of selection. For the other 17 officers were of such senior standing in the Army that there was no question of selection at all in their being chosen, for, even under the old purchase system, their seniority would have given them a claim to be thus brought in. The effect, then, during the last three years of a system of so-called selection has been simply to retain to those officers who had purchased up early in their career a continuation of the unfair advantages of the purchase system, even after that system had been condemned and attempted to be abolished by the country. And it is very easy to account for this—it is a matter in which the Commander-in-Chief can scarcely help himself. There is an opinion very prevalent and very popular in the Army, that until every officer has been paid down his regulation money—as long, in fact, as the State retains any portion of that money—every officer has a vested right to succeed to the vacancies that occur in his own regiment. I am not prepared to say that that mode of paying the regulation money down would not have been the best way of satisfying the claims of the officers. I am decidedly of opinion that it would have more satisfactorily solved the question, and undoubtedly it would have done so more speedily, and thus have got rid of all this protracted uncertainty and discontent. Nor am I in a position to say whether the authorities who administer the promotion of the Army do share that opinion of the officers, that they have a vested right of succession to regimental vacancies. But this I am certain of—that judging from facts in black and white, judging by their acts in the last three years, until you satisfy that opinion of the officers as to their claims, promotion by selection will continue to be, as it is at present—a mere delusion and a sham, a mere name used to throw dust in the eyes of the public; and that the intentions of the country as to rooting out the effects of purchase from the Army never will be carried out. And my main objection to the Bill is that not only does it perpetuate those supposed vested interests, at a time when they were gradually beginning to disappear, but it will do worse; by allowing money to be paid for exchanges it will create a new class of vested interests, similar to, and quite as difficult to deal with, as the original ones of the purchase system. For I maintain confidently that when you have allowed an officer, as this Bill will do, to pay £2,000—or even £2,500—first for a favourable exchange in the rank of major from one regiment to another, and for then removing the major senior to him out of his way, it will be almost impossible—nay, I say perfectly impossible—morally to resist his claim to succeed to the command of the regiment. Who can deny that this is, and will be made, a direct means of purchasing promotion—by shortening, perhaps, by several years, the time that would otherwise elapse in passing from the rank of major to that of lieutenant-colonel? Sir, we are told that this Bill is introduced in the interest of the poor officer. To me it is a marvel how any true friend of the Army can permit himself to be deluded by such specious but transparent reasoning. I will put one consideration to those who think money exchanges would benefit the poor man. We have at least nominally abolished purchase. The country has come to see at last that the profession of arms is one requiring from those who would aspire to attain to eminence in it, not only special qualities of a high order, but the exclusive devotion of a lifetime of study and application. The next inevitable reform consequent on this discovery will be that the country, while rightly expecting a higher professional standard from its officers, will see that it is just and equitable that a highly-educated profession should be better paid. But if we have exchanges by purchase, this demand for higher pay can never be made, or if made, can always be evaded. Once let us have a system of money exchanges, and the poor officer can never complain of the insufficiency of his pay to enable him to live at home, for the obvious and ready reply to him will be—"If you cannot live in England, it is your own fault; why not exchange to India or the Colonies with some richer man, and put a few hundreds in your pocket at the same time?" I say that those are no true friends of the Army, or of the poor officer, who would thus re-open the door to enable the State to do that which it has always done under a purchase system—evade its just obligation to pay its officers properly by eking out the insufficient income of the poor officer—not from the public purse—but by forced contributions out of the pockets of his

richer comrade. But, Sir, I have not yet done with the evils of exchange for money. One immediate effect of them—and I beg the House to ponder this well—will be to divide the Army into two classes, having separate interests—the rich officers and the poor ones. What will be the result? Why, that the poor men, consulting not their inclination but their necessity, will be all serving abroad in distant unhealthy climates, bartering their health and their lives against money, and the rich men will all be congregated in the near and pleasant Mediterranean stations, or in still closer and pleasanter proximity to Pall Mall and the clubs. At first sight this appears all that could be wished. The poor man fills his poor purse to the benefit of his family; the rich man finds military life made less irksome and pleasanter to him. But, Sir, what will be the effect on the efficiency of the Army—the nation's property, the nation's defence—in time of need? What will be the effect on the free career for talent which purchase was abolished to obtain? I have no hesitation in saying it will be most injurious, if not destructive. Immediately this division into classes takes place, then, as during the purchase system, all the benefits, honours, and distinctions of the service will come, as a matter of inevitable certainty, to the rich man; all the knocks, all the hardships, all the drudgery, to the poor one. It will be asked, how so? Just in this way. The rich man being always at or near home, near the centre of news and of interest, near the centre from which any foreign expedition must start, while avoiding all the wear and tear of foreign service in peace time, will be at the right spot for early asking for, and early grasping, all the loaves and fishes, all the increased opportunities of Staff employment, all the increased chances of distinction that war affords. But the poor man, in his distant colony, or in remoter India, after enduring all the hardships of climate, and of exile, and of monotonous toil in time of peace, will have the additional bitterness of forced exclusion from all the prizes of the profession in time of war, and will be left eating his heart out in compulsory inaction, while his more fortunate comrade—simply because he is the richer man—is on the spot to reap all the honours and rewards of war. Is not this a monstrous injustice? Sir, if I speak warmly, it is because I say that which I know from my own bitter experience—my own, and that of my father before me. Others may forget; but I, as a son, cannot be expected to forget those long years of patient waiting in which my father, a student of war from his youth—whose capacity had been acknowledged by every General under whom he had served for 40 years—was debarred by such regulations as those I am now combatting; debarred, not from the opportunities of personal distinction, for that he never coveted for himself, but from that chance for which every impulse of his great heart beat—the opportunity of usefully serving his country in some great emergency. Sir, that opportunity came to him at last, but it came to him in advanced age, when his feet were already standing on the threshold of his grave; too late for the achievement of personal renown, not too late, I thank God, for the interests of his country. But, be it recollected, Sir, that but for the fortuitous circumstance that that great revolt occurred in the very country in which, by his poverty, his lot had been fixed; but for the suddenness with which the dreadful crisis followed on the heels of the first outbreak, even that opportunity would have been denied to him. Had there been more time, the usual rule would have been carried out. Some favourite of fortune, some veteran of Windsor and of St. James's Park, would have been sent out to supersede him in the command, and after a long life of patient service he would have descended to the grave unhonoured and unknown, without once having found scope for his talents on a larger scale. That example, Sir, should be a warning to England for all future time not to deprive herself wilfully of one-half of the richest inheritance she possesses—that capacity and ability that are to be found in all classes of her officers—in rich and poor alike—by imposing such conditions of service on her Army as practically restrict the chances of distinction in great European wars to the privileged few—such rules as practically make the prizes of the profession the exclusive appanage and property of the rich. Nobody will convince me that that is a desirable state of things to restore, or a salutary condition for our Army. To be divided into two broad sections or castes—by force, not of capacity and talent, but of interest and of money. Once re-introduce the money element, and you cannot avoid, however good your intentions may be, giving the rich man an undue advantage over his poorer comrade. If you pass this Bill, within six months you will have purchase in full force again, just as before 1871; and all the money paid by this country in hopes of its abolition will be utterly and wantonly wasted. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government said the other day, in resisting my Motion for the adjournment of this debate, that he was sceptical whether any fresh arguments could be adduced that would be "interesting." Sir, I venture to differ from the right hon. Gentleman. I venture to think that when this subject is properly understood—when it is seen to be what it really is—not a mere minor question whether officers shall or shall not be allowed to exchange freely, but a question involving the great and grave issue whether seven millions of money shall be spent for the purpose for which the nation has intended it, or shall, by an adroit manoeuvre, be used to consolidate and perpetuate that very system of purchase which they were voted to abolish, then, I think, the question will assume for the taxpayers of England an "interest" far exceeding that of even any glowing romance that ever fell from his brilliant pen. I have trespassed on the patience of this House much longer than I intended; but this is a matter of vital importance to the interests—aye, to the very existence—of a nation, and no one is so qualified to speak on it as those who have practical knowledge of its working. Therefore, I trust the House will pardon me, in conclusion, one personal allusion I am about to make to my own experience. I have now had the honour to serve Her Majesty for 29 years, in peace and in war, in almost every part of the globe. During that time, first as a regimental officer, then for some years on the Regimental Staff, subsequently in both departments of the General Staff of the Army, I have had opportunities, seldom surpassed, of knowing the merits and defects of every part of our system. I only mention this for the purpose of saying that which I heartily rejoice to be able to say—that at no time within my recollection, not even under the stimulus of actual war, has there been such a wide-spread, rapid, and at the same time solid advance made in professional knowledge and improvement among all ranks of our officers as during the last three years. The progress is more like the work of a generation than of three short years. From the oldest to the youngest, every officer is now earnestly doing his best to qualify himself for success in the noble profession to which he belongs—to fit himself for the coveted opportunity of being useful to his country in time of need. To what is this advance attributable? To the fact that you decided three years ago—wisely, but not one moment before it was necessary—to root out and sweep away for the future the baneful withering influence of the purse, and to substitute for it the juster, the nobler standard of professional excellence and merit. I implore this House not to check or to hinder this great and wholesome progress. Do not again divert the attention of your officers from their professional duties—to the ignoble gambling for shares in the promotion Stock Exchange. Do not, even for the supposed sake of some considerable advantage to individuals, again open the door to the jobbery and corruption, the unworthy underhand dealing to which our officers were, till four years ago, compelled—most reluctantly compelled—to demean themselves. It was no fault of theirs, mind. The officers did not establish purchase. It is even doubtful whether they in any way benefited by it. It was forced upon them. It was a bad legacy, like many other evils that we have gradually extirpated from our Constitution, an evil legacy from the base times of the Stuarts. Then do not force it on us again. I say it advisedly, it is better that the country should pay any sum that might be necessary out of the public purse to facilitate exchanges, than that this demoralizing and dangerous traffic between officers should be re-opened. Sir, I have shown earlier in my arguments that the desirable—nay, laudable—objects that the Secretary of State for War has in view—the greater facility for exchange—can be better accomplished by other and less dangerous means. I beg this House to resist this temporary pressure in favour of this retrograde change, revived and exaggerated by the unwise re-introduction of this Bill. Keep, instead, to the regulations now in force—relax them still further where it may be found to be necessary, and in six months any feeling on this subject will have passed away. The officers will accommodate themselves, as they always honourably and cheerfully do, to any decision that is manifestly in the interests of the public. And I will guarantee that your Army, raised by your wise determination to that true dignity of a profession, of a career open to rich and poor alike, kept by your sound judgment still unsullied from any trace of an ignoble and mercenary traffic, will reward the country, which has been so wisely jealous of its best interests, by increased results of efficiency and usefulness which shall eclipse, if that be possible, even its own rich historic record of honour and patriotism in the past.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House is of opinion that Regimental Exchanges may be properly allowed under official control; but that any legislation permitting a public officer to pay a sum of money by way of profit or bonus to another officer in respect of a bargain for the exchange of their offices would be injurious to the public service,"—(Mr. Goschen),

—instead thereof.

SIR SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he was unavoidably absent when the subject was under discussion on a former occasion, but having since studied the speeches that were then delivered he was at a loss, and he was still so, to understand why a measure so simple and so just should have aroused the opposition that had been manifested in the House. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the War Department in introducing the Bill distinctly disclaimed having, in the slightest degree, any wish or intention to interfere with the new system and of going back to the old system of purchase, and said that, if it were possible to do so, he would be no party to it. The right hon. Gentleman further said that he considered the new system irrevocable, and that he was prepared to stand by it loyally and firmly. The Bill had come before the House recommended by the highest authorities connected with the administration of the Army, who considered that it was for the interest of the Army that exchanges should be permitted; fortified by the opinion of the Commission, of which the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty was a Member; and 99 out of every 100 officers considered it was a proposal in the shape of an act of justice which, in the interests of the Army, ought to be conceded. One was therefore at a loss to understand why it should meet with so much opposition, and which was to be repeated upon every possible occasion. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen), and the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just spoken had certainly treated the question in a manner different from that previously adopted; but, though they both opposed the measure, the speech of the hon. and gallant Member had conclusively answered and demolished the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman whose Motion he seconded. He could only suggest as an explanation of the opposition to the Bill that as the Session grew older hon. Gentlemen opposite saw that the Government were in a position to introduce measures which commended themselves to the general acceptance of the country, and dealt with some acknowledged want or reformed some known evil connected with the social and universal life of the country. The Opposition were therefore in this peculiar position, that night after night they were obliged to accept these measures and express their approval of them; and therefore, unless they could find something to urge upon the country, their occupation was gone, because, their mission being to curse, night after night they were called upon to bless. The fact was, as one hon. Member opposite had said to him—one, too, whose opinion was held in high estimation by his Colleagues—"This Bill, at any rate, is the best horse we have in the stable; it is not a very good one, but we intend to run him on every occasion as long as he has got a leg to stand upon." That was the reason why this question had been treated as a Party question, and that was why there was to be such a continued battle about it. It was, at any rate, the duty of hon. Members on his side of the House to show that there was no foundation for the assertion that the present Government was a reactionary Government, or that its intention by this Bill was covertly to re-establish the system of purchase. They must show that justice to the officers required that facilities for exchange should be increased. If this measure would lead to the re-establishment of the system of purchase, he would remind hon. Gentlemen opposite that before the new system was introduced the system by which exchanges could be made in consideration of money payments was more frequently followed in the non-purchase services than in regiments of the Line. In three years—from October, 1868, to October, 1871—there were 133 exchanges in the Royal Artillery, and only 260 in all the other regiments of the Army. Those figures showed that effecting exchanges for a money consideration was perfectly consistent with a system that entirely forbade purchase commissions, and also that in regiments, such as the Royal Artillery, where promotion was slow, it was there a natural consequence that a system of exchanges should exist. But, said the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City, one of the great dangers of the Bill would be that it would lead to a system by which purses would be made in order to induce officers to retire. He believed that what the right hon. Gentleman meant by that was that in the case of an exchange being proposed between an officer at home and a senior captain, for instance, those who were under the senior captain would make a purse and induce him to effect an exchange because they would gain a step by so doing. He (Sir Seymour Fitzgerald) defied any officer of the Army to say, either from his own experience or from any amount of inquiry that he might make, that there was a single instance of such a proceeding. And even if such a thing was possible, it was just as possible under the existing system as it would be under the system to be established by the Bill of his right hon. Friend. Exchange under the Bill would be subject to strict regulations, and it was obvious that no such transaction as that the right hon. Member for the City supposed would be sanctioned directly or indirectly. With regard to the objection of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) that the Bill dealt only with the facilities which were to be given for exchanges among the officers alone—

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he did not himself use that argument. It had been used by some one else, and on its being replied to by the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton (General Shute), he interposed a question to him on the subject.

SIR SEYMOUR FITZGERALD: The argument was, at any rate, distinctly dealt with by several hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. His answer to it was this—If a private in a regiment was ordered to India, before he could go he was examined by a medical inspector, and unless the inspection was satisfactory, the doctor immediately said to the private—"Stand aside; you are to remain in dépôt." But how with an officer? Even if he was ill he was called upon to go, and unless he could get his exchange he had to leave the service. When the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the War Office said that these exchanges were to be made simply upon military considerations he meant that, as far as the money part of the transaction was concerned, the War Office had nothing to do with it; but that, with regard to the position of any officer after such exchange, the authorities held themselves free to act solely on considerations of military fitness. Both the last speakers had represented the Bill as interfering with selection. Now, he confessed his inability to understand this, because he understood "selection" to mean that the officer next in seniority would not necessarily be appointed when a vacancy occurred in the command of a regiment, but that an officer would be appointed who possessed all the requisite qualifications for so responsible a position. Selection did not mean that a particular officer was the best man for a particular locality in India or elsewhere. Therefore, if one lieutenant-colonel sought an exchange with another lieutenant-colonel, one officer would be as good as the other, inasmuch as both had been selected for the responsible post of commander of a regiment. The present Bill could not re-introduce purchase in any shape or form; but he wished to point out that the existing system did not afford that proper liberty of exchange which was necessary for the well-being of the Army. Consequently, in justice to the officers, this Bill ought to be passed. Hon. Gentlemen opposite treated this as a question which must necessarily arise between the rich officer and the poor officer; but he entirely repudiated any such grouping, because there was no greater mistake than to suppose that the power of exchange was only sought by those two classes of men. He believed that exchanges had been constantly made between men of most moderate means, and that, in some cases, the exchange money was paid by the officer who could least afford it. The opponents of this measure erred in supposing that no exchange ever was made except because a rich man wanted to avoid a particular service which a poor man would be willing for a pecuniary consideration to accept; and the right hon. Member for the City (Mr. Goschen) spoke with great indignation of a letter which had recently appeared, in which an officer had said the circumstances were such that if he had no power of exchange, he would be obliged to resign his commission. It must constantly happen in the many changes of military life and in private relations that men, for reasons perfectly satisfactory, and without having anything to do with military considerations, were obliged to stay at home. An officer might be unable to undertake foreign service because he had a sick wife or sick children; because he himself had only just recovered from an illness; or because he had aged parents whom he might never see again if he went away to distant climes. Was it fair to say to a man in such a position—"You must not in any way hold out any inducement in order to get an exchange, and if you do not get an exchange you must leave the service?" For it should be remembered that an exchange without some inducement was only possible when it was just as important for one officer to remain at home as it was for another officer to go abroad. In other cases the balance could only be equalized by a pecuniary payment. One of the evils of the present system was, that the number of exchanges under it did not equal the demand. In the two years before the establishment of the system 157 exchanges took place, and in the two years succeeding only 97, so that in those last two years there were about 60 per cent of those who probably would have exchanged if the opportunity had been afforded them. The exchanges now effected were precisely those which the authorities ought to encourage—namely, with men who liked Indian life, and who were inclined to stay in India for the sake of the higher pay. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) said the principle on which this Bill proceeded was that a poor officer might eke out his emoluments by the receipt of a bonus. In reality, the Bill was framed as much in the interest of the poor as of the rich officers; but, after all, the House ought to endeavour to promote, not the interests of any class of officers, but the well-being of the Army. At present an officer might be compelled to retire from a service in which he desired to continue, or else go to a distant country with a feeling that he had been unjustly treated. It might be true, as had been stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London, that several witnesses had said that they had in past times paid large sums of money for their exchanges, and that they looked forward to recoup themselves under the old system. But to make good such losses was not, he would beg to remind him, the object of the Bill. If such a case were to come under the notice of his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War to-morrow, he would justly point out that he had nothing whatever to do with anything but the military considerations involved in those transactions. He would, in conclusion, simply express a hope that the House would that evening give its sanction to the measure, and by a majority so decisive that they should be relieved of the menace held out to them of having this fight fought over and over again so long as the measure was before Parliament. He was quite sure the country would see that there was no danger of the revival of purchase, and that it was desirable that they should give contentment and satisfaction to their officers, and he was sure that this Bill would do more than anything else to restore good feeling and contentment.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, that it struck him as somewhat remarkable that the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for Sunderland, with, as he had reminded the House that night, a varied service of

29 years, had been able to point to but a single instance of the evils which it was contended had resulted from the former system of exchanges. That single instance many would be inclined to think was a peculiar and well-defined example of the good which might and often did accrue under the old system to officers more fortunate in possessing gallantry and ability than worldly means. The noble and brave father of the Member for Sunderland had—owing to the very circumstances which prolonged his stay in India—been afforded opportunities of serving his country in a high position—opportunities which it was needless to say he had nobly turned to the best account. True, he had died sooner than his compatriots would have wished; but he died on the scene of his glory, and under any circumstances it would have been hard to have attributed his premature death to the former system of exchanges, although it might on the other hand, be fairly argued that it was the fixing of his lot in India, of which the hon. Baronet had complained, that gave him the opportunity of reaping his harvest of renown. But able and experienced as was the hon. and gallant Baronet, it seemed that his mind had become saturated with the evils of the former Purchase system, until he looked at everything connected with the Army—even at exchanges, through a medium which gave a particular tint to all his views. As for himself (Captain Nolan) his experience in service was not indeed so long as that of the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland, but he thought that the fact of his having always belonged to a non-Purchase corps gave him some advantages in attempting to calculate what would be the probable course of events in the Infantry and Cavalry, now that their working was changed from a Purchase to a non-Purchase system, over those possessed by the hon. and gallant Baronet. Now, first as to the argument of the Member for Sunderland, that promotion would be purchased under the exchange system. There were in the Artillery and Engineers over 2,000 officers, and while in the last 8 or 10 years hundreds of exchanges had been made in those corps, it was a fact beyond all contention that not one single step of promotion had been gained in either corps through exchanges. Again take the case of double battalions—and exclusive of the Guards (who no more required a system of exchanges than did German or Austrian officers)—the Army reckoned 58 of such battalions—was it not unlikely, nay, impossible that a captain could in these, as had been suggested, make arrangements with the 19 captains who would be over his head, so as to purchase promotion? The same argument applied of course, with increased force to the subalterns of such battalions. But take even single battalions, was it likely that an officer could, in exchanging, negotiate with the nine captains which even there he would have to clear out of his path to secure his own promotion, and that, too, in defiance of every regulation. With the Cavalry, where sometimes there were as few as seven captains to a regiment, these difficulties, insuperable in the previous cases, became less, but still could only be vanquished if we supposed that there was no Secretary for War, or that the person occupying that position steadily insisted on keeping his eyes shut. It was, perhaps, conceivable that promotion could be thus purchased by majors and colonels of the Cavalry and Infantry—not, remember, of the Artillery and Engineers. But were the interests of over 10,000 officers to be sacrificed because a rule generally advantageous might, if great laxity prevailed at the War Office, be open to abuse by a special class of 600 or 700 officers? Was it not the proper course to pass the general rule for the great majority of cases, and to take special precautions to prevent the realization of abuses in the exceptional instances? The right hon. Gentleman who had spoken first to-night had said that vested interests would accrue under a system of exchange. Now, the only instance in which he specially advocated exchanges, or in which officers cared much, or at least vitally, about them, was when there was a change of stations, as from England to India, or to some distant colony; and these were instances in which, he contended, it was impossible that vested interests could accrue, for hon. Members must bear in mind that a regiment served for five years at home and for 10 abroad, and it had been specially pointed out to them by the right hon. Gentleman that time was necessary for the growth of a vested interest. How, then, could a vested interest spring up in an exchange which during five years was constantly sinking in value, and which at the end of that time would have reached its minimum? But would not, in fact, an officer paying for an exchange, be purchasing a necessarily perishable commodity, in which it was impossible from the very nature of things that vested interests could arise. With regard to other remarks that fell from the right hon. Gentleman, he thought that officers would deem it—and with justice—hard that such attacks should come from the right hon. Gentleman? Whom did the right hon. Gentleman represent here? Who but the greatest body of traders that the world had ever seen?—traders, who in the interests of their commerce, had insisted on the Navy conquering almost every important maritime fortress on the globe, and had since called on the Army to garrison and retain these ports. But not content with this, these same traders had banded themselves into a Company, and conquered a territory of 200,000,000 population, which they again called on our Army to hold for them—while they sent here a right hon. Gentleman to prevent the officers of that Army from alleviating the heavy burthen which such a task entailed. The right hon. Gentleman had denounced the commercial notions of officers, but he should have remembered that if they exchanged their scanty hundreds, it was to lighten the toil necessarily incurred in procuring for the right hon. Gentleman's constituents the faculty of amassing their tens of millions—and yet to this the right hon. Gentleman objected, on the ground of high principle. There was another point:—Hon. Gentlemen who last year had shown no interest in the private soldier or the non-commissioned officer, said now—"Why not allow the private and the non-commissioned officer also to exchange?" Well, he hoped hon. Members would remember this when the question of the non-commissioned officers came on, as he hoped it would come on, this Session; but it was a fact that at present, most privates could almost choose where they would serve as between England and India, or the Colonies. A soldier enlisted for only six years, and he could choose either a regiment going to India, in which he could spend all that six years, or one just returned, in which he would be sure of five years' home service. Officers had no corresponding power, and except by exchange could not in any way select their stations. The right hon. Member for the City of London alluded to the Lord Clyde argument, which he said had never been answered. Now Lord Clyde was a man of tolerably strong prejudices; he stuck to one regiment, going wherever he was ordered, and doing good service. An argument was drawn from Lord Clyde's career that an officer might become a good general by sticking to one regiment. But there was a greater man than Lord Clyde—the Duke of Wellington—who changed his regiment no fewer than six times before he became colonel. Therefore, it was within the bounds of possibility that a man might become a good general, even though he changed his regiments. Other specific instances had been brought forward, for example, that of Major Arbuthnot had been mentioned. Now the case of Major Arbuthnot was almost a typical one, as showing that it was not foreign service which the officer wished to escape, but rather the time at which such service was to be home. Major Arbuthnot had certainly of late obtained relief from foreign service by an exchange, but what were the true facts in his military life? Why, that he had twice been on foreign and active service during his previous career; that in one at least of these instances he had volunteered and had been promoted for good conduct in the field. Again early in the discussion, the hon. Member for the Border Burghs had pointed out the imaginary evils which might result to the service from an exchange between a specially efficient colonel, stationed on the North-west frontier of India, and a colonel stationed in, and just good enough for, a Cathedral town in England. Well, in 1815 colonels had been suddenly summoned from Cathedral towns to face a great master of war in Belgium. But let that pass. Suppose the Cathedral colonel inefficient—it would under any regulations for exchange be perfectly within the scope of the Secretary of State for War, to prohibit such an exchange on pure military grounds, which this Bill did not purport to affect. He would however give a converse case to that of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs to show that the present prohibition of money passing beyond a certain figure in exchanges, was, sometimes, actually injurious to the service only premising that while the case of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs was imaginary, his was an actual one. A Cavalry colonel, known to be an extremely good soldier, fit not only for a Cathedral town, but for a campaign in any part of Europe, had been ordered to India. He had no special acquaintance with that country, and he had reasons for wishing to remain at home, so he applied to another Cavalry colonel, who was perhaps a little too much of a Hindoo, but who did not wish particularly to exchange. However, he said he would, if the War Office would allow him pretty liberal costs—not only the expenses of his journey and the outfit of his bungalow, but also the price of his horses. But the Secretary of State for War would not consent. And yet it would be a very difficult thing for any Secretary of State for War to determine what would be the cost of an exchange or an outfit. Sir Charles Napier had said that the outfit of an officer ought to be a piece of soap and two towels, but officers might have a different opinion. It should not be forgotten that the English Army was in a totally different position from that of any other Army in the world. Not 1 per cent of the Prussian or Austrian Armies were out of the country; and in Germany, officers might remain in a garrison town for 20 years, except for the 18 months they were on active service. Now the keenest men about exchanges were the officers of the Artillery and Engineers, because they were liable to be sent abroad twice as often as other officers. The latter had to go out with their regiments, but officers of the Artillery had to go abroad with their batteries and also whenever they were promoted. He hoped this Motion would not be pressed to a division. The proper course would be for those who had objections to the Bill to endeavour to modify and improve it in Committee.

COLONEL NORTH said, he was not surprised at the Motions of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) and the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) to reject the Bill on the second reading; but he was surprised at the part which had been taken by the hon. and gallant Member for Bath (Captain Hayter) with reference to it, which was of so much importance to his brother soldiers, the more so as he belonged to a branch of the service who were not affected by this Bill, as their duties about the Sovereign confined their stations to London and Windsor, and occasionally to Dublin—he meant the Brigade of Guards—who were always ready and willing to go on foreign service, and who were sure to uphold the honour and glory of the country wherever they went. But he was still more surprised at the part which had been taken in opposition to the Bill by the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock). He had followed with great interest and delight the glorious career of the hon. and gallant Baronet's father; but he could not help thinking that if that distinguished officer were now alive he would not have approved the course taken to-night by the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland. If there was any officer of the service who had obtained more by the system of exchanges than another, it was the late Sir Henry Havelock—and it was fortunate, both for his country and himself, that he was able to make them, as it enabled him to remain in India, which afterwards became the scene of his glory and his success. With regard to the speech made the other evening by the hon. Member for the Border Burghs, he must say he had drawn very largely on his imagination and stated as positive facts what required a little more consideration. For instance, the hon. Member stated that out of the whole Army 50 battalions were stationed in India, and only four or five were stationed at distant and unhealthy climates. [Mr. TREVELYAN: Where they did not get a large increase of pay.] There were two in China, three at the Cape of Good Hope—[Mr. TREVELYAN: I do not call that an unhealthy climate]—in Ceylon, Bermuda, Jamaica, the West African Settlements, the Gold Coast, Gibraltar, and Malta. There were no less than 24 battalions of the Army stationed in these parts, and yet the hon. Member for the Border Burghs said there were but four or five. Then the hon. Member said that if they passed this Bill commissions in the Army would be sold and bartered, and officers would be constantly changing from regiments in which promotion was slow to regiments in which promotion was rapid.

Captain Nolan

Lord Clyde himself had exchanged on four different occasions. The hon. and gallant Member quoted from the speech made against the Bill by the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), who suggested that the case of the poor officer should be met by an increase of pay, instead of in the manner sanctioned by this measure. A friend of his, struck by the sudden fit of liberality which had come over that hon. Member, remarked that the hon. Gentleman surely could not be the late Financial Secretary of the War Office, who had had an opportunity for several years of increasing the pay of the officers, but had not signalized himself by any such achievement. The opinion of the Duke of Cambridge was, that exchanges were freely permitted when individually desirable, and when they were beneficial to the public service. Sir Charles Yorke, for many years Military Secretary, considered exchanges to be personally and publicly advantageous; and Sir Richard Airey said they were of great advantage to the public and to individuals. In fact, exchanges were of great convenience to the rich officer, and to the poor officer of the greatest pecuniary importance, for a sub-lieutenant in the Army did not now get the pay of a journeyman carpenter. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) said the other night that in opposing the Bill he would be supported by the whole Liberal Party, led by their new Chief. He doubted that statement, knowing as he did that the noble Lord opposite (the Marquess of Hartington) had been Secretary of State for War, and must well understand the real nature of that measure. He could not understand why this should be made a Party question, for the Liberals had just as many relatives in the Army as their political opponents. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) the other night, in his eloquent peroration, declared that one of the three things which ought not to be bought or sold was the honour of a soldier. Well, it was the first time he (Colonel North) ever knew that the right hon. Gentleman took an interest in the honour and glory of our officers, and certainly during the period that he was Chancellor of Exchequer there was more injury done to the Army than at any previous time. The system of purchase, having been done away with, would never again be restored, although if the measure abolishing it had to come on again he would offer it the same determined opposition as he did before. He sincerely hoped that the Bill would pass, for both the rich and the poor officers were entirely agreed as to its desirability.

MAJOR BEAUMONT observed, that the Secretary of State for War, when introducing the Bill, said that he would not have brought it forward if he had not been quite sure that it had nothing to do, directly or indirectly, with the question of the re-introduction of Purchase; but he differed entirely from the right hon. Gentleman upon that point. He believed that this Bill did re-introduce the system of purchase, and it would be a most difficult thing for the War Office to frame regulations which would prevent its re-introduction. A junior officer would find it a convenient mode of getting rid of his seniors—to ask them to exchange instead of buying them out as formerly. Officers who joined the Guards previous to the abolition of Purchase, and who had obtained the rank of captain and lieutenant colonel, were unable to exchange with officers of the same rank in the Line. Consequently, they were debarred from exchanging altogether; whereas the junior officers in the Guards would find themselves, after the passing of this Bill, in this position—that the value of their commissions would be increased not from any question of purchase, but because of the social advantages of the service, and the pleasanter conditions in which they were placed. The same argument would hold good with respect to commissions in the Cavalry and commissions in the Line. Officers would choose to exchange from the less favoured to the more favoured regiments; and, if so, would they not pay money for it? Therefore, it could not be said of a Bill which would have the effect of stamping commissions with a value which they had not before, that it would not have a great tendency to purchase. He maintained that it would. It was true that the amount of money passed under the new system would be as nothing compared with the amount which passed under the old system, but the principle would be the same. There were special circumstances in the re-introduction of purchase which would tend to its extension, and, at the same time, it was likely to prove a source of practical embarrassment to the War Office. Foreign Governments recognized the principle of exchange in connection with their armies, but they did not permit payments between the officers. The thing was unknown in foreign service. The Secretary of State for War shook his head; but, for his own part, he was not aware of any instance of the kind. He was free to admit that there were circumstances which rendered the condition of officers different from those which obtained in other branches of the service and also in other Armies abroad; but that difference, he maintained, was not such as to warrant the re-introduction of a system which, at any rate, a large number of Members considered to be fraught with such important and disastrous consequences so far as the principle was concerned. The whole of the arguments in favour of this Bill had turned on the word "convenience." If it were true that the convenience of the Army would be consulted, and that the change would tend to the interests of the State, he should have been happy to give his vote in favour of the Bill. He was willing to admit that the convenience of officers might be consulted to a certain extent, but it became a question of degree. The Secretary of State for War had alluded to the number of regimental exchanges that had taken place in the two years previous to the abolition of purchase, stating the number to be 159, as against 97 in the two subsequent years. These were regimental exchanges, and to these would have to be added a number of others, though the regimental were the more numerous. According to that statement the number of officers whose convenience would be consulted by the passing of the measure was insignificant. The inducements to officers to exchange divided themselves into two classes. One was represented by officers who exchanged for some reason connected with their health, or because they disliked their regiment and wished to serve elsewhere. To that class of exchange, Members could not reasonably object on either side of the House. The provisions of the War Office were such that not only was there no veto placed on such exchanges, but the War Office went further and said that any reasonable amount of money paid for such exchanges was legitimate. But there was a second class of inducements to exchange. There were pecuniary reasons. A great deal had been said about the abstract question of justice as between the richer and the poorer officers. He believed that exchanges of that kind, when sanctioned, were perfectly consistent with honourable feeling; but it was a great question whether sanction ought to be given to the principle that was involved. There was one class of pecuniary reasons which was of a somewhat peculiar character. It reversed the ordinary current where the rich man paid the poor man, because the poor officer would in this case pay the rich, expecting to recoup himself by the emoluments of service in India. But he put it to the House whether it was desirable that speculative exchanges of that kind should be encouraged? His own belief was that it was not desirable, and that money paid for such exchanges would be likely to prove anything but satisfactory to those who paid it. When we had deducted the number of officers who would exchange in that manner, and when it was taken into consideration that there was a considerable proportion of exchanges which were not objected to on either side of the House, there was really a very small residuum of exchanges which would be affected by this Bill; and looking to the small amount of convenience which officers would derive from it, he maintained that it was not to be compared with the disadvantage that would accrue to the public service by the introduction of a system which, at any rate, a large number of the Members on the Opposition side of the House regarded as immoral in principle and unsatisfactory in its working. He did not wish to say anything on the sentimental aspect of the question, to which the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) had done full justice. He felt perfectly certain that whether the system of purchase were or were not the law of this country, English officers would always be found to do their duty honourably and straightforwardly whatever the circumstances under which they might be called upon. But there were practical considerations which suggested themselves in the consideration of this Bill. It was not, in his opinion, a desirable course of legislation to stimulate exchanges. Apart from what had been said about officers running away from their regiments, whether in presence of an enemy or of sickness, there was no doubt that officers and men had greater mutual confidence and esteem if they knew each other and were associated with each other in every-day life; and on that consideration alone a system which had for its effect to stimulate exchanges was not one to commend itself to ordinary judgment. He should like to know what the Secretary of State for War would say in reply to this—how officers on half-pay for meritorious services were to be placed on an equality with other officers who, after the passing of this Bill, could exchange. The last argument he would use against the Bill was not the least important. Lord Cardwell used to point out to this House how it was that Purchase stood in the way of Army reform, and how it was that he was tripped up on this question of Purchase in everything he did for the good of the Army. It was complained of at the time that the House was called to pay £8,000,000 to redeem the Army from pawn; and, for his own part, he thought it would have been far better that the scheme of organization should have come in first and should have led up to the necessity for the abolition of Purchase. That was his view at the time; but he consoled himself with the idea that he should be able to justify his vote in favour of abolition by saying that he had helped to redeem the Army from pawn in such a sense that Purchase could not come back again, and that the way was clear for a comprehensive scheme of Army reform. Since the passing of the measure for the Abolition of Purchase he had been somewhat disappointed; because, instead of the Army having been welded into an harmonious whole, as they had been promised it should be, nothing had been done beyond the establishment of a certain fanciful connection between the Reserves and the Regular Forces. The re-organization of the Army was not a question to be determined according to Party politics, and he should have been equally ready to accept any good scheme of Army reform from right hon. Gentlemen opposite as from those who sat before him. He regretted, however, to find that the first important step that the right hon. Gentleman had taken in the matter was to return to the purchase system which the country had paid £8,000,000 to get rid of. If this measure became law, it would prove a complete bar to all future Army reform, and he regretted extremely that it had been introduced, and it would tend to resuscitate in the Army ideas that could never be realized. He was sure that the vote of that House to-night in favour of this Bill would have to be undone by future legislation.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL reminded hon. Members opposite as a proof that the system of exchanges would not conduce to the re-establishment of Purchase, that that system had been in force from time immemorial in the Artillery and the Engineers, in which the Purchase system had never been adopted. Being desirous of obtaining information from practical men on this subject he had put certain questions to the manager of Messrs. Cox and Company, who had been in their establishment upwards of 50 years, and who was in constant communication with officers of all ranks. The statement of that gentleman was to the effect that he saw no possible way in which exchanges could re-introduce the Purchase system—the two subjects being quite distinct; that he regarded the question of exchanges as essentially one affecting the poorer class of officers; there being always four or five times as many men anxious to exchange as there were men who wished to offer a money equivalent; that under the old system the poorer officers were always anxious to exchange in order to enable them to obtain the funds for supporting and educating their families, that many restrictions used to be put upon exchanges on the part of the military authorities; and that in no case had he known a man who had exchanged into a home regiment who had been permitted to exchange again when that regiment was ordered abroad. He had 1,200 accounts under his charge, and, in his opinion, the whole Army was dissatisfied with the present condition of affairs as regarded exchanges, and looked forward with satisfaction to the passing of this Bill. If this Bill were to be rejected the military authorities had better at once prohibit all officers below the rank of Field Officers from marrying. He (Sir Charles Russell) would remind the House that when an officer wished to exchange he had to go first of all to his colonel, and, if he gave good reasons enough to satisfy him, he then had to apply to the Commander-in-Chief. Now did the hon. Members opposite mean to say that the Commander-in-Chief could not be entrusted to say who ought to exchange and who ought not; because, if so, how was it that they entrusted him to say who was fit for promotion, which was a much more important matter than exchanges? A good deal had been said as to the convenience of officers being the sole matter considered, and it had been asserted that when once a pecuniary consideration had passed, almost exclusive regard was paid to the wishes of the officers concerned. Well, on that subject he might be allowed to say that he had once exchanged. He was under orders for foreign service, but being ill at the time he applied to the authorities for leave to exchange, and did exchange with an officer junior to himself in the regiment. Before he sailed news reached England of our difficulties with Madagascar, and the draft of the regiment was ordered to be augmented. He was, as he had said, very ill at the time and obliged to keep his bed; but, notwithstanding that fact, he could not touch the hearts of the authorities. The service, and not the convenience of officers was the one thing to be considered, and he actually sailed in the same ship, with the officer with whom he had exchanged. He had the curiosity to examine some Returns on this subject which took place from 1866 to 1873, and found that during all that time only one exchange took place in every year. If there was any desire on the part of certain officers to take advantage of their wealth or position, the vigilance of the authorities was sufficient to check and control any such desire if it existed. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) stated the other day that officers were degraded by such exchanges. He, for one, did not feel at all degraded by the fact that his father had paid £100 to an officer who was willing to exchange with him. The right hon. Gentleman asked what would be thought of a Judge who wished to exchange from the Court of Queen's Bench to the Court of Common Pleas—but as the Judges complained of the heated atmosphere and want of ventilation of those Courts the exchange would merely be from one bad smell to another. He would mention a more apposite exchange. Suppose a County Court Judge in Northumberland, with a sickly wife, desired on account of her health to exchange to Devonshire, and paid a sum of money on account of the difference in value of house property, but did so with the sanction of the Lord Chancellor, could such an exchange be objected to, or would the Judge be degraded on account of it? Would a clergyman be degraded who exchanged from a country parish to a wider sphere of usefulness in London, or from London to the country on account of the state of his health. He could not think so, and how, he asked, was an officer of the Army degraded when, for sufficient reason, and with the sanction of the authorities, he exchanged? Did the House really believe, said an officer to him in a letter the other day, that Lord Penzance, Lord Justice James, and Mr. Hunt would have reported in favour of the system if they had not thought it necessary? The opposition to it was a party one, and was calculated to shake the confidence of the Army in those on both sides of the House who had to administer the affairs of the nation. He rejoiced that this Bill would pass into law, because it was a fulfilment of promises which the Conservative Party made so freely at the General Election, promises which were fully and practically endorsed by the country—namely, that no profession should any longer be needlessly harassed.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was not astonished that his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Westminster (Sir Charles Russell) should have introduced the high authority in favour of the Bill of the principal clerk of Messrs. Cox, the Army agents, because they might depend upon it that when the Bill passed into law, Messrs. Cox and Co. would be the most influential authorities on the subject of the British Army. The Secretary of State himself and the Commander-in-Chief would have to bow their heads in deference to the accomplished clerk of Messrs. Cox, the Army agents; and those 1,200 accounts which his hon. and gallant Friend had paraded before the House would no doubt be largely increased by the exchanges to be negotiated by them under that Bill. He would not have taken part in the debate were it not that he had had some practical experience of the operation of exchanges upon regiments in Her Majesty's Service. It had happened to him, in his professional capacity, some years ago to be concerned in an inquiry into the condition of one of the most famous and celebrated regiments in the service of the Queen, which was placed in the unfortunate position of being called back from India very shortly after it had been sent there, in order that it might be tried, he might almost say, at the bar of public opinion rather than by general court-martial, which was the instrument of that inquiry, by the order of the Commander-in-Chief; and he had no hesitation in saying that the unhappy condition of that regiment was produced principally by the operation of exchanges. He would state, not a theoretical case, but the practical result of the system of exchanges at a recent period, authorized by military authorities both of England and India. The regiment in question was ordered to India at the height of the Indian Mutiny. Shortly before it left its colonels retired, not by exchange, but on half-pay. Within three years of the time the regiment went to India, it had three separate colonels; and it lost its major, five captains, two lieutenants, its doctor, and its paymaster, through the system of exchanges. What was the result of these exchanges sanctioned by the military authorities? At a period when the regiment required the moral support of its officers more than at any other time, it was left to itself by the mass of them, and they were replaced by strangers to the regiment. Hon. Gentlemen opposite were great admirers of the regimental esprit de corps. If selection were introduced it was considered a bad thing, because it destroyed the esprit de corps; but if it were destroyed by money, that was all right. What an outcry there would have been if a famous regiment had lost its colonel and its officers by the principle of selection; but when the same effect was produced by pecuniary considerations, under the sanction of the military authorities, it was all right, and was an admirable system. What happened with regard to the regiment in question? The officers quarrelled with each other, and some of them caballed with the non-commissioned officers. ["No, no!"] At all events, that was the sentence of the Commander-in-Chief, who removed them from the regiment. The colonel, who was brought home to be tried, and who had exchanged into the regiment, was acquitted, but the other officers, who had also exchanged, were removed from the regiment, and that was the result of a system which by this Bill the Government were wishing to encourage and promote. Memorandum after Memorandum was launched at that regiment after it went to India—a regiment which up to that time had never had an aspersion cast upon it by the military authorities. That was his answer to the hon. and gallant Gentleman when he said how could they suppose that mischiefs would happen under the control of the military authorities. He gave that as a practical answer to the challenge put forth by the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster. It was very remarkable that these circumstances occurred immediately after His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief had given evidence before the Duke of Somerset's Commission, in 1857, when His Royal Highness said it was entirely in the power of the military authorities to control exchanges, and they would be so controlled. It was proved, however, that the military authorities were unable to control these exchanges as soon as pecuniary considerations were introduced into the matter. The recollection of that case would cause him to vote against the Bill. The great and only argument really adduced in favour of the Bill was the recommendation of the Commissioners. Now, he had a great respect for the eminent men who formed that Commission; but when it was alleged that their Report ought to be conclusive, he must adopt a legal phrase and say that there never was a finding more out of the Order of Reference. The question they had to consider was what compensation should be made for the abolition of Purchase; and if they had recommended that Purchase should be restored, they would not more have exceeded their authority than by recommending the sanction of exchanges. Their Report brought a considerable amount of pressure to bear upon the Secretary of State for War; but the House must examine this matter for itself. He looked for the case in favour of the Bill in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hardy). He made a distinction between exchanges and sale. But barter where money passed was just as much a sale as in any other case. But then they were asked to pass this Bill for the sake of the asthmatic officers. He hoped that asthma did not prevail so extensively in the British Army that it was necessary to have a Bill for the sake of the asthmatic officers. Then there was the great tailors'-bill argument. That was of more extended application. This was a Bill, according to the right hon. Member, to take young gentlemen who had lived a little too fast out of pawn and make them available for the service of the country. It seemed to him that this was a better argument for post-obits than for exchanges; and for himself he was unwilling to see Her Majesty's Army turned into a court for the recovery of small debts for even the most respectable tradesman. But that was not the real object of the Bill. The real object was described by the hon. and gallant Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), who said he must protest against the attempt to run down fancy officers. The hon. and gallant Member said—

"It was expedient that country gentlemen having county influence, and others having independent fortunes, should be encouraged to enter the Army for a short time for the sake of benefiting themselves by its discipline."

It was not that the Empire should be defended, but that country gentleman should be benefited by discipline.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF explained that what he had said was that the country gentlemen would be benefited by discipline, with the object of taking the command of regiments of Militia and Volunteers.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had these words on his notes, and was coming to them if the hon. and gallant Member had not interrupted him. His object was, not that the country gentlemen should go and serve their Queen and country in any part of the world, but that they should become good officers for the Militia and Volunteers. That reminded him of the famous jest made by William Pitt in 1803 on the passing of the Militia Bill of 1803—that certain corps seemed likely to act up to the tradition that they were "never to leave the country except in case of actual invasion." That was why it was to be reserved for country gentlemen to benefit by Army discipline. There was the true old Tory ring about that candid statement of the object of the Bill. We had only lately emerged from the time when the theory pervaded the public service that every Department was kept up for the purpose of benefiting country gentlemen of great county influence. The Tory Party had received an education which had much improved it, and under a wiser system we had abolished privileges of this kind in every other part of our public service and social life, and it was in the Army alone that they were proposed to be restored. They once said that if Purchase was abolished no English gentleman would ever enter the Army. ["Oh!"] Well, at all events, it was said it would discourage them from entering the Army, but it had not done so; and it showed that the estimate of the spirit of English gentlemen on his side the House was much greater than that of the present Government. That was the true history of the Bill. The hon. and gallant Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had let the cat out of the bag, and that was why the Bill was so enthusiastically supported on the other side of the House. The hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Sir Charles Russell) said, that the Bill was demanded by the Army. He dared to say it was. The House had heard that it was convenient to every branch of officers, and no doubt every profession liked to have its business conducted in accordance with its own convenience. On the part of the legal profession, he protested against the sales and exchanges so kindly recommended by the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster. Indeed, these things could not be defended by gentlemen of high character and feeling, unless their opinions had been warped by the long-established system of money Purchase. The old boroughmongers were not worse than others; they could not understand what possible objection there was to selling a seat in this House; in like manner the old sinecurists could not understand why a man should not have £5,000 a-year for doing nothing; and it was not until some time after these things had been abolished that everybody came to understand how bad they were. The most remarkable feature of the debate was that nearly all the Gentlemen who supported the Bill were in favour of the Purchase system, and the

hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North) said he hoped to see it restored. The Secretary of State for War did not say so; he said he did not wish to restore Purchase; he said he should be dishonest if he attempted to restore it; but after the arguments that had been used, especially after the weighty statement of the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock), the House and the country had a right to expect from the Secretary of State for War a more solid explanation of the manner by which we were to be assured that Purchase was not to be restored. The hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Sir Charles Russell) could not understand how it was possible to restore Purchase; but the possibility could easily be explained. Suppose there was a junior captain of a regiment in India, or of a regiment in England just about to go to India, and there was a regiment, a favourite regiment, which had just come home. The junior captain knew the probabilities were that, in a short time, exchanges would occur in that regiment, and that if he entered it, he would have a greater chance of rising in it than he would have of rising in a regiment differently circumstanced, and if he entered it by purchase it was purchased promotion. What was to prevent the same gentleman, without its being known, communicating with a friend in India, and by private negotiation purchasing another step? Indeed, he might go on purchasing step after step; Mr. Cox would manage it for him admirably; and, under cover of this system of exchange, he might purchase his way to the top captaincy, exactly as if the system of Purchase still existed. What was to prevent a man who knew the colonel of a particular regiment paying a large sum for an exchange into it, on the chance of promotion. True, he would not be certain of it; but ceteribus paribus, as a good man, he would have the chance of the next step, and that would be purchasing promotion just as much as if Purchase existed. The power of exchange would give a money value to a commission when it was granted. A lady might ask for a commission for her son to enable him to pay his tailor's and other bills; and she might obtain a commission in an expensive regiment, which might be exchanged for money immediately. That would be giving money just as much as if it were given in cash. Nothing would prevent these things, for nothing would be known about them; and the right hon. Gentleman said he did not know anything about them. One good man would exchange with another, and whether £1,000 or £2,000 had passed nobody would know. He took it for granted that the officers of the Guards who gave evidence before the Commission represented the opinions of the Guards. If they did not, it was odd that those who entertained opposite opinions did not give evidence; and every one of the witnesses claimed a vested right in sale and exchange, not subject to military circumstances at all. Their language was express on the subject; they said they had a right to recoup themselves by exchange, and that exchange was the certain resource of the officer in the Guards or Cavalry in time of need. What became of military discretion when this claim was made? This Bill was to give this right of exchange, and to attach a value of £2,000 or £3,000 to a commission. It was not denied that exchanges ought to be permitted; but the question was, why they should be made for money? Was money necessary? That was the real question. It was not alleged that any exchanges which were desirable on military grounds had been prevented by the present system. The system of one officer paying another officer's cost of transit was a bad one; he would rather see the cost borne by the country. The Secretary for War gave three instances when exchanges ought to take place; first, when an officer found himself in a regiment he did not like; secondly, when an officer wished to serve in a regiment in which his father had served before him; and, thirdly, when an officer wished to go to a regiment where he had friends, or which represented his nationality. But all that they did for the private soldier, without any money passing, and could they not do it for officers in the same way? If the passage of money was unnecessary, did it not do harm? Did the "fancy officer" do no harm to the British Army? The Report of the Duke of Somerset's Commission, to which the first three names attached were those of Somerset, Stanley (Lord Derby), and Sidney Herbert, said—

"The system attracts to the service idle young men who, having money at their disposal, regard the Army as a fashionable pastime for a few years of leisure, and bring with them habits of excess and dissipation injurious to discipline and embarrassing to their fellow-officers, who are often forced to leave the regiment where such extravagant modes of living prevail."

That was their opinion of the "fancy officer." He made it difficult for the poor man to remain in a regiment; and this was the poor man's argument against exchange. As the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock) said, the system of exchange furnished a return flow-pipe, for poor men who made room for rich men. When the "Battle of Dorking" came, he should be sorry to think the British Army was divided into two classes. In the old days there were regiments called the "Die Hards;" he should be sorry to think there would be regiments called the "Living Invalids." He should be sorry to think that when that battle came to be fought, the security of Great Britain depended mainly on soldiers who had not studied the science of their profession in the best schools—that of foreign service, whether in India or elsewhere. An hon. and gallant gentleman (Captain Nolan) said, that the English Army was in a different position from that of any other country. Now, there was another Army—which was on our Indian frontier, or near it—which served in climes quite as trying, and in places quite as inhospitable, and under skies quite as severe as our own—he meant the Russian Army on the shores of the Caspian. It was, however, only the English Army that asked for that which the Russian Army would feel ashamed of if it were a part of their system—exchanges for money value. Such exchanges, he might add, were never permitted in our old Indian Army, and General Vivian, an old Indian officer, in evidence before the Commission, stated that on account of the superiority of some stations in that country to others, to have allowed them would have created great heart-burnings in the Army. Why, then, was it sought to make exchanges universal in the English Army on the same ground? Again, let him ask what sort of officers we got abroad by the system of exchanges? He knew there was a theory, which was to some extent a favourite one with many hon. Members in that House, that the sort of young gentleman who wanted to pay his tailor's bill was the best man that could be procured for the Army; but Sir Colin Campbell, the late Lord Clyde, when asked what sort of men exchange gave, and whether he thought frequent exchanges would produce a bad effect, said that, in his opinion, they did injury to the service, though they might be a benefit to the individual. Those men who went out to India merely in order to get increase of pay he did not regard as the best sort of officers. Such was the opinion of one who was himself a distinguished soldier; and, indeed, of purchased substitutes every army in the world had shown itself anxious to get rid. He had the good fortune to have heard a great speech which had been some time ago made by General Trochu on the organization of the French Army, and a great part of it was taken up with a statement of the injury which was done to the Army by the system of purchased substitutes. Anyone who read the Report of the Commission could not fail to be struck, he might add, by the evidence of Colonel Bray as to the way in which poor officers were obliged to "watch the market." He confessed that that sort of huckstering tone reminded him of a passage with which hon. Members were familiar in Romeo and Juliet, when Romeo, going to the unfortunate Apothecary, said—

"Art thou so bare, and full of wretchedness, And fear'st to die?"

Then the Apothecary replied—

"My poverty, but not my will, consents."
Romeo. "I pay thy poverty, and not thy will."

And then, being a fine gentleman, he bade him a courteous farewell. Now, that was, he confessed, a sort of language and spirit which he should be sorry to see introduced into the British Army. For his own part, he strongly objected to it. Nec cupomantes bellum, sed belligerantes. The House had heard a great deal of the ad captandum argument of the poor man, and poor men, no doubt, very often found it very desirable to get money by going out to India; but there was a poor man whom the Bill did not help, but whom it would destroy. He referred to the poor man in India who wanted to get home. Now, if once the proposed system of exchanges were established, no officer unless he was rich could come back from India,

so that the very man who was most entitled to consideration would be absolutely excluded from the advantages which it was proposed to confer. That was his answer to the poor man's argument. Beyond that the Bill would, he contended, interfere with the disponibilité of the British officer; although, of course, he would have no absolute right to refuse to go wherever he might be ordered. But he wished the House to take a larger view of the question than the mere convenience of a few individuals. He should like to ask what would be the probable effect of the proposed system on the great mass of private soldiers in the Army? ["Oh, oh!"] That was surely a question which they would not be ashamed to discuss, for it affected the most important branch of the Army. The private soldiers of our Army were, he was thankful to say, not what they were. [Laughter.] He did not know why hon. Members laughed. There was no class which had more improved in recent years in character and intelligence, and it was for that reason he asked what they were likely to think of the measure before the House? They were men who did not take for granted as they did 40 or 50 years ago that persons of rank and wealth and station should be placed in exceptional positions. They reflected on such things, and the House was bound therefore to consider the effect of a measure like the present upon their minds. It was said, indeed, that exchanges were never effected in the presence of battle or war; but was heroism confined, he would ask, to facing the bullets or the sword? Was there not as much fortitude and courage required to face the swamp and the hospital? ["No, no!"] The hon. Gentleman who cried "No, no" must be one of those soldiers described by the hon. and gallant Member for Christchurch; but did they not think that want of fortitude of the two descriptions he had mentioned exercised also a depressing, discouraging, and a demoralizing influence on the discipline of the Army? When the men went to battle with their lives in their hands day after day, what would they think of their officers dropping away one by one under the institution of this exchange system? Well, he knew of a regiment in which three colonels, one major, and five captains left it in three years, and what would the men think if such a system as that was practised under the encouragement of a Parliamentary measure like this, which enabled officers to return to their pleasant homes while they, the men, were left in the jungle and the desert to die? Such a system would be void of that which they had heard described as esprit de corps in the Army. These were considerations which, if they did not recommend themselves to hon. Gentlemen opposite, he at all events regarded as worthy of the serious attention of the House. The men to whom he referred left their regiments, not because they were disabled or invalided, but because, in the language of the Commission, they were "more blessed with this world's goods than the men whom they replaced." ["Divide!"] If hon. Gentlemen opposite thought they would stifle discussion, they were mistaken. But if the men had an unfavourable opinion of the officers who left them, what would they think of the officers who came to them—officers who came to them, not because they specially preferred the service, but because they were paid for it; officers who came to them, not for love, but for money? And if that was the effect upon the regiments abroad, what would be the effect upon the regiments at home? Of the new officer all the regiment would know was that he was a man who had paid a sum of money to come to them in order to avoid hardships elsewhere which he did not like to endure. [Murmurs.] Well, was that true or not? ["No, no!"] Was it true that an officer paid money in order to exchange a disagreeable life for an easy one? And if these were facts, they might depend upon it the private soldier would know them. But what would a regiment say of the man who left them? They would say—"He was a man whom we knew and liked, and whom we would have followed anywhere; but he has been bought away from us." And thus, by the double operation of the system, two regiments were demoralized. These were the reasons why hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House opposed this Bill, probably—perhaps certainly—in vain. The Ministry had, no doubt, a majority; but no hon. Gentleman ought to know better than those who sat opposite that majorities were ephemeral. On his side of the House they thought they had settled the question two or three years ago. Hon. Gentlemen on the other side had, however, the power to disturb the settlement, and also, he was sorry to say, the will to disturb it. If they did, the Opposition must submit to it; but submission was not acquiescence; and they would not cease to protest against a system which they were convinced was injurious to the military spirit of the British Army. They knew—and there were sagacious men on the Conservative benches who knew—that the tide of public opinion on this subject was already on the turn in their favour. And they would appeal to the enlightened judgment and the deliberate conviction of the nation upon a course which they believed to be injurious to it. They had been accused of dealing with this as a Party question. The hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Sir Charles Russell) had said this Bill was in redemption of the pledges of the Conservative Party at the hustings, and that looked like treating it as a Party question. The hon. and gallant Member for Brighton (General Shute) had said that it was one of the main causes which gained the Conservative Party a majority at the last Election. That surely looked like making the Army the subject of a Party question on the Conservative side of the House. If by saying that the Opposition had treated this as a Party question hon. Gentlemen opposite meant that they had used it in order to embarrass the Government or harass the Army, they made an accusation against them which was unjust. When they dealt with the question, he did not recollect that they ever directed against their opponents such imputations. They thought the Conservatives were mistaken; but they never ventured to say they were unpatriotic. In one sense, indeed, this was a Party question. The differences of parties were in some respects strongly marked, and they depended on the antagonism of great principles. If that were not so, Parliamentary contests would be a mere ignoble scramble for place. There was a distinction of Party in matters of principle, and the Bill raised it in its strongest and most decisive form. The Conservatives were the party who, historically, had been defenders of exclusive privileges, the upholders of traditional monopolies. The principles which the Liberal Party upheld were opposed to all those things.

Century by century, and year by year, the Liberal Party had fought these questions, and, thank God, they had fought them successfully. They had struggled against exclusive privileges and traditional monopolies, and especially against the most ignoble of all privileges, the most unjust of all monopolies—those which were purchased by money. They had sought equality—not the social equality which Revolutionists dreamt of, but equality before the law, the equality of all classes and ranks in the service of the nation and of the Crown. It was because this Bill militated against those principles that he and his hon. Friends were irreconcilably opposed to it. It was because it tended to establish a monopoly and the privileges of wealth that they would vote against it. They opposed the Bill, not because they respected the Army less than did the Conservatives, but because they thought their own view of that which was conducive to its interest and its honour was higher and better than theirs. They resisted this measure because they were sincerely convinced that it was unsound in its principles, and that in its results it would be injurious to that noble profession upon which, in no small degree, depended the reputation of the English name and the fortunes of the English Empire.

MR. DISRAELI: This question has been discussed for two nights—too much, I think—in the light of whether Purchase or non-Purchase is the better system, and whether the Bill has a tendency to return to the arrangements which were abolished two or three years ago. I would rather consider the Bill in this light—Is it a measure which tends to increase the efficiency of the British Army? Now, Sir, I think that before we can come to a right conclusion on that head, we must place before us the changed position of the British officer which since that measure to the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) has just referred, was passed. The British officer, before the measure for the abolition of Purchase was passed, was in this situation—that he had, as it were, a mortgage on his commission. In case he was called upon for any particular service, which, for various reasons, he might not wish to pursue or accomplish, he had to recollect that, if he asserted his independence and followed his own will, he might incur, and indeed would of necessity incur, great pecuniary loss. But what is the position of the British officer now? It is one of complete independence, and I myself do not lament it; because, notwithstanding the numerous imputations and allusions made by hon. Gentlemen opposite to the opinions of this Bench, I never opposed the Abolition of Purchase. Well, the British officer, if he is ordered to service which he does not approve—if he finds military arrangements made which do not suit his convenience, or which may seriously injure interests which are most dear to him—he can at once throw up his commission, and follow the bent of his mind. The necessary consequence is, that it is your duty and your interest in every way to study the convenience of the British officer, and I have been surprised to hear this point alluded to in sneering tones by some hon. Members opposite. It is the interest of this country that we should, in every possible way, do all we can to induce him to retain his position in the service. Well, that being the case, you have to consider your system of exchanges. It is only by the system of exchanges that you can effect this result. The hon. and learned Gentleman who has just addressed us has made a very able and elaborate speech—an admirable answer to the discussions of a few days back—and a complete attack upon the whole system of exchanges. But that is not the question before the House. It is not the question I am intending to enter into. It is not a question on which two-thirds of the hon. Gentlemen opposite can sympathize with the hon. and learned Member for Oxford. I conclude there is a very general opinion in the House at present that the system of exchanges must be maintained; that it must be encouraged and stimulated; and that upon a judicious system of exchanges the well-officering of our Army, and the consequent comfort and condition of our troops, mainly depends. How are you to obtain a system of exchanges of such a character, and which shall be enlarged in its application so as to accommodate itself to what probably will be an increased number of applicants? It is impossible for you to lay it down as a mere abstract rule that if two persons want to exchange, an arrangement can be made by a mere exercise of the will. The exchange depends upon arriving at some equality in the condition of the persons exchanging. It is impossible that you can find two persons—as was so well put by my right hon. Friend the Member for Hors-ham (Sir Seymour Fitzgerald) in his very able speech—whose conditions are identical when the exchange is to be effected. There will be difference of age, of health, of domestic circumstances, and of taste; all of which must be considered before you can bring about an arrangement. Some element must be introduced which will make approximation possible; and in what way can this be done except by a money test—a principle which is already sanctioned in our legislation on this question. Are you going to say to the officers exchanging—“You shall give so much money and you shall not give more?” Either the money payment must be approved, or the contrary course must be taken; and to say that money may be paid, but only within certain limits, appears to me to be attempting arrangements which are not proper subjects for legislation. I think the House will agree with me that it is unnecessary to enter into any vindication of our system of exchanges, and, that being so, what are the objections to this Bill? I have heard from the hon. and learned Member for Oxford, and from several other hon. Members, very elaborate descriptions of the circumstances which they have held up to public reprobation; but there are none of the consequences to which those hon. Gentlemen refer which could not be accomplished under the present law. Therefore, the question which the House has to decide is, whether this measure which certainly will assist and stimulate exchanges—every hon. Gentleman opposite is agreed upon that, and imputes it as a fault to the Bill—is a wise and politic proposal. I cannot say that I have heard any arguments in opposition to the Bill throughout this discussion. I have heard a great deal of abstract reasoning; but I have heard no practical argument upon the subject. It is said that the measure will produce a vested interest of which we cannot rid ourselves. I maintain, on the other hand, that it cannot produce a vested interest, because it does not acknowledge the existence of any pecuniary element. We know nothing of any sum of money passing. When Purchase existed you did recognize a money payment to a certain extent, and there was the nucleus of a vested interest, and a foundation upon which you could build a vested interest. But in the proposition now brought forward by my right hon. Friend the Secretary for War there is no foundation upon which a vested interest can be made. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford made it a charge against this measure that it would lead to a recurrence to the system of Purchase. What satisfactory reason has been advanced to prove that assertion? I know from experience that the system of exchanges has long existed and been largely practised in corps and regiments in which Purchase has had no existence. Therefore, I cannot see that the grave assumption, which has been the father of most of the arguments and objections to this Bill, has any foundation whatever. As for the rich-and-poor argument, it is no argument at all, but simply a loose assertion which must be left to the decision and experience of hon. Members on both sides of the House. My experience of such matters may be limited; but it does not at all justify the assumption of hon. Members opposite that this is a measure which must in its action reduce the officers of the British Army into two corps of rich and poor. The arguments brought against the measure have been mere assumptions. There has been no appeal to experience — no evidence founded on facts. The question has been argued throughout upon abstract assumptions; and therefore I cannot at all bow to the weight of the objections that have been made to the Bill. Great objections have been taken, much declamation has been used, and very powerful appeals have been made which have either amused or alarmed us. What has been the subject of these appeals? They were invectives against the system of exchanges itself, which is acknowledged by all to be a material part of our military system. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford mentioned the case of a foreign Army in connection with a remark which had been made as to the peculiar character of the English Army. The hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned a foreign Army as not being inferior in its character and in the difficulties and hardships which it had to experience to the British troops. I am far from denying that the Russian troops deserve the eulogy which the hon. and learned Gentleman bestowed upon them; but there is no similarity between the position of the Russian Army and the English Army. That of the English is most peculiar; there is none like it in the world. If you take the variety of climates and countries—the great distances which our troops have to explore—the various parts of the world, different in all the conditions upon which health and life exist, they have to work; if you remember that in Asia, Africa, and America, and in every part of the globe, the British Army has its duty to perform, and often a great deal to accomplish; if you recall to your recollection that it is only a detached portion of the Russian Army which is confined to the severe and inhospitable climate of the Caucasus—where they have no doubt great difficulties to encounter, and where they exercise and show some of those qualities which elevate human nature—I say that, recollecting all these things, to compare the Russian Army with the British as to variety of duty is one of those flourishes of rhetoric of which the hon. and learned Member for Oxford has such a store. Hon. Gentlemen opposite have defended themselves in the course of the debate from the imputation of Party motives; but I am not aware that any such motives were ever imputed to them. They have availed themselves of the opportunity for debate, and have given to the discussion an air of importance which the magnitude of the question involved neither necessitated nor justified. I am afraid this resenting of imputations which were never made must arise from the pricking of their own consciences in the case of hon. Members opposite. On the whole, however, I think the discussion has been a not unprofitable one, and that it has filled the House and brought hon. Members to the fulfilment of important duties which would perhaps have been neglected if a subject of this character had not arisen. But I cannot agree that because hon. Gentlemen opposite have seized an opportunity which, if they are successful, will materially diminish the convenience which we wish to secure for the officers of the British Army, and damage the position of the Army generally, they are in taking such a course vindicating the principle of civil liberty or following the great tradition of which they are so proud. The measure is not a great one. I wish it were greater than it is; but I believe that, at any rate, it is sound and safe. No protracted discussions can change the character of the measure. It is completely understood by the House and the country, which is represented by hon. Members of this House who are about to vote on the Bill. You recognize the system of exchanges as part of your military machinery, and we have brought forward a measure which adapts your system of exchanges—that important part of your military machinery—to the changed circumstances of your Army. That is the whole question, and, convinced that it is the whole question—convinced that the House believes that it is the whole question—I am not frightened by all these bursts of artificial eloquence. I am not daunted by the pretence that a great Constitutional Party has suddenly unfurled the glorious flag of civil liberty; and I call upon the House to give its verdict now, and distinctly, upon this question—will you support, for the sake of the nation, the interests of the Army?

TELLERS.
Adam, rt. hon. W. P.
Kensington, Lord

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On Question, "That the Preamble be postponed?"

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he presumed the Government would not go on with the Bill that night.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that as the Bill consisted practically of one clause, on which there had already been two discussions, he hoped the House would now allow it to be proceeded with in Committee.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON observed, that there were several points which required further discussion, and he would therefore move that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (The Marquess of Hartington.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 159; Noes 267: Majority 108.

MR. MACDONALD said, that, considering that it was now the time—half-past 12—when all the public-houses were closed in London, he begged to move that the Chairman do leave the Chair.

MR. DISRAELI said, he wished to meet the convenience of the House; but if the debate were to go on till the noble Lord and his Friends thought they had answered the arguments in support of the Bill it would last a long time.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. DISRAELI said, he would now consent that the Chairman should report Progress, and on Monday, after the Army Estimates, they would renew their friendly discussions on the Bill.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

JOHN MITCHEL.

ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

MR. MELDON rose to move an Address for Papers relating to the transportation and custody of Mr. John Mitchel. The hon. Member said he did not move for these Papers with any view of re-opening the question that had been recently disposed of by the House; but on constitutional grounds, in order that the electors of Tipperary might have in the approaching election, fully and fairly before them, the means of judging whether their votes would be thrown away if they should again support Mr. Mitchel. Grave doubts existed on the point whether Mr. Mitchel was legally in custody at the time of his alleged escape from Van Diemen's Land, and as to the legality of the circumstances attending his removal from Bermuda. It was impossible that the warrants or orders under which Mr. Mitchel was kept in custody should not be forthcoming; surely, the Government ought not to refuse to produce the documents asked for. His object was not to entangle the Government in new difficulties or to force them further into the mire, but with the constitutional object he had already indicated. The Government and the House had taken upon themselves to decide behind Mr. Mitchel's back, and on ex parte evidence, upon his qualification; but he (Mr. Meldon) maintained it was the bounden duty of the House to insist upon the production of this evidence—if it existed—and to ascertain the fact whether or not the custody was legal.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of the following Documents:

"1. The Warrant or Order under which Mr. Mitchel was sent from Bermuda to the Cape of Good Hope;

"2. The Despatches from or to the Governor of that Colony in respect of that Colony refusing permission to the Government to land convicts there;

"3. The Warrant or Order under which Mr. Mitchel was sent to Van Diemen's Land; and,

"4. The Warrant or Order under which he was held in custody there."—(Mr. Meldon.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL on the part of the Government declined to consent to the Motion. He said that on a very recent occasion, the hon. Member for Westmeath, in accordance with the expressed feeling of the House, had withdrawn a Motion for the production of Papers which had reference to the selection of the jury by whom John Mitchel had been convicted; those Papers were asked for for the purpose of showing that the conviction was improper; and it appeared to him (the Attorney General) that the House would only be acting in accordance with its former views if it now declined to assent to the Motion of the hon. Member, which had for its avowed purpose the showing that John Mitchel was not in legal custody at the time of his escape. But the hon. Member for Kildare had assigned another reason for the production of these Papers, and that was that they were required to enable the electors of the county of Tipperary to make a proper choice at the forthcoming election. To this he need only reply that the Papers in question, if it were possible to produce them at all, could not be produced in time to serve as a guide to the Tipperary electors. To this he might add that, as it was now 10 years since transportation to the Colonies had been discontinued, he could not say whether the records connected with the transportation of persons, who had been convicted nearly 30 years ago, were still preserved.

MR. SULLIVAN said, the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman would add a new sensation to the already highly sensational "Mitchel Case." For what was the astounding confession to which they had just listened? Her Majesty's Attorney General was obliged to confess publicly that documents essentially and most vitally necessary to complete the Papers moved for by the Prime Minister were not forthcoming—had never been seen by him, if indeed they had any existence at all! And he had carefully avoided saying where they were. The Government had produced a document purporting to state that a prisoner named John Mitchel escaped on a certain day; but where was the judicial proof that he was not recaptured the next day or the next month? Where was the identification of the John Mitchel that escaped with the John Mitchel that had been returned for Tipperary? Above all, where was the warrant on which it was pretended to hold Mr. Mitchel in legal custody in Van Diemen's Land? They charged that owing to a fatal informality in certain of these documents Mr. Mitchel was never for one moment in legal custody from the instant he left Table Bay. If that were so, every one knew the effect upon his escape and his present legal status. In what position then did the Government stand? Without those documents under their hand the due proof of John Mitchel's legal disqualification was incomplete, and being incomplete was no proof at all. But whether the Government produced these documents or not—whether they proved valid or invalid—the fatal error remained—they had declared John Mitchel disqualified in the absence of documents and proofs, which every lawyer would declare to be essential—unless, indeed, in the High Court of Parliament less proof were required than at a common Sessions Court on a trial for petty larceny. He warned them lest in their anxiety to strike down John Mitchel they should demolish every precedent that was supposed to be the bulwark of our liberties, and establish one that in years to come many an Englishman might bitterly bewail.

DOVER PIER AND HARBOUR BILL.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to authorise the construction of additional Piers and works at Dover; to amend the constitution of the Dover Harbour Board; and for other purposes."—(Sir Charles Adderley.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

THE THEATRES—THE LORD CHAMBERLAIN'S JURISDICTION.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF ST. ALBANS, in putting some Questions to the Lord Chamberlain, of which he had given Notice, on the subject of the closing of theatres on Ash-Wednesday, said, he wished to disclaim sympathy with the spirit of certain communications which had appeared in the newspapers on the subject of his inquiry. The authority of the Lord Chamberlain in respect of theatres had existed since 1627, and he thought the dramatic profession would be very sorry to change it for any other. He did not wish to enter into any discussion of the religious part of the question, whether theatres should or should not be allowed to be open on Ash-Wednesdays, while all other trades and professions were allowed to be exercised on that day. Formerly, he was told, the theatres were closed on the Wednesdays and Fridays in Lent, but this restriction was done away with in consequence of a Resolution in the House of Commons—he would leave it to others to decide whether, in a Christian country like England, theatres and music-halls should, in a religious season like Lent, be permitted to be open, and whether the theatrical profession or trade should be allowed to go its own way; but he challenged the noble Marquess who filled the office of Lord Chamberlain to assign any good reason why theatres in Westminster must remain closed on

Ash-Wednesday, while a theatre at Chelsea could be open—to explain why he should prevent the Haymarket company from acting in their own theatre on that day, while they could go down to Nottingham and play in a theatre there. He would further ask the noble Marquess to justify the fact that Drury Lane Theatre was closed by his authority for theatrical performances on that day, while a musical performance which would have been illegal at St. James's Hall did come off at Drury Lane. They knew very well that a certain party wished to make Ash-Wednesday an universal holiday; but, as their Lordships were very well aware, every other trade continued its usual avocations on that day; but the closing of the theatres meant that many poor families could earn no pay. The evening was kept by some of the actors and actresses in attending a dance for the Dramatic Fund. Did the noble Marquess think this was a more legitimate occupation than that in which these ladies and gentlemen were ordinarily engaged? The grave fact in the case was that the closing of theatres on Ash-Wednesday meant a day of starvation to many. That being so, Parliament and the public had a right to know why it should be enforced in the case of some theatres, while the regulation did not apply to others. It seemed a strange state of things that music-halls on the Middlesex side of the Thames could not open on Ash-Wednesday, but music-halls on the Surrey side might and did. Here was another anomaly—An old Act of George II. made it illegal to give public concerts before 5 o'clock under a magistrate's licence; so that a public concert which commenced at 4 o'clock and ended at 6 in the afternoon must be under two licences—the first part of it must be under a licence from the Lord Chamberlain, and the second part under one from the Middlesex magistrates, and he was informed as a fact that an action had been brought against the proprietor of St. James's Hall for allowing a concert to commence before 5 p.m. The licence of the Lord Chamberlain would not, however, cover some places—such, for instance, as the Polytechnic; and, consequently, if there was any infringement of hours by such a place, it was liable to be sued by an informer for a penalty of £100. The whole of the licensing system, as applicable to places of public amusement, was full of anomalies, and required revision. As the noble Marquess had stated on a certain occasion that one of the advantages of the change of Government was that the public had him for Lord Chamberlain, he hoped to hear from the noble Marquess that he disapproved that system and was prepared to recommend its abolition or amendment. He begged to ask Her Majesty's Government, Why those Theatres which are under the Lord Chamberlain's jurisdiction should be closed on Ash-Wednesday, while other Metropolitan and the Provincial theatres were not so restricted: Why Music Halls on the Surrey side of the River are allowed to open on Ash-Wednesday when those on the Middlesex side are closed, And, whether Her Majesty's Government will amend the clause in the Act 25th Geo. III., cap. 36, prohibiting concerts and musical entertainments from being given before five in the afternoon?

THE LORD CHAMBERLAIN (The Marquess of HERTFORD) said, that the anomalies to which the noble Duke referred arose from theatres in different localities being under different jurisdictions. Under the Act for Regulating Theatres, 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68, which passed in 1843, the Lord Chamberlain issued annual licences for theatres within the Metropolitan Parliamentary boroughs of that date. Chelsea, though now a metropolitan borough, was not so then, and, consequently, it was not within the Lord Chamberlain's jurisdiction even at the present time. Drury Lane and Covent Garden were licensed by patent of King Charles II., and did not come to the Lord Chamberlain for an annual licence. Theatres in all other places were licensed by the Justices of the Peace for the division in which each theatre was situated. The Justices were empowered to make rules for such theatres, and these rules were different in different localities. No material change had been made in the form of licences issued by the Lord Chamberlain for many years past, excepting the omission from the restricted days of Wednesdays and Fridays in Lent in 1841, and of Passion week, with the exception of Good Friday, in 1861. Since that date the restrictions in the Lord Chamberlain's licences were precisely similar to those in the licences for music and dancing issued by the Justices of the Peace for Middlesex under the Act 25 Geo. II., c. 36. Perhaps he might be allowed to bring to their Lordships' recollection that in 1866 a Select Committee of the House of Commons sat to inquire into the Theatrical Licences and Regulations. The Committee, the Chairman of which was Mr. Goschen, reported on the 28th of June, 1866, that it was advisable to place all places of amusement in the metropolis under one authority. Owing to the difficulties of detail, no action was taken upon that Report. With reference to the last part of the noble Duke's Question—as to concerts not being allowed to be held under magistrates licenses before five in the afternoon—he found that the Lord Chamberlain, with the sanction of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, acting on the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown, had since 1866, for the general convenience of the public, issued supplementary licences to those holding licences for music and dancing within the Liberties of Westminster, to enable them to give such entertainments before 5 o'clock in the evening as were permitted by the Justices' licence after that hour. The Lord Chamberlain took no responsibility whatever upon him by these licences with respect to the character of the entertainment or the safety of the building; and Her Majesty's Government had no intention, so far as he knew, of prohibiting concerts and musical entertainments being given before 5 P.M. under these circumstances, no practical inconvenience having arisen from the custom.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY said, that nothing could be more clear than the Answers of the noble Marquess to the exact Questions put to him by the noble Duke. But he ventured to submit to their Lordships that those Answers left the matter in as much obscurity as that which had surrounded it before. According to the statement of the noble Marquess, there seemed to be three jurisdictions to which theatres were subject. There was, first, the jurisdiction of the Crown, which granted those patents to two of which the noble Marquess had referred; in the second place, there was the jurisdiction of the noble Marquess himself; and, in the third place, there was the local and district jurisdiction of the magistrates. That appeared to him to be quite enough of diversity for one subject of a not very complicated nature. But of all those jurisdictions there was none so diversified or so confused as that of the noble Marquess himself; because, if he understood rightly, his powers were so strictly local in their character that he had not jurisdiction over Chelsea and Bayswater, and even a theatre called—he presumed from some complimentary motive—the Court Theatre, and which was in the vicinity of that House, was not under the jurisdiction of the noble Marquess. If that was the fact, it was clearly desirable that some Act should be passed to amend such a state of things. But he had not heard the noble Marquess answer the Question of the noble Duke, why one theatre in particular, which he supposed was under the noble Marquess's jurisdiction, was allowed to be open on Ash Wednesday, unless it was that theatre which the noble Marquess referred to as having the patent. It illustrated the monopoly to which he had referred—how one large class of human beings who earned their bread by their connection with the stage should alone of all others of the community be restricted from earning their wages on that day, and that an exotic body of minstrels known as “The Negro Melodists” could, by a change in the locality of their performance, make that which was illegal in Piccadilly legal in Drury Lane. If he were a polemical writer—and in these days he would rather wish he were—he would be rather curious to trace the cause of this difference—he should like to inquire why what was regarded as an immoral performance in Piccadilly should be regarded as having the odour of sanctity when it was brought within the precincts of Drury Lane. If no answer could be given to that question, there was a clear case—as had been well put by the noble Duke—for legislating in this matter. Since the noble Duke put his Notice on the Paper, he (the Earl of Rosebery) had heard that the proceeds of the entertainment at Drury Lane were given in charity, and that for that reason the performance of the Christy Minstrels was allowed to pass by the vague authorities in these matters. That might very well be; but it did not mend the case of the people who were deprived of their wages elsewhere—because there was not a single person drawing wages from any particular performance who had the slightest objection that the proceeds of the entertainment should be applied to charity so long as those wages were first paid. What they had to complain of was that they alone of all the community were forbidden to practise their profession and earn their bread on Ash Wednesday. The question seemed to him to resolve itself into this dilemma. Either the drama itself was altogether immoral in the abstract, or else it must be held that the day itself was as sacred as Sunday. In the first case, clearly no theatrical performance ought to be sanctioned at all; in the other, clearly no other profession ought to be able to practise their calling on Ash Wednesday. There was no escaping from one horn or the other of the dilemma. Whichever horn you took, you placed the Surrey magistrates in a very painful and almost ridiculous position, because they did not seem to take the same views as regarded theatrical performances or of Ash Wednesday as were taken on the Middlesex side of the water. In fact, if any “intelligent foreigner” were staying in London on that day he would find it difficult not to imagine that these matters were regulated by geographical rather than moral considerations—though, of course, no supposition could be more erroneous. He hoped that the Leader of their Lordships' House would turn his attention to the matter, as this subject combined those social, and, as regarded Ash Wednesday, those theological elements which appeared to recommend themselves so much in legislation to Her Majesty's Government.

EARL BEAUCHAMP admitted that the present state of things was anomalous, but it had existed from very ancient times, and would continue to exist so long as there was a conflict of authority and jurisdiction. It did not arise from any such idea as that that which was immoral in one place could be moral in another; but from the circumstance that the Lord Chamberlain had jurisdiction in one district and the justices of the peace in others. The Lord Chamberlain, indeed, had a larger jurisdiction than the noble Earl had given him credit for—because it was upon his authority that theatrical performances were prevented from taking place on Sundays and Good Fridays as well. In the exhaustive inquiry before the Committee of 1866 no attempt was made to procure the opening of the theatres on Ash Wednesday, nor did the managers complain of their being closed as a grievance. At that time there were only 25 theatres in the metropolis; but there were now above 40, which was a proof that since 1866 no injury had taken place, but that the theatrical profession had been sufficiently prosperous to induce managers to embark large sums in these entertainments, and thereby to evince their confidence that Government would impose no unnecessary restriction upon them.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS.
THE 26TH REPORT.—QUESTION.

EARL POWIS asked, Why only a portion of the Twenty-sixth Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for 1873 has been presented to Parliament? He asked the Question because the portion which had not been presented contained very valuable appendices.

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, the reason was that an objection had been taken by the Treasury on the ground of expense to the publication of those Appendices. In that objection the Home Office concurred. If the noble Earl moved for the Correspondence on the subject between those two Departments and the Home Office, there would be no objection to produce it, and it would furnish their Lordships with the grounds of the objection.

EARL POWIS said, he would move for the Correspondence.

Address for Correspondence as to printing the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England, agreed to.

1873—THE COURT OF ULTIMATE APPEAL.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE: I beg to give Notice, that on an early day, I shall call the attention of the House to the defective state of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, with reference to the constitution of Her Majesty's Court of Appeal, and move the following Resolutions:—

"(1.) That it is desirable, in any arrangement of the judicature of the United Kingdom, to make provision that the ultimate appeal in all cases shall be made to the same tribunal. (2.) That for that purpose it is expedient that such appeals from the Courts of Great Britain and Ireland should be carried, as heretofore, to the House of Lords."

PUBLIC HEALTH—MIDWIFERY PRACTICE—CASE OF ELIZABETH INGRAM.—QUESTION.

MR. JAMES asked the President of the Local Government Board, If his attention has been drawn to the proceedings in the case of Elizabeth Ingram, as reported in "The Times" of the 1st of March; and, if it is his intention, in view of the circumstances the trial brought to light, to introduce any measure placing all persons practising in midwifery under more immediate supervision than at present, and giving power to the local authority, on the report of a coroner, or other due cause shown, to suspend them from the exercise of their practice?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Sir, my attention has not been directed to this case, otherwise than by the reports in the newspapers. It would appear that the prisoner alluded to by the hon. Gentleman was acquitted on the score of ignorance; so that if she had known the danger involved in her attendance, it is possible that she might have been liable to punishment. The whole subject of the registration of midwives, and the possibility of putting in force some such powers as those suggested by the hon. Gentleman, have been frequently under the consideration of the Local Government Board, and only quite recently it has formed the subject of a correspondence between myself and the Home Secretary. Cases of a similar nature to that which is referred to have occurred at Leicester and Wolverhampton; and in one case the person who was supposed to have communicated the fever was a medical practitioner, and in the other a midwife. The question is a difficult one, and is now under the consideration of the Government, and the hon. Gentleman may rest assured we will not lose sight of it.

CUSTOMS' DUTIES (IRELAND)—BANK NOTES.—QUESTION.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer (in reference to his reply to a Question on the 22nd ultimo), If he will state to the House by what Act of Parliament or other authority are Bank of England and Bank of Ireland notes declared a legal tender in Ireland, to the prejudice of the notes of the National Bank, the Provincial Bank, and the Northern Banks of issue?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that he was afraid he had inadvertently made a mistake in the matter. No instructions whatever had been issued to the clerks in the Customs and Excise Departments as respected the bank notes they were to receive in payment of the revenue. They might exercise their own option as to what notes they would receive, they being held responsible for all the money they might receive.

POLLUTION OF RIVERS BILL (SCOTLAND).—QUESTION.

MR. DALRYMPLE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Bill promised in Her Majesty's most gracious Speech, for the Prevention of the Pollution of Rivers, will be extended to Scotland as well as to England; or whether he will bring forward a measure of the same kind for Scotland?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the Government had already issued a Royal Commission to inquire specially into the pollution of the Clyde and its tributaries, but whether they would be able to bring in a Bill relating to Scotland until that Commission had reported, or to extend the Bill for England to Scotland, was under the consideration of the Government. He should be happy to give an answer to the Question after Easter.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. SALT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will postpone the Committee on the Friendly Societies Bill until after Easter, in order that persons throughout the Country interested in the measure may have full opportunity of considering its details?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, there was other business which must take precedence of this Bill, and he did not think, therefore, although he wished to, that he should be able to take it in Committee before Easter; but he thought it would be for the convenience of the House and for the interests of those concerned in the matter that they should go into Committee as early as possible.

CLOSE-TIME FOR SEAL FISHERY—INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. W. E. PRICE asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether any efforts have been made to induce the Governments of certain foreign countries interested in the Arctic seal fisheries to agree to the establishment of an international close time for seals; and, if so, whether he can state to the House with what results those efforts have been attended, and whether any time has actually been determined upon during which the capture of seals shall be prohibited; and, whether, in the event of any such close time being agreed upon, it is proposed to enforce its due observance, and, if so, by what means?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in reply, said, only two Foreign Governments—Sweden and Germany—had been concerned in the negotiations with regard to the establishment of a close time for seals. The Papers which he had laid upon the Table two days ago stated all that had passed on the subject. He was afraid the negotiations would not be terminated in time to establish a close season that year, but by next year there was a prospect that a close season would be established internationally upon the coast of Greenland where the seals bred.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE RECENT JEWEL ROBBERIES.—QUESTION.

MR. WALSH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the numerous robberies of jewels that have lately occurred in London and its neighbourhood, and whether he will institute an inquiry into the conduct of the police on account of their apparent inability either to prevent the crimes or detect the perpetrators?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, it is quite true that valuable jewels have lately been stolen from the Great Western Railway Station, and that a number of burglaries, resulting in the loss of similar property, have been reported from the neighbourhood of Windsor. But in no case have these occurrences happened within the jurisdiction of the Metropolitan Police. I am happy to say that within their jurisdiction robberies have been extremely rare of late, owing, as we believe, to the system of night patrols which has been established for the special purpose of preventing burglaries. Every assistance will be given to the county police in the neighbourhood of Windsor for the detection of the perpetrators of the recent burglaries there, and the prevention of similar occurrences in future. At the same time, it would be well that a little more care should be exercised by the owners of valuable property than has sometimes been the case hitherto. I may also state to the House that several members of a well-known gang of burglars have recently been apprehended and sentenced to 20 years' penal servitude.

ASSIZE COURT ARRANGEMENTS—SALE OF STAMPS.—QUESTION.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If his attention has been called to the inconvenience to suitors at the assizes occasioned by the clerks of assize and associates not being authorized to sell the stamps required for the entry of causes; and, whether there is any objection to allow such officers to sell the necessary stamps for that purpose?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, his attention had not been drawn to the matter, and he was therefore not prepared to say whether there was anything objectionable in it. No complaints had been received on the subject by the Board of Inland Revenue.

SHANNON DRAINAGE ACT, 1874.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN NOLAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If there is any prospect of the Shannon Drainage Act of 1874 being approved by a number of proprietors sufficient to permit of its provisions being put in force; and, if not, does he intend to introduce an amending Bill this Session which might remove the objections which the proprietors may entertain to the existing Act?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that he had not sufficient information at present to enable him to answer the Question. Meetings were now being held by the Commissioners of Public Works at various places on the Shannon with the view of hearing any objections that might be made by the proprietors to the mode in which they were assessed under the Act: and it was impossible to say what would be the result of these proceedings until the period fixed for them by the Act had expired.

THE REGIMENTAL EXCHANGES BILL.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I wish, Sir, to ask the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, Whether it is still his intention to proceed with the Regimental Exchanges Bill on Monday next, after the Army Estimates; and, if so, after what hour he will not bring it on? I may perhaps state that in addition to the Amendments which are already upon the Paper, some of which are of considerable importance, I have ascertained that several further Amendments will be placed upon the Paper this evening, and that they are not unlikely to lead to considerable discussion. I think it extremely improbable that the discussion in Committee can be concluded within an hour or two of the end of the Sitting, and I would suggest that more ample time should be given.

MR. DISRAELI: I do not propose to proceed with the Regimental Exchanges Bill after 11 o'clock. That will allow three hours, at least, for the discussion.

And if there are so many new Amendments coming forward as the noble Lord states, that is rather an argument for us to avail ourselves of that time on Monday, as the Committee will probably extend over several days.

PRIMARY EDUCATION (IRELAND) COMMISSION, 1870. — RESOLUTION.

MR. O'REILLY, in rising to call attention to the Report of the Royal Commission on Primary Education (Ireland), 1870; and to move—

"That in order to make Primary Education in Ireland efficient, it is essential to provide well trained teachers, fitting school buildings and teachers' residences, and adequate remuneration for the teachers; and that these objects can best be attained by supplementing the present system of training teachers by the establishment of non-vested training schools which might receive grants for teachers efficiently trained; by a contribution out of local rates to the erection and maintenance of schoolhouses and residences under local management, such contributions to be supplemented by grants; by continuing and extending the present system of payments for results; by requiring local contributions from rates or otherwise (a free residence to be considered as equivalent to local aid to the amount of its fair value); and by assisting teachers to obtain deferred annuities," said: The national system of education in Ireland has been in existence 40 years: in that time it has done much good, and excited much controversy: it has covered the country with a net-work of schools; most of them filled with scholars of all religions, some nearly empty or filled with children of one religion exclusively. It has enlisted warm sympathy and aroused vigorous antagonism; and questions connected with it have excited the warmest feelings, I had almost said passions; and been avoided in consequence by cautious politicians. So much has this been the case that when the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland, with that sincere zeal for good administration with which we all justly credit him, resolved, as appears by his letter of November last, to grapple with its difficulties, I can well imagine some of the older and more cautious of his colleagues warning him off the perils of the task in the words of the Roman—

"Periculosa plenum opus aleæ Tractas, et incedis per ignes suppositos cineri doloso."

Sir, let me in the commencement of my remarks assure the right hon. Gentleman and the House, that I have no intention of stirring up the smouldering embers of controversy or agitating the "burning questions" of Irish education. I desire, in the interests of education, to take stock, as it were, of its present position in Ireland, in order to see whether by reasonable and calm discussion remedies for defects or means of amelioration may be suggested. I think that no better ground-work for this purpose could be taken than the Report of the Royal Commission to which I wish to draw attention. It was a Commission eminently calculated to command public confidence, being admirably constituted for the purpose it had in hand. It was presided over by an English Nobleman (Earl Powis) eminent for ability, industry, and impartiality: four of its Members were peculiarly qualified to speak on educational subjects; Sir Robert Kane and Professor Sullivan who were Irish, and Mr. Cowie and Mr. Stokes who were English. It comprised seven Protestants—including one Bishop and two clergymen—and seven Catholics, all laymen; and its recommendations are the more entitled to respect, in that of 14 Members 11 signed the Report, the only dissentients being three of the Irish Members of the body; although some others dissented from individual recommendations. No formal action has been taken to give effect to their recommendations, but many of the most valuable of them have been carried out by the Commissioners of National Education themselves. These recommendations were embodied in 129 paragraphs, and of these 18 have been carried out, including those in favour of maintaining the system of administering the Education Grant by an unpaid board in preference to appointing paid Commissioners; an increase in the class, salaries, and re-arrangement of the teaching body, with the abolition of the inferior class of teachers called probationers; the adoption of an agreement for three months' notice to terminate agreements between teachers and managers of schools; the placing of convent schools on the same footing as the other schools of the country; and, most important of all, the introduction of the system of payment by results. The first question is, What is the state of primary education in Ireland? And on this point the conclusions of the Commissioners reveal a state of things which is most unsatisfactory; and, although there has been, since the date of their Report, as I shall point out, some improvement, that state of things substantially continues. Of the whole number of children of school age in Ireland only 45 per cent were at school on any one day: of the children on the rolls of the National schools less than 40 per cent was the average daily attendance: it is true that the average attendance of those on the rolls in other schools was higher; being in Church education schools 50 per cent, and in Christian Brothers schools 71 per cent; but we have now to deal with National schools. Nor was the progress of the children better than the attendance. 45 per cent of all the children are "in the first book," that is little more than learning their letters. In the examinations by the Inspectors, in 1867, before the system of payment by results was introduced, less than 30 per cent of the pupils on the roll were presented for examination, only 18·6 passed in reading, 7·8 in writing, and 6·2 in writing from dictation. The Commissioners say—

"The progress of the children in the National schools of Ireland is very much less than it ought to be. We have come to the conclusion that, although there are few places in Ireland where children have not the means of education within reach, the results hitherto achieved are far below what is desirable. The system if not retrograding in efficiency, is at least stationary, and stationary at a very unsatisfactory level."

Now, Sir, that is a state of things which I think calls for a remedy, and for which I therefore venture to suggest one. The Commissioners attribute the bad state of primary education to two causes—the irregular attendance of the children, and the inefficiency of the teaching; for the first they see no remedy but compulsion, which they do not recommend; and, although I myself look forward to the not distant day when school attendance may be made compulsory; yet, no doubt, the country is not yet prepared for it. As to the efficiency of the teachers, I do not wish to depreciate them. I regard them generally as an excellent, and, allowance being made for want of training, an efficient body of men; and I agree with the Commissioners that the inefficiency complained of is mainly due to the inadequacy of the salaries. They say—

"The general opinion of their efficiency formed by witnesses not connected with the National system is favourable, but there is also abundant testimony to the general desire for their improvement;"

and they adopt the words of Mr. Richmond—

"The National teachers generally struck me as quite as intelligent a body as we have a right to expect considering the emoluments offered to them. I frequently heard the complaint made that the teachers are half educated or less than half educated men. I entirely concur in the view that one of the first steps requisite for the improvement of education in Ireland is to raise the average standard of competency in the teachers; but none the less does it appear to me that the average standard already attained is quite as high as it is possible to reach without an advance in the attractions offered."

The last part of my Resolution treats of the emoluments of the teachers. But there is one point connected with the efficiency of teachers on which the Commissioners laid the greatest stress, and that is the want of scientific training. So, also, Mr. Chichester Fortescue, on the part of Lord Russell's Government, in his letter of the 19th of June, 1866, said the want of training for teachers was "a state of things they viewed with much concern;" and the present Chief Secretary (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) said, in his letter of the 5th of November, 1874, that the present Government "desired to take into their serious consideration the vast number of untrained teachers employed in the National schools." Contrast the state of things in Ireland with that in other countries. In all other countries that I know the course of training in normal schools is at least two years. In England five years are spent by a student as a pupil teacher, and two years in a normal school. In Ireland only a small proportion of the teachers receive any training; and what is the amount of training that small proportion receive? In the first place, they are not trained at all until they are put in charge of a school. Inspectors go about the country and select masters already teaching a school, and then send them up for training in the Marlborough Street Normal School. What time do they remain there? An average of four months and a-half. Now, the Bishop of Manchester, a high authority on these matters, said—

"The value of a second year's training, morally and intellectually, is indisputable. It is the one fact in the entire range of educational questions upon which there is an entire consensus."

I should have thought it unnecessary to occupy the time of the House with proving the necessity of training for Irish teachers, had I not seen it asserted in The Daily News of this day that there is an abundance of sufficiently well-trained teachers in Ireland, although they do not get the same training as in England. That was not the opinion of one, whom to name is to honour—the late Sir Alexander Macdonnell, who for 40 years presided over national education in Ireland. He said to the Commissioners in 1868—

"The evil is a great one. We know very well that 45 per cent of the pupils are in the first book. I believe that learning the alphabet and first book takes very nearly two years under the common method of teaching. I believe, when the art of teaching is thoroughly understood by trained teachers, the length of time taken in mastering the first and most difficult book would probably be diminished by one-half."

Let me also read a letter on this subject from Mr. Renouf, one of the School Inspectors under the Privy Council in England, and who was employed by the Royal Commissioners to inspect the schools in Ireland. He writes—

"While examining schools in the counties of Waterford, Wexford, Tipperary, and Kilkenny, I was careful to bear in mind the very different circumstances under which I was accustomed to examine and report upon the schools of my own district in England. But, every allowance being made for the difference of circumstances, it was altogether impossible to avoid perceiving that the efficiency of the Irish schools was not only inferior in degree, but even in kind. The teachers and children were everywhere fully as intelligent as the teachers and children in England, yet not only did the children break down in examinations of the mildest character, such as I should not have been allowed to hold in an English school under inspection, but their teachers seemed to be totally ignorant of the amount, and still more so of the quality, of instruction which might fairly be expected from those under their care, especially from the lowest classes of the school. The first school which I inspected on my return to England—St. Patrick's, at Walsall, was almost as thoroughly Irish a school as any I had seen in Ireland—the priest, the teachers, and the children being all Irish Catholics; but the amount of work done by the First Standard children, the accuracy and style of it, were such as perhaps not one of the teachers I had seen on the other side of the water had a conception of. How could it be otherwise? The teachers in Ireland had—at least in general, not been taught how to teach."

The number of trained teachers in Ireland was 3,842; the number of untrained teachers there was 6,118. Contrast the state of matters in Ireland with what it is in England and Scotland. In England there are 39 training schools with 2,894 students, receiving a grant of £95,200. In Scotland there are five training schools with 704 students, receiving a grant of £21,500. In Ireland there is only one normal school, with 218 students, receiving a grant of £7,646. The larger number of the National Schools in Ireland are frequented mainly—most of them entirely—by Roman Catholics, and Roman Catholics form the great bulk of the teachers. Of these there are 2,640 trained, and 5,007 untrained. A larger proportion of the Protestant teachers had received training, but a very large number of Protestant teachers are untrained. Even if the Marlborough Street Training School were full, its capacity for turning out teachers is very limited. The number of teachers required to fill vacancies occurring annually in Ireland is 700. From the year 1838 to the year 1857 the number of trained teachers which that school turned out averaged about 270 a-year, and that rate has not increased, the number turned out last year being only 207. It is true that there exist certain district model schools appointed for training, and that these in some degree help to supply the want, but only in a small degree; the number of trained teachers they are able to send out not exceeding 90 annually. Thus, at present, the total annual supply of trained teachers does not exceed 290, while the number actually required is 700. There is another reason why the present masters in Ireland are not trained, and that is the deep-seated and well-founded objection of the Roman Catholics to the present training schools. This, Sir, is the state of things which the Resolution I propose says requires a remedy, and for which I suggest one. As to what the remedy should be, it is important to consider what Lord Stanley, in a letter which might be considered the charter of the National schools, said, on the subject—"The teacher shall be required to receive previous instruction in a model school in Dublin to be sanc-tioned by the Board;" but, curiously enough, as the Commissioners pointed out, it got into print in a considerably altered form—from corrections made, it was supposed, when passing through the National Education Office. The form it assumes is—"shall have received previous instruction in a model school to be established in Dublin." That, in my opinion, was the fatal error. Instead of allowing free and independent training schools, controlled by Government, the State undertook the management of the schools entirely, and therefore they failed. The greatest difficulty in carrying out the present system is caused by the objection felt by the Roman Catholics. The Royal Commissioners, referring to this opposition, say—"The consequence is, that the system of united training for the teachers of Ireland has failed;" and the noble Duke the President of the Council (the Duke of Richmond) said last year—

"Might not the deficiencies as regards trained teachers in Ireland be attributed to the circumstances which has rendered the training of teachers by the mixed system difficult, if not impossible?"

Accordingly, Mr. Chichester Fortescue (now Lord Carlingford), in order to overcome this difficulty, recommended that while the existing training schools should remain exclusively under the control of the Commissioners of National Education they should allow the teachers to reside in approved mensal houses, where they might observe the practices of their religion, and further added—

"The Government prefer to stimulate private enterprise and private zeal to supply the wants which exist; and they therefore propose to encourage the establishment of model (training) schools under local management."

Such also in substance is the recommendations of the Royal Commission; and such the system which I advocate. The adoption of the English and Scotch principle—namely, that the State should dissociate itself from the training of teachers, except as regards the testing of results, and that a certain graduated payment should be made to each school for having given such secular teaching and training as the State requires. In England and Scotland the payment is £100 in the case of men, and £75 in the case of women for every certificated teacher who having been trained, continues teaching a school for two years at least after the receipt of their certificates. Here I wish to prevent a misapprehension which may be caused by the occurrence in my Resolution of the words "non-vested training schools," which have been understood by some friends to mean that they should not be vested for educational purposes at all, and I must therefore explain that in Ireland "vested schools" means schools which are vested in the Commissioners of National Education, while the term "non-vested" is employed to designate the voluntary schools throughout the country. The voluntary training schools should be vested in trustees for the purposes of education. In the training schools which I wish to see established, I do not want the State to have anything to do with the imparting of religious instruction. Let the State pay for the secular result, and for that alone. I may mention that the seven English Commissioners—only one of whom was a Roman Catholic—were unanimously in favour of the recommendations in the Report; but there were three Irish dissentients—namely, Sir Robert Kane, Mr. Wilson, and Mr. Gibson. Sir Robert Kane objected to teachers being trained by monks or nuns. For my own part, I think the State ought not to inquire whether the teachers are "religious" or not, but should be satisfied if they are efficient teachers, and I admit I think it probable that the Catholics would prefer to have female teachers instructed by nuns, who are competent and thoroughly devoted to the work. Of the two others, Mr. Gibson does not give any reason, except that—"The training colleges in England were founded altogether on a different principle from that of the Irish model schools." Mr. Wilson gave three reasons; that voluntary training schools would be denominational, which is only saying that those they are intended for prefer them, and are willing to prove their preference by freely paying for them; that they would separate teachers, which is the same objection in another shape; and, thirdly, that they would entail unnecessary expense. If by this he meant that paying for training teachers was unnecessary expense, he differed from all educational authorities; but voluntary training schools, a portion of the expense of which would be defrayed by voluntary aid, would be cheaper than State training schools, the whole cost of which is defrayed by the State. The only other tangible objections I have seen are contained in a memorial lately presented to the Lord Lieutenant (the Duke of Abercorn) by certain Presbyterians in the North of Ireland. Their first objection is that "it would be injurious to Protestants." But another passage in the same memorial seems to me a complete answer to this objection, for they say—

"The proposed schools are designed for, and would be attended by, only teachers of one creed—namely, Catholics."

So they could do no harm to Protestants who might continue to frequent the existing schools. Their second objection is like the first. It is—

"That no new training schools ought to be recognized, because Protestants of all denominations are satisfied with the central training establishment and district model schools."

Now, if this were true, it would prove only that one-fifth of those for whom trained teachers are wanted are satisfied with the present imperfect system of training. But I doubt its truth, because I find that whilst there are 1,146 Protestant teachers who are trained, there are 1,030, or very nearly one-half, who are untrained. Can we doubt, then, that the present training of teachers is grossly deficient, or that the only practical way to improve it, is to avail ourselves of voluntary efforts to supplement the present schools, by schools such as exist in England, and were recommended by the Royal Commissioners and by the Commissioners of National Education in their letter to the Chief Secretary (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), of the 10th December, 1874. But if we are to provide trained teachers, to retain them we must increase the attractions of their position, and nothing is more important in this respect than to provide them with residences. The Commissioners say—

"The want of residences for school teachers is also a reasonable cause of discontent. All the witnesses who gave evidence are agreed."

And they adopt the words of one of their Inspectors—

"There is no way in which the Government could improve the status, the loyalty, and the efficiency of the Irish teacher so materially."

There are only 1,400 teachers' residences for 5,000 schools, and the want of a residence is felt more in Ireland than in England. In England, if the teacher can pay for it, he can always procure a residence; in Ireland, frequently there is none to be had near the school. The Commissioners report that the teachers have frequently to walk from three to five miles to their school, and in many cases can procure lodgings only in a public-house, the last place where a teacher ought to reside. But I wish to state at once that the question of providing residences for teachers is intimately connected, in my opinion, as my Resolution shows, with another question—that of local contributions. There is no use in evading the question; local contributions in Ireland fall far short of what they ought to be. There are, I know, many good reasons why we cannot expect as much in this respect in Ireland as in England. In the first place, you in England have been centuries providing for the needs of the population. You have had for years churches, many schools, and many school endowments. The Irish people, on the other hand, have had within the present century to provide all their churches and all their schools—of National schools alone, nearly 4,000 have been built without any aid from Government. In the second place, in England the landlords reside amongst the people, are of the same creed with them, and contribute very largely to the building and supporting of elementary schools. In Ireland, the landlords are largely non-resident, and, differing in creed from the people, contribute very little to their schools. It should also be borne in mind in estimating the voluntary contributions to primary education in Ireland, that, as the Royal Commissioners point out, nearly £100,000 a-year is subscribed for the support of primary schools other than National. Yet still I do not hesitate to say that voluntary contributions fall short of what may fairly be required; and still more, that primary education can never be put on a satisfactory footing until local interest is more enlisted by local contributions and local management. Such was the conclusion of the Royal Commissioners, who recommend—portion to the amount locally contributed, and that the Commissioners should maintain this rule in all places except those where they should be satisfied that, after all due local exertion has been made, its application would close a necessary school."

In fairness I should state that there were three Irish dissentients to this recommendation—Sir Robert Kane, Mr. Justice Morris, and Mr. Waldron. But it is no use to lay down the principle of local contributions, unless in default of subscriptions you have a rate to fall back upon. I therefore fully endorse the recommendation of the Commission—

"That, in default of voluntary local payments or school-fees, the requisite local contribution should be raised by rate."

Now, this question of providing teachers' residences affords a very favourable mode of dealing with the subject of local contributions. The Commissioners recommend—

"That a house, or house and garden, should be considered as equivalent to local aid to the amount of its fair value;"

and I believe that whilst a universal school-rate would not be either fair or practicable, local authorities would often be willing to vote money for a school residence. And to facilitate this I would make two suggestions: first, "that loans under the Land Improvement Act should be authorized for providing teachers houses," and, secondly, that in such cases, half the annual instalment might be paid by the National Board, if the other half be provided locally. These recommendations are substantially adopted by the Royal Commissioners and the Board of National Education. The latter estimate the cost of a house at £200; but, I believe, in country districts a sufficient one could be built for £100, the annual instalment would be £5, one-half contributed locally, one-half paid by the Board. I need hardly add that such houses should be vested for the purpose of teachers' residences, not in the National Board, but in local trustees. I now come to the question of the payment of teachers; and, as the House will perceive, I advocate the extension of payment for results in opposition to the increase of class salaries. And here I should not be acting frankly towards the House if I did not state at the outset, that very many of my friends, the Irish Members, differ from me on this point, and that the teachers, as far as can be ascertained, are unanimously in favour of class salaries. Indeed, the teachers have remonstrated against a private Member like myself interfering in a matter which, they say, concerns their interests, and assert that it should have been left wholly in the hands of my Friend the hon. Member for Kildare, who represents them, and who is, in their interest, to move an Amendment to my Resolution. Sir, if the interests of the teachers only were concerned, I would have willingly left them to the able advocacy of my hon. Friend, in whose hands those interests would be much safer than in mine; but there is something much dearer to me than the interests of the teachers—though I sincerely desire to serve them—that is, the interests of education, the interests of the children; and holding the opinions I do. I should be neglecting my duty if, to court popularity, I shrank from urging them. But first let me explain that the question between us is one of degree. The Royal Commissioners recommend that, the class salaries being increased to some extent, all further additions should be made on the principle of payment for results. The addition to salaries which they recommended has been made, and what I urge is, that all further payments should be by results; and first let us see what is the weight of authority on this point. Payment by results in preference to increased salaries was recommended by the Royal Commissioners unanimously; and if any hon. Member will turn to page 294 of their Report they will see the array of competent witnesses by which it was supported. Sir Alexander Macdonnell, the late Resident Commissioner, Mr. Keenan the present one, and all the officers of the National Board who were examined; two Episcopalian and three Roman Catholic Bishops, and, as the Commissioners say, "the majority of those who are practically acquainted with educational details;" whilst the few who were opposed to it were really opposed rather to details. Such was the evidence in its favour before it was tried; but it has now been in operation for three years, and what is the opinion of those most competent to judge? The Commissioners of National Education on the 19th of November, 1874, unanimously recommended that it should be continued and extended. I will trouble the House with but four short extracts from letters I have received on this subject from persons most qualified to speak with authority. The first is Mr. Vere Foster, a gentleman who has devoted more time and money to the promotion of education in Ireland than any other man, and than whom the teachers have not a better friend. He has sent me a series of letters in which at this time he advocates increased payments by results in preference to increased class salaries. The Roman Catholic Bishop of Clogher, whose diocese embraces the county of Monaghan, writes to me that in his opinion, and that of all the school managers of his diocese, nothing has ever done so much to improve the teaching as payment by results, and that they earnestly desire to see it maintained and extended; so also the Bishop of Elphin, whose diocese extends through the counties of Sligo and Roscommon, writes—

"The mixed system of payment partly by salaries and partly by results which is now in use exercises a most salutary influence on teachers, pupils, managers, and parents. I can state as a fact that this system has produced to a remarkable extent those good effects in the National schools of this diocese, which number over 250."

So also the Roman Catholic Primate, whose diocese embraces the counties of Armagh and Louth, writes to me on his own part and that of all the priests in his diocese who are school managers to state their approval, founded on experience of payment by results, and their desire for its extension. Sir, these four letters are voluntary testimonies which since the terms of my Motion were published, I have received in its support. I believe the immense majority of school managers of all creeds are favourable to it. I now challenge my hon. Friend and those who oppose me, to produce on their side the opinions, not of school teachers, but of school managers. Such is the weight of evidence, but are there any facts by which we can test the working of the system? There is one very significant one. The Commissioners of National Education in their Report for 1873 point out—

"That whilst there was an increase in the number of children on the rolls of 14,262, there was an increase in the daily average attendance of 17,550."

"This increase in the latter shows a decided improvement in the regularity of the children's attendance."

So also the proportion of children on the roll who made the required 90 attendance was 50 per cent, whilst the old average attendance was, as I have shown, only 45 per cent. So also the proportion of children who made the requisite attendances, presented for examination, who passed it most satisfactorily: it is, of infants, 86 per cent; of first class, 80; of the second, 84; of the third, 90; of the fourth, 94; of the fifth, 96; of the sixth, 96 per cent. Let me examine now the objections which have been put forward on the part of the teachers in the documents which have been sent to me and other hon. Members. In the first place, it is said that under the system of results the lion's share of the payment is monopolized by convent and other large schools. I do not know why convent schools should thus have been put forward, except to excite prejudice; as a matter of fact, convent schools receive less than others. With the exception of seven, they are not paid class salaries, but a capitation-rate on the scholars which amounts to much less. It is true they are paid like others for results; but do not they earn it? But take the case of large schools in towns. It is true a school of 300 children can earn as much as 10 schools of 30 each; but is not the number taught 10 times as great? Is not the teaching staff required larger, and the labour more severe? Those who know the difference in fatigue and mental strain of teaching in a small country school of 30, and in a crowded town school of hundreds, and have seen, as I have, the strength and health of women worn out in the latter, will not grudge the payments earned in these cases by results. But is it the fact that the teacher of a country school with an average attendance of, say 35, could not earn a fair increment to his salary by results? If hon. Members will turn to page 344, they will see how the Royal Commissioners calculated the probable results of what they proposed. They say—

"A school of 30 in average attendance ought to be able to earn on payment by results about £30."

And they go on to explain how they propose this should be done. They say—

"We have agreed that a third-class teacher should be secured a minimum salary of £24" (what it now is); "results should amount to £11; and to this should be added school fees and a free residence for the teacher."

As, however, the present scale of results payments is somewhat smaller than that recommended by the Commissioners, I have made a similar calculation for myself. Let a country school have an average attendance of 34, of which 10 are infants; of these 80 per cent of passes will give £1 4s.; 15 in first class, 80 per cent of passes will give £3; 6 second class, 80 per cent, will give £1 10s.; 3 third class will give £1 7s.: a total of £7 1s. I have further consulted those connected with the Board most competent to form an opinion, and they assure me the least such a school ought to earn is £8. And let the House remember that if the amount devoted to payment for results be doubled, and consequently the scale raised, the above amount will be doubled also. But I will give the House not only theories but facts; and those not selected for a purpose but the first that have come to hand. In a village school in the county of Louth, where I live, the average daily attendance in the male school was 39, the number who made 90 attendances being 40. In that case the master's class salary was £24, but he gained by results at the present low standard the sum of £9 11s. 6d.; while in the female school the average daily attendance was 44, the number who made 90 attendances 47; the mistress's salary was £24, and she earned by results £15 14s. 6d. In an instance supplied to me by the hon. Member for the Queen's County (Mr. Dease), in a small mixed school, in the rural part of that county, the master's salary is £30, the amount earned by results was £11. But it has been said, a convulsion of nature, such as an earthquake or a flood, may cut off the attendance and deprive the teacher of results. Well, such convulsions of nature are not common; but it so happens I can supply an instance of one. There is a small rural mixed school on my property in a wild district of Galway. Hon. Members may have heard of the moving bog. About 18 months ago this moving bog, covered with a deep flood of mud a considerable tract of my property, and cut off from the school a considerable portion of the children who attended it. Yet for the year 1873 that school earned £17; and this year, although the accounts are not yet made up, the matter stands thus. The master's salary is £24; the average daily attendance 47; the number who made 90 attendances 62; and if they pass, the results fees will be about £20. Sir, much has been made by the teachers of the fact that many hundred schools have earned less than £5; nay, very many less than £1. But does not this suggest the question, not whether such schools receive too little, but rather whether they are worth the class salaries paid? If a school does not produce results to the amount on the present standard of £1, is it worth £24 or £30 of class salary? I will take the most remarkable case which is put forward. A school in the County Wicklow, in a hilly, but by no means a wild or uninhabited district, earned by results only 5s. 9d. Do hon. Members realize what this means? Two infants who passed would have earned 6s.; so there was not that much; one child in the second class would earn 5s.; so this school could not show work for the year equal to teaching two infants "their letters and to read words of two letters," or one child taught the three R's. Nor will the epidemic or storm theory answer these cases. Some hundreds, not to say thousands of schools in Ireland cannot all have been afflicted with an epidemic or a thunder storm on the day fixed for examination; and I do not doubt that in such an extreme case the examination would be transferred to another day. I will notice only two other objections to payment by results put forward in papers which have been sent to me by Teachers' Associations. One is in these words—

"Our deliberate and unanimous opinion, after three years' experience, is that we look upon this system as having completely failed in its objects."

I have given the House the means of judging how far the system has failed in its object of improving education in Ireland. The other objection is—

"It has introduced a wholesale system of cramming, instead of the intellectual teaching which was heretofore the distinguishing characteristic of the instruction given in our National schools."

An "intellectual teaching," in which half the pupils were in the first book, and under which, as Sir Alexander Macdonnell stated, the time occupied in teaching the elements was double what it ought to be. There is one real and serious difficulty in extending the present system of payment by results; but it is one, I believe, easily met. It is the case of schools in very sparsely inhabited districts, where the attendance is permanently and necessarily very small. These cases may be met in either of two ways. Either the Commissioners may be empowered in such districts to exceptionally increase the class salaries; or, what I would much prefer, the scale of results fees might in such districts be raised; so that, for instance, when a result was paid for elsewhere 2s., it might there earn 2s. 6d. By this means a school of 28 in such a district might be enabled to earn as much as one of 35 elsewhere. A very grave grievance on the part of the teachers is the absence of any provision for their declining years. I am fully aware of that fact; but having reflected upon it to the best of my power I have failed to devise any system of pensions which I could recommend with any confidence in its acceptance by the nation. If any one should propose a practicable system of pensions I would support it gladly. The proposal contained in the Report of the Royal Commission was, that teachers might be assisted by Government or local aid by means of deferred annuities. I think that was a practical suggestion which might be adopted, and therefore I have embodied in my Resolution a proposal that teachers should be assisted to obtain deferred annuities. There are, however, great difficulties in paying each year a portion of the premium, and I think the same end may be better attained by a slight modification of the plan. It is that where a teacher has purchased a Post Office deferred annuity of a given amount, which falls due at a certain time, if he has then served 10 years, he shall have an additional annuity of half the amount purchased for him; if 20 years, an annuity of equal value; and if 30 years, an additional annuity representing the value of one and a-half. Sir, I have to thank the House for the patience with which it has listened to what was necessarily a dry, and, I fear, a wearisome statement. I have laid open with an unsparing, but I hope a just and impartial—I am sure with a not unfriendly hand—the shortcomings of primary education in Ireland. It were an easier and a more agreeable task to speak pleasant things. It is always an ungrateful duty—to none more ungrateful than to me—to point out defects and shortcomings.

“Pudet et hæc opprobria nobis Et dici potuisse et non potuisse refelli.”

But it is necessary, in the first place, boldly to face an evil and measure its extent, if we would provide for it an effectual remedy. I have stated what I believe to be the evil; I have suggested what appear to me the appropriate remedies. I venture to ask for these suggestions from the friends of education on both sides of the House a calm and fair, I would even say a favourable consideration; I would ask those who may on some points differ from me to bring forward their suggestions—

Candidus imperti; si non, his utere mecum.”

One thing I entreat you not to do. Do not recognize the evil, yet abstain from applying a remedy. Do not shrink from doing what you see to be right because it may offend prejudice, or acquire you unpopularity. Do not put away the subject because it is difficult; or defer action because it is troublesome. Do not say, “Yet a little time for slumber; yet a little folding of the hands to sleep.” I make this appeal, not in the interests of any party, or even in the interests of any particular religion; I make it in the interests of the hundreds of thousands of poor children, who look to you to put within their reach a good, a sound and an available education, so to redress, as far as human laws can redress, the inequalities of fortune and the ills of poverty. I make this appeal in the interests of the Empire whose greatness and whose stability depends on its citizens being well-educated, and therefore reasonably prosperous, contented, and loyal. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “in order to make Primary Education in Ireland efficient, it is essential to provide well-trained teachers, fitting school buildings and teachers’ residences, and adequate remuneration for the teachers; and that these objects can be best attained by supplementing the present system of training teachers by the establishment of non-vested training schools which might receive grants for teachers efficiently trained; by a contribution out of local rates to the erection and maintenance of schoolhouses and residences under local management, such contributions to be supplemented by grants; by continuing and extending the present system of payments for results; by requiring local contributions from rates or otherwise (a free residence to be considered as equivalent to local aid to the amount of its fair value); and by assisting teachers to obtain deferred annuities,"—(Mr. O'Reilly.)

—instead thereof.

MR. MELDON, in rising to oppose the Motion, said: I rise on the part of the National school teachers of Ireland, numbering as they do very nearly 10,000 persons, to protest in the strongest manner possible against the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Longford which he has just brought forward. I also protest against the introduction by my hon. Friend of several questions into the one Motion, upon some of which most of his Colleagues in the representation of Ireland, including myself, heartily concur with him and of others in which he must necessarily be almost alone. If a direct issue was knit as to the necessity for the institution of properly-regulated training establishments it would be found that very few Irish Representatives would differ from the hon. and gallant Member for Longford. His Motion so far as it affects the teachers is both ill-timed, injudicious, and injurious to them. I object, Sir, to this Motion as being ill-timed and injudicious because at the present moment the Government have under their consideration the case of the teachers, because by the terms of the Resolutions which the hon. and gallant Member has proposed, it is sought to throw obstacles in the way of the Government fairly considering and bringing forward any scheme that would tend to benefit the condition of those whom I represent, and because by introducing political questions, which in my opinion ought to be studiously avoided, the difficulty of obtaining the removal of the grievances so justly complained of has been vastly increased. I think it is highly injurious because the scheme or system which my hon. and gallant Friend has to-night brought before the House ostensibly for the purpose of improving the position of the National school teachers of Ireland, is eminently calculated to make them still more dissatisfied, to disappoint the hopes which they have that something substantial will now be done for the bettering of their condition, and because, in my opinion—putting aside the case of the teachers—education in Ireland must necessarily be injured if his views are adopted. I have already said I entirely concur with my hon. and gallant Friend in the view of the necessity for training establishments, but in my opinion the discussion of that question is seriously hampered and interfered with by being brought forward on this occasion and by being mixed up with the other questions now being considered. In the interests of the teachers, therefore, I at present decline to enter upon any discussion of this matter, or of the more difficult one of local taxation. Last Session I had the honour to bring under the consideration of this House a Motion for the improvement of the condition of the Irish National school teachers. On that occasion it was conclusively shown—and I am not aware that there was any person either inside or outside of this House who denied—that the teachers had real and substantial grievances which ought at once to be redressed. I may divide their complaints into three heads. They complained—1st, that their salaries were not sufficient; 2ndly, of the great want throughout the entire country of residences; and 3rdly, that when they were overtaken by old age or infirmity, no provision was made by which they could obtain pensions. It appeared to be the unanimous opinion of the House that these complaints were all well-founded and ought to be removed; but upon the assurance of the Government that the subject would have the serious consideration of the Government, I with the assent of all the hon. Members who supported me withdrew the Motion and left the matter in the hands of the authorities. During the Recess the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant for Ireland having the advantage of every information that could be obtained, set to work with a will to make himself acquainted with the facts, and the greatest hopes are felt that a better time for the teachers is at hand. That being so at the commencement of this Session, I advised those who were acting for the National school teachers, and on my advice the great body of teachers throughout Ireland agreed that the proper course to adopt was to leave the matter entirely in the hands of the Chief Secretary, and to wait patiently until it was the convenience of the Government to disclose to the House the result of the consideration which he had given to the question. Under these circumstances, the teachers consider that they have hardly been fairly dealt with by the hon. and gallant Member for Longford in having the discussion of this matter brought forward at the present time, and they also complain that my hon. and gallant Friend should have brought on his Motion at such an early period of the Session without giving them fair or due Notice. On Saturday last for the first time the terms of the Resolution were made public and were put down upon the Order Book of this House. The course pursued has precluded the teachers from presenting to this House the numerous Petitions, which they otherwise would have done, against the system now proposed. I may state, however, that in the interval between last Saturday and to-day, I myself have received communications from over 5,000 teachers by means of resolutions passed at, I am informed, more than 200 meetings of Teachers' Associations throughout Ireland, and I believe that the majority of Irish Members have received from their various constituents, memorials and resolutions requesting them to oppose the Motion now brought forward. Indeed, it seems that the hon. and gallant Member for Longford in the course which he has pursued ostensibly for the benefit of the teachers has not the concurrence of a single one of the entire body. [Mr. O'REILLY: The patrons are in favour of my proposals, but I admit the teachers are unanimously opposed.] Thinking as I do, therefore, that the interests of the National teachers would be injured by a discussion of any of the political questions which have been introduced by my hon. and gallant Friend, I will not on the present occasion follow him in those portions of his Motion which deal with training schools or with local taxation. I think the best course for me to adopt will be to state shortly the views which I take of the claims of the National teachers. It appears to me that it is the duty of the Government to see that those employed under, what I must unfortunately call a "State system" of education, should be properly paid, and that their position should be such that they can honestly and fairly discharge their duties to the public. Once for all, I must protest against this system being called a "National system." Although this system has had the support to a certain extent of all classes and creeds, it still remains a creature of the State, and no other plan but denominational education ought, or, as I believe, ever will, be accepted by Roman Catholics as National. Now, I think I need only recall to the attention of the House the manner in which education in Ireland has been treated for the last 40 years. In 1831 the system now existing was introduced by Lord Stanley, and was most unfavourably received. Neither the Presbyterians nor the Roman Catholics were willing to lend themselves to the plan proposed, but Government after Government so fostered and protected the system that opposition gradually yielded thereto until in 1839 the Presbyterians of Ireland consented to accept the then existing state of affairs; and in 1861 the Roman Catholics, after obtaining certain concessions, gave their adhesion to the system so far as to take advantage of the facilities for education offered. The first Report issued by the Commissioners showed 107,042 children to be in attendance, and the existence of but 789 schools in the entire country. From the last Report which has been presented, it would appear that there are now 974,644 children attending 7,160 schools, that there are 1,353 vested and 5,294 non-vested schools. These figures show conclusively that the facilities for education have been availed of, but the number of non-vested schools show clearly that the Roman Catholics have not adopted the principle of this National education. No volunteer has interfered with the Government in the carrying on and protection of this system. To the Government the teachers look for their remuneration, and upon the Government devolves the duty of providing—if they wish the system to at all succeed—inducements to attract efficient teachers in Ireland. At the present moment the salaries of the Irish National school teachers, as I shall presently show, do not reach the pay of a sub-constable of police, in fact, a household servant or a scavenger here in London are better paid for the work they do. The teachers complain that their salaries are insufficient, they complain that residences should be provided for them close to the schools where they have to teach, and they ask that, when broken down by age or infirmity they should not be left after spending all their life in the service of the public to the workhouse and to a pauper's grave. There are three classes of teachers in Ireland, and all they seek for as to salaries is to have fixed class salaries of £1 per week for third-class, £1 10s. per week for second-class, and £2 per week for first-class teachers. Now, Sir, the number of teachers at the present moment in the service, exclusive of those employed in the convent, monastic and workhouse schools is 9,802, of these 7,488 or 76 per cent receive class salaries of from £20 to £24; 2,113 teachers, or about 21½ per cent, are of the second class, and receive from £30 to £38; and 201 teachers, or 2 per cent, receive from £42 to £52 per annum. The total salaries of all the teachers amounts to £264,882, or an average salary of £27 10s. 2d. per teacher. The results fees for the last year amounted to £90,755, or an average of £9 8s. 6d., while the local emoluments amounted to £61,670, being an average per teacher of £6 8s. 1d. These calculations, which are accurately made from the Returns in the Appendix to the 40th Report of the Commissioners, show that the average salary of the teachers from all these sources amounts to £43 6s. Now, what is this salary for men and women who spend their lives studying and teaching? Why, it is barely sufficient to keep body and soul together, and when we remember that out of this paltry salary school rents have frequently to be paid, residences provided, provision for old age made, and the teacher's family to be supported, it is scarcely credible that such a state of affairs exists. When we look at the salaries of the English and Scotch teachers we find that the average salaries of male teachers in England is £103 10s. 10d.; of female teachers, £62 9s. 11d.; and in Scotland the male teachers receive £110 7s. 10d., and the female teachers £58 14s. 4d. Now, the hon. and gallant Member for Longford proposes, undoubtedly, that the condition of the Irish teachers should be improved, but the course which he points out is not likely to accomplish that object. He proposes to extend the system of payments by results—a system which even to the extent it has already gone does not appear very clearly to be beneficial. There are many objections which in the interest of education alone can be urged against payment of teachers by results fees at any time; but the introduction of the system, in 1872, was based upon an unsound principle. I can very well appreciate the argument that, as a stimulus and incentive to greater exertion, payment by results to a limited extent might work well; but in 1872 it was introduced not to improve the quality of education, but merely for the benefit of the teachers and for the purpose of increasing their salaries. The system is also open to the objection that mere cramming and mechanical teaching is resorted to, and no real and lasting effect is produced upon the minds of the pupils. The regulations in force for the advancement of pupils from a lower to a higher class works also very badly, because a teacher is not allowed to present a pupil for examination for results, in one class, more than twice—except in the infant classes—and it very often happens that pupils who attend on only a limited number of days are forced by this plan into classes more advanced than they are fit for, and all chance of a substantial education is destroyed. If the teachers were first given a sufficient salary and then a system of increased payment by results was introduced with the view of stimulating the exertions of teachers to give to their pupils a better quality of education then, I think, such a system would be most satisfactory. I do not propose entering more fully into this question, because the teachers in deference to the wish of their superiors do not ask that the present system shall be altered; and I pass on to consider whether any extension of the results system will be beneficial either to education or to the teachers. The chief defect of the mode adopted of payment by results is that it works very unequally. Those teachers and schools which have least want of assistance obtain by this system the greatest advantage. Schools in populous districts attended by pupils of an higher order of intelligence in localities where voluntary contributions are large, obtain infinitely more advantages by payments for results than in poorer and less prosperous parts of the country. In these latter places, although the work of the teachers is more laborious, although education is afforded under much greater difficulties, and where all the help that can be given by the State is wanted, little or nothing can be earned as fees for results, even in favourably circumstanced schools, so great is the uncertainty connected with this system that a teacher can never say what in reality his income is. To show the great inequality between the payments by results in large and prosperous schools and the smaller and less favoured ones, I will just refer to a few cases taken very much at random out of the Appendix I have before alluded to. The Belfast District Model School earned £523 2s. 8d. last year for results; the Victoria Street School, £117 7s. 6d.; Lurgan School, £126 9s.; Coleraine Model, £117 16s. 3d.; Central Model School, £400 2s. 6d.; Galway Model, £76 2s.; Sligo Model, £143 3s. 6d. Now 33 per cent of all the schools in Ireland earned less than £10 for results, and of this number a very large proportion earned less than £5. It is perfectly manifest that the hon. and gallant Member for Longford has brought forward this Motion, so far as he seeks to extend the system of payment by results, in the interest of a few most prosperous schools that really want assistance the least. The next objection is the uncertainty in the attendance of pupils over whom the teacher has no control. In many districts in Ireland the children are engaged in manual labour and cannot attend during some parts of the year, although they can be tolerably regular in their attendance at another time. Consequently, the teacher may not be able to present such pupils for examination on the days appointed, and thereby loses the benefit of all his exertions in the education of such pupils. An epidemic may be prevalent about the time of the examination, and probably the greater number of the scholars will not be able to present themselves for examination or possibly will have gone to some neighbouring school. Accidental causes such as sickness, severe weather, or absence of parents, may very frequently cause the absence of pupils just at the time appointed for examination. Again, parents—since the introduction of the results system—refuse in many instances to pay any school-fees, because they say the teachers are doubly paid, first by class salaries and then by results. The teacher cannot insist upon payment, because the neighbouring schools are open freely to the scholars whom he may refuse to receive. The system holds out a very great inducement to poor, unfortunate, underpaid teachers to falsify the attendance book, in order that they may reap the benefit of their exertions in bringing forward pupils that can pass the examination. The Reports of the Inspectors clearly show that, under existing circumstances, this temptation is very great, and it is hard to blame teachers who err in this respect when we consider that in many cases they do so in order to keep starvation from their doors; and the case of a teacher who knows that he can earn a few shillings by altering the attendance list in the case of a pupil—who probably has attended almost the full number of times requisite to entitle him to be examined—can hardly be too leniently judged of. The extension of the system, however, by increasing this temptation is, I think, a sufficient reason why no such extension should be adopted. Teachers of Infant schools suffer very heavily by the system of payment by results, because it is impossible, no matter how much labour is bestowed on the education of infants to bring them up to the required standard in a period less than from two to three years, whilst the fees to be earned are so much smaller than those allowed for grown children. Again, many children are not sent to school until after the age for earning results in the Infant schools, so that they must be taught in a class with the infants gratuitously. Again, great temptation exists for a teacher to neglect the education of pupils who are not regular in their attendance thinking that his time is much more profitably employed in the education of those who will be likely to enable him to earn fees under this system. Again, great uncertainty exists by reason of the different methods adopted by the examiners. One Inspector possesses a happy knack of extracting from a nervous child the knowledge which the pupil really possesses, whereas another may not possess as happy a manner. Thus, a teacher may earn twice as much by the same pupils upon an examination by one Inspector as he could by the same pupils upon an examination by another. The proficiency of all classes of children depends just as much—if not more—on their regular attendance, their aptitude, and application as on the exertions of the teacher. I have already shown that where aid is least wanted, the attendance and aptitude of the scholars is most likely to be found satisfactory, whereas, where aid is most wanted—from causes wholly beyond the control of the teachers—the attendance is irregular, the aptitude below the mark, and all causes combine to lessen the remuneration of the teacher. Under the present system it must always be with the teacher a mere question of money—how much he can earn—rather than the quality of the education which he affords. The trifling amount of results to be earned in the rural and village schools is so small, no matter how great the exertion of the teacher may be, that this system adds little to the paltry salary which he is paid. The Inspectors and other authorities upon this question are not agreed by any means as to the prudence of even continuing the system of payments by results. Many of them are opposed to the principle, others of them think that it has not yet had a fair trial, but few—if any—could be found wholly to endorse the policy of the course now pursued. In conclusion, I will lay before the House a few statistics showing how this system of payment by results has worked in Ireland. For the past year, 6,731 schools were earning results, 561 of which earned less than £5; 1,921 earned under £10 and over £5, and 2,486 earned less than £10, or, in other words, 37 per cent of the schools earned less than £10, when it is remembered that in many of these schools there are two or more teachers employed, it will be clearly manifest that payment by results works the greatest injustice in the case of those requiring assistance the most. On these grounds, therefore, without further elaborating the points to which I have called the attention of the House, I submit that the teachers are justified in resisting any extension of payment by results. The next point to which I would like to bring the attention of the House is as to residences. I may premise by stating to the House that in England nearly 80 per cent of the teachers have free residences, whereas in Ireland 77·7 of the male teachers and 79·9 of the female teachers have to provide and pay rent for the residences. Upon the efficiency of the teachers depends very much the quality of the education given to the youth of the country, and how is it to be expected that an unfortunate man or woman who has travelled, probably in the rain, three, four, or five miles—and oftener a greater distance—to their schools in the morning, can properly or efficiently discharge his or her duty as a teacher. Having remained teaching during the day, most likely without any fire in the schoolroom, for, unfortunately, the only provision made for fuel in most cases is the contribution by some of the children of a few sods of turf, the same unfortunate individual has to return the same distance never having had the opportunity of being able to change or dry his or her wet clothes. In order to show the House that I am not in any way putting an extreme case, I will read the evidence of one of the most experienced of the Head School Inspectors given in his Report to the Commissioners, contained in the Appendix from which I have already quoted—

“The teachers in numerous instances suffer great inconvenience for want of residences near their schools. Many of them are obliged to walk six or more miles daily in the discharge of their duties, and it is evident that this labour, more especially in the case of females, must exercise a depressing influence on their energies in school.”

I think I need not elaborate my arguments on this question further, but content myself by stating the foregoing facts. The remaining point to which I will address myself is the question of pensions. Now, my hon. and gallant Friend has called attention to the Report of the Commissioners, and has brought this question very fully before the House. I press for the granting or securing of pensions to National teachers as much—if not more—in the interests of education itself as for the benefit of the teachers. It is of the utmost importance that the very best class of instructors for the youth of the country should be obtained. The Civil Service appointments and other pursuits where pensions are granted attract at present the most suitable and proper persons. If the position of the National teacher were so improved that young men of ability would feel certain that the workhouse and a pauper's grave could not possibly be the conclusion of a life spent in the faithful discharge of onerous duties, there would be no difficulty in having the most competent and efficient teachers that could possibly be desired under such circumstances. A teacher who had once gone through a course of training would remain in the service instead of at present after a very short period either migrating or adopting another following. The gratuity given by the Board in cases approved of by the Treasury is sufficient to maintain the superannuated teacher for a year or two at the most, after which he must trust himself and his family to the care of the union and become a burden to the rates. Another and most injurious effect of the present system is to retain as teachers persons aged and infirm who have long ago ceased to be efficient as teachers. Patrons and managers of schools cannot possibly turn adrift these old and incapacitated teachers, because they know the misery that such dismissal must necessarily cause. If pensions were secured the services of all these teachers would forthwith be dispensed with. Young and efficient persons would immediately be found who would supply their places, and we should have a class of teachers far in a way superior to those who at present have charge and control over the education of the country. I regret to say that the number of cases I could allude to is so numerous that it would weary the House if I went into detail. Suffice it to say it has been shown that there were on the night when the last Census was taken 111 National teachers in workhouses, all of them infirm and aged or otherwise incapacitated. I admit that there is a difficulty in this question about pensions because National teachers are not Civil servants; but I have already proved that it is the duty of the State to provide sufficient inducement to attract a supply of efficient teachers. I have shown how the State interferes directly in the payment of the teachers, and above all, I have called attention to the fact that gratuities cannot be given by the Board without the express sanction of the Treasury. To meet the objection that the National teachers of Ireland are not Civil servants, I would suggest to the Government to bring forward such a scheme as is proposed by my hon. and gallant Friend by which deferred annuities can be obtained, the Government contributing a very substantial sum towards such purchase leaving it to the teachers to supply the remainder; but before any system of this kind can be adopted the remuneration of the teachers must be so increased as to enable them to maintain themselves and their families in comfort and decency before they think of providing a fund for the purpose of provision for old age. I have now shortly alluded to the points, which in my opinion demonstrate that my hon. and gallant Friend—in the proposal which he has to-night made to the House as to the extension of the system of payment by results—is entirely mistaken. I know there is not in this House a man more sincere in his opinions and more honest in his convictions than the hon. and gallant Member for Longford; but I feel convinced that on the present occasion he represents a very small number of the patrons of schools who have been devouring the lion's share of the money given by the State as remuneration to teachers by payment for results. I appeal to this House in the interest of education, in the name of the Irish people on the part of the children of Ireland, not to allow this system of payment by results to be extended. I implore of the Government on every ground that can or ought to influence a statesman or a Minister at once so to improve the position of the National teachers that education in Ireland can be carried on effectively. I beg of the Chief Secretary to take into his consideration the case of the National school teachers of Ireland; all they ask for is a mere competence; they desire nothing further than to have the causes which have led to their present grievances and complaints removed; they wish to settle down to their duties, to do the best they can faithfully and honestly to carry out the great and important work entrusted to them; they wish to have their minds freed from anxiety and to devote themselves cheerfully to the duties which they are called upon to discharge. I know that if there is gratitude in human hearts, the National teachers of all others will be the most ready to acknowledge the benefits which will be conferred upon them by a favourable consideration of their case by the Government and this House. I repeat all they seek for is to have third-class salaries increased to £1 per week,

£1 10s. for second-class, and £2 for first-class. This question cannot be considered as in any way a party or a political one. The system is a State one, nothing more is asked than bare and simple justice, and I think that the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland has now an opportunity of showing to the country that the promises which he made last Session he is willing to fulfil, and I can assure him that the conciliation of such a large body of men in Ireland who have entrusted to them the education of the rising generation, will, in no small way, assist in impressing upon the Irish people the desirability of cordial union with this country. I am proud to say that I believe the people of Ireland desire nothing better than the most friendly and close intimacy with the people of this country provided you will only govern us as you would govern yourselves, and I believe this feeling will be much assisted if the Government will prove to the teachers of Ireland that they are ready and anxious to do for them what has already been done for the teachers of Great Britain. If at a later period of the evening the Amendment of my hon. and gallant Friend shall be assented to, I shall move the Amendment to his Resolution of which I have given Notice—namely, to leave out all the words after “teachers efficiently trained” to the end of the Amendment, in order to add the words—

“By providing free residences, by continuing the present system of payment by results, by increasing the class salaries of all teachers, and by securing to teachers pensions.”

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR: I have often been surprised that no Irish Member up to the present time has called attention to the very important Report of the Royal Commission on Primary Education in Ireland. It is a Report replete with interest, and remarkable for the recommendations which it contains. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Longford (Mr. O'Reilly) has done good service by drawing attention to it. His Resolution contains some proposed improvements of the present administration of Irish schools which all friends of education will cordially consent to endorse; but it contains other pledges which I hope this House will be slow to give. The Resolution begins by admitting the want of efficiency in the present mode of conducting National education in Ireland. Now, on this and on another point relating to Irish education, there are two popular delusions which have sunk so deeply into the convictions of the English people that it is difficult to root them out. The first is, that Irish education is undenominational; the second is, that the results of the Irish system are such as justify pride on both sides this House. Never were delusions more complete. No less than 99½ per cent of Irish National Schools are managed denominationally, and only ½ per cent are under mixed management. The present Irish Schools are simply denominational schools with a time-table Conscience Clause. Not only are they managed by separate sects, but their actual management is mainly clerical. In fact 70 per cent of them are managed by priests of the several persuasions, and only 30 per cent are under lay management, but of the Roman Catholic Schools 85 per cent are under clerical patrons. Therefore, the present national system is entirely denominational, and the denominations must have the credit or the discredit of their efficiency or failure. Then we come to the second delusion of the English people, that the results of the system are creditable to the wisdom of Parliament, and are sufficient to justify our own congratulations. This delusion ought to be dissipated by the astonishing revelations of this Commission. In the first place, we find that the children on the rolls are only nominally scholars, for the Commissioners tell us that only 36 per cent of them attend school regularly, and that 64 per cent are conspicuous by their absence. In other words, the school truancy is three times greater than it was in England before the introduction of compulsion. I know of nothing in the history of education of any civilized country in modern times which is so lamentable. No school system could be efficient under such conditions, and, therefore, we ought not to be startled at the recorded results of the system. The Commissioners tell us that no less than 45 per cent of the children at school are in the first book, or in the one immediately above the A B C. To understand how low the level is, let me compare these results with those in Great Britain in 1869, before the new Act gave a stimulus to education. In Great Britain, of all the children on the roll, 42 per cent passed in reading; in Ireland, only 18 per cent. In Great Britain, 40 per cent passed in writing; in Ireland 8 per cent. In Great Britain, 36 per cent passed in arithmetic; in Ireland, the Commissioners declined to give us an estimate. A question naturally occurs to all our minds. If the children of Ireland have such low education, in what condition are the men and women of Ireland? The late Census gives us some particulars on this head. It classes as literates all who can either read or write, not those who can do both, and it classes as illiterates those who can do neither. I have not yet seen the summary tables for Ulster and Connaught, but I have in my possession those for Leinster and Munster, and the results are these, taking the nearest decimals. In the Province of Leinster 30½ per cent of the Roman Catholics, 7½ per cent of the Episcopalians, and 6 per cent of the Presbyterians can neither read nor write. In the Province of Munster it is still worse, for 41½ per cent of the Roman Catholics, 7½ per cent of the Episcopalians, and 4½ per cent of the Presbyterians can neither read nor write. Only the Returns of four counties in Connaught have reached me, and they give still more startling results. Leitrim has 33 per cent; Roscommon, 40 per cent; Galway, 56 per cent; and Mayo, 57 per cent of the people above five years of age unable either to read or write. In Ulster the smallest percentage of illiterates is in Antrim, where it is 15 per cent; the largest in Donegal, where it is 42 per cent. Does the House realize these astounding facts? We are spending £500,000 annually for education in Ireland, and the system has been in operation for a generation, and these figures show what a melancholy outcome there is for our efforts and expenditure. The administration of the system is an educational failure. So far, I agree entirely with my hon. and gallant Friend. His first condition for improving the system is to train the teachers, to improve their dwellings and the schools, and to give them better remuneration. Further on in the Resolution, he indicates that local management and local rating should be brought in aid of these requirements. I know my hon. and gallant Friend to be a zealous educationist, and I think he includes much that is desirable in these comprehensive suggestions. He has shown the House clearly that the teachers are insufficiently trained. In fact, so loosely have the Commissioners of Irish Education held the reins of the system, that they empower the manager of a school to appoint any man or woman he pleases to the office of teacher, whether he is trained or untrained, whether he is lettered or ignorant. The Inspector after the appointment would draw attention to any glaring incompetency, but previous to it he has no power. Teachers are then classified by the Inspectors, and about one-half of the principal teachers are in the third class, one so low and unsatisfactory that the Commissioners recommend that it should be raised. Even the teachers trained in the model schools and in the central Dublin training school have no training comparable to teachers in this country. With us, they must be five years as pupil-teachers, and then must have two years in training colleges. In Ireland a residence of six months is considered sufficient training for a teacher, even without the preparatory preparation of pupil-teachership. My hon. and gallant Friend is therefore quite justified in asking this House to look more carefully to the training of teachers in Ireland, for no principle in education is more firmly established than this—that the efficiency of the school depends upon the efficiency of the teachers. My hon. and gallant Friend points to their low salaries, and proposes that they should be raised; but happily he does not suggest that the State should bear all the burden. At present the teacher is the servant of the clerical manager of the school. The manager appoints and dismisses him, but the State furnishes five-sixths of his pay. The education of an Irish child when the Commission reported cost 19s. per annum, of which the child pays in fees 2s. 7d., the locality in subscription only 9d., while the State pays 15s. 8d. My hon. and gallant Friend is not unreasonable enough to ask this House that the State should pay more, when it is the local manager who assumes all control of the teachers, whom, however, he refuses to pay, and whom he discourages from being trained and made efficient in the Government training schools. The position of teachers in Ireland is thoroughly unsatisfactory. Their pay seldom reaches, and is generally inferior to, the wages of an artisan, and their tenure of office is precarious.

It is the universal experience of nations that, however vigorous may be the central administration, however active the local management, the success and civilizing power of schools wholly depend on the character, position, and attainments of the teachers. If the civilization of Ireland is to be increased by education, the position of its schoolmasters must be raised, so that they may be removed from the class of justified grumblers, and be made firm and staunch allies of the State. But that cannot be done by the State alone. The localities must take part in the local government and local expenditure on education. If Ireland contributed like England by local subscriptions, even before rating was established in 1870, she ought to subscribe for her schools £110,000 annually. If you take away £4,000 of endowments, she only now gives £10,000 by local contributions. This, in reality, is a significant and startling fact. The poorer classes in Ireland are an example to us in their independence of public aid, for pauperism among them is much less than in England; but the middle and upper classes show them a bad example in the matter of education. Instead of contributing, as men of property and position do in Great Britain, to the education of the poor, the Imperial purse is always looked upon as the source of expenditure. Until Irish districts rate themselves, or are rated by Parliament, for the support of education, it is in vain for us to expect improvement either in the condition of the teachers or of the taught. When you have rate-aided schools, then will arise interest in local management and justification for local control. At present the educational failure of the existing system shows that there is neither. I therefore cordially join with the hon. and gallant Mover of the Resolution in accepting local rating and local management as indispensable conditions for improvement. I will not follow him into the details of his application, though I quite agree with him that the conditions of the school-houses and of the dwellings of the teachers require great improvement. But how to improve them, either by local or Imperial aid, is a matter of great difficulty. By a letter of the Propaganda, of the 14th January, 1841, the Sacred Congregation advised that the property of school-houses should be vested in the

Bishops or parish priest, and in consequence of that policy, we find that three-fourths of all the schools are non-vested, or constitute property not legally destined for education. The application to them of rates would not be desired by the priests, or would not be permitted by the ratepayers. There are, therefore, serious difficulties in the way of the application of the good principles laid down in this Resolution. Nevertheless, the position of the teachers in regard to these non-vested schools is intolerable. Notwithstanding their miserable salaries, the Commissioners tell us that the poor teachers have to make the repairs of one-third, or exactly 33½ per cent of the non-vested schools, and that their miserable salaries are further burdened in nearly all cases—exactly in 95 per cent of the non-vested schools—with the supply of the maps and educational appliances. My hon. and gallant Friend is more than justified in asking for a genuine local, and not merely clerical, management, and for local rating to remedy these crying evils, however formidable may be the difficulties in the application of his remedies. He recommends nothing new. In the early days of the system, Dr. Doyle recommended mixed committees of management with a layman for treasurer: but under the loose administration of the Irish Board the management has become chiefly clerical. So far, I have been able to agree with the Mover of the Resolution in his diagnosis of the maladies of the Irish educational system, and of his measures for its cure. But now I separate from him. I see too clearly the evils which have arisen from non-vested schools to agree with him that he will improve the system by introducing non-vested training colleges. This is not a question in which one denomination is involved. All denominations in Ireland are equally at fault in the failure of the present system. The Episcopalians, the Presbyterians, the Roman Catholics, have all, at one time or another, opposed mixed education in the Government training schools. They have had their own way, with the most thorough completeness both as to the schools and as to the schoolmasters, and the system has proved a gigantic failure. The teachers are untrained, the scholars are uneducated, and the growing population of Ireland are in a state of almost incredible

ignorance. ["No, No!"] Well, I have given you facts from public documents which unhappily prove each of these assertions. And yet we are asked to intensify the denominationalism which has been tried and been found wanting. My hon. and gallant Friend wishes denominational training schools. Can he give us securities that the various denominations would take a sufficiently high estimate either of what the teachers should know, or what the scholars should be taught? The Roman Catholic denomination is much the most extensive in Ireland; but I find nothing in the evidence of the Bishops examined before the Commissioners in proof of their desire for a high training of teachers. Take Cardinal Cullen's evidence as an example. He neither wants high training for a teacher nor high education for a scholar. His Eminence says, in speaking of teachers—

"I would not require certificates. Those who pass the best examination and get diplomas most readily are oftentimes the very worst teachers. They have their thoughts fixed on situations in which they could get on in the world."

That discontent with their present condition is just the thing that I should like to foster. Of course, this idea of non-certificated teachers is entirely opposed to our notion of English denominational training schools, but I find Bishop after Bishop pointing out the evils of over-training on such grounds as that trained teachers are less submissive to their pastors. And now as to the taught. Cardinal Cullen's idea of teaching is summed up in these words. He says that it should be limited to the three R's, and to the history of the Scriptures and of the Church.

"Too high an education will make the poor oftentimes discontented, and will unsuit them from following the plough, or for using the spade, or for hammering iron, or building walls."

Well, when I find a dignitary of the Roman Catholic Church with such power over its counsels, cherishing ideas of education which we have long ago abandoned as antiquated in this country, I am not disposed to yield the Government training system, inferior as it still is, for a denominational system which is likely to be much worse. The Cardinal tells us, in his evidence, that the Roman Catholic Church will not be satisfied until it has training schools, such as convents and houses belonging to Religious Orders, for training teachers. In answer to that view, let me quote the opinion of one of the Commissioners, Sir Robert Kane, a man of eminence, and himself a Roman Catholic. He says—

"I consider it to be the fact that in every country where such a course has been adopted, it has resulted in the social decay and political debasement of the people."

If this were not true, it ought to have been disproved in Ireland, for there you have schools almost wholly under clerical management, resulting in a failure the most complete. If you are to supplement this system by a training of teachers under Religious Orders, the subordination of secular to religious teaching would be still greater. As Bishop Cloyne told the Commission, the Church ought to have control of every part of the education in the school except the multiplication table. This is the Middle-Age maxim revived—" Ad eum qui regit Christianam rempublicam scholarum regimen pertinere." This clerical management of schools, whether Roman Catholic or Protestant, has had a trial of more than a generation, and we are now called upon to view the woeful results of the system. In England and Scotland the State has lately assumed its own sovereign functions in regard to education, and will soon, by compulsory education, far distance Ireland, which began a national system 35 years before England. The chief cause of the difference is, that in Great Britain lay management has been joined to the labours of the clergy, while in Ireland clerical managers have thought themselves capable of undertaking a work which they have failed to perform. For that result all denominations are responsible. When my hon. and gallant Friend points to the analogy of English training schools with those which he demands, there is no doubt some similarity, but also great dissimilarity in the comparison. There are Catholic training schools in England admirably conducted, and there are Catholic day schools quite as efficient as any in the country. But this result has been achieved, because they have had the same advantages as the other schools of the country. They have been under an efficient administration, responsible to Parliament, and like other schools have only been aided when they did their work well. But in Ireland there is no real Ministerial responsibility for education, and the administration of the Commissioners has been so weak that they yield everything to clerical influence, and preserve no securities for success. They have allowed the school buildings to slip away from them, and while they continue to pay the teacher wholly, they allow the clerical managers to be his master without contributing to his wages. There is no lay local management as in England, and no local contributions worth taking into account, either by subscription or rates. What then is possible? First of all, there should be efficient Ministerial responsibility for our annually increasing Imperial expenditure, now more than £500,000. I urged that upon the House last year in a Motion upon a Minister of Education. But even without such a Minister, the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland should be subordinated to the Education Department, as the Scotch National Board is at the present time. The Irish system has failed, not from any want of boldness or sagacity in Lord Derby's original conception of it, but because the Commissioners have not carried it out. He always contemplated that local government should manage the schools, and mainly pay the teachers. My hon. and gallant Friend by the words of his Resolution simply comes back to the original system. Do as we do in Great Britain. Encourage local effort, but only in proportion as it is put forth. Pay with Imperial money only for efficient schools producing results useful to the country, and refuse to support those schools which do not. Surely he who pays the fiddler ought to name the tune. Then, when money is paid for efficiency only, you soon will find teachers trained in order to win the grants. How they are trained is a matter of secondary importance, if the State pays, as it does in England, only for the secular results of actual teaching. Our system both in Catholic and Protestant training schools is to pay nothing for the teachers while in training, but to credit the school with £75, if after two years' work in a regular school he proves his efficiency and obtains his certificate. The training college is inspected, and its teaching appliances are kept up to the mark, as a means to an end, but that end is tested by a two years' working of secular teaching in schools unconnected with the training college. Now, I do not deny that there are no small arguments in favour of doing in Ireland what we do in England and Scotland, if we could trust the Administration to carry on the work in the same way and bring it up to the same standard. But that is not the recommendation of the Royal Commission, nor is it the meaning of my hon. and gallant Friend when he asks the House to pledge itself to "non-vested training schools." In both cases, the actual meaning is to hand over the training of teachers to the Religious Orders. That is a system utterly incompatible with a free and vigorous national life. Besides that, there is ample experience in Ireland on the subject. Even now the Christian Brothers and nuns in Ireland train teachers, and the Commissioners tell us that their schools are in no respect better than the other inferior schools of Ireland. The hon. and gallant Mover of the Resolution relied much on Mr. Fortescue's celebrated letter of June 1866, and seemed to think that the Liberal party were bound by its recommendations. I for one refuse to be so. It was written at a time when the signal failure of Irish educational administration was unknown. Education in Ireland is an instance of Home Rule, pure and unmixed, except that it is Home Rule supported by Imperial taxation. But it has entirely failed. Not until the educational administration is brought under Imperial control, and not until the educational standards of Ireland are made comparable to those of Great Britain, could you be justified in largely increasing expenditure, even were it not to be placed under the control of the clergy. The time has arrived when, in making new arrangements for education, national interests and not denominational interests must be consulted. At present there is a mixed system of training which with proper development—for it is now only equal to one-half the annual supply—might be made equal to the necessities of Irish teachers. As long as the Commissioners cede everything to the priests and receive nothing in return, the Catholic Church will oppose this mixed system. But if you follow the practice in Great Britain and refuse to pay for schools, unless they are efficient, the clerical managers will soon learn that the only means of winning money is to train the teachers. Do not be alarmed at the prospect of a conflict with the Catholic Church in Ireland. No doubt, the priests are very powerful when they are in unison with the feelings of the people. But the former know very well that the Irish wish good education, and if they oppose them in their wish, the priests will lose influence, and the people will gain freedom. Much as I wish to see local rating and local management for schools introduced into Ireland, I would not grudge to it a much larger amount of Imperial taxation than Great Britain receives in proportion to the population. But then, the enlargement and extension of education in Ireland should have a national, and not a sectarian object. It cannot be expected that a Parliament which has disestablished one Church in Ireland, shall endow other Churches through their schools. A fair trial has been given to clerical management in Ireland, and it has signally failed to produce useful results. The time has come for superseding clerical management by local government under a firm Imperial administration. The plan of low education has been tried in Ireland, and the people remain uneducated and dissatisfied. Other countries, notably Switzerland, Holland, Germany, and in part Scotland, have tried to give their people a higher education with the most happy results. They have found the education suitable for the demands of labour in all parts of the world, and those who remain at home and those who emigrate have prospered. In the model schools of Ireland, which my hon. and gallant Friend would like to convert into denominational schools, there is the material and the resources for a higher education of the people. The Irish people are remarkable for their natural intelligence, acuteness, and love of knowledge. If these qualities are not developed by the system of education now prevalent, it is the system and not the people who are at fault. You started the national system under fair auspices, for you had a people with a traditional love of knowledge. They held schools under the hedges. But all this desire seems to have been stifled by our existing low education, otherwise, how could there be whole Irish counties with 50 per cent of a population unable to read or write. The scope of education ought not to be limited to the production of mere hodmen and rough labourers, but should suffice to raise an intelligent people above their present condition. It is not the interest of the nation that Ireland should continue to have a poor, half-educated, and discontented peasantry; but it is the interest of the nation, however great may be the Imperial as well as local expenditure, for such a result, that the people of Ireland should have their high natural faculties so cultured, as to enable them to go forth into the industrial battles of life with that armour of self-reliance and educated intelligence which will enable them to fight manfully wherever they are placed, and to reap the fruits of conquest. If Irish Members desire the alliance of English and Scotch Members on both sides of the House in the promotion of this great result, they will find zeal for the work equal to their own, and no parsimony in the endeavour to attain it. But surely it is natural when Parliament realizes the terrible deficiencies of education in Ireland, as displayed in the Report of the Commissioners, that it should require the education to be conducted in a national spirit, with no preference for the interests of Churches, though with perfect protection for the rights of conscience, in the single desire that the people should enjoy the advantages of a really sound and useful education, which hitherto they have not received.

Mr. MACARTNEY believed that one of the reasons why education had not made more progress in Ireland was the fact of the parents there not being compelled to contribute towards the payment of the schoolmaster. A thing given for nothing was not so highly valued as one that had to be paid for. The present pay of the teachers in Ireland was miserable—not equal to the average wages of an agricultural labourer. The residence of the teacher, too, where he had one, was usually a wretched place. Under those circumstances, it was not to be wondered at that there was not a high quality of education there, and that the best men did not come forward as teachers. He held that where districts refused to contribute voluntarily towards providing for education, a rate should be imposed upon those districts for the desired purpose. If Her Majesty's Government would bring forward a measure requiring the parents

not have to give less for the Con~~sumption~~ sumary, as the necessity for maintaining a large force would soon disappear.
 That would make Ireland more thankful.

Mr. JOHN MARTIN said, the remark of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) about Home Rule in connection with the subject was not intelligible, because the Board of Education in Ireland was under the direct control of the Minister of Education in England, and the Board of Education in Ireland was appointed by the English Minister. It was supposed, no doubt, of Irish gentlemen but they were selected to suit the purpose of ruling Ireland by England. The Irish system of education was inefficient, as everyone knew, to civilize the population. The stepping-stone of the Government between the professors of education in Ireland and the people accounted for the inability of a very large proportion of the people in some counties to read and write. He remembered that during the Home Rule agitation, when a parcel containing a new edition of some of the books issued by the Board of Education was received at a school on his own property, he had the curiosity to see what changes were in the new edition. What the changes were the following alteration would illustrate. There had been in one of the reading books lines of Sir Walter Scott beginning—

- Breathes there a man with soul so dead
Who never to himself hath said
This is my own, my native land ? "

Those lines were cut out, and in place of them was a paper of a very different kind indeed—not verse, nor anything of a poetic character, but a paper entitled, “Easy Lessons on Money Matters by Dr. Whately,” who was then and for many years afterwards Archbishop of Dublin and manager of English interests in Ireland. After long opposition by Presbyterian, by Anglican, and by Catholic clergy, the system was established, and the clergy of the various Churches in Ireland had now adopted it. It was therefore national in its extension over the country, and as it was established by the State and accepted by the population, the practical course to be taken was to appoint as teachers such men only as were properly qualified by moral character and by the attainments requisite for teaching, and to pay them sufficient salaries. As to the principle of results, he would desire to eliminate it altogether, because he thought it was pernicious. He altogether objected to the imposition of new local rates for the support of a system which was only a part of the system of English rule in Ireland. If rates were to be paid for education, then education ought to be exclusively under the control of those who paid the rates. He would certainly vote against the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Longford, and support the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Kildare.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, that when the hon. and gallant Member for Longford (Mr. O'Reilly) gave Notice of his Motion he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) did not anticipate that the debate would travel over such a wide extent. He did not intend to enter upon the general question of National Education in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair), in a very able speech, had expressed his views upon the general question. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) confessed it rather surprised him that, considering the importance which the right hon. Gentleman very justly attached to the Report of the Royal Commission of 1868, it was not until the present year that he thought it necessary to call attention to the subject. No one who looked at that Report fairly could under-estimate the difficulties of the question. The right hon. Gentleman, in the first part of his speech, appeared to be anxious to sweep away the existing system. He objected to the National Board of Education, and to the management of schools by clerical managers. But he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) confessed he was glad to hear the comparatively modest requirements with which the right hon. Gentleman concluded. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to say, that if he could be satisfied that local aid was obtained as it ought to be in Ireland for national education—if he could be satisfied that the money granted by that House was properly administered, and adequate results were obtained from it, he would give his support to the present system. Well, what was the actual state of things? We found in existence a system which had gradually made its way until it had become the national system of education in Ireland, and it would be unwise at that time of day to attempt to abolish or radically change it in order to substitute something entirely new. In his judgment it would be far wiser to amend it with a view to increased efficiency, and it was in this spirit that he should approach the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Longford. There were two principal portions into which that Motion might be divided. The first, respecting the establishment of training schools, was not of a strictly financial character; whereas the payment of teachers and providing residences for them were more closely connected with finance. The hon. and gallant Member spoke of the comparatively small number of trained teachers in Ireland as compared with untrained teachers. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) believed the statistics showed there were 3,842 trained teachers as against 6,118 who were untrained. But while admitting the gravity of the evil, he must call attention to certain facts, to which sufficient importance had not been attached. Undoubtedly those who had not undergone any regular training were as few in number as had been stated, but the mere figures hardly conveyed an accurate idea of the qualifications of the teachers employed in the Irish National Schools. There were no fewer than 4,000 paid monitors at the present time in the best ordinary schools, and of these from 350 to 400 rose annually from the monitorial staff to the position of teachers. Moreover, 90 or 100 teachers were furnished every year from the pupil-teachers and monitors in the model schools; and about 300 candidates for the same position came yearly from the more advanced pupils of the National Schools. On the whole, he believed that 70 per cent of the recruits to the National School teachers came from monitorial training of one kind or another, and were examined and classified before appointment as teachers: it would therefore be unfair not to admit that they possessed considerable qualifications for their position. The small number of teachers who had been trained in normal schools was not due to a deficiency of those institutions, for during last year there was sent out from the normal school in Dublin a very much smaller number of teachers than there was actually accommodation for. That establishment could hold 300 students, but for several years had received no more than 250 annually; and in 1873, only 207 were trained there. The want of trained teachers was mainly due to the circumstance that the system adopted at that school was not approved by the Roman Catholic Prelates. It was, however, part of the system of United Education, whereas all the proposals made to obviate the difficulty suggested the establishment of a new kind of training colleges, of a more or less denominational character; though it was only right to say that the proposals recently made on this subject by the National Education Commissioners were not admitted to be of this nature by those who supported them. The question then was, how far it was possible to combine denominational training colleges with the present system of national education in Ireland, which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh had asserted to be denominational. If the right hon. Gentleman had referred to any of the numerous discussions on the subject, he would have found himself contradicted not only by Episcopalians and Presbyterians, but also by Roman Catholics. The present system was supported by Episcopalians and Presbyterians as undenominational, and they opposed any changes in a denominational direction; while Roman Catholics often objected to it as not sufficiently denominational. The English and Irish systems were essentially different, for Parliament had founded the educational system in Ireland on a united basis, while in England it had merely aided the different religious bodies, and mainly the Church of England, in their voluntary efforts to educate the people; and it was no argument to say that because there were denominational training colleges under one system in this country, they ought to be established under quite another system in Ireland. But there was one suggestion made by the National Board of Education on this subject which was based upon another footing: in fact, it was to a certain extent based upon their original practice. Before the date at which the buildings in Marlborough Street were thoroughly completed it was the practice to allow the students training together in the normal schools to board and lodge out where they chose, receiving a certain allowance to cover their expenses, and that was a system which the National Board of Education had, by a majority of 14 to 2, recommended for adoption again at the present time. But when he looked at that proposal and asked himself how far it would meet the views of the hon. and gallant Member, he was compelled to say there would be serious doubt on that subject, because in the evidence given before the Royal Commission, he found that Cardinal Cullen, on the part of the Roman Catholics, objected to a similar proposal, because he did not consider it a solution of the question. He was bound to say that he was not able that evening to recommend to the House any proposal for the establishment of fresh training colleges. He might, however, state that if the Roman Catholic Bishops could be persuaded again to adopt the course they followed in former years, and to allow those over whom they had influence to receive training in the normal schools, he believed the real difficulty of producing a sufficient supply of trained teachers would be practically settled. But this subject was intimately connected with the amount of payment which the teachers received, for it was a waste of money and time training teachers at the expense of the State, if the emoluments they could obtain were not sufficient to induce them to remain in the service. It therefore seemed to him that the real solution of the question might be found in making the position of the teachers better and more desirable. That brought him to the financial portion of the Motion before the House. It was admitted by himself and by his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War, when the question was discussed last Session, that the position of the teachers was unsatisfactory, and that it would be the duty of the Government to propose to the House some scheme to improve it. It would shortly be his duty to lay such a scheme before the House. The point of difference between the hon. Member for Kildare and the hon. and gallant Member for Longford seemed mainly to be whether the improvement in the emoluments of the teachers should be made in addition to the class salary, or by way of additional payment for results. On this he would say that he thought very strong arguments had been adduced by the hon. Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) on his side of the question. In spite of all that could be said in favour of payment for results, and the improvement it effected in education, we must not forget that in a country like Ireland, with so scattered a population and such small schools, payment by results would not always meet the difficulties of the case; and if teachers were left to run the risk of an epidemic, wet weather, of hostility from parents or from those who influenced parents, they might, through no fault of their own, be deprived of no small part of the income you wished them to earn. From the statement of the National Board of Education, it appeared that the grant for payment for results which had continued for three years had been received in very different proportions by the first and second class as distinguished from the third class. Very generally it was the case that the teacher of the smaller school would have a smaller salary; and, under those circumstances, it would hardly be a proper settlement of the question if no addition were made to the lower class salaries of the teachers; and therefore he proposed to add a certain percentage to those salaries. Without going into the statements of the right hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh respecting the low standard of education in the Irish schools, he feared that it must be admitted that there was more truth in those statements than they could desire; but matters, especially with regard to the regularity of the attendance of children, were progressively improving, and he had no doubt that, subject to certain alterations in administration, the present system was capable of doing all the good required from it. He believed, however, that there was an unnecessary number of small schools, between 1,100 and 1,200 having an average attendance of less than 30 scholars. He could not help thinking that, by amalgamation or otherwise, this number might be reduced to the extent at least of one-fourth. Teachers also ought to be relieved from the cost of repairing schools or school residences. He thought it was possible, and he was sure it was desirable, that more fees should be exacted from the parents of children, if only for their own sake—that they should better appreciate the benefits of education. It must not be forgotten, however, that in many parts of Ireland these parents had paid more towards education than similar classes in England, because their richer neighbours, he feared, had sometimes not contributed as much towards the erection or maintenance of schools as the same class of persons in England. The question of pensions was by no means an easy one. He thought the only mode in which they could well be given was on the principle of deferred annuities recommended by the hon. and gallant Member for Longford. The Treasury might, perhaps, contribute a certain proportion of the annual payment required to provide a life annuity, beginning at a certain age; but any such proposals would require a large expenditure on the part of the Treasury, at any rate when the plan first came into operation, and therefore he could only say that a scheme for this purpose had already received careful consideration, and that he was in communication with the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon the possibility of carrying it into effect. Last Session he referred to the question of residences, and the Correspondence which had been laid on the Table showed that it was intended this year to propose a Vote not exceeding £5,000 towards the erection of residences in the case of vested schools. He was not without a sanguine hope that something might be done also in the case of residences for non-vested schools. This object, however, could not be accomplished by a grant for the erection of such residences, though it might possibly be done by an alteration in the Land Improvement and Glebe Loans Act, under which those who were anxious to borrow money for the purpose might borrow it from the Board of Works, the residences being erected subject to the supervision of the Board of Works, and a certain proportion of the annual repayment of the loan being allowed to the borrower by the National Board of Education so long as the residences were bond fide devoted to the use of school-teachers. As to all the proposals he had sketched out, it should be understood that none of them, excepting the grants towards the erection of residences for vested schools, could be considered as

finally decided on by the Government. In dealing with all of them, the difficult question arose how far the additional expenses—indeed, all the expenses—for Irish education should come upon the Imperial Exchequer. There was very great force in the argument of the right hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh upon the point. It had given him great pleasure that evening to hear it admitted by Irish Representatives that it was right and fair that some local contributions should be levied in Ireland towards the education of the people. Three years ago his noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) proposed an increase in the national grant for Irish education, which was then estimated at £104,000 a-year, for the purpose of annual payments for results. That grant had continued for three years, and it had increased in the last year, he was happy to say, because it had been well expended, to £120,000. The Government, however, were now bound, not only by the terms of the letter in which his noble Friend announced this proposal to the National Board of Education, but also by the necessities of the case, to re-consider the whole question. The grant of £120,000 a-year, then, must be looked upon as ending at the close of the present financial year; and, in making fresh arrangements, the Government must deal with the whole question de novo. He had said that he thought it necessary to increase in certain proportions the class salaries of the teachers. That object might be attained by devoting half of the £120,000 towards such increase, allowing the other half to remain in the shape of a certain grant for results. And, in addition to this, on condition that, say, £60,000 a-year was locally raised by the levy of a rate which the Guardians of every Union should be authorized to raise, £60,000 to meet that levy would then be granted from the Treasury as a further payment for results. In fact, subject to certain limitations, the Guardians of the Union would be authorized to tax themselves towards the proper payment of the teachers of the National Schools in their Unions; and upon doing so they would receive a proportionate amount from the Treasury in addition to what was already given. That was a proposal which, when put into shape, might commend itself, he hoped, to the House. It seemed to him that it would initiate in Ireland a due provision from local rates for the purpose of national education. It was impossible to adopt the same system in Ireland, which had been laid down in Scotland and England. There were no sufficient materials in Ireland for the formation of school boards, and he believed that if you wished to obtain a local contribution in the shape of a rate, you could only do so upon the basis of the poor rate and through the Board of Guardians. How could we at once, when people had been long taught, as it were, to lean entirely upon the crutches of Imperial grants, turn round and say—"We require a compulsory rate for the purpose of national education?" But by some such proposal as he had sketched out, we might initiate contributions from the localities towards that in which they themselves ought to be most interested. He hoped the hon. and gallant Member for Longford, and also the hon. Member for Kildare, would be content with the discussion, and be satisfied to leave the matter a little longer in the hands of the Government. He had heard with very great gratification much that had fallen from hon. Members from Ireland in this debate. It was clear to him they appreciated the fact, which must be patent to everyone, that whatever might be said of education in Ireland, it was at any rate true that the present system had, from small beginnings, and in spite of great struggles, at length come to this—it educated, at least to a certain extent, nearly 1,000,000 of children in Ireland. Bearing this in mind, he did not think it wise to propose any sweeping change. He would wish rather to deal with it in the way of preservation and reformation, and to restore it, where necessary, in accordance with its main principles, as a system of united secular and separate religious instruction.

MR. ALDERMAN W. M'ARTHUR said, he was glad to hear that teachers would be improved in status and that they would have residences provided for them; and he had no doubt that what had been said on the subject would be received with equal satisfaction in Ireland. Unless both those things were done, it was vain to expect an efficient staff of teachers in Ireland. He regretted that objections should have been taken to Marlborough Street College. The late Right Hon. Alexander Macdonald, Resident Commissioner, when examined before the Royal Commission of 1868, said that, for the last 29 years, he had seen great numbers of young men come to the college from every part of Ireland, and of all religious creeds, and yet they lived in such perfect harmony together that he had never heard of a religious quarrel among them. He thought that a most desirable result and was of opinion that the fact of bringing together the teachers of different denominations had had a most happy effect on the population of Ireland. This proposal for training colleges was not a new one. It was brought before the late Lord Derby in 1867; but his Lordship told the deputation that the adoption of such a system would be destructive to national education in Ireland. He should greatly regret if separate training colleges were established in that country. The hon. and gallant Member for Longford (Mr. O'Reilly) had told them that chaplains would be appointed to the colleges without salaries; but how long would it be before the House would be asked to provide for salaries? He regretted that the Roman Catholic hierarchy in Ireland had set themselves in opposition to the model schools, for there was no system in the world better than the model schools in Ireland; and if efficiently maintained, they would be able to supply a large number of trained teachers every year. In proof of that, a single model school—that of Belfast—turned out 33 males and 30 female teachers, and in 1862, 76 teachers. In any future legislation, he trusted that the Government would maintain intact those schools; for they could have nothing better.

MR. O'REILLY said, that after the speech which they had heard from the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland on behalf of the Government—a statement which he thought was very fair—he would not trouble the House to divide.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE METROPOLIS VALUATION ACT, 1869—QUESTIONS TO RATEPAYERS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GOLDSMID, in rising to call attention to the obnoxious questions now put to the ratepayers of the Metropolis under "The Metropolis Valuation Act, 1869," said, that by that Act it was provided that a valuation of the metropolis was to be made every five years, and certain regulations were laid down with respect to it. Forms of questions were to be sent out to every ratepayer, such as were prescribed by the Income Tax and the Acts amending the same. In 1869 a form of a sufficiently inquisitorial character was prepared, but it was nothing in comparison with the form issued this year, which had caused great discontent, especially amongst the commercial community, from whom he had received several communications on the subject. He very much doubted whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself could answer all the 13 questions contained therein, when addressed to him at his own private residence; indeed, if report spoke truly, three Members of Her Majesty's Government had been unable to return satisfactory answers. If, then, the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not himself answer these questions, how could he expect that an ordinary occupier or shopkeeper should be able to do so? One of the questions was—"At what would your house let from year to year in its uninhabited condition?" There were hundreds of houses in the metropolis with regard to which an occupier would be entirely at a loss to answer this question. Lord Dudley was known to have a magnificent house in Park Lane; but who would give any thing for it as an unfurnished house from year to year, without any certainty of occupation beyond that time? Another question was—"If held on lease, give the date of lease or agreement, for what term, and whether granted on any and what premium or other consideration than rent." In many cases the occupier of a house was wholly unable to answer such a question. But if the difficulty of answering these questions was great in the case of the ordinary householder, it was still more perplexing and annoying to shopkeepers, who were required to state the name of the landlord, the length of the lease, and various other matters. Now, under the Act any ratepayer might on the the payment of 1s. inspect the Returns, and ascertain the term of lease of the premises of his rivals in trade. He might then, in order, if possible, to damage his rival, obtain from the landlord the reversion of the premises, and thus might destroy his rival's business by compelling him to leave the neighbourhood. In one case, with regard to which he (Mr. Goldsmid) had received information, a tradesman had, in consequence of an attempt of this kind, to pay £4,000 in order to obtain a renewal of his lease, so as not to let his business be ruined. The questions which were put did not, it appeared to them, come under the terms of the Act, and were not necessary to enable the Assessment Committee to estimate the value of the premises. Indeed, as Chairman of an Assessment Committee he must say the valuation of the occupier was about the worst that could be had. He had received information that the vestry of Hackney had had great difficulty in consequence of the form in which the questions were put, and he believed if Her Majesty's Government had given instructions a much simpler form of questions might have been prepared. He therefore hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give directions that the form should be revised, reducing the number of questions, and rendering them less difficult and harrassing to the ratepayers of the metropolis. He begged to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he would state to the House by whose instructions and for what reason the new form of questions was prepared; by whom it was so prepared; and by whom approved?

MR. FORSYTH said, he, too, had felt strongly that these questions were very difficult to answer, and he should have given Notice to ask for information had not the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. Goldsmid) done so. The questions were puzzling, unsatisfactory, and perplexing, and were not authorized by the Income Tax Acts. The return was required to be made in the form specified in the Income Tax Act, or in such form as the Commissioners of the Treasury might prescribe. Now, as the questions that had been sent out were not in the form prescribed by the Act, they must be in the form prescribed by the Treasury, and he would be glad to know whether they had been sanctioned by the Treasury? These questions did not enable the occupier to give the only information required by the Treasury; and they were not only very unsatisfactory, but also extremely puzzling and difficult to answer. Who could say "the amount of land-tax redeemed, and whether by landlord or tenant?" Next, "the amount of sewers-rate, and whether paid by landlord or tenant." "If the property is subject to tithe, state if commuted or otherwise." Who could answer these questions? He confessed that he could not, and a distinguished Member of the House had told him that he could not without consulting his lawyer. In the case of building leases the amount of ground-rent would afford no indication of the value of the house, and yet the leaseholder, not being the owner, could not make his return in that capacity. If gentlemen who had some knowledge of the Law found no small difficulty in answering them, they were surely not questions to be put to the whole of the occupiers in the metropolis.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, referring to the word "obnoxious" in the Question, doubted whether it was quite in order to put epithets into Questions of that sort. Having received an intimation that a series of questions was to be put to him on the subject, he must frankly own he was afraid it was the series on these forms that he was expected to answer. He was rather pleased to find that they were interrogatories of a very different character, and he was quite ready to give the hon. Member such information as he was able on the subject. These questions were prepared in pursuance of the Act of Parliament of 1869, the object of which was to provide for a common basis of value for the purposes of local government and taxation, and to promote uniformity in the assessment of rateable property in the metropolis. The Act proposed that an Assessment Committee should be appointed, which should make a valuation of all the property in the metropolis, and, in order to make that valuation upon a proper basis, not only for local but for Imperial purposes, it was provided that the Surveyor of Taxes should be consulted, and that the valuation made should be subject to his revision. That was the reason for which it was provided that returns should from time to time be made in order to assist the Assessment Committee to make these valuations, and the Act contained a provision that such

valuations should be made once in every five years. [Mr. GOLDSMID: Not a new form of question every five years?] The returns were to be in such form as the Income Tax Act prescribed, or the Lords of the Treasury directed. When the first form of questions were drafted they were sent out in a different and simpler form from the present one, and, so far as the Treasury and the officers of Inland Revenue were concerned, they were quite satisfied with the form originally prescribed. But between the quinquennial valuations the local authorities were charged with the duty of putting certain questions in order to obtain certain information. The new form was prepared by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue and approved by the Treasury. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, however, found that in the interval since the last quinquennial valuation, the local authorities had put out forms of questions of their own, embracing other matters than those which had originally been required, and as it was necessary to frame a form of questions which would suit the purposes both of Imperial and local valuation, they endeavoured in framing their new form of questions to meet the wishes of the local authorities. He certainly agreed with his hon. Friends that these questions were puzzling and difficult, and he frankly owned that he could not answer them all himself, and was glad to find that he was not singular in that respect. But at all events if the individual could not answer them, he had simply to say so, and it would be so much the worse for the Assessment Committee, who would consequently have more trouble in making out their Assessment. The much more serious objections were, that to answer some of the questions it would be necessary to state what would be very annoying for persons to disclose. The question as to who was the owner of the property, and when the lease would terminate were those to which the most objection had been raised. With regard to the first, he really thought that a strange delicacy existed in the matter, and that owners generally had somewhat more consideration for persons holding leases of their property; therefore, it was hardly likely, as an ordinary rule, that an occupier would have his house bought over his head at the termination of his lease without his knowledge. As regarded the period of the termination of the lease, he thought that was immaterial to the officers of Inland Revenue, and, so far as they were concerned, they would take no exception to any return because it did not disclose that fact. At the same time, the length of the lease was an important consideration in determining the value of the property. With regard to the question as to who was the owner of the property, that was a question always asked, and which must always be asked, under the Income Tax Act; and as long as an income tax was maintained, he did not see how that question was to be avoided. With regard to the Schedule generally, it did not follow that tenants were bound to answer questions on which they were not informed; but it did seem to him fair to put the question to the occupier, and to require him to answer it if he could. He did not know that the occupiers need take extraordinary pains to obtain information on points they were not informed on, and he did not think that the questions were really open to the charge of being unnecessarily vexatious. The desire of the Treasury certainly was not unduly to press them, and the officers of Inland Revenue had received instructions not to reject any return which failed to disclose the name of the owner. There was every desire to make the thing as little vexatious as possible. It must be borne in mind, however, that the main object of these questions was to ensure that the rating should be fair, and in order to effect that it was absolutely necessary that certain information should be got in order that one man might not be rated, proportionately, more than another, and the unwillingness to give it arose often from an unreasonable squeamishness.

MR. RAMSAY said, he was of opinion that such questions as those in the Schedule could not be avoided, unless we were to ignore altogether the claim of the ratepayers to have the rates equally levied on all descriptions of property, according to its true annual value. That was the principle of the Act for the valuation of heritable property of all kinds in Scotland. A difficulty which had been urged in regard to leaseholders whose leases ran it might be for 99 years was obviated in Scotland by the statute which placed leaseholders for more than

order, if possible, to damage his rival, obtain from the landlord the reversion of the premises, and thus might destroy his rival's business by compelling him to leave the neighbourhood. In one case, with regard to which he (Mr. Goldsmid) had received information, a tradesman had, in consequence of an attempt of this kind, to pay £4,000 in order to obtain a renewal of his lease, so as not to let his business be ruined. MR. RAMSAY said, he was of opinion that such questions as those in the Schedule could not be avoided, unless we were to ignore altogether the claim of the ratepayers to have the rates equally levied on all descriptions of property, according to its true annual value. That was the principle of the Act for the valuation of heritable property of all kinds in Scotland. A difficulty which had been urged in regard to leaseholders whose leases ran it might be for 99 years was obviated in Scotland by the statute which placed leaseholders for more than

of precaution in that respect were taken, they looked forward to the success of the present Expedition. That opinion clearly laid it down that there was no greater risk to be experienced in an Arctic expedition than attended the voyage of H. M. Ship Challenger. All subsequent Expeditions to that of Sir John Franklin, during a period of 30 years, had always returned in safety, their death-rate having been less than that of seamen engaged in any other service. They pointed further to the advantages to be derived from the introduction of steam power and improved victualling and navigation, and to the fact that Arctic service was most popular in the Navy. He had already stated that since the return of the Expedition to investigate the fate of Sir John Franklin and his comrades this country had retired from the field of Arctic exploration, but the calamity which had deterred this country had not had a like effect upon other countries. Germany had sent out an Expedition in 1869-70; Sweden one or more Expeditions in 1872; and Austria one in the same year, all of which Expeditions had had more or less success in the investigation of the problem which had long puzzled Arctic explorers. The German Expedition, pursuing its exploration by the East Coast of Greenland, reached a latitude of 77 degrees; Sweden, proceeding from Spitzbergen, reached a latitude of 80 degrees; and Austria, going by way of Nova Zembla, reached a latitude of 82 degrees: the explorers observing, though they did not reach, land at a latitude of 83 degrees. Singular to say, however, notwithstanding those successes of the Expeditions of different countries, no Arctic navigator had reached so high a latitude as that which Parry gained in 1827. He did not quite reach the 83rd degree, but fell very little short of it, and though land had been seen further North than any he actually visited, no European traveller had ever set foot upon so high a latitude as he. The question, then, was, if other nations had not been deterred by the fate of Sir John Franklin and his followers from pursuing those investigations, was it for this country to give up the research. He had mentioned Expeditions from other European countries, but he should add that it was in consequence of the results attending an Expedition sent out by the United States of America that they had been encouraged to send out the proposed Expedition. The Polaris proceeding by the route proposed to be now taken—by Baffin's Bay—reached 82° 16' N. lat., without obstruction. In view of these facts, a consideration of the scientific results to be attained, and the small risks to be run by those who had the conduct and formed part of the Expedition, induced the Government to decide upon sending out another. When that resolution had been arrived at, steps were taken to secure as far as possible the safety and success of the Expedition, and he would like to inform the Committee of their nature. A Committee of most experienced Arctic voyagers was called upon—Admiral Richards, the Hydrographer to the Admiralty, Sir Leopold M'Olinckock, well-known as having solved the fate of Sir John Franklin, and Admiral Sherard Osborn. Those officers, with the greatest alacrity, assembled at the bidding of the Admiralty, and gave them the benefit of their experience and advice as to the means which should be adopted as far as possible to ensure a successful result; and in their Report, which would be found in the Papers before the House, most valuable suggestions were made for the guidance of the Expedition. The points put before that Committee were these. What should be the scope of the Expedition, what should be the order for carrying them into effect, what description of ship ought to be employed, and what were likely to be the most suitable winter quarters? With respect to the first point, the Committee decided that the scope and primary object was to attain the highest northern latitude possible—the North Pole, and the limits of navigation were to lie between 20 and 90 degrees of west longitude. The most material point before the Committee was what route should be taken. That had long been a vexed question amongst navigators and persons who had given their attention to the subject; but as was pointed out by the Report of the Hydrographer, experience had rather narrowed the grounds of dispute, because the Expeditions sent out from foreign countries, although they had met with a certain amount of success, and had been able to lay down the boundaries of lands which had not hitherto appeared in any chart, yet had shown that from the different points from which they endeavoured to reach the Pole complete success did not seem likely to be ensured. Therefore, by a process of exhaustion, persons of Arctic experience had almost unanimously agreed that the route by Baffin's Bay and Smith's Sound was the one which offered the greatest prospect of success. He had mentioned already that the voyage of the Polaris, the American ship, by that route was very encouraging for the Expedition which they now proposed to start. They endeavoured to obtain ships that were best suited for the purpose in view. One of Her Majesty's Ships, the Alert, had been pronounced by the Committee to be in all respects fit for the service, and she had been thoroughly overhauled, and was being prepared under the personal supervision of Sir Leopold M'Clintock at Portsmouth. They had purchased a sealing ship called the Bloodhound, but having already a ship of the same name in the Navy, her name would be changed to the Discovery, and she was also being prepared for the Expedition under the same direction at Portsmouth. It was proposed that these vessels should sail in concert—the Alert to be the forward ship, and the Discovery ultimately to be left about 200 miles behind, not proceeding beyond 82 deg. N. lat.—to act as a depôt and rescue-ship, in case the Alert should have to be abandoned. Should the Expedition not return as early as was expected—namely, in 1877—a third ship would be sent to their assistance, in order to supply provisions and bring home the ships' crews, if it had been found necessary to abandon one or both ships. He could assure the Committee that every pains had been taken to equip those ships in the best possible manner, and to provide all that was necessary in the way of special clothing and provisions. He had, with pleasure, to recognize on that occasion the kindly feeling and favour with which the Expedition had been received by those foreign Governments which had been communicated with on the subject. The Danish Government, which had settlements on the coast of Greenland, had most warmly entered into the enterprise, and had promised to procure sledge drivers and dogs for the Expedition when it should reach their shore. The Government of the United States had offered Her Majesty's Government the stores left by the Polaris at different points, in order to supplement the arrangements already made. This Expedition, therefore, he might say, would start with the hearty goodwill of those foreign Governments which were able to render us any service. Having now explained the objects to be attained, and the risks of the Expedition, he would only add that it was no doubt possible that its main object, which was the discovery of the veritable Pole, might not be attained. A great deal would depend upon the season, because, in some years, the water was more open than in others. Of course, in addition to the chance—if there was such a thing as chance—of the severity of the season, there was that unknown quantity of the nature of the land and water around the Pole, and whether it was open water or frozen water. He would not pretend that there was no risk or peril for the gallant officers and men who were to be sent out on this peculiar enterprise, but the benefit was great in comparison with the risks which were likely to be encountered. The men of the naval service of this country were not likely to shrink from perils at the call of their Queen and country, and that was especially true of those who had penetrated the Arctic regions. Those who were now about to engage in that Expedition were not a whit inferior to those who had gone before them, and were men who had not been accustomed to shrink from any perils to which duty might call them. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Vote.

MR. E. J. REED said, he entirely approved of a further Arctic Expedition, and therefore did not rise to oppose the Vote. He wished, however, to observe that if the Expedition had not been sent quite so soon, they might have looked for more favourable consequences than they could now do. He thought a British Arctic Expedition, on which £100,000 was to be expended, might have been made the nucleus of several simultaneous expeditions, which could have made observations at different points, and he contended that they would have contributed much to the advancement of Arctic science. He wished to explain that neither the German nor the Austrian Expeditions had any intention whatever of attacking the Pole, or seeking to go there. The German Expedition was sent to explore the neglected East Coast of Greenland, and the Austrian to explore the unknown seas to the north of Siberia. It therefore followed that it had not been the endeavour of the scientific men of Germany and Austria to do that which we were going to do—namely, to discover the veritable Pole itself, whatever that Pole might prove to be. Our Expedition was starting at a time when other nations were prepared to spend money for the same object, and when he put his Question the other night to the Prime Minister, he was only anxious to suggest that, having been made acquainted of late years with the progress in meteorology and magnetic and astronomical science, and that they were advanced chiefly by simultaneous observations, it would be very desirable, for the purpose of bringing about scientific results, that we should have several expeditions organized to make simultaneous observations at different points. Notwithstanding that this Expedition was about to start this year, and the German Expedition was not to start until next year, there was ample time and opportunity for coming to some understanding with regard to that Expedition for at any rate simultaneous observation. He trusted the First Lord would take the subject into his consideration. The necessity of simultaneous observations being made by different countries had been strongly urged upon him by the Commander of the Austrian Polar Expedition, whom he had met at Trieste, and there was a great disposition among scientific men in all countries to recognize the value of these simultaneous observations. The First Lord of the Admiralty had acted wisely in availing himself of the very best advice; and, therefore, while otherwise he should have been disposed to question the fitness of the Alert, he would not do so now. He hoped the Vote would be passed without opposition, and that the remarks he had offered would be received in the spirit in which they were made. He had no idea of checking the enthusiasm with which the proposal had been met, for he believed that such Expeditions, publicly organized for scientific objects, reflected credit upon the age.

MR. COLLINS said, he had great experience of very cold climates, and he would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty to send out with the Expedition, at whatever cost, a large quantity of reindeers' skins to be used as overclothing by the men. He had himself travelled through the North of Finland, and was well provided with a quantity of fur; but after some days he found it useless, and was obliged to give it up in consequence of being very unwell. He then got reindeer skins, and immediately recovered his health perfectly. The dresses should be made so as to cover the head and the hands, and the overcoat should come down the legs. The Expedition should also be supplied with an abundance of sledges and dog harness. A supply of feather pillows, and reindeer skins upon which the men could recline and cover themselves, and of boots and shoes to be worn over others would be found to be very acceptable.

MR. ANDERSON said, that the First Lord of the Admiralty had omitted to tell the House when the Expedition was to sail. [MR. HUNT: In May.] His reason for referring to the date was, that the experience of the Dundee navigators, who were the men best acquainted with the Polar Seas, was that it would be too late for the Expedition to sail in June, as was originally proposed, and that it would be necessary for it to sail in April, in order that it might get well up Smith's Sound before the season got too far advanced. It might be impossible now to send off the Expedition any earlier than was intended; but he thought it right to mention the circumstance, as it was most desirable that the Expedition having been undertaken, should be attended with success. It was highly creditable to the Government that they had undertaken it, for it was high time, when other nations were going so far a-head in Arctic discovery, that we should do something to keep up our old reputation.

MR. YEAMAN said, speaking from 17 or 18 years' connection with Arctic traders and trading, he could corroborate what the hon. Member for Glasgow had said as to Smith's Sound. He had little fear as to the success of the Expedition, and did not think it would be attended with much danger. During the long time he had been connected with Polar trading, he had scarcely ever lost a man. There had certainly been some ships lost; but, thanks to the proximity of the ice, there was hardly ever a man lost. We had great facilities and advantages over what were possessed by the Expeditions which were sent in search of Sir John Franklin, and there was no doubt that the Expedition now being sent out would, in a couple of seasons, discover whether the Pole was to be reached by way of Smith's Sound or not. He had every confidence in the Government and the First Lord of the Admiralty doing everything in such a manner as would do credit to the country, and there was little doubt but this great maritime nation would be the first to discover whether the Pole could be reached by that route or not. He suggested that with the view of obviating the necessity of either of the steamers having to return for coals, a sailing ship should be sent to Melville Bay with 400 or 500 tons of coal.

MR. GOSCHEN wished to say, on behalf of the late Government, that they wished the Expedition every possible success, and that they should not grudge the present Administration the credit which they would deserve from having organized it and proposed the Vote to the House of Commons. The late Government, while in office, organized the Expedition of the Challenger in the cause of science. They thought that was a most important operation. The deep sea exploration was a matter which interested not only the public, but to a far greater extent the scientific world, and they did not hesitate to come to Parliament and ask for the necessary expenditure to carry it out. They thought that while that Expedition was on their hands, there was no great hurry for organizing this Polar Expedition, and they reserved it for another year. However that might be, they trusted that the results of the present Expedition might be as successful as they believe those of the Challenger to have been, and that the Government might have reason to congratulate themselves upon it.

MR. A. EGERTON said, he thought that the Government and the Admiralty might fairly congratulate themselves on the reception the project had met with. He could assure the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. E. J. Reed) that the Admiralty did not undervalue simultaneous observations, when they could be carried out with other Governments; but it was feared that too much time would be lost in making their arrangements; and, after all, the importance of simultaneous observations was not so great in this Expedition as in that having reference to the Transit of Venus. Besides, the Government would have the advantage of comparing the observations made for them upon scientific matters with those made for other Governments at a future time. The Government would desire to give their results to other Governments and to obtain the results of other Governments. If the hon. Member for Kinsale (Mr. Collins) would be pleased to call at the Admiralty and make suggestions to the Arctic Committee he would be received with courtesy, and his observations would be listened to with attention. He might state that the matter of sledges, and boots, and other things had been carefully considered, and he could assure the House and the public that every care would be taken in regard to the wants of the men; but they would be ready to receive any suggestions. He would just add that the expediency of sending out a ship with a supply of coals had also not been lost sight of, it being contemplated by the Admiralty to send out this year or next a small store ship, with the object to which the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. Yeaman) had called attention.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £3,000 (Supplementary 1874-5), Steam Machinery, &c., Breaking-up Ships.

(3.) £9,000 (Supplementary 1874-5), Navy, Miscellaneous Services.

(4.) £240,299 1s. 5d. (Supplementary 1873-4), Excess of Naval Expenditure.

MR. ANDERSON said, it was a very large sum, and he should like an explanation as to some of the details.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, that the details were all explained in the Appropriation Accounts; but as he must share the responsibility of this Excess, he would explain what had been done in regard to it. It was found that some surpluses which were expected from other Votes were not realized. It was also found that an increase of not less than £33,000 was due to a misunderstanding by the commanding officers of several ships abroad of an Admiralty Circular, with reference to the making up accounts at the end of the financial year; which had resulted in throwing upon the year 1873-4 what was properly due to the succeeding year. There was also an unexpected claim of £11,000 sent in from the Bombay Government for stores supplied, and another unexpected claim of £3,000 from the War Office. The rest of the Vote was made up of outstanding claims for stores, and through the prices of coal and iron not falling in price as the Department expected. Another cause of the Excess in the expenditure was due to concentration of our ships on the Coasts of Spain and Zanzibar in the years 1873 and 1874, where the officers had to be supplied with stores by contract in lieu of drawing them from our dépôts. During the three years that he was Financial Secretary at the Admiralty, he had experienced much anxiety with regard to the high price of coal and other stores, and the excess of the last year it was totally impossible to avoid.

(9.) £750 (Supplementary 1874-5), for the Wellington Monument.

MR. BECKETT-DENISON desired to know what progress the work had made, and when it was likely to be finished?

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he was happy in being able to give an encouraging account. Mr. Stevens, the sculptor, was recovering his health, and had resumed work with great energy. In May, 1874, the marble work was completed and in the Cathedral. There remained to be completed all the bronze work, if that was of a purely sculptural character. At the present time the effigy of the illustrious Duke and the upper part of the sarcophagus were cast in bronze. One of the side groups was in the hands of the founder, in process of casting. The second group would be ready for casting in three weeks' time, and the lower part of the sarcophagus was also nearly finished. That would be the last of the sculptural works connected with the monument. In conclusion, he wished to bear testimony to the zeal exhibited by Mr. Stevens since the recovery of his health. He would give more detailed explanations on Monday.

Vote agreed to.

(10.) £4,000 (Supplementary 1874-5), for British Embassy Houses, &c., China, Japan, and other places.

Mr. ANDERSON asked for an explanation of the Vote?

Mr. W. H. SMITH said, the item was intended to enable the Government to purchase a new Legation house at Lisbon.

Vote agreed to.

(11.) £3,000 (1874-5), for additional accommodation at Marlborough House.

(14.) £3,108 (Supplementary 1874-5), Charity Commission.

(16.) £25,000 (Supplementary 1874-5), Stationery and Printing.

Mr. BECKETT-DENISON wished to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that the total charges under this head amounted to something like £500,000 a-year. Those charges were, he believed, susceptible of great reduction; but he would urge that economy would never be enforced in this branch of the public service until the heads of the different Departments personally took the matter of methodizing expenditure in hand and dealt with it.

Mr. ANDERSON said, he, too, also thought that something must be done to check this expenditure, the total charge for the year being enormous.

Mr. ASSHETON suggested that expense would be saved if the number of Blue Books and Papers now sent to hon. Members as a matter of course—out of which they were unable to read a tenth part—was decreased.

Mr. EARP said, he would suggest, as a means of saving money in the Printing and Stationery department, that hon. Members should refrain from moving in the House for the production of Returns, Papers, and Reports, unless they were absolutely necessary.

Mr. W. H. SMITH said, he agreed with the suggestion of the hon. Member for Newark, for one great cause of the large expenditure incurred was the printing of so many Returns called for in the House. The item charged for Stationery, was certainly a large one, and it had for some time past been engaging the attention of the Treasury. It was hoped that economy in the matter would be speedily effected by establishing a form of accounts between the different Departments, which would clearly bring home to each the amount expended on account of it for stores and working materials of all kinds.

LORD ESLINGTON concurred in the suggestion of the hon. Member for Newark.

Mr. SULLIVAN wished to know whether the Vote included any of the parchments and vellum which had been stolen from the offices in Dublin?

Mr. W. H. SMITH said, he would ascertain.

Vote agreed to.

(19.) £1,604 (Supplementary 1874-5), Local Government Board, Ireland.

Mr. SULLIVAN said, he should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would inform him whether this sum included anything for the Local Government Board Poet. A new Department appeared to have been created, with a Government Poet in it. Though he knew that officially that was not necessary, seeing that they had a Poet Laureate, he would first give the House a sample of Government poetry which had been published by this Department—

“There's a skin without and a skin within,
A covering skin and a lining skin;
But the skin within is the skin without,
Doubled inward and turned inside out.”

The rules of prosody were very much violated in those lines, and he did not think they would pass muster in a literary review; but as a sample of Government poetry they were curious, and he wished to ask how much of the Vote was intended for the Government Sanitary Poet in Ireland?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH replied that the office of Sanitary Poet to the Local Government Board in Ireland might perhaps be a very useful one, but as far as they had gone they had not yet sanctioned the appointment. No doubt, if they were to do so, they would have plenty of applications. The hon. Member would see by the Vote what the items were.

Vote agreed to.

(20.) £150 (Supplementary 1874-5), Public Record Office, Ireland, and Keeper of State Papers, Dublin.

(23.) £15,887 (1874-5), General Survey and Valuation of Ireland.

MR. SULLIVAN inquired whether the sum included any amount for the new scale of salaries recommended?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, that the question had better be asked when the Estimates for the year were before the House. These Estimates were on account of the past year.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, that in his opinion it would not be right to settle this matter on a Supplemental Vote a year after power concerning it had been taken away from the grand juries.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, that the grand juries had not been interfered with. By the Act of last Session the sums to be paid by the grand juries were settled upon a fixed instead of a varying sum, and they were great gainers.

Vote agreed to.

(24.) £10,000 (Supplementary 1874-5), Law Charges.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, he thought it would be satisfactory to the House to know whether in that sum were included any particulars of the cost of the prosecution of the case of the Queen v. Castro.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that a complete Return of the expenses in the case referred to was made last Session. When the whole of the expenses incurred had been paid, the amount would be something under £60,000.

Vote agreed to.

(25.) £1,540 (Supplementary 1874-5), London Bankruptcy Court.

(26.) £210 (Supplementary 1874-5), Miscellaneous Legal Charges, England.

(27.) £957 (Supplementary 1874-5), Court of Bankruptcy, Ireland.

(28.) £365 (Supplementary 1874-5), Registry of Deeds, Ireland.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

(29.) £1,547 (Supplementary 1874-5), County Prisons and Reformatories, Ireland.

MR. SULLIVAN objected to the dual system of prison Inspectors in that country, and hoped the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would be directed to the question.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, the subject had frequently occupied his attention during the past year; but, so far as his observation had gone, his opinion did not accord with that of the hon. Gentleman.

Vote agreed to.

(30.) £150 (Supplementary 1874-5), Dundrum Criminal Lunatic Asylum, Ireland.

(31.) £750 (Supplementary 1874-5), Miscellaneous Legal Charges, Ireland.

(33.) £1,547 (Supplementary 1874-5), Learned Societies and Scientific Investigation.

(35.) £100 (Supplementary 1874-5), National Gallery of Ireland.

(36.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £223, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1875, for the Queen's University in Ireland."

MR. SULLIVAN said, he would move that the Vote be reduced by £120, the sum granted for medals. Than the Queen's University, he maintained there was no more gigantic educational imposture in Europe, kept up by the sheer force of grants of money from the Imperial Exchequer—while they were exceedingly economical on subjects in which the Irish people were more concerned.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Item of £120, for Medals and Prizes, be omitted from the proposed Vote,"—(Mr. Sullivan),—put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(37.) £2,000 (Supplementary 1874-5), Diplomatic Services.

MR. BECKETT - DENISON asked when the North American Boundary Commission would be at an end?

MR. BOURKE said, it was going on now, and it was impossible to answer the question.

Vote agreed to.

(38.) £3,186 (Supplementary 1874-5), Grants in Aid of Expeditions in certain Colonies.

(39.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £18,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1875, for Tonnage Duties, Bounties on Slaves, and Expenses of the Liberated African Department."

MR. ANDERSON said, he objected to the sum of £12,000 charged as compensation for the destruction of certain dhows by Her Majesty's Ship Thetis, and would move the reduction of the Vote by that amount. He believed Captain Ward had been too zealous in the pursuit of prize money, and that innocent persons had suffered, many pearl-fishing dhows having been destroyed. The Treasury Letter said that if the amount had been a smaller one, they would have required him to pay it himself; but as it was a large sum, they let him off with a reprimand.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £12,000, for Compensation for Destruction of Dhows by Her Majesty's ship 'Thetis,' be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Anderson.)

MR. HUNT said, the naval Department had expressed disapproval of the conduct of Captain Ward, and it was not likely to be repeated.

MR. GOURLEY thought a reprimand was not sufficient.

MR. BECKETT-DENISON could not find, after reading the Correspondence very carefully, that Captain Ward had been guilty of more than a great error of judgment.

MR. MONK wished to know what had become of the loot from these 10 dhows which were plundered?

MR. HANBURY said, he thought the solution was that Captain Ward had not sufficient instructions. While in Bombay recently, officers had complained to him several times of the insufficient instructions they had received from the Admiralty. In that case, it was hardly fair to blame the captain of the Thetis.

MR. HUNT said, the occurrence was much to be regretted. There was a good deal of cunning exercised by the Natives in carrying on their illicit trade, and he had no doubt that Captain Ward, in the absence of explicit instructions, and not being acquainted with the coast, had taken too zealous a view of his duty. That, however, would be remedied by more detailed instructions which had been prepared.

MR. ANDERSON said, that under the circumstances, he would pass the matter over this time.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(41.) £2,830 (Supplementary 1874-5), Miscellaneous Expenses.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, that when the Civil Service Estimates came on, he should call attention to the Office of Lord Chamberlain, in regard to his control of the theatres. He thought that it would be much more satisfactory if the theatres were placed under the Home Secretary, who had the administration of the police. The Lord Chamberlain did not possess at present a sufficiently large staff to enable him to enforce his authority in this matter.

Vote agreed to.

(42.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £13,247, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1875, for the repayment of certain Miscellaneous Advances to the Civil Contingencies Fund."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he wished to strike out of the Vote the sum of £500 given to Lieutenant Wood for bringing home the despatches from Coomassie. He did so with the view of asking on what principle officers were selected for such service?

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £500, for a Gratuity to the Honourable Henry J. L. Wood, Lieutenant 11th Hussars, for bringing the Despatches announcing the fall of Coomassie, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Sir Charles Dilke.)

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, that Colonel Milward, who brought home the despatch in the case of the Abyssinian Expedition, was an officer who had been very useful; but he did not know if there had been any previous service to entitle Lieutenant Wood to the distinction, and suggested whether it was desirable that it should be a mere fancy gift in the hands of the Commander of the Expedition.

MR. F. STANLEY said, that the same precedent had been followed in this as in previous cases, and the practice had been in existence from time immemorial. The Commander of the Expedition selected the officer whom he wished to entrust with the message, and he (Mr. F. Stanley) did not know that there were any circumstances which placed the present on a different footing from previous cases of the kind.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he was of opinion that there was a distinct difference between that and previous cases. There was a certain appearance of passing over officers of greater service, and it was desirable that there should be some established principle of selection for the post.

MR. HUNT hoped the hon. Baronet would not put the Committee to a division. The gratuity had been recommended by the Commander-in-Chief of the Expedition, and if it was now disallowed, it would be to pass a Vote of Censure on Sir Garnet Wolseley.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

GENERAL CARRIERS ACT (1830).

NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. JACKSON moved that the Select Committee be composed of the following 19 Members:—Mr. Cavendish Bentinck, Mr. Brocklehurst, Mr. Maurice Brooks, Mr. Bruce, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, Mr. Freshfield, Mr. Gibson, Mr. Goldney, Mr. Staveley Hill, Mr. Laing, Mr. Leeman, Mr. Sampson Lloyd, Mr. Ma-jendie, Mr. Morley, Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Salt, Sir Edward Watkin, Mr. Watkin Williams, and Mr. Jackson.

MR. BECKETT-DENISON objected to the Committee as nominated; more than half of them were members of the Bar, while many others were manufacturers; in fact, there were only about four independent Members nominated. He thought it would have been better if the choice of Members to serve on the Committee had been left to the Committee of Selection.

MR. JACKSON said, he had had great difficulty in nominating the Committee, and had done his best to make it generally acceptable.

Motion agreed to.

THE CLERK OF THE PARLIAMENTS—RESIGNATION OF SIR JOHN GEORGE SHAW LEFEVRE, K.C.B.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I have to inform your Lordships that I have received from Sir John Shaw

Lefevre, the Clerk of the Parliaments, the following letter :—

"18, Spring Gardens,
6th March 1875.

"My dear Lord Chancellor,

"It has been a matter of great regret to me that owing to the weakness resulting from a severe indisposition I have been prevented from attending in the House of Lords since the opening of the Session :

"This interruption to the performance of my duties, which is likely to continue another month, combined with the consideration of my advancing age, has led me reluctantly to the conviction that my duty to the House of Lords requires me to resign the office of Clerk of the Parliaments, and accordingly, if their Lordships should think it right to acquiesce, I shall take the necessary steps to give formal effect to my resignation :

"In making this announcement I trust that I may be permitted to express the deep regret which I feel at quitting the service of the House of Lords and the consequent cessation of my official intercourse with their Lordships, from whom collectively and individually I have uniformly received, during the twenty-seven years which have elapsed since my appointment, the greatest consideration, confidence, and kindness. The gratitude which this retrospect calls forth will be a lasting sentiment during the remainder of my life :

"I have the honour to be,

"My dear Lord Chancellor,

"With feelings of the highest respect "to your Lordship personally

"and officially,

"Your Lordship's

"Obedient humble Servant,

JOHN GEORGE SHAW LEFEVRE.

"The Right Honourable,

"The Lord Chancellor,

"&c. &c. &c."

My Lords, I cannot doubt that your Lordships will have heard with very sincere regret that Sir John Lefevre has found it necessary to resign the important office in your Lordships' House which he has held for upwards of a quarter of a century. My Lords, when Sir John Lefevre first sat at the Table of this House he was not a novice in the public service, and I am certain I do not go beyond what I feel your Lordships will endorse when I say that in the performance of his duties in this House he has shown a zeal and an intelligence, and, at the same time, a courtesy and good feeling which have never been surpassed. My Lords, the anxiety of Sir John Lefevre for the order of your Lordships' proceedings has been evinced not merely by the knowledge and mastery of the traditions and precedents of this House which he attained, but by a very valuable and methodical arrangement and analysis of our Standing Orders which he prepared: and it is a remarkable fact that, in one generation and in one family, two of its most eminent members have devoted, in their respective spheres, their remarkable talents to simplifying and elucidating the order and proceedings of the two Houses of Parliament. My Lords, coming to what has fallen particularly under my own observation, I must express my sense of the ability which Sir John Lefevre has displayed in connection with the judicial business of your Lordships' House; especially in the settling and drawing up decrees and orders on appeals, often long and complicated, and requiring a very considerable amount of technical knowledge. I must, at the same time, bear testimony to the great services he has rendered as the head of the Committee for conducting the publication of the revised edition of the Statutes. My Lords, I will add nothing more to these remarks save this—that I feel confident that any successor to Sir John Lefevre cannot pursue a better course than to follow his example.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I hope your Lordships will allow me to say a few words on this resignation in addition to what has fallen from the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. In anything I say I will take care that my long personal friendship with Sir John Lefevre shall have no influence with me in the tribute which I desire to pay him in his public character. It so happens, my Lords, that some years ago, when Lord Palmerston recommended the Queen to make Sir John Lefevre a Knight Commander of the Bath, it fell to my lot to draw up a statement for the Queen of what were his public services. I had to represent to Her Majesty that he had served in three Public Offices—at the Colonial Office, the Board of Trade, and the Poor Law Board—and some of those offices, as it happened, were held by him at times of great difficulty, and when business of great importance was being carried on. He had been, I think, on no fewer than 16 Commissions—unpaid Commissions. I need not trouble your Lordships with the names of those Commissions; but what I remember about them is that they extended over a wide and varied range of social, political, military, and scientific subjects of the deepest interest. I may add that, when first I became connected with the University of London, I found Sir John Lefevre was at that time Vice Chancellor. He had held the post for a great many years previously, and during that period the Institution had great difficulties to contend with; and I think that the successful position it has assumed is in no small measure due to the part he took in its management. On its work Sir John Lefevre has left his mark. As to his ability in the discharge of his duties in this House, it is not necessary for me to add to the encomium pronounced by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. There are, perhaps, other Members of your Lordships' House who have a greater knowledge than I have myself of his services in connection with the administrative business of this House, though circumstances have afforded me a very ample opportunity of knowing them; but I believe I shall have the concurrence of everyone of your Lordships when I say that he has afforded us immense assistance on all that relates to the conduct of our proceedings. It would be impossible to overrate the assistance he has given to your Lordships, not only as the fulfilment of a duty, but with a readiness and a cordiality which I am sure are appreciated by every Member of your Lordships' House.

Then the said Letter was ordered to lie on the Table; to be entered on the Journals; and to be taken into consideration on Thursday next.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE ACT (1873) AMENDMENT BILL.—(Nos. 10-29.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

REPORT OF THE AMENDMENTS.

ORDER WITHDRAWN. BILL WITHDRAWN.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, before your Lordships proceed to the Orders of the Day I wish to ask your Lordships to allow me to refer for a few minutes to a Bill which passed through Committee a few days ago and which now stands for Report. The Bill to which I refer is the one to amend the Judicature Act of 1873. As your Lordships are aware, it is a Bill intended to introduce various modifications in matters of detail in the Judicature Act of 1873; and it also contains two cardinal provisions — or two provisions which have become most conspicuous in this House — provisions by which are transferred to the Appeal Court established by the Act of 1873 the Scotch Appeals and the Irish Appeals which now come to your Lordships' House. My Lords, considering the course of legislation agreed to by both Houses of Parliament in the Session of 1873, and considering that the Bill of this year, in respect of the matter to which I have referred, is identical with the Bill which I introduced last Session, and which passed your Lordships' House, Her Majesty's Government, in bringing it forward this year, expected — and with good reason expected — that it would not have met any serious opposition in this House. My Lords, in that they have been disappointed. The Government have found — and it has been brought more directly to their attention by Notices of Amendments which have been lately given by Members of your Lordships' House — that from among those who ordinarily are supporters of the Government they must prepare not only not to receive support for this Bill, but to encounter a very general opposition. My Lords, turning to the other side of that House, we should have had no doubt, as we always have had, a loyal support from the Members of the former Cabinet for the measures which they originated: but even on the other side of the House Her Majesty's Government find opinion divided. From declarations which have been made we find that we should have to encounter opposition from the noble and learned Lord who under the late Government was head of the Law in Ireland (Lord O'Hagan), and also from the noble and learned Lord who filled the office of Lord Advocate under the Liberal Government (Lord Moncreiff). My Lords, under these circumstances, the Government have been obliged to admit to themselves — to realize the fact — that it would be impossible to pass the Bill through this House. They have no course to pursue, therefore, but that which I now announce to your Lordships — and I need not say that I deeply regret to announce it — namely, to withdraw the Bill.

LORD SELBORNE: My Lords, after hearing what my noble and learned Friend has stated with respect to the state of opinion among the ordinary supporters of the Government, and what he has also said respecting what he believes to be the state of opinion on this side of the House, it is not for me to express an opinion as to the necessity of the course which my noble and learned Friend has announced:—but, assuming that course to be necessary for him, I think it right to say that I have heard it with very great regret. That regret does not—at least I hope I may say so—arise from any personal feeling of my own in regard to the proposal thus abandoned; but arises from a feeling that the manner in which this question has been dealt with affords grave ground for future anxiety respecting your Lordships' House, and anxiety in a still greater degree with respect to all future attempts to improve the administration of the law in this country. My Lords, there have been circumstances connected with this matter to which it is painful to allude, but to which it is necessary to allude after the announcement we have just heard. The circumstances under which this Bill has been abandoned are not a little extraordinary. The legislation to which this Bill was to give effect was legislation not hastily passed through this House. It was preceded—as on a former occasion I had an opportunity of showing—by a series of inquiries and tentative measures for improving the Appellate Jurisdiction of your Lordships' House; all of those suggested measures having proved failures. Well, my Lords, the Act of 1873 passed through this and the other House of Parliament not without discussion—not without opposition—not without divisions. Last year your Lordships adhered to what you had done in the previous year; notwithstanding the pressure of some, who then assumed to represent feeling in Scotland and in Ireland, you gave your sanction to a Bill which would have transferred to the Court of Ultimate Appeal established for England appeals coming from Scotland and from Ireland. Your Lordships deliberately passed the measure of last year—not without debate, not without discussion, not without divisions,—in which all the arguments against the transfer of the Appellate Jurisdiction of this House were elaborately brought forward and fully heard. It was said, that the transfer had never been recommended by any Committee or Commission, and that it had been voted by the two Houses of Parliament without full consideration: but, my Lords, those arguments were disposed of in 1873, and were met again last year, when your Lordships again affirmed and gave further effect to the Act of 1873. I say then, my Lords, considering that this legislation was adopted only two years ago under the circumstances which I have stated, and considering that it has never yet been tried or in actual operation, to intercept it now in the manner now announced to us, without any warning or anything else to prepare Parliament and the country for such a proceeding, does seem to me not a little extraordinary. And why is this done? I read in the papers that there has been organized what is called “a Committee,” the object of which body is to change your Lordships' own legislation, and to bring back a state of things in connection with your Lordships' House which your Lordships yourselves thought it right to do away with;—this outside committee insists on your Lordships retaining powers and duties—powers which you gave up two years ago, because you felt that you had not sufficient means of discharging the duties annexed to them. If such an outside organization is to be successful on a question relating to the powers and privileges of your Lordships' House, to what lengths may not such a mode of interference be carried in other matters? I confess, my Lords, I view with astonishment the means by which this result has been brought about. But there is still more to be said: other things have been done, even more extraordinary than what I have been referring to. As the proceedings of the other House of Parliament are communicated to us by Papers sent up to your Lordships' House, I believe I shall not be out of Order in referring to what appears on the Notice Paper of the House of Commons. From that record, my Lords, it would appear that while this Bill, which we now learn is to be abandoned, was yet before your Lordships' House—after it had passed through Committee, and while it was waiting for the next stage, that of Report, which had been postponed—before, therefore, it was possible for the Bill to be sent down for the consideration of the other House of Parliament, or even to be debated on, the points which had been reserved for discussion in this House upon the Report, a right hon. Gentleman a Member of that House, who might have been supposed to be exceedingly well acquainted with the usages of Parliament (Mr. Spencer Walpole), gives Notice of a Resolution having for its object to obtain the opinion of that House on a most important feature in the Bill still before your Lordships' House. I hope that this is the only instance in our Parliamentary history of such a proceeding as that. I am sure there cannot have been, directly or indirectly, any understanding in this case between that right hon. Gentleman and any Member of the Government. Two years ago, when the Judicature Bill was sent down to the other House, objections were taken here by the noble Lord now on the Woolsack to certain changes which the House of Commons had proposed to make in the Bill, and the making of which it was urged would be in some degree an interference on the part of that other House with the privileges of this House. Neither my noble Friend behind me (Earl Granville) nor myself thought that those proposals went the length of an intended invasion of the Privileges of this House; but when I now see a Bill actually pending in your Lordships' House and which Bill has passed a second reading and gone through Committee—when I see, in the interval during which the further stages of that Bill in your Lordships' House stand postponed, an opportunity taken of inviting the House of Commons to dictate to your Lordships as to the course to be adopted by you in the next stage of that measure, and that on a question affecting peculiarly the powers and duties of your Lordships' House, it appears to me that the precedent is one which may involve consequences going even far beyond the grave consequences which must more immediately result from this proceeding.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My Lords, I think I shall exercise a wise discretion if I decline to follow the noble and learned Lord (Lord Selborne) in that part of his observations which had reference to the conduct of the other House of Parliament in the course it has thought proper to pursue.

LORD SELBORNE: The other House has done nothing in this matter.

Lord Selborne

I allude to a Notice given by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: I understand the noble and learned Lord to advance this argument—that it is not usual that a Resolution should be moved in the other House respecting a Bill which has not yet left this House. Now, I do not think that to discuss the Privileges of the other House could lead to any useful result on this occasion; but on the matter before your Lordships I will just add a little to what has been said by my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack. My Lords, I hold that it is impossible for a Government to force through a measure of this kind contrary to the wishes and feelings of this House. The noble and learned Lord (Lord Selborne) says that matters are not different now from what they were in 1873:—but as regards the proposal for the transfer of the Appellate Jurisdiction there is this remarkable difference:—In 1873 the noble and learned Lord the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland (Lord O'Hagan), who voted in favour of the Judicature Bill, must be presumed to have been in favour of that portion of it. But if so, he has thought fit to change his views; for he is now one of the most zealous advocates for the retention of an Appellate Jurisdiction by this House. I know that this Session we have not had the benefit of hearing him, but last Session we heard him. Then one of the most eminent legal authorities in Scotland (Lord Moncreiff), who held the office of Lord Advocate under the former Government in 1873—[LORD SELBORNE: No.] Well, if the noble and learned Lord had ceased to be Lord Advocate before that time, of course he is not bound by what was done by the Government of that day; but certainly he is now among the most energetic opponents of the Bill. No one can regret more than I do the course the Government has felt obliged to adopt in respect of the Bill; but seeing the opposition that there is to the Bill, they have arrived at the conclusion that it would be useless to attempt to force it through an unwilling House.

EARL GREY: My Lords, I quite concur with the noble Duke that no Government can force a measure of this kind against the feelings of this House; but I do say that, looking at the past history of the Bill, looking at the deliberate assent it received from this House, and at its great importance, such a measure having been introduced by the Government ought not to be disposed of by secret communications and without the House having the opportunity of considering the reasons which might be urged in favour of such a proceeding. If the proper Parliamentary course had been taken—if my noble Friend (Lord Redesdale) who has given Notice of an Amendment which would have again raised the question of the transfer of the Appellate Jurisdiction had followed up that Notice—the House would have known what was to be said for and against my noble Friend's proposal; and no doubt the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack would have been prepared to defend, with his usual power, the proposition contained in the Bill. If after that the measure had been defeated on a division, there would not have been a word to be said against the conduct of Her Majesty's Government. I, for one, should have regretted the loss of the Bill, but I should not have said a word against the Government; but I say it is not fair to this House, and it is not fair to the country, that a measure of this kind should be abandoned on private communications and without a public discussion. That a Bill of this importance should be got rid of in this manner is not, in my opinion, creditable to your Lordships' House, fair to the country, or calculated to do honour to Her Majesty's Government.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I am anxious that there should be no mistake as to the position which the Government occupy in this matter. We came to the decision announced by my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack with feelings of the deepest disappointment. I say for myself distinctly—and I know I may say for others—that under no circumstances would we have yielded if we had not in our own mind felt that we were yielding to a pressure of imperative necessity. When I say imperative necessity, what I mean is this—that, in the actual state of feeling prevailing on both sides of the House, I am firmly convinced that if a division were taken on this turning point of the Bill—whether you should part with the Appellate Jurisdiction or not, and that if we were in favour of parting with the power, we should not be able to carry the Bill. I say, and not for myself only, that I deeply regret the result. Having made up our minds in 1873 to part with the Appellate Jurisdiction of this House, I think it unwise now to retract the concession we made and to endeavour to retain it. My opinion on that point is unaltered; but I do not believe anything would be gained in the interest of good and sound legislation on this question hereafter if, instead of abandoning a position which is in our judgment untenable, we endeavoured to force this Bill on the House and failed to pass it, thereby adding to the difficulties of a question which is already sufficiently complicated.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) said he thought he should exercise a wise discretion in not answering that part of the speech of my noble and learned Friend as to proceedings in the other House of Parliament. The noble Duke not only did not answer it, but he misapprehended it. The complaint was not made against the other House of Parliament, but as to proceedings proposed to be taken by an individual Member. It was, perhaps, discreet of the noble Duke not to try to answer the unanswerable statement of my noble and learned Friend. I fully believe in the regret expressed by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack and the noble Earl who has just addressed your Lordships; but I did not understand the noble Duke to express any regret.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: I certainly did express my deep regret.

EARL GRANVILLE: I, of course, apologize—I did not hear my noble Friend. But, passing from that, I must say that as regards the necessity for the course taken by the Government your Lordships have received nothing but assertion. Nothing has been stated to show the imperative necessity of abandoning the Bill. That necessity has been asserted, but no proof of it has been offered. The noble Duke said that the late Lord Chancellor for Ireland, who was a party to the Judicature Act of 1873, opposed this Bill last year, and he also spoke of Lord Moncreiff's opposition; but those facts were known last year, and in the face of those facts your Lordships passed the Bill, and the only reason given by the Government for it not having passed the House of Commons was that another important measure stood in the way. Let the Bill be discussed in open light; let us have the opinion of the House on it, and do not let it be withdrawn in this manner. As to the arguments against the latter course, I shall not add one word to what has been said by my noble and learned Friend. I entirely agree with him and with my noble Friend (Earl Grey) as to the gravity of such a proceeding. I would ask the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack whether we are to have any further statement this year; whether the Government intend to propose any amendments of the Act now on the Statute Book; or whether that measure, which does transfer the English appeals from this House, is, so far as the Government are concerned, to come in force next July?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: What I desire to state is that the present Bill will be withdrawn. Whether some legislation will not be necessary in respect of the Act of 1873 is a matter which will require consideration. I shall announce the intention of the Government on that matter at the earliest possible moment.

LORD WAVENEY said, he did sincerely regret the withdrawal of the Bill, and he could assure the House that the Lord Justice Clerk and other opponents of the transfer of the Appellate Jurisdiction of their Lordships' House were quite prepared to discuss the question.

Order for receiving the Report of Amendments on the first Thursday after the recess at Easter discharged, and Bill (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

NAVY—SYSTEM OF TRAINING BOYS. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE, in rising to call attention to the present system of training boys for the Navy, and to urge upon Her Majesty's Ministers the desirability of having more sea-going training vessels, said, from the merchant service of the country, enormous as it was, they could get but very few men fit for the naval service. There were 240,000 seamen in the merchant service, yet there was great difficulty in getting men from that service to enter the Navy. The best men would not enter; and though there were plenty of men who would be ready to enter the service, those were the men the Navy would not have. The great mass of them were below the class of men that we wanted. The pay in the merchant service was generally higher during their active service than that of the Navy; but the pay of the Navy was in the long run better, because the men got pensions. Another reason why serviceable men did not enter the Navy from the merchant service was that they did not like the restraint of the service or the necessary discipline. Another objection to merchant seamen as men to man the Navy was that they would not be of any use in fighting until they were trained to the great guns and small arms. They might be trained, but they did not like it. Formerly the merchant service was of great value for manning the Navy. At that time every merchant shipowner was bound to take apprentices, who served five or seven years, and then the Navy got trained seamen. Merchant ships did not take apprentices now. Then, merchant ships were always at sea as long as they could get any cargo; but ships of the Navy were not constantly at sea. At one time they had compulsory power to draw men from the merchant service for the Navy, but at present they had not that power. The system at present in use for manning the Navy was to take boys from 15 to 16½ years old. These boys were drafted into training ships, and by an agreement signed by their parents they were bound for 10 years after the age of 18. Those boys cost the country a considerable sum of money—as much, he believed, as £100 each—they underwent training in every duty that could be expected from them—and when under the superintendence of Captain Wilson, did that officer the greatest credit. After the first 12 months' training the boys were fit to do any duty that could be required of sailors. But they were not sent to sea—they were kept in harbour, where they acquired bad habits, and learnt nothing more—they were not sea-boys, nor sea-men—it was out of the question to make a seaman out of a boy that had never been on blue water. In 1873 a Vote was taken for 2,615 boys—but of these 261 deserted, and there were now between 1,000 and 1,500 waiting to be drafted to sea. It was obvious that since we could no longer depend upon the merchant service for manning the Navy, we must train more boys, and the Government should appoint more training ships. The boys, too, should be trained by active service at sea, and for that purpose he thought the Government should appoint especial sea-going vessels—two frigates, he thought, might be most usefully appropriated to that special service. The question was a very serious one, and encouragement should be given to merchant shipowners to take boys, and by paying them (the owners) some agreed upon sum, a good class of men might be got for the Navy. The Government should take very great care that this country could boast of better trained seamen than those of any other maritime Power. In a great naval war they should endeavour to have the best class of seamen. He trusted, in conclusion, that Her Majesty's Government would deem his suggestions deserving of consideration.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that any observations with respect to our Navy which fell from one who bore the honoured name of Maitland would meet with the best attention of the House. He entirely concurred with the noble Earl in the desire that the boys in our naval service should be trained to the highest possible degree of perfection. He would explain what the Government proposed to do. As things at present stood, there were five training-ships at different ports where those boys were trained for a period of six months. They were then sent on board tenders for a certain number of days, not generally exceeding six weeks; because if a longer time were allowed, the tenders could not supply the number of boys required for the sea service. These tenders were serviceable for the purpose only for six months of the year—from April to October—for it was not deemed safe to send them to sea in the winter months manned principally by boys. The number of boys so trained at one time was 490; but inasmuch as there was a new batch every six weeks, instruction was given to 2,839, every boy being in training for at least 36 days. The number of boys which had been entered for the last five years was, he might add, 14,195, or an average of 2,839 a-year. After the boys attained the age of 18 years they were sent to sea in sea-going ships; but as the ships could not take all the boys that were ready, many of them contracted bad habits by hanging about the ports, or deserted; so that the country, after spending a considerable sum of money on their education, lost their services. The attention of the Admiralty had, however, been directed to that state of things, and they proposed to add one cruiser to the five brigs now employed, and to send the first-class boys to sea during the six winter months. He hoped that the noble Lord would be satisfied with these arrangements.

LORD ELPHINSTONE was understood to express his approval of the course proposed on the part of the Government. He could confirm, from his own experience, the statement of the noble Earl, that very few men entered the Navy from the merchant service.

SPAIN—RECOGNITION OF THE GOVERNMENT OF MARSHAL SERRANO AND KING ALFONSO.—QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, in rising to ask the noble Earl opposite whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table the Papers connected with the recognition of the Government in Spain under Marshal Serrano, and that of King Alfonso, I wish to say that I shall not press for their production if any such objection exists. If not, I think it desirable that the country should be informed, and that it should also be known abroad, on what principles Her Majesty's Government have acted, and the reasons, if there are any, for taking any exceptional course. After the abdication of the last King of Spain, the several Governments of Europe and the late Government at home were anxious to find an opportunity of recognizing in that country a Government which was either legally or constitutionally established, or which, at all events, seemed to be generally accepted by the people. There was no Government which fulfilled these conditions when we left office, and we did not think, therefore, the time had come when we could recognize any; the same course being wisely followed, in my opinion, by Her Majesty's present advisers. There was a paragraph in the Queen's Speech at the end of last Session, which indicated their reasons for not recognizing the Government of Marshal Serrano; but in the autumn that Government was recognized by Her Majesty's Ministers;—and I may in passing, perhaps, refer to what was said by the present Prime Minister when a Government of which I was a Member recognized that which was set up in France under General Cavaignac. The right hon. Gentleman said,—“The Government recognized the Government of General Cavaignac, and immediately they did so, it fell.” Now, that appears to me to be a remark which may be equally applicable to the Government of Marshal Serrano. But I think, nevertheless, Her Majesty’s Government took a wise course. Since that time the Government have recognized the Government of King Alfonso, who, although he has received no legal or constitutional sanction on the part of the people of Spain, appears to have been accepted by the Army and I believe in Spain generally, as the person most likely to bring about a favourable solution of the difficulties of that country. Although no doubt any nation has a right to recognize the Government of another, yet it is not our practice—and the remark applies to both Parties in the State—to give that recognition except, as I said before, in those cases in which a Government is legally or constitutionally established, or meets with general acceptance from the people; though the recognition of the Government of one country by those of other States is to some extent a solution of the difficulty. I may also observe that the recognition of that of King Alfonso by Her Majesty’s Government was a little later than that by other Governments of Europe, and I think that the public should be made aware of the facts, and be enabled to judge whether there were any sufficient causes in this particular case. My object, then, in asking for these Papers is that the public should be informed on the matter. Before I sit down I should like to make a remark on a subject with respect to which, I may say, I have no personal knowledge—I allude to some violent attacks which are said to have been made on Mr. Layard, the Minister of this country in Spain, in some of the Spanish journals. With regard to Mr. Layard, I can say from my own knowledge while I held the Seals of the Foreign Office that it was impossible for a Minister to have acted more completely according to the instructions he had received or to have kept his own Government at home more fully acquainted with the state of affairs in the country to which he was accredited than Mr. Layard did; and, I may add that I believe no person could more honestly desire the welfare of Spain than he did. I have the satisfaction of feeling sure that the noble Earl opposite will be able to confirm what I could not help saying with respect to Mr. Layard.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked whether, in the event of any of the Papers asked for by the noble Earl (Earl Granville) being laid upon the Table, the Secretary of State would include such despatches as might show whether the unusual course of giving advice to a Sovereign when presenting credentials, reported to have been taken by Mr. Layard, had been authorized by the Secretary of State or not.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I have not the slightest difficulty in answering the Question put to me by my noble Friend (Earl Granville). In the matter to which my noble Friend has referred, as in all other transactions in which Mr. Layard and I have been jointly concerned, the action and language of Mr. Layard have had the entire approval of Her Majesty’s Government. It is perfectly true, as the noble Earl intimated, that various attacks—some of them I believe of an extremely virulent and personal kind—have been made in certain of the newspapers of Madrid and circulated among some portion of society in Madrid against the representative of this country in that capital. I believe that those personal attacks have not emanated from any important or influential section of society. But in Spain, as elsewhere, there is a violent Ultramontane section, to which the representative of a Protestant and constitutional State is naturally objectionable. I do not know the details of these attacks; but Mr. Layard has very properly treated them with the contempt which they deserve. With regard to what the noble Earl said as to the practice of this country in the matter of recognition of Foreign Governments, Her Majesty’s Government have not departed from the usual manner of proceeding, and I do not understand that he objects to the course which has been taken by Her Majesty’s present Government in recognizing the Government of Marshal Serrano. We delayed a little in the first instance because, as your Lordships will remember, the Government of Marshal

Serrano was one which did not rest on any popular basis, but was created by a military pronunciamiento, and it was natural that we should wait until we saw that it was a Government in a position—I will not say to be permanent, for it is very difficult to say what Government will be permanent in Spain as Spain now is—but in a position in which it could hold its own, and in which it should be recognized de facto by the great majority of the people. We thought the Government of Marshal Serrano fulfilled that condition. It was undoubtedly recognized de facto over nearly the whole of Spain with the exception of the Provinces in which the Carlist War was then and still is going on. The fact that war was going on was given as a reason—and I think it was a very fair reason—why it was impossible to place the Government of Marshal Serrano on a basis of legality by the convocation of any Parliamentary Assembly. It was said then, with perfect truth, that an Assembly which represented only a part of the country would not fulfil the necessary conditions of a national Parliament; while to summon representatives from the Provinces which at the time were occupied by a hostile force, was a course which it was impossible for any Government to adopt. We therefore waited for a while before recognizing the Government of Marshal Serrano, and when we judged the time had arrived we instructed our Representative in Spain to recognize it. We had been preceded in this recognition by other Governments, and one motive with them was to give the Government of Marshal Serrano a certain degree of moral support against the Carlist party. The initiative was not taken by us, but by the Government of Germany. If a different course of action had been followed by the leading Governments of Europe on that subject many inconvenient complications might have arisen. I need not refer to them more particularly. We found that the French Government was willing in that matter to take the same course as the Government of Germany; and with the single exception of the Government of Russia, there was no European Government that was not ready to recognize the Government of Marshal Serrano. We, therefore, thought it would have been a step that was very unusual, and one for which it would have been very difficult to assign adequate reasons, if we had declined to do that which, with one exception, every other great European State had done. So much for that transaction. On the first night of the Session the noble Earl (Earl Granville) expressed his surprise at not finding some mention of that transaction in the Speech from the Throne. My sole reason for not advising the insertion of a paragraph on that subject was that the Government of Marshal Serrano having collapsed in a manner which anywhere but in Spain would have caused considerable surprise, and with a degree of suddenness that no one anticipated, the question of its recognition six or seven months before was one that had lost all practical interest and importance. And as we had acted in the case of Marshal Serrano's Government, so also we have acted in the case of that of King Alfonso. We found the Government of King Alfonso to be accepted by the country, as that of Marshal Serrano had been, over all other parts of Spain except those which the Carlists occupy. We were in no particular or precipitate haste to give a formal sanction to that Government; but we satisfied ourselves that it was de facto established, and we believe that it has at least as good a chance of permanence as any Government that might take its place. Where revolutions are so frequent as they are in Spain, I do not think it would be a desirable thing for it to be supposed that by recognizing a de facto Government in Spain, we commit ourselves to any expression of opinion upon its merits, or to anticipations as to the future. We recognized the Government of King Alfonso as we recognized the Government of Marshal Serrano, because it appeared to us to be that which, as a fact, the Spanish people acknowledged and obeyed. As to the Papers to which the noble Earl referred, I do not know that they will throw any more light on the subject than I have endeavoured to give in these few remarks; but there is no reason why they should not be produced, with, of course, the usual care to avoid anything that may compromise other persons or other Governments, and I shall be very happy to produce them.

(SALARIES) BILL. (No. 31.)

(The Lord Steward.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

EARL BEAUCHAMP, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, explained that its object was to do an act of justice to certain meritorious public servants. The salaries which were considered sufficient when the metropolitan police courts were established in 1839 were now inadequate—they were below those now paid to the County Court Judges, notwithstanding the graver nature of the duties they were called upon to perform. By the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 79, by which the metropolitan police districts were established, it was provided that salaries not exceeding £1,200 a-year should be paid to each magistrate; though by a subsequent Act the salary of the chief magistrate was raised to £1,500. Since 1839 the population of the metropolis had vastly increased, and the duties of these gentlemen had become proportionately heavy. The expenses of living had also largely increased. It would be very bad policy to pay inadequately a body of gentlemen to whom were entrusted such weighty responsibilities—or to place their service at a less value than those of the County Court Judges, who might be said to occupy an analogous position. The Bill therefore proposed that the salaries of the chief magistrate should be in future £1,800 a-year, and those of the junior magistrates £1,500. It would be unwise parsimony to continue to pay them inadequately, and it was therefore now proposed to raise their salaries from £1,200 to £1,500, giving the chief magistrate at Bow Street £1,800 a-year.

Bill read 2^a accordingly and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

ORDER CONFIRMATION (BRIGHTON)

BILL [H.L.]

(No. 32.)

PACIFIC ISLANDERS PROTECTION BILL [H.L.]

BANKRUPTCY LAW (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether the attention of the Government has been called to the unsatisfactory state of the Law of Bankruptcy in Ireland, and if any measure for the amendment of such Law may be expected to be introduced by the Government during the present Session?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET): The only communication, Sir, that the Government has received calling attention to the Law of Bankruptcy as at present administered in Ireland is one from the Northern Law Club, forwarded to us since my hon. Friend placed his Question on the Paper, and advising that clauses should be introduced into the Judicature (Ireland) Bill to facilitate the transaction of local Bankruptcy business at Belfast. I can assure my hon. Friend that those suggestions, together with any which he himself may make, will meet with a very careful consideration. It is not, however, the intention of the Government during the present Session to introduce a measure dealing separately with the Irish Bankruptcy Laws.

POOR LAW—REMOVAL OF A LUNATIC PAUPER.—QUESTION.

DR. LUSH asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his official notice has been directed to the circumstances attending the removal of Nathaniel Worthington, an insane soldier, from Devonport Military Hospital to Westminster Union Workhouse on the 6th of January last; and, whether any Correspondence upon the subject has passed between the Westminster Union Board of Guardians and the Local Government Board; and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay it before the House?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, that his attention had been called to the circumstances related in the Question of the hon. Member, which were now being inquired into by the War Office. He was not able at present to lay the Papers on the Table of the House. The Correspondence asked for by the hon. Member would not convey much information in the absence of the further documents which he hoped would shortly be forthcoming.

ARMY—RECEIVERS OF REGIMENTAL NECESSARIES.—QUESTION.

MR. NAGHTEN asked the Secretary of State for War, If he has taken into consideration the defective state of the Law with regard to the punishment of the receivers of regimental necessities from soldiers, with a view to its amendment?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, the law relating to receivers of stolen property was the same whether the property stolen consisted of regimental necessities or other articles. He was not aware that the general law on the subject required amendment; but as difficulty no doubt arose from the fact that soldiers had power legally to dispose of certain things which formed part of their equipment, the matter was under the consideration of the authorities at the War Office, and he trusted some improvement would be effected.

EMIGRATION OF PAUPER CHILDREN.
QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR PEEL asked the President of the Local Government

Board, Whether, having regard to the recent Report of Mr. Doyle, Local Government Inspector, on the Emigration of Pauper Children to Canada, he proposes to take steps, in concert with the Government of the Dominion, to regulate such emigration; and, whether there is a prospect that the necessary precautions will be taken before the ensuing emigration season?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, that he hoped before this, he should have been able to inform his hon. Friend that steps were being proposed by the Government of the Dominion of Canada with a view to the regulation of this system of emigration; but Mr. Doyle's Report had not been very long sent over to Canada, and although communications had been opened, they were not very far advanced; whether the arrangements between the Home and the Dominion Governments would be completed in time to allow of the necessary precautions being taken before the ensuing emigration season he could not at present say; but the number of pauper children sent as it were under Government sanction bore but a small proportion to the total number sent out by Miss Rye and other ladies.

IRISH REPRODUCTIVE LOAN FUND.
QUESTION.

MR. O'KEEFFE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the county of Waterford, which possesses a sea coast of about forty miles, including several fishing stations, will be entitled to any portion of the Irish Reproductive Loan Fund, by way of loan, or otherwise, in order to enable the fishermen along that coast to develop their industry?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that the county of Waterford was not one of the counties originally included in the list of those entitled to the benefit of the Irish Reproductive Loan Fund, and the Act of last Session made no addition to the counties so entitled. He had communicated with a society established in Ireland for the bettering of the condition of poor fishermen by granting them loans, and had suggested that in future they should confine their loans to counties similarly circumstanced to Waterford, as not being provided for under the Act.

IRISH FISHERIES INSPECTORS' REPORT, 1874.—QUESTION.

MR. O'CLERY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Why the Report of the Inspectors for Irish Fisheries for the year 1874, which, according to the Act 5 and 6 Vic. c. 106, s. 112, should be presented to Parliament within twenty-one days from the commencement of the present Session, has not as yet been issued?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that at the time of the passing of the Act directing that Reports should be furnished at a particular date, there were no Boards of Conservancy in Ireland and no statistics to be collected. Since then Boards had been established and much valuable statistical information was annually collected, but it would not be possible to include it in the Inspectors' Reports, if those Reports were presented to Parliament within the time fixed by the Act. In the event of its being necessary to amend the Fishery Laws, he should propose that a later date should be fixed by law for the presentation of those Reports.

CRIMINAL LAW—COUNTRESS OF DUDLEY'S JEWELS.—QUESTION.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been particularly called to the fact that on the 15th, 16th, and 21st days of December last an advertisement appeared in "The Standard," offering £1,000 reward for the restoration of Lady Dudley's jewel case, having the following concluding paragraph:—

"All communications made on the subject will be considered as strictly confidential, the sole object being the recovery of the missing property."

And, further, that on the same days an advertisement appeared in "The Times," inviting any person into whose hands the jewel case might have fallen to communicate direct with Lord Dudley; whether Lord Dudley is a magistrate and chairman of Quarter Sessions of the county of Worcester; whether it is consistent with the duty of one holding that position to take such a course and to offer to receive satisfaction for a felony committed; and, whether under these circumstances, it is intended by Her Majesty's Government to suffer such a proceeding to pass unnoticed?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS; I am sure, Sir, the hon. and learned Member will not think I was intentionally guilty of an act of discourtesy to him in the way in which I answered his Question the other night. I believe Lord Dudley is a magistrate and Chairman of Quarter Sessions, and I believe the jewels in question have not been found. I also believe, as I stated the other night, that the legality of the particular advertisements referred to by the hon. and learned Member is very shortly to be brought before the Law Courts. Therefore, I hope the hon. and learned Member will pardon me for saying, that I still entertain the opinion I expressed on the former occasion, that, under the circumstances, it would not be right for me simply as Secretary of State to attempt to give any interpretation of the law on the question to this House, when that law is to be brought in question in a Court of Justice, or to apply that law to a state of facts of which I know really nothing, and have not the means of knowing.

METROPOLIS—FOOTWAY, ST. JAMES' PARK.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL asked the First Commissioner of Works, If his attention has been called to the condition of the footway between Buckingham Gate and The Mall; and, whether it cannot be rendered more cleanly for the use of foot passengers?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in the absence of the First Commissioner of Works, said that the attention of the First Commissioner had been repeatedly called to the state of the portion of the Mall in question, and among others by the hon. Member for East Surrey. He felt it would be very difficult to acquiesce in the suggestion of the hon. Member for Westminster, unless some general plan could be devised for laying down asphalté between Buckingham Gate and Marlborough House. The matter was now under consideration, and as soon as a decision was arrived at, his noble Friend would communicate it to the House.

INDIA—LUCKNOW AND KIRWEE BOOTY—RETURN.—QUESTION

MR. RYDER asked the Under Secretary of State for India, When the Return of Moveable Property which came into the possession of the State in consequence of the military successes at Lucknow and Kirwee in the last Indian war, which was moved for in the Sessions of 1873 and 1874, will be presented to Parliament, and what is the cause of the delay?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, the Return alluded to by my hon. Friend was received at the India Office last autumn. It did not contain all the information asked for by the House. The attention of the Indian Government has been directed to this fact, and as soon as we receive all the information necessary to complete the Return it shall be laid upon the Table of the House.

THE NEW FOREST SHAKERS—ARREST OF MISS WOOD.—QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of the recent arrest in the New Forest of Miss Wood, a person alleged to be a lunatic; and, if so, whether such arrest was made on the ground that she is dangerous to herself or others; and whether such arrest is legal and justifiable?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, my attention was called to this arrest. I immediately put myself in communication with the Lunacy Commissioners. I ascertained that the certificate which had been given did not warrant a detention in a lunatic asylum, and that it might have been amended within a period of 14 days under the statute. I further communicated with the Lunacy Commissioners, and directed that an inquiry should be made, in order that Miss Wood should be released, if they found no necessity for her detention. I am happy to say that this afternoon I have received a note saying that she has been discharged.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE— (WALES.)

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD, in moving for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the administration of justice in those portions of the Principality of Wales where the Welsh language prevailed, and to consider the expediency of appointing official interpreters to attend the Courts there, said the Motion of which he had given Notice was felt to be one of much importance in the Principality. He was bound to say that the percentage of wrong verdicts in Wales was not greater than it was in England; and as regarded perverse verdicts, he did not think Welsh jurymen were more perverse than English ones. But unless some change took place in the present mode of administering justice in Wales, it was absolutely impossible that a failure of justice should not sometimes take place in the Principality. For instance, this might occur, a jury might be composed thus: one third of them understood the English language, another third understood it imperfectly, and the remainder did not understand it at all. Part of the evidence was given in Welsh and part in English. The former was translated by some person who happened to be in Court, not for the sake of the jury, but for the convenience of the Judge and counsel. The evidence given in English was not translated, because the Judge and counsel understood it, unless, indeed, some jurymen should happen to have the courage to speak out, and say he did not understand it. The counsel addressed the jury in English, and the Judge summed up in the same language, and yet the jury were asked to return a proper verdict according to the evidence, which they could not do, because a considerable portion of them did not understand the language in which the counsel and Judge had commented upon the evidence. The consequence was, that in many a clearly-proved case they preferred giving the prisoner the benefit of the doubt. At Quarter Sessions, in the County Courts, and before magistrates the same difficulty arose, and sometimes policemen had to be resorted to to interpret evidence. In the County Courts, it frequently happened that the parties were unable to state their cases in English, and were obliged to employ an attorney to conduct the most trifling suits, and even if they dispensed with professional assistance, they would still have to employ an interpreter, at an expense, it might be, greater than the amount they sought to recover. Under these circumstances, he submitted that it was not too much to ask the Government to appoint official interpreters, and pay them for the performance of their duties, not only in the Superior but in the Inferior Courts. The appointment and maintenance of fit persons to administer justice had always been treated as one of the duties of the Government. It was also the duty of the Government to make the administration of justice as effective as possible. In the Principality that could only be done by the appointment of competent interpreters. To interpret well required not only a thorough knowledge of both languages, but also skill and experience, and that could only be secured by the selection of those best qualified for the duties, and paying them an adequate remuneration for their services. In India and the colonies interpreters were appointed, and he did not see why Wales should be treated in a different manner. Was it because the people were so quiet and never raised a voice of complaint? Was it because they could govern Wales without a single soldier? However right or wrong it might be to maintain the Welsh language, if the Welsh people did not know English it was not their fault. They were very anxious to learn it; but the fact was that until almost recently, the Government had made no attempt to teach them the language. The prevalence of the Welsh language was a fact that could not be ignored, and whatever the opinions of Her Majesty's Government might be as to the advantages or disadvantages of its continuance, it was a fact that could not be lost sight of if they were really desirous of improving the administration of justice in that portion of the Empire. He thought his Motion commended itself to the attention of the Government, and he trusted they would not object to it. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving the Amendment.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT, thinking that the claim put forward by the hon. and learned Member was a most just one, cordially seconded the Motion.

Mr. Morgan Lloyd

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the administration of justice in those portions of the Principality of Wales where the Welsh language prevails, and to consider the expediency of appointing official interpreters to attend the Courts there,"—(Mr. Morgan Lloyd.)—instead thereof.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN, in supporting the Motion, hoped his hon. and learned Friend would be more successful than he himself had been in his efforts to remedy the evil complained of. It was a mistake to suppose that in dealing with the subject, they would be dealing with a transitory state of things which would disappear in a generation or two. There was a popular belief that the Welsh language was dying out, but that was not well founded. At any rate, like Charles II., it was dying extremely hard. The number of persons speaking Welsh in the Principality was larger he believed now than it was a generation ago, if not larger relatively than the people who spoke English. The truth was, that at school the Welsh children learnt English as a foreign language, and preferred when they went home to return to their native tongue. He could corroborate every word his hon. and learned Friend had said as to the result of this state of things, both in the Imperial and the local Courts. When they found the Judges and the counsel speaking one language, and the witnesses another, it was impossible that justice could be properly administered, and as a consequence, miscarriages of justice frequently occurred; indeed, he believed such miscarriages were more than were heard of; but the worst of the present system was, that it tended to lower the estimation in which the administration of justice was held. Last year he proposed that the County Court Judges in Wales should always be persons acquainted with the Welsh language. That would, so far as the local Courts at least were concerned, have been a great improvement, and he regretted his proposal was not acted upon. Although he did not believe much in Select Committees, yet, as the appointment of such a Committee would lead to the whole subject being considered, he trusted that the Home Secretary would accede to the Motion.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he must differ somewhat from the hon. Member who had brought forward this subject. He must remind the House of a Rule, which used to be enforced by means of a Sessional Order, that, on going into Committee of Supply, they should only talk about subjects relating to the branch of Supply. He did not complain of the course which had been taken, but thought the old rule might now be usefully mentioned. As to the Motion, the question had in various shapes been mooted previously with respect to the Motion immediately before the House—namely, the appointment of a Select Committee. Considering the vast number of subjects which had to be referred to Select Committees of the House of Commons, it was necessary to take seriously into consideration the convenience of Members who were called upon to serve upon such Committees. It was impossible to grant Committees upon every subject hon. Members wished, for the work of the House was getting greater and greater every year, and if these Committees were to go on multiplying it would be impossible that the work could be overtaken. With respect to the subject of the Motion, he could not help thinking that it had been presented in the strongest colours in which it was possible to do it; but if the hon. Member had wished to make out a case for the appointment of a Committee it might have been expected that he would have endeavoured to do so, not by stating certain cases which might occur, but by referring to cases of hardship which had actually happened. Last year, upon the Motion of the hon. and learned Member who had just sat down (Mr. Osborne Morgan), a suggestion was made that the Judges in Wales should be conferred with, as to whether it was wise or not to incur the expense of appointing official interpreters, not only at Assizes, Quarter Sessions, and County Courts, but in all inferior tribunals. In consequence of what took place then he (the Home Secretary) communicated with the County Court Judges, and there was only one of them who gave the slightest notion of such a thing being desirable, all the others being strongly against it. One said that he did not think that additional interpreters were needed, and that their appointment would cause quite a useless expense, for the Registrars and their clerks generally spoke Welsh fluently; while another stated that there was no difficulty whatever in obtaining a good interpreter when one was required, adding that in his opinion, to appoint paid interpreters would be a mere waste of money, which might be better expended in another way. Therefore, he (the Home Secretary) did not think it desirable that the proposed Committee should be appointed. If the hon. Member would, in the course of the Session, or afterwards, call his attention to any real cases of hardship in Wales in connection with this matter, he should give it his best consideration and communicate with the Judges in the districts where such cases occurred, and, if any steps should be deemed necessary, communicate with the Lord Chancellor. Meantime, until much stronger grounds were laid before the House, he did not think that that was a matter for the appointment of a Committee, and he trusted the hon. and learned Member would not press the Motion.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, under the circumstances, he wished to withdraw the Motion, and would take an early opportunity of conferring with the right hon. Gentleman on the subject.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

ARMY—REDUCTION OF THE LAND FORCES.—RESOLUTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON, in rising to move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, the assurances of friendship from all Foreign Powers, mentioned in Her Majesty’s Speech from the Throne, warrant a reduction in the land forces of the British Army,” said, that whatever exception might have been taken to the previous Motion, that was one which was at least germane to the business the House was about to be called upon to discuss. Nevertheless, he felt that he ought to make some apology for bringing it forward. Any one ought to apologize to the House who ventured in these days to talk politics, and he was aware that the question of retrenchment and economy was not a question that was particularly popular in the House of Commons. He did not mean to bring any charge against the House with respect to that, because he believed it truly represented public opinion, for economy was an unpopular virtue in any private individual, and it appeared to be equally so in any body corporate. There was nothing in the country which people seemed to like so much as military display. But, whether unpopular or not, there was no place in the world, so far as he knew, where both sides of the question could be so fairly heard as in the British House of Commons. He believed that some hon. Members who substantially agreed with him would not be disposed to support his Motion, on the ground that the whole responsibility in such a matter ought to be placed upon the Government. Now, he could not admit the entire force of this argument, believing that a responsibility also rested upon him, as a Member of the House of Commons, to express his opinion. In that belief, he last year moved the reduction of the Vote by 10,000 men. As he was going away after the division, the Secretary for War, who had opposed the Motion, saying he did not see why the Force should be reduced by any particular number, said to him (Sir Wilfrid Lawson)—“Why 10,000? Why did you not move to take 10 tons off the Devastation?” Well, there was some point in the question, and he felt, in fact, that he had no particular reason for wishing to reduce the Army by 10,000 rather than by 20,000 men; and, as he could give no rational reason for the reduction of any particular number, he determined to alter the form of his Motion. No doubt, he should now be told that he did not propose any definite reduction, but merely submitted an abstract Resolution. Next year, then, he should revert to the 10,000, and in the following year to the abstract Resolution, and so he should go on till he got some satisfaction. Meanwhile, he hoped it would be understood that he was not finding any fault with the management of the Army. He was not competent to do so, on account of being insufficiently acquainted with the subject. He could not go into any details as to the respective merits of long or short service, neither could he decide whether Cavalry or Artillery were the most useful, or Volunteers or Yeomanry Cavalry the most useless, branch of the service. All he wanted was, to discuss the policy which, in the opinion of the Government, rendered these large sums in the Estimates and this large number of men necessary. In 1792, in Mr. Pitt's time, we were content with a force of 18,000 men at home, but now we had an Army of 129,000. What reason was there that we should now have a larger Army on foot in the United Kingdom than we had any time since 1810? Why, when we received assurances of friendship from all nations, was it necessary for the Government to come down and ask for power to increase our Army by 287 men, and our expenditure by £192,000? There was some proof that those assurances were not idle, vague, empty compliments. The Prime Minister said no later than July last, that—

“There never was a period when our friendship, and our real friendship, was sought with more constancy and urgency by the leading Powers and Empires of Europe and America.”

Why, if that were the case, did we go on increasing our Army? He had asked that question now for two or three years, and had got no answer. If he should not get an answer to-night from the Secretary for War, who was so frank, so fair, and so free in his bearing towards the House, he should despair of ever getting one at all. What was the reason? Was it in order to repel invasion that we increased our Army? He was not going to deny that invasion was possible. Nothing was impossible; but it was so improbable as to come very near the impossible, and one must be prepared to incur a certain amount of risk. It was well said of Sir Robert Peel that he had no foreign policy except peace and goodwill towards all nations; and that great statesman had said—“I believe in time of peace we must, by retrenchment, consent to incur some risk.” But where was the risk? Of whom were we afraid? Would the Government say which nation it was that was not included in “all nations?” Was it France? When he came into this House first, we used to have alarming speeches made as to what France was going to do. But surely France was busy enough now looking after her own affairs. A story would illustrate the state of France. A gentleman hired a valet, and gave him strict instructions what he was to do. He was to call him in the morning to tell him what o'clock it was, of what kind was the weather, and what form of Government he was living under. Well, that being so, was it of Prussia we were afraid? Why, Prussia was employing her whole time in watching France. Besides, as showing the state of feeling with respect to the military system there, hon. Gentlemen perhaps had not heard what the Consuls at the different ports were telling us—namely, that there was a wholesale emigration from Prussia, owing to the disgust of the people at the grievous burden of the conscription, and the warlike preparations which beset them on every side. Besides, were we not connected by Royal marriages with Prussia? But, then, there was Russia. Yes, but we had married her also last year. Russia, indeed, invade us! We had been fools enough to invade Russia, but we might rely upon it, Russia would not be such a fool as to invade us. Then there was Spain. Were we afraid of her? In that wretched country even Kings struck work—and the present King was in such a wretched position, that when he took a trip in a railway train, he had to back into a tunnel to avoid the shots of his subjects. No, the fact was there were only two enemies from which the people of this country had any cause to fear invasion—the one was the Pope, the other the Colorado beetle. As for the first, he might be left in the hands of the late Prime Minister; as for the second, there was no doubt that the sound Conservative Government which we now had would prevent that noxious Republican insect from Americanizing our institutions. But suppose there were any other enemy than the two he had named. Hon. Gentlemen talked as though we had no Fleet. He believed we had a most powerful Fleet, and he would tell the House why. He remembered what occurred in the beginning of last Session. The right hon. Gentleman who manages the Fleet, not having got quite accustomed to his position, came down one night and alarmed the House most terribly. He talked about paper ships and a phantom Fleet. But in a short time the House saw it was entirely a mistake, and no one believed that our Fleet was a phantom, any more than that the right hon. Gentleman himself was a phantom. In fact, he had heard it stated over and over again by competent authority, that our Fleet was perfectly able to meet the combined navies of the world, and he believed it. Well, then, what was the use of all our great military armaments?

Suppose the combined nations of the world were to come on and beat this Fleet of ours, believed to be invincible? Where were we, then, with all Europe against us? Our 129,000 men against their mighty armies would be little better than 129,000 broomsticks. No, our Army was far too small for aggression, and too large for self-defence. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give an answer to the question, what we wanted all these men for? and would not talk vaguely, as his Predecessor used to do, about the great military Monarchies, saying that so long as they were arming, we were obliged to put a good face on it, and arm too. Why, that was his case; that we ought not to be the fools the great military Monarchies were. If we followed their example, we should be acting according to the old proverb, that "One fool makes many." He was informed that at that moment there were 12,000,000 of men under arms in Europe. [An hon. MEMBER: No, no!] He might be wrong; but he had seen it so stated. He would not take up the time of the House in trying to delineate the material and moral evils of such a state of things, the waste of time, of wealth, of happiness, which it involved. If these things were going on in the nations of Europe, there was all the more reason for showing that in that great assembly of dangerous lunatics, there was one sane nation at least. His point was, that all this arming could not go for nothing. The existence of these large armies was the very cause of war.

"The sight of means to do ill deeds Makes ill deeds done."

It would be the story over again of the old African Chief, who said he was obliged to go to war, because he had got a barrel of gunpowder, which would spoil by keeping; and the copying of these wretched people by this country was, if he might be allowed to say so, the most "snobbish" course any nation could follow. It was the old fable of the frog, which tried to make himself as big as a bull, and burst in the operation. He was interested the first night of the Session in hearing the hon. Gentleman who moved the Address (Mr. Stanhope) condemn what he called "a policy of selfishness and isolation." But there was nothing selfish in minding our own business, and there was nothing to be condemned by the name of isolation in looking after our own affairs, and leaving other people to look after theirs. The words which he had quoted from the Prime Minister would show that "the policy of selfishness and isolation" was the true policy; and he had quoted them to show that we were more respected in Europe than ever we were before—far more than we were a few years ago, when Lord Russell was always writing threatening letters, and Lord Palmerston making "Rule Britannia" speeches. It would be pleasant if the Government could see its way to some diminution of this military expenditure, so that they might be better able to fight—as he was sure they were anxious to do—the enemies permanently encamped among us—the disease, and pauperism, and crime of the country. They had broached certain measures with that object; it required time, money, and care to carry them out, and would it not be well to devote more time, more money, and more care to those ends by getting rid of some of this expenditure? Then what benefit might be done to the "harassed interests" which were so often coming to the Government to complain? The Government had had time to attend to none of them but the Army. They had redressed some of the grievances of the Army; but others were coming with grievances which they could not redress. When General Peel sat in that House, he used to estimate by a rough-and-ready calculation that every man in the Army cost £100. The cost now was a great deal more, owing to the rise in prices, and if we cut off 10,000 or 20,000 men from our Army what a large sum the Ministry would have in hand! The Chancellor of the Exchequer was annoyed ever and anon by gentlemen coming to get rid of the income tax. His hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Mr. Gordon) was going some night to detail the misery of people with whom he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) sympathized to a certain extent—the brewers. The hon. Gentleman was going to ask the House to take off their licence duty. No doubt they would have the hon. Members for Derby (Mr. Bass) and for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Greene) by-and-by telling the House that if they did not get relief, they would end their days in the workhouse. Another question very dear to the agricultural mind was the repeal of the malt tax; its advocates, too, would be sent empty away. At present it only had a following in the House of about 17; but that would no doubt be increased ten or twenty-fold, whenever a Liberal Government should again come into power. Then there was the question of Local Taxation. He spoke feelingly on that subject, for he was himself a distressed country Gentleman. He had heard the question of Local Taxation talked about for years and years; it was the dream of country gentlemen by night, and their talk both day and night—they longed for the time when rates would fall, and rents would rise; but nothing could be done for these poor country gentlemen. Already he saw the effect of "hope deferred" upon their visages. They looked so sad and sat so silent, except when on the great question of "Turnpikes" they gave forth an inarticulate moan. The fact was, so long as they had such 'an enormous and extravagant expenditure as £24,000,000 on the Army and Navy it would be impossible to give relief to any of these interests. He made his appeal to the present Government, and in doing so, wished the Nestor of the Tory party—the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) who lent life and interest to every debate in which he took part—was in the House, because the right hon. Gentleman had voted with him before on one of these Motions as a protest against this great expenditure being permanent. He (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) hoped the House would not think he was pressing the Motion on Christian grounds. He did not put his Motion on the ground that war was wrong. He knew that opinion was held by the early Christians; but he was not addressing an assembly of early Christians, but of advanced Liberals. They had improved on Christianity since those early days, and went by the Articles of Religion to which they all—from the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) downwards—owed "unconditional allegiance." The 37th Article declared that "It is lawful for Christian men at the commandment of the magistrate to wear weapons and to serve in the wars"—thus by one delicious sentence correcting the Sermon on the Mount and revising the New Testament. Now-a-days we sang Te Deum for the slaughter we had committed, with a warmth of devotion which was measured by the numbers we had slain. The hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. E. J. Reed) had explained to them that a new kind of religious service was prescribed for the Navy, for when a ship was launched, a prayer was offered that no evil might befall her, but that she might do all the mischief that was possible. No wonder when the Shah was here he wrote in his diary words something like the following—"This is a wonderful people. I see hospitals and asylums and every institution to relieve suffering humanity, and at the same time they devote their whole energy and power to provide for the slaughter and destruction of their fellow creatures." Such was the language of this Pagan Monarch, who, no doubt, derived his notions of Christianity from some unorthodox missionary who told him our duty was to love one another. He simply asked the House to consider the question as a matter of business, and see whether the advantages to be gained were not too little for the money expended in obtaining them. So far as he was concerned, he was of opinion that both sides were equally to blame with reference to this matter. The Opposition were called Liberals, and the reason, no doubt, why they were called so, was because they were liberal in expenditure whenever they were in office. His great hope lay in the fact that in the Conservative Cabinet he saw Lord Derby, whose presence there seemed to prove that statesmanship and common sense could co-exist. Lord Derby had asked in one of his speeches—"What was the Army for?" That was the question which statesmen and politicians had to settle before they organized and reorganized it, and voted for its payment. Lord Derby, though not fortunate enough to be in office at the time of the Arbitration with America, was the first statesman who initiated that policy; he knew its benefits and the probable advantage it would be in the future. The Prime Minister, also, when in opposition, had denounced our "bloated armaments." He (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) was quite sure the Prime Minister agreed with him in every word he had uttered, if only he would say so. He unfortunately did not belong to the Tory party, but he could trust the Leaders of that party in foreign politics as well as any other set of men in the country. He believed those statesmen were able to settle our disputes by "the still small voice" of reason rather than by an appeal to brute force, which, after all, was nothing but the argument of the bully and the braggart—the barbarian and the coward. He appealed to the House to support his Motion as a sort of Vote of Confidence in Her Majesty's Government. They had a great opportunity before them. They had been called to office by the voice of the country expressed at the last General Election. They had passed through a long night of disheartening opposition, but they were now supreme in the House and in the country. Why should they throw away that great opportunity, spending the Session in bringing in Bills, of which the best that could be said was, that some people thought they might do some good, and nobody thought that they could do much harm? He called upon them to do something which would make them be remembered in history—for, as Bentham said—"Whatever nation shall get the start of another in making a proposal for reducing its armed force will crown itself with everlasting honour." Let the House encourage the Government to take that truly noble policy—a policy which he was convinced would not only lighten the burdens of the country, but promote peace and tranquillity, and ultimately confer blessings on the whole world. He begged to move the Resolution which he had placed on the Paper.

MR. PEASE, in seconding the Motion, said that the remarks he had to make in reference to the present Estimates were equally applicable to those introduced by Lord Cardwell. They were now asked for £536,000 more than last year for the united services, and an increase of £1,173,000 on the year 1873-4, so that they were going on increasing, instead of diminishing their expenses, at a time when wages, iron, and other materials were falling. Since he had been in the House—a period of ten years—they had spent no less than £270,000,000 in the defence of the country, and they had had no war during the whole time. Under those circumstances why were they going to keep 400,000 men within the United Kingdom? What had they to fear? Not America, because the American Navy had gone to nothing, and they had only an army of 25,000 men dispersed throughout all the States of the Union. In fact, so scattered was it, that he was assured by a friend who was well acquainted with the condition of affairs in that country, that it would take six weeks to get together 10,000 men in any part of the Union. Had they any reason to fear the three European countries, who by reason of their wealth and armaments were alone formidable—France, Russia, and Germany? He thought not, when their respective conditions were considered. For instance, France scarcely knew from morning to night under what form of Government she would be living, and had adopted a Conservative Republic merely to avoid Napoleonism, and its consequences. Besides, for all aggressive purposes, she was crippled for some time to come; and had increased her debt from £245,000,000 to £1,100,000,000. With respect to Russia, they had done away with the only source of ill-feeling in that quarter, by giving up the points they had gained at so much expense with reference to the Black Sea, and whatever might be her sentiments, she could never think of invading us; while as to Germany she would hesitate before plunging into war with any country, knowing, as she did, that France was hanging on her flank ready to make an attempt to snatch back Alsace and Lorraine. We might be perfectly certain that as long as Lorraine and Alsace were German, we had no reason to fear an invasion from Germany. These things being borne in mind, and it being also remembered that they had the most powerful fleet in the world, it was idle to think that either of the three nations mentioned would ever think of invading this country. Therefore there was really no reason why we should keep up these great armaments. Moreover, we had a foreign policy continued through a succession of Ministers of remarkable talent, from both political parties, and this policy which had been energetically adopted by Lord Clarendon, Lord Granville, and Lord Derby, was that of non-intervention in the affairs of other countries, but of holding our own, and maintaining our honour; and this could best be done by conciliatory measures, and working in harmony with other nations. Further, it should be borne in mind they had a large enough field in which to spend their money, instead of wasting it upon standing armies. There were such questions as Artizans Dwellings, Pollution of Rivers, Local Taxation, Education, and the Civil Service, all requiring the expenditure of large sums of money, and upon them ought the energies of the Government to be most properly directed. Counties were groaning under their burdens of taxation, but until the scandal of spending so much money upon the Army was abated, he, for one, did not see how they were to be relieved. But apart altogether from such considerations as these, enormous evils were created by the mere maintenance unemployed of large bodies of troops in a country. The fact was, that by keeping up a large standing Army they were withdrawing a large number of men from industrious employment, and were maintaining them at the expense of those who were industrious; they were also engendering a spirit of war amongst the people which it was most injudicious to encourage. Not only was that spirit of war fostered in young officers, but a vast amount of absolute immorality was produced. One man in every four of the Army had been convicted of drunkenness, and out of 17,000 recruits there had been no less than 5,000 deserters. That alone showed the large amount of vice which would always be an attendant on a standing army in times of peace. He might be told that this expenditure was called for by the vast standing Armies maintained on the Continent, and he believed that the great Powers had on foot not less than 5,000,000 men. But, on the other hand, the aggregate debt of Europe had increased to £2,218,000,000, the larger part of which had been expended in keeping these vast forces in arms, and in fostering the military spirit. And what was the consequence? Why did the German emigrants leave their country in shoals? It was to escape the conscription, and because they hated the military service. In Russia, the same thing went on, thousands emigrating to America to avoid service in the army. He felt it his duty to second the Motion of the hon. Baronet, because he believed that keeping up that war force in time of peace had a detrimental effect upon the morals of the country at large. It was said we were a Christian nation. The Church had a prayer which thousands uttered every Sabbath day, and it was,

"Give peace in our time, O Lord." That was a prayer we ought to listen to, and thus set a better example to those nations of whose conduct we had reason to complain.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the assurances of friendship from all Foreign Powers mentioned in Her Majesty's Speech from the Throne, warrant a reduction in the land forces of the British Army,"—(Sir Wilfrid Lawson),

—instead thereof.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, as he intended to vote for the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), while not at all agreeing with some of the grounds upon which he based his proposal, he should be glad if the House would permit him, in a very few words, to explain the different grounds upon which he intended to support the proposal for a reduction of the Army. He was not what his hon. Friend called an early Christian; he did not at all believe in the immediate approach of a Millennium in which the rule of force would cease, and moral considerations alone govern the destinies of the world, nor did he put that faith which his hon. Friend appeared to do in the pacific assurances which Her Majesty invariably received from England's rivals abroad. He supported his hon. Friend in the first place, because he retained the old traditional objection of the Liberal party to a standing Army. Some reasons for that distrust and suspicion had just been alluded to by his hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Pease). There were others not less important which he might mention, but with which he need not trouble the House at that time, as they were sufficiently recognized and understood. But beyond this he entertained the opinion that their form of standing Army had passed into a condition of present and necessarily increasing inefficiency. That was an impression which, in his opinion, was becoming generally shared by both sides of the House, and by all parties in the country. To put it simply, the day of the recruiting sergeant was past, and under its present form and government the military occupation as now carried out could not enter into competition with the best portion of the working classes of this country, with their ordinary avocations and modes of industry. It was not his intention to trouble the House at that time with more than the merest sketch of what he would propose as a substitute for their standing Army; it was enough to say that he would base it on the principle of making the entire male population of the country a great Reserve, to draw upon in any case of real necessity. He would endeavour to increase the physical force and strength of the whole population, superadding such an amount of military training as would make all the nation rapidly effective in case of necessity for defence. He was, of course, pointing to some modification of what was known as the Swiss system, and this, in his opinion, was the sort of aim which they should set before themselves in the future, and which he believed would be warmly assented to by the working classes of the community. A commencement should be made at once in this direction by requiring some amount of physical education and gymnastic exercise as a branch of their system of national education. He was aware that to many these views would sound exceedingly Utopian, but he was convinced that he was far from standing alone in these opinions. Three or four years ago 50 hon. Members of that House held a private meeting on the question of the national defences, and signed a paper of adherence to a scheme something like that he had sketched out. On that occasion he had for the only time in his life the honour of finding himself in agreement with the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho). It was therefore upon quite opposite grounds to those put forward by his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle that he supported his Motion. It was not because he thought with the hon. Baronet that England was superfluously strong in defence, it was rather because that in any case of strain and necessity she would be found essentially weak. The hon. Baronet had stated that he based his Motion upon a Vote of Confidence in the foreign policy of the present Government, in which he said he had just as much faith as in the policy of the right hon. Gentlemen who now sat upon the Opposition side of the House. In that sentiment he (Mr. Taylor) entirely agreed. His confidence was equally great—or small—in the right hon. Gentlemen who sat on the one side or the other of the House. He believed that that Department of Public Business, like any other Department which was practically free from the observation and criticism of public opinion in the country, would be characterized in the future as it had too often been in the past by an unhappy mixture of rashness and cowardice. He believed they would be liable in the future to such alternations of spirit as had marked their policy during the last few years: parallels would be afforded to their conduct in permitting Alabamas to prey upon the commerce of an ally when thought to be weak, and when that ally became strong of humiliating themselves, not by accepting arbitration, but by accepting it with the inevitable results accruing upon its being tried by ex post facto conditions; or should they find themselves compelled by the urgency of an ally to threaten again their great Northern rival, Russia, they would first commit the folly of striking at the extremity of the enemy and not at its heart—in the Crimea instead of in Poland—and finally when the occasion had passed of sacrificing the little they had gained through the expenditure of so much blood and treasure by tearing up the Treaty, which was the only result of the war. On these grounds he should vote for the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he did not think that on the present occasion it was necessary to enter upon the question raised by the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor). The question of conscription was of too large a character to be discussed on that Motion, and he doubted whether conscription would be found in its results at all less expensive than the system at present existing. As the hon. Gentleman gave that sole ground for voting against the present state of our armaments, the House would feel that until the course suggested had been provided, we must keep to the existing order of things. He need not say much upon the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson). It was certainly a little hard for one like himself, who had to go through the dry work of moving the Estimates, to find that any little liveliness which might lie in the subject had been taken out of it by anticipation. The hon. Baronet said he had great confidence in the foreign policy of the Earl of Derby, and, relying upon that, did not think it was necessary to have so large a defensive force as we now had; but the Earl of Derby was of a different opinion, because he was a party to these very Estimates. There was one compensation in connection with his hon. Friend. Even when he was depicting our miseries, he did so in such a good-humoured manner that everybody was laughing when they ought to be crying. But when they left the hon. Baronet and went to the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease) they at once passed "from gay to grave, from lively to severe." That hon. Gentleman had depicted as blackly as he could all the evils of a standing Army; but he seemed to forget that the 400,000 men of whom he spoke were not only for the defence of this country, but for the defence of India and the colonies. As to the statement of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle that in Pitt's time, the Army numbered only 18,000 men, he had to observe that at that period there were over 1,000,000 of men available for the defence of the country; while India had its own troops. The comparison between Pitt's time and the present day, therefore, was an argument in favour of increasing, rather than of diminishing, our forces. The reliefs now required for India rendered it essential, indeed, that we should maintain a considerable force at home, and he was quite sure the country had less to fear from its existing Army than from the success of enthusiasts like the hon. Baronet; because, if they succeeded in effecting such a great reduction in the Army as his hon. Friend contemplated, the effect would be that people would become frightened, and say the Army was entirely inadequate for the protection of the colonies and the preservation of India, and a revulsion of feeling would sweep away all economical measures, and plunge the country into a larger expenditure than we had now. That being so, and feeling sure he should not convince the hon. Baronet by speaking at any greater length, he would only say that he trusted the House would not consent to the Motion, but allow the Government to go at once into the Estimates.

COMMISSIONS IN THE HOUSEHOLD REGIMENTS—RETURN.

OBSERVATION.

MR. SANDFORD rose to call attention to the Return (No. 281) on the subject of Army and Navy Appointments, and to the fact that the manner of obtaining Commissions in the Household Regiments, both Infantry and Cavalry, was omitted from that Return.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that if he would move for it, the further information which the hon. Member desired to have should be given.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(1.) 129,281 Land Forces, for the Service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland at Home and Abroad.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Mr. Raikes, in moving the first item in the Army Estimates relating to the number of Men, it is usual for those who fill the office I have now the honour to hold to make a general statement as to the condition of the Service, both as regards its personnel and its matériel. Notice has already been taken this evening that there is an additional expenditure this year over that of last, but if hon. Members will be good enough to refer to a Paper issued this year, called "The Army (Variations of Numbers)," they will find a very full explanation of the causes of the difference between the expenditure proposed for the Effective Service of the two years, and therefore I shall not feel it necessary to go minutely into the matter now, and the more so because an opportunity will be afforded to hon. Members to discuss it when the various Votes are before the Committee. I may, however, mention that some portion of the general increase in the expenditure is due to the unusually high price of forage this year; to the supply of the necessary horses for the autumnal drills and manœuvres at Aldershot; and to the large item of £25,000 occasioned by the additional day in Leap Year. With regard to the latter item, however, we may hope that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will receive such an additional sum as may more than balance the increased charges of the two Services occasioned by the extra day having to be provided for. In addition to these sources of increase there is that of the naval charges. It has been urged that much advantage would be derived from treating that item on the principle of repayment, so as to prevent its appearing in the Army Estimates; but the subject having been considered very fully by those who are anxious to bring about a proper balance between the Navy and Army charges, the conclusion that has been arrived at is, that, if the Committee wishes to have a thorough audit of the accounts for the two Services at the end of the year, it is absolutely impossible to adopt the principle of repayment. Therefore, it is that the charges for the Navy, amounting to £232,000, appear in the Estimates now before us. I may here remark that I am most anxious to furnish to the House the very fullest information I can with reference to the Army, but that information has already been published in its most compendious form in "The General Annual Return of the British Army," and therefore I hope that hon. Members before moving for Returns in reference to the Army will consult that work, and move for them in the lines there laid down, they will thus avoid throwing an unnecessary strain upon the Department, the regular work of which is sometimes brought almost to a standstill in consequence of the clerks being engaged in the preparation of some special Return, which is, perhaps, only consulted by some five or six Members. I can assure the Committee that it is our wish to make this general Return as complete as possible, and that every suggestion for its improvement shall receive our most careful attention. If hon. Members will look at the end of the present work they will see that we have added a new and very useful Return at the end of the Report of the Inspector General for Recruiting, which shows the increase and the decrease in the Army during each month of 1874. That, I believe, will be found extremely useful.

Before I proceed to deal with the general subject of the Estimates, perhaps the Committee will allow me to make a few observations on the question of the recommendations of the Commission upon Officers' Grievances, which have been referred to several times. It is my intention, when I bring forward the Vote for the Army Purchase Commission this year, to call the attention of the Committee to three of those recommendations, and to ask for an additional sum on account of them; therefore, it is unnecessary that I should go into the subject at the present moment, further than to say that as inasmuch as the subject which was before the Officers' Grievances Commission is so intimately connected with the question of promotion, until the Commission on that question has reported, and ample time has been allowed us for considering that Report, we shall be unable to deal finally with it. The principle laid down by my Predecessor in office was, that as adequate a flow of promotion must be maintained in the Army as was maintained under the Purchase system. That subject is now under the consideration of the Committee, and it will be recollected that in the Report of the Commission on Officers' Grievances all the recommendations were based upon the assumption that promotion must be kept up in accordance with the principle laid down by my Predecessor. I may remind the Committee that I have been required to complete a great deal of unfinished work, and therefore I hope the Committee will extend to me some consideration on that account. My Predecessor had commenced a great many subjects, and as far as regards the Abolition of Purchase, he left office without having laid down any principles upon which the future system of promotion and retirement from the Army should be conducted. As time went on, it became necessary that the latter question should be taken into consideration, because, in consequence of the Purchase system dying out rapidly, the difficulties connected with promotion would be growing day by day. Leaving these questions, I should wish to give the Committee some information with regard to the matériel before entering upon the subject of the personnel of the Army, and in doing so I will refer very shortly to the different heads under which my remarks will occur.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

In the first place, I should wish to call the attention of the Committee to Vote 12, relating to the Stores. The Stores were formerly under the management of what was called the "Control Department," but I have taken upon myself—I hope not without the assent of hon. Members opposite—to abolish that title, which has led to every sort of jealousy and ill-feeling, it having been supposed that department was created to regulate and control everybody in the Service; and, although that was not the case, it was not thought desirable to retain a title which gave such great offence, and therefore we have divided the department into two branches, one to be called the Ordnance Store department, and the other the Supply and Commissariat department. The officers in these two branches will be placed upon two different lines of promotion, one set being placed under the Director General of Artillery and Stores, and the other under the Director General of Supply, both remaining under the Surveyor General of Ordnance. I hope the alteration will be carried out immediately. There is no immediate intention to interfere with the Transport, which for the time remains under the Commissariat, although the time may come when it may be necessary to deal with that branch of the Service. It will be noticed that under the Vote for the Supply and Manufacture and the Repairing of Warlike and other Stores there is an apparent increase of nearly £16,000; but the reason of that apparent increase is, that there will be a less repayment in the year than there was a right to expect of about £65,000, and therefore there has been an actual saving under this head of £49,948. I may state that a considerable reduction has been effected in the cost of the manufacture and repair of small arms through the various improvements which have been introduced into the machinery. On the whole, the reduction is very considerable. In connection with the Ordnance Stores, it has to be noted that we are still engaged in making an 81-ton gun, capable of throwing a 1,600 pound shot—a monster surpassing anything which has yet been known. Of Artillery, we have 372 field batteries manned, equipped, and horsed, as compared with 180 in 1870; and we are keeping up our Reserves steadily. This is one of those defensive Forces to which, perhaps, even the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) would not object, for it is scientific and complete in every way. With respect to small arms, the Martini-Henry rifle has been supplied to all the troops at home, and I am happy to say that the reports of it are extremely favourable—that the men, instead of being distressed with the recoil, do not feel it at all, and that the weapon is one that gives great satisfaction. On the 31st of March this year, we shall have a reserve of 400,000 Martini-Henry and Snider rifles, 57,000,000 of ball cartridges; our store of gunpowder is fully maintained; and, with regard to all other stores, I may say that the supply is adequate. I need say nothing at present about the Commissariat. It will be sufficient to enter into the details of that part of the subject when we come to the Votes. I have endeavoured to obtain the latest information with respect to the condition of the brigade depôts. The expenditure under that head is not in the Estimates; but inasmuch as the time must come when it will materially affect them, I think the Committee ought to be told as much as possible on the subject. There are to be 70 of these depôts. New barracks are to be constructed for 32 of them. At present 15 of these are under contract; plans are ready for seven; plans are in progress for other five, and with regard to the remaining five, negotiations for land are going on. As to the other 38 depôts, existing barracks are at present being adapted for 20 of them, and plans are in hand for the adaptation of 16 more, while two are tentatively occupied. In the other cases, alterations are under consideration. There has been a great desire to have training barracks for the Militia—that is to say, there is an objection to going under canvas. Warley, we hope, will soon be available, and negotiations for land are going on at Lichfield which I hope will prove satisfactory. With respect to the Northern Tactical Station, which I mentioned last year, I am sorry to say we have not made much progress. The mere sight of a cocked hat in any neighbourhood where it is supposed land may be wanted for troops has a most prejudicial effect in raising the price, and the sum demanded is sometimes enormous, we have therefore to look around us very carefully before purchasing any land for this purpose. But the scheme to which I refer has not been lost sight of, the matter being at present in the hands of the general officer commanding the Northern district. I cannot conceal from myself that the difficulty in regard to land is growing day by day, and that we are constantly becoming more “cribb’d, cabin’d, and confined”—a fact which is, perhaps, natural in this thickly inhabited country. For many reasons land is becoming more valuable—the means of bringing it under cultivation are increasing; and even at Aldershot, on account of the increasing difficulty we experience in moving outside the ground on which the camp stands, we shall have to face that difficulty by extending the area of our possession if we are to continue to have manœuvres on an extensive scale—manœuvres which I need not say are of great advantage to the different branches of the Service. Passing from that point, I may mention that new barracks have been built at Colchester for the Artillery; that additions have been made at Shorncliffe, with a view to having a complete tactical station, and that additions have been made at Glasgow in order to have a Cavalry and Artillery station. No Militia having yet been annexed, we are not in a position to give any information as to the probable working of the brigade depôts when they are in complete order. During 1874-5 £200,000 will have been expended on fortifications that are being built under the loan, and I think I may say it has been mainly spent on iron shields for the forts. It takes a long time to procure these shields, as there are only two firms which supply them, and the process of putting them up is tedious. Plymouth and Pembroke are now complete; Portsmouth is approaching completion; and there is a prospect that the whole amount which so many years ago was taken for the works in question will not be needed. Such a result would, no doubt, be highly satisfactory to the Committee, and I am bound to say that it would be chiefly due to the distinguished officer—Colonel Jervois—who has had charge of the works. Sir Frederic Chapman, the Inspector General of Fortifications, reported as follows on this subject in February, 1874:—

“These results are mainly due to the engineering skill, administrative ability, and untiring zeal of Colonel Jervois, on whom has devolved the general conduct of the business relating to these national defences from the first conception of the design to the actual execution of the works."

In that opinion I entirely concur. Colonel Jervois is now going into a new sphere of action. He has been appointed Governor of the Straits Settlements, and those who have been connected with him in the War Department have every reason to believe he will be as successful in his new post as he has been hitherto. With respect to the fortifications which are referred to in the Estimates, I have to state that the fort at Landguard is nearly complete. There is a turret being constructed at the Admiralty Pier at Dover, and the works at Gibraltar are nearly ready for heavy ordnance. The outer defences at Malta are rapidly advancing, and at Bermuda and Halifax there is not much remaining to be done. About 800 heavy guns will have been provided by the 31st of March, and a large proportion will be in their places. The smooth-bores will have, in a great measure, been replaced by the converted rifle guns, which have been proved to be a very effective weapon. Coming next to the subject of military education, I must allude to the very satisfactory Reports which I have received in regard to the schools for the soldiers' children. I will not go into details upon the present occasion, but I cannot refrain from saying a word about a gentleman to whom great credit is due in connection with the establishment and promotion of these schools—I mean the Rev. G. R. Gleig, the present Chaplain General of the Army. At a great age, that reverend gentleman has resolved to retire from a post which he has occupied for a long period of time with great advantage to the service, and I am sure the Committee would not like that I should pass from the subject without referring to his services. Anyone who has read his interesting and fascinating book The Subaltern about the Pyrenean campaign, and who knows the localities referred to in it, must have been struck by the accuracy of his descriptions; and we know also how gallant was his behaviour. Afterwards he served with distinction in America. He has gradually reached the position he now occupies, and for which his great exertions in establishing military schools and bringing them into an efficient state pointed him out as fit. I am sure the Committee will not overlook the good service he has done, but will heartily wish him a peaceful and happy retirement. With respect to the military education of a higher class, I want to call the attention of the Committee more especially to Sandhurst. Last year a system existed by which young gentlemen, after having succeeded in the competitive examinations, received their commissions and were sent for a year to their regiments, after which they were sent back to Sandhurst to complete their school training for another year. The House showed last year that it considered this plan as sure to fail. You could not treat officers who had been in a regiment as boys are treated, and it was certain to lead to the difficulties to which it did lead. We have now altered that; but I am not satisfied that we have gone far enough, and I look forward to a time when, after a young man has passed his examination, he will go to Sandhurst upon the same footing as cadets go to Woolwich; that instead of the country having to pay them as commissioned officers they will pay for themselves during the year they are at Sandhurst. By the plan we propose we shall get rid of the difficult and complicated system of ante-dating commissions, as those who obtain commissions will proceed straight to their regiments and stay with them from that time forward. That seems to me a much better plan than the present, and it is most important that we should get rid of an irritation to which that system has given rise. I cannot pass from Sandhurst without calling attention to the estimate in which that school has been held by one of the present Kings of Europe. The present King of Spain went to Sandhurst last year and conducted himself in all respects very much as any other cadet would have done—showing himself anxious to submit to the discipline of the place and to take advantage of the instruction to be obtained there. It is, I think, to the credit of Sandhurst that it should have been selected by those who were interested in the new King, as the place of his education. With respect to Woolwich, we know that we have had there one of a very high position, who not only made use of that military school, but attained a very high standard in almost all the subjects of examination. I think that England has been honoured by those two military schools having been selected for the education of those two distinguished persons to whom I have referred. I should add that the Reports from Woolwich have been favourable during the year, as have been the Reports from Sandhurst also, and so far what was proposed last year has proved successful. I am thankful to say that, although the students at Sandhurst have had to submit to considerable inconvenience in consequence of their increased numbers, and the new buildings not being completed, they have done so with great good humour and good feeling. I come now to a point as to which I was questioned last year—the Medical department. That department has, I frankly own, given me infinite thought and received from me much consideration, and I am sorry that even at this moment I am not prepared to make any very definite proposal. The fact is, that there has been a very great change made in the Medical department. That department was in 1873 regimental, and is now departmental. It has become a Staff, and until it has settled down it is most difficult to arrive at a conclusion as to the best mode of dealing with it. Indeed, members of the Medical department have issued publications which are extremely interesting, but which are by no means unanimous in the opinions they express, for there are in the pamphlets I have read, strong advocates for the Staff system, for the regimental system, and for a combination of both systems. Whether it would be possible to combine both is a very serious and difficult question; but certain trials are being made with a view to solve the difficulty. Whatever the result may be, I think it is but right to allow of a fair trial for the existing system; but there are, however, one or two points as to which the Medical department have a right to know what my view is, and the first is the question of promotion. For my own part, I do not see the difficulty which was seen by my Predecessor in office of allowing what practically they get—namely, their promotion in 15 years. They want to be secured in it, and I do not see any great difficulty in securing it, although I have not yet arrived at any definite conclusion on the subject. So, also, as to the question of fixed retirement at a certain period—that is a subject which presses itself upon my mind, although until I come to a conclusion upon it, I would rather not make any promise in respect of it. While I was still considering and making progress as to the Medical department, I was, I must say, somewhat startled by the Warrant which was issued by my right hon. Friend near me for the Medical department of the Navy. It may be said that the two Medical departments stand on a totally different footing, but, to a certain extent, the two services must compete for the young men entering the profession, and if the Navy gets too many of them, it may be necessary that we should raise our terms in order that we may get our fair share. That also has stood in the way of my coming to a definite conclusion; but I may say I am most anxious to settle a matter which affects so much the interest of the Army, and of a profession which has done its duty so thoroughly well as regimental officers, and as I have no doubt they will in their present position. With respect to the health of the Army, the foreign Reports have not all come in, but, substantially, it is satisfactory. There are some local fallings off as compared with 1873, but, taking the last 10 years, there was a fairly low ratio of sickness in the Army during the year 1874. The deaths in the United Kingdom were 9 per 1,000, which is, I am told, identical with that of civilians of the soldiers' ages. In India the deaths were 13·41 per 1,000; and that is by no means a high average. With respect to one expedition which went out last year—that to the Gold Coast—the medical service was so highly satisfactory that it would be wrong in me to pass it by without a word. The deaths amounted to 63 from disease, or 31·4 per 1,000, and 18 who were killed or died from wounds. Nevertheless, the troops seem to have been in good health since their return from that pestilential climate. There have been some cases of ague, but very few, and I am told by the Director General of the Medical department that this most satisfactory result, considering the nature of the service and of the climate, was mainly owing to the skill, care, and intelligence of the medical officers accompanying the expedition. With respect to the non-Effective Service—the out-pensions—there is an increase of £42,000, which arises from arrangements with India, which I will explain when I come to deal with that branch of the subject, as also an increase on account of general officers. I may again mention, as I did last year, that we do not propose this year to have manœuvres on a large scale. I am led to that conclusion by many considerations—to a considerable extent by the very large price of horses and forage which would have greatly enhanced the cost of such manœuvres—and I thought that, inasmuch as the drills last year were very useful and advantageous, we might this year go on with them at Aldershot in connection with the Militia regiments as before. I have mentioned some distinguished names in the course of what I have said, and I may be allowed to mention one more. A most distinguished officer who commanded at Aldershot has died within the last few days, and I cannot proceed further without referring to the name of Sir Hope Grant. As a Cavalry officer he was one of the most daring and intrepid that ever led Cavalry into action. He was beloved by subordinates and soldiers, and when he was promoted and became a General he was found to show the same consideration for his men and for his officers, and the same trust was reposed in him by his officers, as when he commanded a regiment. And, although some persons conceived that a Cavalry officer was not best suited for the command which Sir Hope Grant held, yet it was found that in India, during the Mutiny, and China, he distinguished himself in the face of the enemy in the highest manner, and returned to this country having added to the lustre and honour of the British name as to his own. I cannot help saying that Sir Hope Grant was one of those officers of whom England may well be proud. He raised himself entirely by his own exertions. He owed nothing to favour—everything to his own right hand—and his modesty was equal to his courage. I have no doubt we shall always find officers equal to the occasion; but it is something worthy of note that, when an officer who for a long time has been in comparative obscurity, is suddenly called upon to fulfil duties of the utmost responsibility, conspicuous ability and high qualities are proved by the difficulties of the position in which he is placed and the manner in which they are met and overcome. Such a case occurred in the career of Sir Hope Grant. Now, Sir, there is one department for which an addition is proposed to be taken for special service—I mean the Intelligence department. I have read an interesting book written by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J.

Holmes), in which, speaking of the Berlin War Office, he says that there is no road, no river, no stream in a country which they did not know as well as the people of it, and that more is known at Berlin of the streams, roads, and hills of our southern counties than in London. It seems to me to be extremely desirable that the Intelligence department should be complete as soon as possible the information which they are to furnish, and we have with that view added a small sum tentatively. The staff is small, but it does an immense amount of work, which will, I have no doubt, prove most beneficial to the country. I now come to an item of increase which I am sure the country will approve. For years past the neglected state of the Crimean graves has been a subject of great regret, they having been plundered by the Tartars, and it is now proposed to take a sum of £5,000 for the purpose of putting them in order. They will then be handed over to the charge of our Vice Consul, who will have them properly guarded, and to Captain Anstey is entrusted the duty of seeing that the money is properly expended. There is another item of an exceptional character—the payment of £5,000 to Major Moncrieff at the end of his connection with the War Department, as was promised. I trust, the Committee will forgive me for detaining them so long from the question as to the men who are to form the Army for the coming year. The number of men we ask for this year is 129,281. It will be observed that this is a few more than last year. It partly arises from a change in the Artillery, which accounts for 131 men, and there are 91 who enlisted before, but who were treated as clerks and were not in the ranks. The Army at home and abroad, including the Indian Army, will number 186,432. The number of Militia voted will be 118,000, but my impression is, that the number enrolled will not be more than from 103,000 to 105,000. We must, however, take the outside number, as we may recruit up to it. The number of Volunteers who are efficient is 161,150. The Yeomanry will be 12,500. The Enrolled Pensioners will be 21,995, and Class A of the Reserve Forces will be 7,829. The total number of men will be 450,755, but not in the sense, as the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle will have it, of being an offensive Army.

We must look to the Regular Army as the offensive Army. The Artillery has been changed, as no doubt many hon. Members are aware, for the purpose of improving the reliefs in India. The proposal is, that there should be three brigades of Horse Artillery at home and three in India; six brigades of Field Artillery at home and six in India. So that there will always be a balance kept, which has not hitherto been the case, and that will be an important change in working the Indian reliefs. The Committee will see in the Estimates a full statement of the distribution of the Forces, although the distribution cannot be exactly in accordance with that memorandum. There will be one small variation in the first instance, because 50 Engineers are going out to Fiji to survey the land of the islands, so that we may know what we have really got. They will go out not so much as soldiers as quasi-civilians. To a certain extent they will receive pay from the Colonial Department, although they will receive their usual pay from the Army. I now come to the great question—as to what is to be done with respect to the men who supply the Army. It seems to have been supposed, although not in this House, that it was my duty to begin my career by attacking the late Secretary of State for everything he had done. Even if I had differed from him on every point, I should have thought that exceedingly bad policy, for by such a course I should only have misled others, and inflicted an injury upon the Service. I give the noble Lord (Viscount Cardwell) the credit, which I am sure he deserves, for having done his best to put the Army into an efficient condition; but he has left a very unfinished work, and I hope the Committee will not think I am acting unwisely in proceeding very slowly. Patience and a very impartial consideration for everything connected with the Army are what the country will expect. It would be easy for me to make great changes and reconstructions; but it would be acting an unwise part, because lines have been laid down at an enormous expense which have been sanctioned by Parliament, and which have never received a thorough trial, and if I had done away with what has been done by my Predecessor, I should have put myself in a position which neither my knowledge nor ability would have justified. There has already been so much change, that it would be unwise to make every one feel that the state of things was thoroughly unsettled. A great many attacks have been made on the condition of the Army; but few who have attacked and criticized have laid down a scheme for the re-construction of the Army. The hon. Member for Hackney has been bolder; but I think he assumes too much, and I cannot see that he has laid any ground for supposing that he will obtain the particular class of men from 20 to 25 that he hopes for, instead of the younger men who now enlist. His plan is based to a great extent on that of Prussia and Germany; but he does not sufficiently allow for the distinction that conscription exists in Germany, while the British system is founded on voluntary enlistment. With respect, however, to the details of the hon. Member's plan, they are worthy of great consideration, especially with regard to Army Corps. That might lead to decentralization, and create emulation among the officers, which might have desirable results; but, at the same time, we must not forget that we have a system of organization which is on its trial, and we must give it a fair patient one. We must watch, too, lest defects should creep in which we cannot remedy. What I would ask the Committee to permit me to do is to look carefully into this system of organization, for we have a system of Brigade Depôts for recruiting which has not yet been brought to a state of full development. In what I have said I have endeavoured to give my attention to all the points that have been brought before me, whether relating to officers or men; it is a very laborious occupation, and one which takes a great deal of time, and if I proceed slowly, that must be my excuse. There was the question of Indian Ordnance Officers, which I was able to settle last Session. The Commission on Officers' Grievances reported last Spring, and there are certain recommendations which I hope, after Easter, to bring before the House. With respect to the great question of promotion and retirement, I am waiting for the Report of a Commission which is fully competent to examine all the circumstances before I present a scheme to the House. Having referred to the question of the officers, I now come naturally to the men. It has been generally supposed, and indeed there is no doubt, that there is a general disinclination on the part of a better class to enter the ranks of the Army. It must be admitted that the Army is not recruited from that class of men which my Predecessor hoped would come in; but, practically, the recruits remain of the same class as before, although to a certain—perhaps not a very great—extent they are younger than they used to be. With respect to recruiting, Reserves, and desertion, and all these subjects, I have formed a Departmental Committee in the War Office to collect information. They have been busily engaged in so doing; but they have not yet reported to me, and I want to be sure, before I make a step forward, that I shall not afterwards have to take two steps backward. No one can regret more than I do that Colonel Anson is not now a Member of this House; but it is a matter of regret that he should have supposed that the moment a gentleman became connected with official life, he would begin to plaster over every defect, or that he would have any other object than to tell the truth relating to the Army. I apply that remark to his references to the Inspector General of Recruiting. He has sent in a Return which is, I am sure, founded on his own unhesitating belief, and the honesty of his character might be an assurance that he has no object except to give the War Department and the country the fullest information about recruiting. I have myself endeavoured to ascertain what is the position of recruiting in the Army. I find that the recruits under two years' service in the Guards amount at this moment to 847 men out of 5,132 men. In the Infantry they amount to 8,294, out of 33,800. So that very young recruits in the Infantry and the Guards are a very considerable minority, although, of course, a growing minority, and they will in time become a majority. We send all the elder men as reliefs to India, so that the cadres at home are seen in their very worst condition, and seem to be very much composed of young men. In former days there was a greater appearance of solidity and age in the men from the mixture of the older and younger men, and that is very different now. A Commission on Recruiting was appointed in 1866, composed of some of the most eminent men in this country. They were told in a letter from the War Department that for two years there were not a sufficient number of recruits to fill the Army, so that there was a difficulty in procuring recruits under the system of long service. They said there was no disposition on the part of the young men of this country to look to the Army as a profession, and they stated that great complaints were made of the extreme youth of those who were sent to India. I mention this to show that the same complaints were made as to the ages of recruits under the system of long service as are made now. Now one word with respect to the Reserves. Suppose we wanted to fill up, both in this country and in India, the cadres to 1,000 men. What should we do? We should require a Reserve of 58,000 men. We have, under the present system, a Militia Reserve which I will not put higher than 28,000. I believe the Militia Reserve is not by any means so unreal as an hon. Gentleman opposite supposes, nor am I inclined to think with him that the Militia itself is an expensive toy. A great many officers say that the Militia is becoming a very serviceable corps indeed, and that it supplies the Army with very serviceable men. If I put the Militia Reserve at 3,000 lower than 28,000 added to the A Reserve of, say, 7,000 men, that, no doubt, leaves a considerable deficiency. But I should like the Committee to consider that there are in this country a very large number of discharged soldiers; there are besides a great many men who have been trained in the Militia. Under pressure we could obtain at least 25,000 of these men. That would, at all events, give us a sufficient number to start with. There is no doubt that pressure is needed to bring up the Reserves, and that, as far as possible, steps must be taken to expedite the process of filling up the Reserves, so that we may be in a position to complete all our ranks whenever occasion requires. [Lord ELCHO asked, whether the Militia Reserve of 25,000 would not be deducted from the Militia?] The Militia Reserve must, of course, be deducted from the Militia, and that will so far reduce the Militia. I do not want in the least to put forward any glowing or glozing account of the state of things. I want the Committee thoroughly to understand where they are, and I want to keep nothing back upon this grave subject. With respect to the question of long and short service, I will mention a few facts, because they tend to show whether the country is prepared to go with short service or not. One—fourth of the recruits for the Line may enter for long service and three-fourths for short service. For long service only 1,444 recruits were enlisted in the Infantry, and 10,613 for short, which certainly gives one the impression that recruits at present can be got more readily for short than for long service. With respect to the quality of the present recruits, I know there has been a very great difference of opinion. I should like very much to read a short statement that was given to me by the Director General of the Medical Department, Sir William Muir. It occurs in his Report to me with respect to the recruits. He says—

The other day I went to Aldershot to see the recruits. I believe notice was given of my intended visit only on the night before. There was no parade whatever, nor did I see any soldiers mixed with the recruits. I saw the recruits only of 1873 and 1874. I believe I saw altogether about 4,000. I will tell the Committee very candidly what I saw and the impression I derived. It was an extremely cold morning. It was one of those very frosty mornings which would make a very well-dressed and comfortable man look rather blue and pinched and cold. Therefore, it was a very unfavourable morning to see men not very well or warmly dressed. Some of the men were in their uniform, others were in a loose sort of undress. I spoke to the officers of Light Cavalry, and they all said they never had so good recruits in the Cavalry as at the present moment. As for the Artillery, there was no concealment at all on that subject. I was told that the gunners in the Artillery were not of a high class—that many of them did not seem to be men of that physique which would enable them usefully to work with very heavy guns. But with respect to the drivers I cannot say I saw any deficiency, nor did I hear any complaint with respect to them physically. I then passed on to the Infantry. I was greatly struck with the extraordinary difference in the regiments, and of course I do not think it would be advisable for me to give the names of the regiments. But there were certain regiments in which it did seem to me that the recruits left little or nothing to be desired. First, as to the recruits of 1873:—They were men who, by the year that they had had in the service, had grown into strong and useful soldiers. In a good number of cases—I may say in the majority of cases—those who were of the 1874 class were men of whom I think I may fairly say they were becoming very much the same as those of 1873. But when I came to one or two regiments the men appeared to me to be not only deficient in physique at present, but not to have in them the capacity of becoming strong men. Upon inquiry I found these recruits were obtained from a class not likely to furnish the best supply of strong men. I am sorry also to say some of the men were not of the very best character. That, of course, will not be taken to apply to all recruits who were physically deficient, but certainly there were some complaints on the subject also. Well, the impression which this cursory view made upon my mind was, that the men were generally young; but in the majority of cases they were, as I ascertained from the leading officers, of exactly the same class as they had always got. They thought that, perhaps, to a certain extent, they were younger, but that after a short time they would become as physically able as the men they had in former days. I should be extremely glad, however, if a class of recruits would come forward of a higher class than the majority of those I saw. But when I am asked to take none but men of 20, I say is it possible to procure men of 20 while labour in this country is in its present state? A labouring man of 20 has settled down to a particular work; in most instances he is devoted to some particular pursuit, which occupies his attention, and being satisfied with it, he does not think of changing into the Army. With respect to obtaining recruits for future years there is a great experiment going on in the Brigade Depôts. The Brigade Depôts are to become the recruiting centres. The object in establishing these Brigade Depôts was to obtain recruits from the districts in which they were established, and it has been supposed by many that the time will come when there will be found in these depôts a new source for recruits, who will do more credit to the Army than those whom we obtain at present. I, however, think it is somewhat doubtful as to the localizing effect of these centres, for I believe that generally recruits enlist at a distance from their homes in order to avoid the sneers of their neighbours. However, greater facilities will be given for recruiting the Army by establishing these Brigade Depôts, because a person desiring to enlist, and, at the same time, to avoid exposure, will be able to accomplish his purpose by travelling no great distance from his home. There are some districts which I believe have never furnished many good recruits. There appears to be rather a hostility to recruiting in those districts, and if we find we are not getting efficient men, we must remove to some other quarters and endeavour to get them there. Another point connected with this subject is under examination by the Departmental Committee to which I have referred. All kinds of proposals have been made with a view to stopping desertions. It will be found that in 1859 desertion was carried on on a larger scale than it is at present. I think that in 1859 it was as high as 42 per cent on the recruiting, and therefore, although I am not going to extenuate the present state of things, I must ask hon. Gentlemen opposite not to "set down aught in malice" in comparing the amount of desertion now with that of former periods. We do all we can to punish desertion; but I am sorry to say magistrates often inflict wholly inadequate punishments, and seem to act upon statutes which are not the statutes at present in existence. That, I think, is very much to be deplored, for if a man has deserted more than once or twice, it is high time he should be punished for violating the oath he has taken to the country. Some persons had suggested "marks." Now, if I were an officer or a private, personally, I should not object to being marked with any mark showing that I had belonged to Her Majesty's Army; there is no great harm in it; but, at the same time, if there is a general objection to marking, it might throw back the recruiting. Therefore, I am not prepared, at all events at present, to resort to that

course. With reference to the suggestion which has been made respecting the clothes and kit, I find that in many instances of desertion neither are disposed of. In very many instances of desertion it is difficult to say why men go. Sometimes they go merely for a lark, and it will be found that out of 5,702 desertions upwards of 2,000 come back. These have been put down as deserters because they were absent for a certain number of days without leave. Again, it must be remembered that in the total of 5,702, those who desert many times are counted over and over again. Still, no doubt, it is a very costly proceeding to keep picking up recruits and dressing them, and then to lose them in this way; and the matter is receiving my most anxious attention, and I hope to be able to devise a mode of checking it. I now wish to say a few words on the subject of the non-commissioned officers, to which the hon. and gallant Member for the county of Galway (Captain Nolan) called the attention of the House last year. I then said they deserved very great consideration, not only because they formed the mainstay and backbone of the Army, but also because it was most desirable they should meet with such treatment as would make them really the best recruiting officers for the Army. Well, I hope that before the Session is over I shall be in a position to present to the House a scheme on that subject, but as I have not yet received the Report, I cannot at present go into the question further than to hold out a hope that I may be able to improve their position. And now I come to the Militia. They are taken at 118,000, and, as I before observed, we expect that about 103,000 will be enrolled. Before the Session is over I hope to lay on the Table of the House a Bill to consolidate the motley and medley statutes which constitute the law of the Militia. I do not expect to be able to deal with the question of ballot this year, but everything that has to do with the voluntary law of the Militia I hope to consolidate into one statute, and if the House sanctions this we shall have a much better groundwork in future years to move upon in respect to the ballot and the enrolment of the Militia. An improvement in the Militia has been effected in consequence of the extended training of recruits. In 76 regiments the recruits were drilled for 12 weeks, and such a period of training makes the groundwork for a man to become a soldier. Then the officers are becoming much better instructed. They take a great deal of pains to become proficient, and are perfectly qualified to command and discipline the regiments with which they are connected. The Staff of the Militia is being absorbed gradually into the Line, and will become connected with the Brigade Depôts. The House is aware it was proposed that as the Militia adjutants had nothing to do except with their own Militia, and had practically nine months of the year to themselves, they should, under the Brigade Depôt system, recruit for the Line, and undertake a number of other duties which had not previously devolved upon them. Complaints have reached us on this subject. The adjutants say that increased duties have been thrust upon them, which were not contemplated when they undertook their duties, and we have had one instance of an absolute refusal to recruit for the Line. Now, I think there is something to be said in support of the objections which the adjutants make. I propose, therefore, that all adjutants who are above 60 years of age shall be called upon to retire on the advantageous terms which I would also propose to all the present adjutants of Militia. On the expiration of 15 years' service in all, and five years as a Militia adjutant, a man may now retire on 3*s.* a-day; after 20 years' service, with seven years as a Militia adjutant, he may retire on 4*s.* a-day; after 25 years' service, and 10 as a Militia adjutant, he may retire on 5*s.* a-day; and after 30 years' service, and 15 as a Militia adjutant, he may retire on 6*s.* a-day. That scale is hardly likely to induce them to retire. I propose, therefore, to all those who signify their acceptance before the 1st of July the following terms:—Under five years as adjutant they will retire on 7*s.* a-day; under 10 years on 8*s.* a-day: between 10 and 15 years on 9*s.* a-day; and over 15 years on 10*s.* a-day. The Committee, I think, will agree with me that these are extremely liberal terms to offer, and, indeed, I should think that if there were no compensatory scheme, they were too liberal. Then we propose that the adjutants should be in a position to count their captain's service in the Militia towards the honorary grade of major, and have companies offered to them in the Militia regiment; so that they may continue there as officers, though they will no longer be adjutants. We shall take captains on full pay from the linked Line regiments to act as adjutants to the Militia, and to undertake all the duties which the present Militia adjutants regard as an additional burden. These captains will hold their posts for five years, and we shall propose to fill up the regimental vacancies from the half-pay list. We shall thus get adjutants who will not only be qualified and ready to promote the interests of the regiments committed to their charge, but, as a part of their understood duty, will become instruments of recruiting for the whole Brigade Depôt. Surely this will be far better than having officers who might think the imposition of these duties unjust, and perform them grudgingly? With respect to the Militia of Guernsey and Jersey, Guernsey has practically adopted the suggestions of the Government, and therefore we shall accept the scheme proposed there. As to Jersey, there has been some recalcitrancy, and the Committee may depend upon it that we shall not give way unless the Jersey Militia is made something really serviceable. I come now to the Yeomanry, a subject upon which I know that many hon. Friends of mine are anxious. The Yeomanry is being gradually improved, but great defects exist in it. Cavalry exercises are of a different class from those which were in vogue among the Yeomanry, and in the changes which occur in modern tactics we may see new uses of cavalry developed. There are many points which require consideration with regard to the Force, and I propose that they should be considered, not by a Commission, but by calling together for friendly counsel four officers of the Yeomanry, four Cavalry colonels, and three Representatives of the War Office to confer upon the changes which may be necessary. As to the Volunteers, the Committee will observe that the number of efficient has largely increased. It has been said that there is a great dearth of officers; but that statement is exaggerated, for though there may be fewer officers in one respect, a great number of what are called supernumerary officers are available. I feel, however, that I need not trouble the Committee on any points connected with the Volunteers till we come to the Vote itself. The officers themselves, I may say, are taking great pains to acquire a knowledge of their duties. The percentage of proficient to enrolled members in the year is 8·06, and this number is constantly increasing. As to the Artillery Volunteers, the report from Shoeburyness is of a very favourable character, and many of these Artillery Volunteers are in a position in which their services, in case of difficulty, might be of the greatest possible utility. I think I have now gone over the items connected with the Estimates. I confess I have no great expectation of arriving very rapidly at the results anticipated by the hon. Member for Hackney, for I fear we cannot hope to procure at present a high class in the British Army, and that we must rely for a long time upon the class which has hitherto supplied us with men. As to conscription, too, I expect that, if ever it comes, it will come at a distant day. We have only one compulsory force, and that is under the ballot for the Militia, which is suspended year by year upon grounds which hitherto have commended themselves to the country. I am bound, however, to say that I have been extremely struck lately at finding in many quarters where I should hardly have expected such a feeling, a growing inclination to try in some shape the ballot for compulsory service. Whether the time will come for such compulsion I cannot say; but I am quite sure that the time never will come unless public feeling pronounces very generally and strongly in its favour, so as to enable any Ministry to carry it into effect. My great object will be to watch carefully what is going on in the Army, asking the House meanwhile to grant me its indulgence that I may have time and be able to show the requisite caution. I do not deceive myself as to the difficulties of the position; but I wish to give a fair trial to the existing system till I see myself obliged, if I should be obliged, to confess that the system is a failure. If I do make that discovery, I shall not hesitate to say that I have been wrong in giving it so long a trial, and I will ask this House to sanction such changes as will make the Army efficient for the purposes for which it is intended. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving that the number of men during the financial year should be 129,281.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he had great pleasure in complimenting the right hon. Gentleman on the speech he had just made and on his efforts to improve our military organization. There was one change shown by the Estimates which, though long expected, might now be assumed to be accomplished, and that was the alterations in the designation of the department known as that of the Control branch. That department was created in the former Administration of the present Prime Minister, and its importance was considered sufficiently great to justify its formation being honoured by mention thereof in the Speech from the Crown. Useful results were expected to be achieved, not only by an improved administration in various branches of the War Office, but also great economy in an expenditure for Stores, Commissariat, Transport, and other supplies, amounting to nearly one-half of the whole Army Estimates. There could be no hesitation in claiming for that department the credit of having effected great good in the transaction of duties relating thereto, but also in effecting such important savings as to enable Lord Cardwell to announce to the House, that it had enabled the Government to diminish the military expenditure below the amount which had been incurred since the war with Russia. All who knew the difficulty of bringing down military charges, especially those added on to meet the requirements of war, would appreciate the efforts which must have been exerted by the Control department in order to aid the Secretary of State in arriving at that result. He (Sir George Balfour) therefore contended that the Control department had substantially succeeded, notwithstanding the defects in its organization and in spite of opposition of the most serious character, from open and secret enemies. He thought it was a mistake to put into the House of Commons the officer at the head of that department, the whole of whose time was required for the discharge of his onerous duties. The system initiated, however, had never been fully carried out, for it had never been intended that the officers of the Commissariat and Store departments should be confined to the discharge of those duties. He and Sir William Power had strongly, and would still recommend that, as in India, a number of warrant officers should be appointed from the ranks who would be the executive officers in charge of these stores. By creating that new grade, the status of non-commissioned officers might be improved, and the service would be made more attractive, they would be carrying out what was intended to have been one of the chief features of the Control department. With regard to the promotion and retirement of officers much remained to be done; but as that must involve a very heavy outlay, he suggested whether the position of officers might not be improved by diminishing their numbers. The number of officers in the British Army was greater in proportion than the number in the armies of the other nations of Europe, and the tendency was for that proportion to increase. For instance, we now had 1,000 officers in excess of the number in 1854, though we then had more privates in the Army than we had at present. The number of battalions, of companies, of squadrons, and of batteries, were all in great excess. With regard to the Dépôt Centres, the right hon. Gentleman was quite right in expressing some doubt whether that system would be so successful in obtaining recruits as had been expected. The important changes made for the purpose of facilitating Artillery reliefs in India, again, did not appear of such pressing necessity as to justify the addition of brigades. A few years ago we had 16 brigades in India, but now we had only 13, and the present changes appeared to have no other effect than to add to the numbers of superior officers. He would gladly see the whole brigade system broken up, and the old plan, formerly existing, up to 1858, of carrying out the reliefs by batteries, restored. The organization of the Artillery was calculated to add to the Indian military expenditure in an unnecessary degree. The four brigades of garrison artillery now in India could be reduced to two brigades by amalgamating the 28 batteries into 14 of the existing strength. The right hon. Gentleman had given a very satisfactory account of the state of our stores; but nothing could be more detrimental to the efficiency of our naval and military forces than to be supplied with stores kept too long; and with regard to ammunition, the better plan would be, to be prepared to provide all that was wanted in large quantities when occasion should require it, than to have a large amount laid by which could never be consumed except in time of war, and which then would be far from effective against an enemy. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would watch with great care the working of the long and short service systems, regarding which he (Sir George Balfour) had never been able to enter into the feeling which was prevalent on the subject. Some men might desire to enter for a long service, while others preferred a short one, and encouragement ought to be given to both. Certainly, as regarded India, it would be preferable and equally desirable to give men that option. The Commission over which Lord Dalhousie presided, and of which he (Sir George Balfour) was a Member, distinctly pointed out that the Indian service was one which men about to become soldiers greatly desired, and which attracted them when other services could not. He hoped that in the re-organization of the Army the right hon. Gentleman would make provision to enable them to realize that desire. As for the Medical department, that branch of the public service might be safely left in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman, who was giving the subject the greatest attention. They were men who deserved well of their country, and he hoped they would find a friend in the right hon. Gentleman. He regretted very much that general hospitals should supersede the old-fashioned system of regimental hospitals, for he doubted whether a general hospital was as well adapted for the Army as regimental hospitals were. No doubt, a general hospital would be more efficient in the treatment of disease, in consequence of the larger staff; but it would be wanting in that control which could be exercised in regimental hospitals, where men were known to the regimental medical officers, and malingering easily detected. The curing of disease was not the only duty of a medical officer, but also the detection of feigned diseases by men desirous of skulking from the hardships of military duty. It was well known that soldiers often entered a hospital when there was no necessity for doing so, and, therefore, a knowledge of the characters of the men such as could be obtained in regimental hospitals was very desirable. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would turn his attention to the enormous military staff at present maintained at head-quarters, and to districts, which, measured by the military strength, must be viewed by all acquainted with the requirements of an army, as truly most objectionable. The right hon. Gentleman would, doubtless, endeavour to ascertain whether it was necessary to keep up those two different departments, the Quartermaster General's and the Intelligence department. With regard to the Intelligence department, while admitting its growing importance, he wished to point out that the staff maintained, under the designations of Quartermaster General and Intelligence, was much too large. In any change that might be made, he would strongly urge that that staff should be reduced, and he believed if the staff were reduced and useless appointments abolished, the service would be improved. He mentioned that excessive staff, because no one could be blind to the fact that if the expense of the Army went on increasing at its present rate the country, especially in a time of distress, would rise up against the whole military system, and then great changes would be made, leading perhaps to serious defects in the military system of this country. As to the Militia, he had never been a great admirer of that force, though it might probably be desirable to maintain it in its present state. In conclusion, he congratulated the right hon. Gentleman on the full and satisfactory exposition of our military affairs which he had made to the Committee, and he could only express a wish that, instead of speaking out all the useful details which he and his Predecessors so laboriously and so ably acquired, to meet the demands for information which hon. Members of the House might apply for, it would be much to the public interests to have the information printed and circulated before the Estimates were moved. This change could be effected with ease by extending one of the present Returns, designated "Variations in Numbers," so as to comprise all the many-figured statements and statistical details which the Secretaries of State now felt bound to collect and to retain in their memory in expectation of Questions often not put.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, he wished to make a few remarks in reference to the Guards, a branch of the service with which he was intimately acquainted, and which had obtained special prominence in connection with the question of recruiting, by reason of the last Report of the Inspector General. He dissented from the rose-coloured view which was taken in some quarters of the question of recruiting in that branch of the service. Last year, the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) stated to the House that the Guards were responsible for their own recruiting, and that the Government had nothing to do with it—a statement which was tantamount to saying, that for five years the Government had silently acquiesced in the extravagant management, or rather the mismanagement, of their recruiting by the Brigade of Guards. The Report of the Inspector General, which imputed no such mismanagement, was a complete justification of the view which he took of the subject when speaking upon it last year. What was bad last year, was infinitely worse this year, owing to the condition of the labour market, and the superior attractions of civil life. The deficiency in the number of recruits of a physique qualifying them for the Royal Artillery and the Brigade of Guards had been noticeable for some time past, and he ventured to predict that it would be noticeable for some time to come, unless the incentives to enlist were increased. The Brigade of Guards was, he believed, about 500 men short of what would be full efficiency at present, and in two years' time, the full effects of the short-service system would be experienced, and if it was found impossible to fill up the void in the ranks now, what would be done when so large a number of men would take their discharge? The Report said that the recruits for the Guards were scarcely of the stature and physique of those who joined in former years, and yet it was also said that the recruiting system was satisfactory. These two statements were hardly consistent. Nobody could read the Report without seeing that it was the Report of one who was attempting to put the best face on the matter, but who was compelled to admit the weakness of his case when he wrote that the recruiting machinery might be expected to grow proportionately more satisfactory, "provided there should be no outbreak of war." During the past year, 58 men had been employed recruiting for these regiments, and they had only obtained 226 soldiers, which gave an average of three and a-half recruits for each individual recruiter. Surely that was keeping up a very expensive machinery for such miserably small results. There was a rumour that the Secretary for War intended to restore to the Guards the additional 1*d.* per day, which they formerly enjoyed, in consequence of the exceptional duties they were called upon to perform in London. He hoped that was true; because he was quite sure the money would not be begrudged them by their fellow-soldiers of the Line. It was interesting to watch the course of public opinion in reference to the matter. To him it was almost incomprehensible that The Times newspaper, which largely and beneficially influenced public opinion on most questions, should, in this particular case, have clung to an optimism which struck him as being infatuated and even pernicious. This optimist view culminated a few days ago, when The Times said—“The Report of the Inspector General is, on the whole, a thorough vindication of our recruiting system;” and this, though it appeared that in the three years ending 1873, more men had been discharged from the Army with bad characters than in the three preceding years. Nor was that fact surprising when they considered, as the Report allowed, that the unsatisfactory condition of recruiting did not end with the paucity of numbers; because, to his certain knowledge, men enlisted, misstating their ages, and after having served not very creditably in other regiments. What he thought would make the position of the soldiers more satisfactory than it was at present, would be to increase their pensions. He advocated that especially in the case of the non-commissioned officers. The present pension of a serjeant-major, 2*s.* 6*d.* a-day, was totally inadequate for a man who filled so responsible a position. It should be at least 3*s.* a-day. Pensions generally should be increased throughout the grades of other non-commissioned officers. The pay also of non-commissioned officers and men should be fairly, though not largely, augmented, and this increase should be in all cases progressive. Every man who had served six years should receive 2*d.* a-day additional, as a proof of his increased value; and, at the discretion of his commanding officer, that increase should be liable to forfeiture for crimes specially mentioned. Not only should the actual non-commissioned officers be paid, but those who now did the duty gratuitously—lance-sergeants and lance-corporals. No regiment could possibly be effective, the non-commissioned officers of which were not thoroughly trustworthy, and no money could be ill-spent in encouraging such men. One other point he wished to mention in connection with the pay of the soldier. Lord Cardwell held out the attraction of 1*s.* a-day and free rations. In military parlance, however, rations only consisted of bread and meat; and in the Guards, 3*d.* a-day was deducted from the 1*s.* for groceries and vegetables. It was not too much to expect that the country should give its soldiers food as well as lodging free. He also considered that three-quarters of a pound of meat was too little for a soldier. The fact was, that they received too much bread, much of which was wasted, and too little meat. In conclusion, let him say one word on the subject of conscription. Without advocating its adoption, he could not help agreeing with the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) and the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock), that they ought to recognize the principle that every man ought to serve for some period of his life in the Reserves, for until they did that, they would be unable to weld the component parts of the military system into one harmonious whole.

MR. A. H. BROWN said, he was sorry to see that so little progress had been made with the Brigade Depot system. No doubt, considerable difficulties had been experienced in their establishment, in consequence of the purchase of land and from other causes, but he hoped they would be overcome. Until these Brigade Depôts were formed, it would be impossible to form a correct opinion of the value of the Brigade system. The Brigades would in their turn test the value of the present system of recruiting, and hence it was doubly valuable to ascertain the real results of the system. The right hon. Gentleman had given an interesting description of his visit to Aldershot. Would he state, for the information of the Committee, whether the recruits in some regiments whom he found not so satisfactory as some others were recruited at the Brigade centres? If, as had been asserted, our recruits were deteriorating, it was high time that a method was discovered to put an end to the declension. With regard to the Reserves, he hoped that in any system that was adopted the Reserves would be made from men who had served under the colours. As he had last year the honour of sitting on a Committee respecting the subject, he should be glad to know whether any agreement had been arrived at on the part of the heads of the various Government Departments, in order to prevent undue competition between them in the purchase of stores. Passing to the Volunteers, his belief was, that all that they wanted was officers. There was a disinclination on the part of young men to come forward to serve as officers, and the consequence was the full benefit was not got out of the force. He thought that if the Warrants and Regulations on the subject were revised, much good would be done. The service would be rendered more popular, without any loss to its efficiency. As to the whole subject of recruiting for the Army, it was at present in a very exceptional position, because wages in the labour market were higher than perhaps they had ever been before. But the moment there was danger and the trade of the country was affected, wages would go down, and the number of recruits would increase, and they would be better recruits both in physique and height. He believed that voluntary enlistment was best and cheapest in the long run, and he hoped that no attempt would be made to introduce conscription or the ballot for the Militia—a system that would break down through the odium it would excite.

CAPTAIN CORRY said, he was of opinion that they would soon get a better class of young men as recruits than they had got for some time past. Young fellows entering the service at 18 years of age had been criticized as not developed; but it should be borne in mind that a young man of 18 had two years more to grow, in which his physique was developed. Besides that, lads of 18 were more amenable to discipline, took better to their profession, and turned out better non-commissioned officers than older recruits did. That remark, however, applied more strongly to the system of enlistment for 18 or 20 years than to the present short service. He was more or less alarmed at the state of the Militia, and should be sorry to see anything done that was likely to lessen its numbers, for it was principally composed of the ablest bodied men in the country—the agricultural labourers. It comprised only 103,000 men, of whom 25,000 belonged to the Militia Reserve, thus reducing it to 78,000—a strength totally inadequate for the defence of the country. At present, 7 per cent of the men in the Army were allowed to be married. They were a great incubus on every regiment on its moving, and they thought more of their wives and families than of their duty. As for the men married without leave, their difficulties were greater than those of the men married with leave, as the former did not enjoy the allowances which were made to the latter class. If, however, the number of married men in our Army were increased, and if they were allowed to go to their Brigade Depôts, being put on the supernumerary lists of their regiments and attached to the Militia, the Army would become greatly more popular. They would be ready to come forward when occasion required, and would be of great service. Then, if we wanted to get men of good physique and good character, we must raise their pay. Our non-commissioned officers ought to be better paid than they were, their present pay being really lower than that of any other official servants of this country. When it was found that a Staff sergeant was paid rather less than a London labourer, it was obvious there must be something wrong. He considered it of more importance to increase their pay and improve their condition in barracks than to give increased pensions. He thought conscription would be most unpopular, and most prejudicial to the good of the Army. In England, conscription meant universal liability to service. This might lead to a demand for universal suffrage, for men might argue that they ought not to be asked to serve unless they had a voice in the matter.

MR. J. HOLMS said, he thought the general effect of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was to show to the Committee and the country that on the whole the present condition of the Army was not unsatisfactory, and that if the organization scheme of 1871 were allowed to go on for two or three years longer, the country would be satisfied with the result. At the same time, he thought he detected in the right hon. Gentleman's remarks an occasional gleam of hope by something like a hint that by-and-by the re-organization scheme of 1871-2 would be thrown aside; and he thought it would be appropriate to recall for a moment the circumstances which led to the adoption of that scheme. In 1870 this country and Europe in general were startled by finding Prussia to be a military Power so great that she could send not only thousands and tens of thousands, but hundreds of thousands of soldiers from the centre of her own into an enemy's country within a couple of weeks. These soldiers were highly trained and of great individual intelligence. Moreover, they were men, not boys—none of them under 20, or, with the exception of the non-commissioned officers, over 32; and the organization of their Army seemed as perfect as it was possible for human intelligence to make it. Well, the cost of that army, including even the fortifications, was only £10,500,000 a-year, whereas our own small Army, incapable of expansion, and in numbers equal to only about an eighth part of that of Prussia, cost about £3,000,000 more. Alarmed at the strength of Prussia, it was resolved to vote an addition of 20,000 men to our Army? What was the result. We got 20,000 of the sweepings of the streets. [Lord ELCHO: That was in five months.] In five months, as the noble Lord had said. It was found at the time to which he was referring that the Army was composed in a great measure of boys and of men over 35; and that its general condition as regarded crime and immorality was something repugnant to the people. Moreover, dissatisfaction was so rife that it was almost impossible to hold the Army together. Under the conviction that it was necessary above all things to obtain a better class of men, the re-organization scheme of 1871-2 was adopted. What was the change which had been effected? Why that, practically, our Army was dearer now than it was in 1870, costing as it did over £13,400,000. He would not trouble the House with details as to crime and immorality, but he thought it could be shown they had considerably increased. The two great touch-stones he would apply had reference to the outgoing and incoming of the men. As regarded the outgoing great dissatisfaction was shown to exist. He would ask did we find dissatisfaction in the ranks of the 43,000 police, or in the Civil Service, or in the Post Office, or in private institutions? He found very little of the kind. In the desire that was shown to desert, the Army was totally unlike any other service or occupation in the country. Leaving it by purchase—the legitimate way—had been facilitated, and the number so leaving it had increased; and, under these circumstances, it might naturally be expected that the number who left in an illegitimate way would diminish, but the contrary had been the fact. In 1870 as many as 4,480 men were advertised for as having deserted, and seven out of every ten of them succeeded in getting clear away. The country was willing to spend a large sum of money to remove that blot. Well, had things improved under the new system? No, for last year, on the contrary, no less than 6,904 were advertised for as deserters, and 5,572 of them were never apprehended. If things went on in that way, all that a soldier would have to do a few years hence when wanting to leave the Army, would be to salute at the barrack gate and walk out. If one point more than another was to be marked in the Armies of Europe, it was the increase in the Artillery. Their Army was improving in that particular; but while the numbers were increasing, the desertions were increasing also. The Artillery formed 19 per cent of their Army, yet last year its percentage of desertions was 30, and therefore they were losing their artillerymen, who were the most difficult to train, faster than any other class of men in the service. In 1870, 8,200 men were advertised for as deserters from the Army and Militia; but in 1874 between the Militia and the Regulars 17,400 men were advertised for as deserters. Clearly, it was impossible to carry on a proper system of discipline under such circumstances. The men were beginning to see they could do pretty much as they chose with the authorities, and they were practically making fun of the War Department. Men enlisted in the Militia from which they immediately deserted and sold their kits, and then re-enlisted in the Regular Army, from which they speedily deserted to enlist and desert again. Such a fact was most humiliating to a great country like this, and it was really astounding to think that, looking at the desertion of the past few years, there must be, at least, some 20,000 or 30,000 men running up and down the country amusing themselves at the expense of the authorities. Strong comments were made in 1870 upon the large proportion of officers to men in our Army as compared with that of Prussia, there being then 6,645 officers to 128,400 men, whereas in the present year we had 7,076 officers to 122,200 men—that was to say we had 429 officers more and 6,200 men less. Turning to the results of our recruiting, he found that in 1873 Lord Cardwell stated that 23,000 men were required to keep up the strength of the Army and to give us a sufficient Reserve; and that in March, 1871, Captain Vivian, who was the then Financial Secretary to the War Office, stated in the House of Commons that we should require 32,449 men to keep up those branches of the service when the scheme had come into full operation. But what were the facts? in 1871 we obtained 23,500 recruits; in 1872, 17,800; in 1873, 17,300; and last year, 20,640, a number that appeared to have rejoiced the heart of the War Department. We were, therefore, considerably behindhand in our number of men. Let any one ask for a reduction to be made in the number of the men in the Army, and the War Department would flutter its wings like a hen over her chickens, and declare that it could not do with one less than it demanded. The Department had, however, permitted the numbers of the Army to go gently down. It had been stated that the increase of the 3,400 men in the number of the recruits this year was owing to the fact that 33 out of the 70 Brigade Depôts had been established, but in his opinion the establishment of those 33 Brigade Depôts had not secured 33 additional men for the Army. The increase in the number of recruits was owing to the fact that last year the trade of the country was a little depressed, and in all probability, if trade did not improve, the number of recruits obtained during the present year would be greater still. But was that a sound principle to go on, that the number of our recruits was to depend entirely upon the depression of trade? Dealing with the question of the Reserve, he would remind the Committee that in introducing his scheme, Lord Cardwell had declared that the system of Reserves he proposed would result at once in economy and efficiency, and in 1872 he stated that the Reserve, which was then 7,000, was to be raised to 10,000. But the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had told them that evening that after all the expenditure that had been incurred, and after three years' additional trial of the system, that our Reserve force consisted of 7,829 men only. With such a result as that, it was a dismal mockery to talk about our waiting to see what such a system would bring about in the course of time. He affirmed that that system was the most utter failure that had been known in modern days. With reference to the subject of conscription, he contended that it was utterly unnecessary to resort to such a means of filling our ranks. The fact was, that we were the most military nation in Europe, and there really was no difficulty in getting the men; it was the want of system in dealing with them that did the mischief. We obtained 50,000 recruits last year between the Militia and the Regulars, and therefore we were getting too many men, if the War Department knew how to keep them when they had got them. At the present moment they were getting 150 men a-day, and were losing them at the rate of 50 a-day—could anything be more absurd? In 1871 he had advocated the establishment of a Running Away Department in the War Office, and now the right hon. Gentleman might think it was worth while to establish such a branch in the War Office. Passing to the consideration of the quality of the recruits we were getting, he wished he could place 25 of the recruits who daily passed into the Army, as a sample for the Committee to look at, in Westminster Hall, and could station behind them 25 of the police, for the Committee to compare with them—a glance would be sufficient, because it would be evident to all that each policeman could catch up one of the recruits under each arm and could run with their burdens up to Charing Cross. The fact was, they were taking mere boys into the Army, when they might get men equal to the British police, who would become a Reserve on which they might rely in time of need. He could not take hon. Members to look at recruits in Westminster Hall, but he would refer them to the Report of the

Inspector General of Recruiting. With respect to the Infantry, the Inspector General said that the chief ground of objection was on the score of youth and want of physical strength; but he added that, under the influence of good feeding and regular habits, the lads would grow up into good soldiers. Still, he said, the complaint was a serious one. No doubt, it was, but as to regular habits they had acquired them—that was to say, they were regularly in the habit of running away. There could be no greater mistake than that of enlisting mere youths; for they were at the very outset put to the heaviest work that would be required of them, and that was one reason of their disappearing. With respect to the Engineers, the Inspector General pointed out the difficulty of obtaining artisans and mechanics to join, a difficulty which did not exist some years since, resulting in the fact that they were obliged to take men whom they would formerly have refused; and in reference to the Artillery, he said it was very hard to obtain men of sufficient stature and strength. The same Report admitted there could be but little doubt that the system of fraudulent enlistment was on the increase, and had become a regular trade among a certain class. It was, therefore, idle to speak of our recruiting being in a satisfactory state, for they were not getting the right class of men into the Army, and it was but poor statesmanship not to listen to the inexorable logic of facts. Of this, he was convinced, that the longer the re-organization of the Army upon sound principles was delayed, the more bitter would be the disappointment in the end. He therefore trusted that before long they would have an opportunity of discussing what was the cause of the present state of things, and what were the remedies to be applied. He was of opinion that both sides of the House were responsible for the existing condition of affairs; and he thought the more suggestions they could get, the better it would be for the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War if he were about to introduce a new scheme.

GENERAL SHUTE congratulated the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War on the moderation he had shown, for the conciliatory terms in which he had introduced these Estimates, and for stating that he proposed to give the scheme of his Predecessor a fair trial. The right hon. Gentleman's task had been a difficult one, owing to the chaos which prevailed, from the fact that a great deal had been pulled down, and very little had been built up. With respect to recruits he fully agreed with the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. J. Holms),* that if they were to have short service, they must not enlist boys. The thing was absurd. They must have men, not boys—they must have bone, not gristle. When they had long service, they could enlist boys, because there was always a proportion of old soldiers fit for the field; at the same time, he admitted there was little reason to find fault with their recruits in the Guards and Cavalry. With respect to the dépôt centre system, he felt satisfied that linked battalions never could answer, because recruits generally had a special inclination for one particular regiment, and in that only would they enlist; while, as regarded the service, more men enlisted with the object of going abroad than of staying at home, but all liked to know whether they were really enlisting to serve in the first instance at home or abroad, which this system rendered uncertain. As to pay, he was not for increasing the pay of the young soldier. Men were quite ready to begin on a little, if they had something to look forward to. He, however, would be inclined to double good-service pay, which would induce men to stay in the Army, making a portion of it Reserve pay. He also thought, in respect to non-commissioned officers, that lance-sergeants and lance-corporals ought to have additional pay, and that every three years a sergeant, if he was a good sergeant, should have some slight increase to his pay. Further, he would suggest that the men upon being enlisted should receive a thoroughly free ration, and upon going on furlough should be allowed ration money, full pay during their absence, and a warrant to convey them home and back again to their regiments. At present the men arrived among their families as paupers, and were obliged to be treated by their friends, and instead of being examples of the pecuniary and other advantages of the military service, they were peculiarly the reverse. He had now to speak of pensions, of which he was a great advocate, for he thought that every man who had ever been a soldier should have a pension of some sort or kind. And here he would say that the idea he was going to express was not his own, but was borrowed from the writer of one of the sixty-nine prize essays on Enlistment which, as one of the appointed judges, he had lately read. He would not have any man of 65 years who had served in the Army go without a pension, and he would make a reduction from that age according to the time the man had served. If he had served five years the pension should begin when he was 60 years of age; if he had served 10 years, it should commence when he was 55 years of age; for there was not anything which had a more discouraging effect upon enlistment in their villages and towns, than to see men who had served their country well and gallantly compelled in their old age to go into a poorhouse. There was in the Army a fault which was not generally known, but which, if not checked, would make itself known in a disagreeable way. There was in the Army a great deal of petty insubordination, which was not treated with the severity it deserved. With respect to desertion, he regretted it was a thing looked upon with sympathy by the population, because they looked upon it as only a military crime, whereas it was in reality a civil crime, and ought to be dealt with by civil, conjointly with military, tribunals. When a man deserted he committed a gross fraud on the taxpayers, and it was for that fraud he ought to be tried and punished. He would empower the police to bring a deserter before the magistrates in Petty Sessions, who should commit him for trial at the Assizes or Quarter Sessions. If that course were taken, there would be much less sympathy, and, though it was originally his own idea, he believed it was now so treated in America with good effect. There was another matter which he wished to see well considered. There were in the patronage of the public Departments about 100,000 minor appointments, and the Earl of Derby had stated last year at the United Service Institution, that there were only about 10,000 of them which required to be filled by men of special aptitude or education; all that was required to qualify a man for any of the others being habits of obedience and order. These situations he should like to see more frequently bestowed on discharged soldiers. Were he to move for a Return of the number of messengers employed in the Horse Guards and the War Office, and the number of gatekeepers to the Parks, with a statement of their antecedents, the House would be surprised to find how few of them had been soldiers. He was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman was about to do something for the non-commissioned officers, and therefore he would not take up the time of the House in speaking on that part of the question. With regard to the Cavalry, he was extremely sorry it had not been augmented. Every nation admitted that they could not extemporize Cavalry, and he should like to have seen our force augmented in order that it might be ready for service at any moment. There were nine regiments which, were he a sailor, he might call advanced regiments, and these could not turn out more than 340 horses. There were 10 other regiments, and they could only turn out from 270 to 280 horses each. If each of nine regiments first for service had added to it every available man and horse of one of the 10 weaker regiments, it would only then just be made up to a sufficient strength to embark for war service. He would also suggest that every Cavalry regiment should have a reserve troop for the recruits and young horses. The drill sergeants should also be attached to the troop, from which all the service troops should receive their formed men and horses. Everything about a Cavalry regiment should be organized in peace as it would be in war, and he believed that the reserve troop could be formed at a small expense. He was sorry it should go forth to the country that there was the least difficulty in non-commissioned officers and soldiers exchanging into different regiments; but, as a rule, transfers only, which were frequent, were necessary, as regiments were seldom complete in men. Having been challenged to produce such cases, he could say that he had known of several exchanges which had been effected with the consent of the commanding officers of the two regiments, and he now held in his hand a memorandum lately given him by a captain late of the King's Dragoon Guards, of two exchanges which had taken place between men of that regiment and two of the 12th Lancers,

£5 having in one of these instances been paid for the exchange. In some respects the non-commissioned officers and men were more favoured than the officers. The former were not sent to India until they were 20 years of age, while he (General Shute) was unexpectedly sent out at 19. They were never sent to India after 18 years' service, while he was sent out after 24 years' service, at the shortest possible notice.

Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN desired to offer a few words on the subject of recruiting and desertion. The air had been full of sinister rumours on the matter for some time past; but he thought the Committee would consider that the opinion expressed by the Inspector General of Recruiting was sufficient to put aside the most virulent of those rumours. It must be remembered that the Inspector General of Recruiting was an exceedingly responsible officer, and he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) could express no sympathy with those officers in the Army, or those persons outside of it, who ventured to insinuate that the Inspector General cooked his Report to suit the views of the heads of the War Office. The present holder of the office of Inspector General was appointed to that office when he was very slightly, if at all, known to the late Secretary of State for War, and nothing was certainly known of his views on vexed questions connected with the Army. All that was known was, that he was not a political partizan of the late Government. He could not, therefore, be accused of partiality; and, in the two Reports he had furnished to the House, he had given, on the whole, a satisfactory account, not only of the numbers, but of the quality of the recruits who had joined the Army. The House ought not lightly to set aside views so expressed. But they had now the means of checking any statements that were made as to the character of the Army. The new "General Annual Return" of the Army, which he held in his hand, afforded them the means of comparing the condition of the Army with what it was as far back as 1861. Now, the first thing he would venture to point to in this Return had already been alluded to; but it was so important that he thought it right again to call attention to it—he meant the number of desertions. In 1861 the proportion of desertions to recruits was

41 per cent. In 1862 it fell to 32 per cent, and a gradual diminution then took place until 1870, when the percentage was 12. During the last two years, indeed, it had risen to be 33. But this was still much lower than the proportion in 1861, and, as had been already pointed out in the discussions on this subject, not only were wages very high in the country during those two years—a fact which of itself would go far to account for an increase in the rate of desertions—but our experience showed that when there was a sudden increase of the Army and large numbers joined it, there followed, after an interval, a corresponding increase in desertions. Now there had been such an influx in 1870, and it was followed by an efflux in 1872-3. Allowing for this, the figures compared well with 1861. Again, the number of courts-martial had greatly decreased. In 1865 they were at the rate of 109 per 1,000 men; in 1868, 144 per 1,000; while in 1871, 1872, and 1873 they were respectively 81, 78, and 76, and this, let it be remarked, notwithstanding the abolition of flogging. There was also a steady increase in the number of good conduct badges, and a marked educational improvement. All these facts showed that the character of the men who entered the Army was nothing like so bad as it was represented to be—that, indeed, it was good—and that the "boys"—or "children," as they had been called to-night—who joined as recruits turned into steady and respectable men. As regarded numbers, his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Holmes) had referred to figures given by Mr. Vivian some years ago, when he estimated that 32,000 recruits would be required annually when short service came into operation. But at that time Mr. Vivian contemplated short service being carried out to an extent that had not yet taken place, and it must be obvious to the Committee that the number of recruits required would increase or diminish according as they made the period of service with the colours shorter or longer. His hon. Friend had alluded to another fact in a way which required explanation. He said that owing to the number of deserters and the difficulty of recruiting, the establishment had been allowed to drop gradually, with a view to cover the deficiency, and he implied that this had been done surreptitiously, and, as it were, behind the back of Parliament. The establishment of the Army had indeed been reduced, but not in the way suggested. It was done openly. The late Secretary of State, when moving the Estimates in 1873, stated to the House that, since the addition of 20,000 men during the German War in 1870—

“The British Establishment proper had been reduced by 8,989 men, the Colonial Establishment by 1,102, and that two Madras Regiments which were at that time voted on our Estimates, . . . numbering 1,760 men, have since been returned to India.”—[3 Hansard, ccxiv. 858.]

Similarly, every other change that had occurred in the establishment had been made with the full knowledge of Parliament. But in discussing the present state of things, they must not forget that it was a state of change; and when they made a change of system they could not help one system over-lapping the other, so that they had many of the disadvantages of both, without the full advantage of either; and due weight ought to be given to that consideration. The hon. Gentleman complained of the smallness of the Army Reserve, notwithstanding as he said, the expenditure of £3,500,000. But all the money was not yet expended, the machinery for recruiting was not yet fully set up, and they must wait until the first term of short service had expired before the Reserve could begin to assume its proper dimensions. Until that time, the Department having no power to transfer men to the Reserve against their will, the force consisted merely of those who had volunteered to enter it. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. G. Hardy) had taunted the late Secretary for War (Lord Cardwell) with having failed to produce a scheme of promotion and retirement for the Army. Now it was impossible, he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) might almost say, for anyone to have worked out a proper scheme of promotion as long as Purchase affected the retirement of officers, and even now he considered that it would be a question of the greatest difficulty to deal with—the right hon. Gentleman or the Royal Commission would find it a most delicate problem to adjust promotion, so that the rate in the various branches of the service should be, from year to year, tolerably equal. He would be glad to see how, with the imperfect data which alone could now be obtained, the question could be settled. The right hon. Gentleman had announced that he had put an end to the obnoxious name of Control, and he was very glad to hear it. The late Sir Henry Storks, whose name was much associated with the Control department, when a Member of that House, said he disliked the title; but the Control department was no work of the late Government; it was instituted by Lord Hampton under the Government of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the Brigade Depôts, and of what he would do, if he found the present state of things did not work satisfactorily. That, he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) thought, implied that they did not work well; but when the right hon. Gentleman came into power, only a small sum of money had been expended upon them, and, therefore, it would have been better for him to have held his hand, if he had contemplated altering the system, until he had reconsidered the matter. But the localization scheme was very carefully elaborated, before it was adopted, by a most able Committee, comprising, among others, General MacDougall, one of the first theoretical soldiers, and Sir Garnet Wolseley, one of the first practical soldiers of the day; it was their opinions that were acted upon, and he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would not without very good reason infringe upon it. As regarded the Medical department, it had come, some time ago, to an absolute block, and it had been necessary to do something. A Committee reported in favour of the staff system as against the regimental, and he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would give every weight to their reasons. He approved of the grant to the Intelligence department, and he presumed that the survey of England, of which the right hon. Gentleman spoke, was of the nature of a continuation of the survey of the South of England which had been for some years conducted by the Royal Engineers. He was also glad to see in the Estimates the item with regard to the Crimean graveyards. It was approved of last year; but there was some question when the late Government were leaving office, as to whether it should be a civil or military charge, and, in consequence, it dropped out of the Estimates. He was disappointed that the Report of the Committee, which the right hon.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

Gentleman said he had appointed on Recruiting had not been laid on the Table before the Estimates were discussed, because it would have thrown much-needed light on the subject. He approved increasing the pay of non-commissioned officers, as they were, perhaps, the most important elements in the whole military force, and it was most important that they should be well treated and thoroughly contented; but it was to be hoped that they would not, from what had been said, form too exalted ideas of what they were to expect. He also agreed, in the main, with the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman for an increased scale of retirement for adjutants. With regard to what fallen from his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander), he did not last year find any fault with the Guards on account of their Stock Purse Fund; he only pointed out that it was managed by themselves, and he still thought that if the public once apprehended the fact that the Guards had a fund of their own, that they managed their own hospital arrangements and their own recruiting, and that the accounts received no regular audit, it would be impossible to maintain that system very long. He did not say there was any pecuniary loss to the country by the arrangement, which was being inquired into when the late Ministry left office. At all events, it was not the fault of the general recruiting system if good recruits were not got for the Guards, because the Guards obtained recruits for themselves; and he would venture to suggest that they might, perhaps, get a better class of men, if they were relieved of the irksome duty of watching public buildings, which could be much better watched by the police. The "free shilling," to which allusion had been made was not intended to be a shilling exclusive of all deductions, but a "round shilling," from which certain deductions were continued. He hoped the discussion would re-assure the public mind that there had been great exaggeration as to the condition of recruiting, and that the subject was not regarded with indifference by those who were responsible for the Army.

COLONEL EGERTON LEIGH said, their great object should be to get rid of rascals who were making money by enlisting, deserting, and re-enlisting.

That might be done by returning to the system of marking them—say, under the arm, or some place where, though unobserved by the public, it would be detected when they presented themselves after re-enlistment for examination by the doctor. He would suggest they should be marked by cupping, which was comparatively painless; and from personal experience he could say it would not hurt a baby, but was everlasting in its results, and which could not be tampered with, as branding with the letter "D" used to be, by adding "aniel," and "avid," and thus producing names in which many deserters tried to re-enlist without detection, but an army surgeon would be always suspicious if he found any mark or scar, and reject the recruit.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK complimented the Secretary for War on the better arrangement of the tables in the Estimates, and the introduction of some new ones, and the honesty and frankness with which he avowed that he continued many operations on the lines laid down by his Predecessor. He wished to point out the difference between the state of the Army in 1870, when Lord Cardwell's reforms began, and in 1874, when Lord Cardwell was removed to another sphere. When Lord Cardwell took in hand the subject of our Reserves they numbered only from 4,000 to 5,000; they were now 35,000 at the least; and of them 30,000 were fit to be put into the ranks to-morrow. In 1870 our field Artillery numbered only 180 guns. When Lord Cardwell left the War Office it numbered 360 fit to go into the field. In 1870 our troops were scattered all over the world, but now we had 70 battalions at home. In Australia and Canada the policy of Lord Cardwell with reference to the military defence of our Colonies by the Colonies themselves had achieved great success. In fact, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War had admitted that the system which Lord Cardwell had initiated was successful almost in a greater degree than he could have anticipated. But what was the condition now with regard to our Infantry? He did not wish to disparage unduly the state of the Army, nor to throw a slur upon ruby-coloured Report which had been made on the recruiting service; but those who were acquainted with the condition of soldiers in this and in other countries must be aware that the securities we were resting on were merely a delusion, full 20 per cent of our Infantry troops not being fit for service. He had asked many officers of experience whether the men they were now getting were equal to those 20 years ago, and his reply was—"Nothing like them; they could not carry their arms, accoutrements, and knapsacks on the march, and we should have to leave many of them behind." It was a pity they had not before them the Report of the Recruiting Committee alluded to the other night, and also the Returns he had asked for, but which the right hon. Gentleman refused on, to him, the incomprehensible ground that they were Departmental or confidential. He wished the country to understand its real position, before they were awakened to it by some grave disaster. The failure of the attack on the Redan on the 8th September, 1855, was due to the fact that the ranks had been allowed to become so depleted that it was necessary to replenish them with young men of immature age, who, though they possessed the courage of their race, were not equal in physique to the service on which they were sent. He had accompanied the German Army on many of its marches in the War of 1870, and particularly on that march—the most disastrous to the French—which terminated in the capitulation of Sedan. The French Army had the start of the Germans by 72 hours; yet the Germans by superior marching were able to outstrip them, shut them in, and eventually force them to capitulate. This country had not fallen in physique. In every street and at every railway station we saw the men whom we wanted, but had not in our Army. The rise in the price of labour prevented us from getting them. It was supposed that a soldier was to get 1s. a-day clear, but he got only 8½d. clear. It would be a wise expenditure to give him 1s. a-day clear. Many penal remedies had been suggested to put an end to desertion. He (Sir Henry Havelock) believed the simple means of allowing 1s. a-day clear to a soldier, and putting 3d. of that into the bank for him at 3½ per cent interest, would attach him to the Army and cause desertion almost entirely to cease. In the Reserve a man received only 4d. a-day, and many persons would not employ men who were in the Reserve. He would suggest that the pay should be increased to 8d. a-day. The charge would not be very great, and 2d. a-day might be put into the bank to the credit of each man, who would receive the accumulated amount when he returned to civil life. With respect to the Cavalry, which was deplorably deficient in numbers, and had no Reserve of horses, he suggested that we ought to adopt the system which had proved so effective in the armies of the Continent, where each regiment had in time of peace a fifth or dépôt squadron, available for increasing the fighting force in time of war, and keeping up a constant source of supply. He hated conscription as much as anyone, but he believed we were gradually tending to a system of more general training, which was not conscription, and which would give us much better results. One of the defects of our system was, that we had three branches of the service which were all more or less in competition with each other. He should like to see that competition stopped, and it was only a matter of organization. We were gradually coming to an emergency which, with our present means, we should not be able to cope with; and sooner or later we must adopt some modified form, not of universal service, but of universal training to arms in this country, a system which he believed would be popular, because it was really the only means by which we could ever be enabled to reduce our standing Army and our Army Estimates. It was a thing totally distinct from conscription, and the sooner we began to look it in the face the better. It was true we were at present in a state of profound peace; but, without desiring to create any alarm, he could not shut his eyes to the growing armaments of at last one great power—Russia—with which there was a possibility of our coming into collision. When her present organizations were completed, she would be able to put 2,000,000 men into the field, and her railway facilities had multiplied almost indefinitely since the Crimean War. He was not an alarmist; but as the boundary line between Russia and our territories in India was conterminous, that fact should be kept in mind. He trusted that what the Secretary of State for War had said about Brigade Dépôts was not to be taken as an indication that he in any degree proposed to interfere with the existing system in that respect, believing, as he (Sir Henry Havelock) did, that these Brigade Depôts afforded the best machinery we could have for bringing the Army, the Militia, and the Volunteers into closer union. In conclusion, he declared that while he was an advocate for the principle of arbitration, not from fear, but from a thorough love of the principle, he held it to be highly necessary that our military force should be complete in, at least, its organization, and thus in the power of largely increasing its numbers in case of necessity.

COLONEL MURE said, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just spoken had said that the cause of their failure in getting recruits was because of the labour market, and not Army organization. It seemed to him (Colonel Mure) that it was efficient organization which was required to cope with the labour market, and the object they ought to have in view was an organization suited to voluntary enlistment in a commercial country. A commercial country was always liable to the labour market being high or low, and if they had a defective organization they could not cope with it. Now, although the existing organization was devised by the Party to which he belonged, he had no hesitation in saying that it was defective, and that it was breaking down every day. He gave the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the War Department every credit for the earnestness with which he had applied himself to the duties of his office; but, as the present Government had only been in office for one year, he thought it would be extremely impolitic if they were too suddenly to upset a system, although it might be defective, unless it could be clearly shown to be injurious. If there was any hon. Gentleman in that House who looked upon the officers of the British Army with respect and esteem, it was himself, and it was with the greatest pain that he found that sometimes they were spoken of in sneering terms in the course of debates in that House. ["No, no!"] It had invariably been the case, as far as his experience went, when officers' grievances were under consideration. It was, therefore, with pleasure that he had heard his hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr.

Trevelyan), in a generous spirit, the other night withdraw certain expressions regarding the affairs of the Army which he had used in the heat of debate. But he could not help observing that those officers who were within the pale of selection were afraid to speak out their real opinions with reference to the Infantry of the Line for fear of the consequences. Moreover, from force of habit, officers, particularly those who never had seen German troops, had not perceived the gradual deterioration, and had accustomed themselves to a lower standard of soldier—like a young man who, in early life married a young and beautiful bride, as time passed, did not remark that she was gradually changing. His friends remarked that she became older, and was losing her beauty, but he remained perfectly satisfied, and, perhaps, laid her in the grave, or parted with her on his death-bed, still honestly thinking she was the beautiful girl of 18 he married 50 years ago. So the officers did not like to acknowledge that the recruits were worse than formerly. They did not like to speak out from an esprit de corps; but also—and this was a grave and sad fact—because they were apprehensive that if their statements came to the ears of the Commander-in-Chief, their prospects might be injuriously affected. He had put the question to four different officers of high standing whether it was not really the case that they were afraid to speak frankly for fear of incurring displeasure, and, as it was called, being blackballed at the Horse Guards or War Office, and the answer had been uniformly in the affirmative. He had, moreover, received letters from about a dozen officers, five commanding battalions, and the remainder officers of high reputation and character, actually in the service, all of whom spoke in melancholy terms of the Infantry. One stated that the recruits were all boys calling themselves 18, but in reality under 16. The next described the physical and moral qualities of the recruits as being of a low standard, while a third letter stated that they were enlisted from the lower strata of the population, and that when a recruit first joined the service he was unable to handle his rifle from sheer weakness. The writer of another letter pointed out that while formerly they recruited strong hard-drinking fellows, now they got nothing but feeble hard-drinking lads.

Another officer of the highest distinction gave it as his opinion that one-third of the present recruits would never be fit for soldiers, while a fifth said they were of very inferior quality compared with the Prussian soldier. What they should remember was that they would not always be called on to fight the Ashantees or Abyssinians. The fact was, while the armies of other European countries were improving in physique we were deteriorating, and yet it was by other European armies that we ought to fix our standard. Formerly, when he was in the Army, they recruited principally from the agricultural classes, and especially from the agricultural classes in Ireland. The recruits were often half starved and badly clothed; but they came of honest fathers and virtuous mothers. They had been brought up in fresh air, and they made excellent soldiers. They did not obtain the same class of men in the Army now. They obtained the scum of our large cities, sons of infirm parents—youths brought up in the haunts of vice and crime, who had breathed foul air from the cradle, and who were morally and physically inferior to those obtained from the agricultural districts. The House might recollect the description of the "Casual," in The Pall Mall Gazette some years ago. The hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Havelock) recollected what an Army went out from this country to the Crimea! It was drawn from the labouring population, and not from the sweepings of the towns. But by degrees, after the Alma and Inkerman and the work of the trenches, that generation passed away and was replaced by hastily recruited boys from the lowest haunts of disease and vice of our cities. The hon. Baronet might remember the 8th of September, that miserable day, when the same Divisions, but with the men changed, were ordered to attack the Redan. The officers behaved as British officers always did and always would do. The non-commissioned officers and a few of the old privates, who had survived their comrades, went forward with their officers into the traverses of the Redan. The miserable recruits, they also darted forward and ran to the parapet of the Redan, but there they lay down four deep in the trenches, firing wildly in the air, and at last were stamped to death by the more mature Infantry of an inferior race. He appealed to the hon. Baronet below him whether, since the Crimean War, there had not been a deterioration in our Army; and, also, whether in the Indian Mutiny the regiments which had suffered much in the Crimea, and had been hastily recruited with youths, chiefly from our crowded towns, had shown the same endurance and vigour which were the ordinary characteristics of mature British soldiers. His hon. Friend knew that they had not. Now, we might have a good Artillery and a good Cavalry, but if we had not an Infantry upon which we could depend, we might as well save the money which the country was now spending on them. The right hon. Gentleman himself had admitted that a considerable proportion of the recruits were inferior lads, and it had been proposed by the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) to strike 20,000 men off the list. He (Colonel Mure) thought that this might be done with advantage, if they went over the various regiments and dismissed those who were so inferior in physique as to make it improbable that they would ever be good soldiers. A vast number were perfectly useless, and it would strengthen instead of weaken the Army to cut them off. By stereotyping the numbers of our Army we were in reality preserving useless creatures, who would cost the country an immense sum of money, because on service, numbers of men would break down in the line of march; numbers would fill our hospitals; and a considerable number of good soldiers would be required to look after them. The reason why Lord Cardwell's scheme had broken down was, that it assumed we should get recruits of 18, whereas they were between 16 and 17—even under 16. They were kept two years, and then, believing them to be 20, we sent them to India, contrary to the opinion and advice of our medical men. Our recruiting system was abominable—a positive cruelty. The recruit was a wretched lad, between 16 and 17, who enlisted because he was starving; the recruiting sergeant whispered—"Say you are 18," and got his bonus, and by the time the recruit was 18 or 19 he was sent off to India. Major General Taylor was a most honourable man, but his Report on Recruiting was most illogical. It was founded on honest evidence, but being himself both judge and jury, he had decided wrongly, and had drawn the wrong conclusion, and brought in a verdict contrary to the evidence. The Report had been quoted as most satisfactory and encouraging; but it was, in fact, the most unsatisfactory Report which had been drawn up for the last six years. Speaking of the Brigade of Guards the Report stated that the class of recruits recently obtained was satisfactory; but it was afterwards admitted that they were scarcely of the proper stature and very deficient in numbers. What did the word "satisfactory" mean? The recruits for the Royal Artillery were also described as fairly good; but it was admitted that they were scarcely sufficient in physical development for the duties they had to perform, and this the Major General called "fairly good!" Then as to the Infantry of the Line, it was said in a large majority of regiments the quality was satisfactory; but the Report went on to say a small proportion were very good, but, in many instances, complaint was made that they were far from satisfactory. Was that satisfactory? It was strange that, in the face of such a Report, the right hon. Gentleman came to the conclusion that recruiting was going on satisfactorily. There was a gross deception in the system of chest measurement, and the test of vision had been reduced. It was usual to measure the chest below the scapulæ or shoulder blades; but in the Army it was now the practice to ask recruits to hold up their arms, to pass the tape close under the arm-pit, and then to lower the arms and measure the chest, with the tape passing over the shoulder blades. That method was most deceptive, as most recruits—and, particularly, weak youths—had prominent scapulæ, and between the scapulæ there was a deep hollow, analogous to the "kick" of a champagne bottle. That was no test of the power of heart and lungs, nor was it the original intention; it had gradually crept in, in order to meet the difficulties of obtaining recruits. In this way an advantage was sometimes given to a weedy man, who came out with a magnificent chest, whereas, if he were measured properly, he would have none at all. Formerly the sight of recruits used to be tested at a distance of 15 paces, but two or three years ago the distance was reduced to 10 paces. If we had to fight foreign nations, let us recognize our foe; let us not go by numbers only; for if we did we should incur expense and disaster. Much had been said of officers' grievances; but what grievance could be greater than that of leading lads recruited from the slums of our towns, who would succumb to fatigue on the march, and require the help of their stronger comrades? How disappointing it would be to find that they were not able to advance when the time for action arrived, or that they would not follow when their officers were ready to lead them on.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he would assure the hon. and gallant Member, that if some of the statements he had made were correct, they were contrary to information received at the War Office; but he should consider it his duty to institute a careful inquiry, particularly as to what had been said about chest measurement and the testing of vision. [Colonel MURK hoped no inquiry would be made as to who his informants were.] What he proposed to inquire was, whether there was any ground for representing the physique of the Army as of such a low standard. It would indeed be a very serious thing if the examinations of vision and measurement were of so superficial a character as had been represented. But when the hon. and gallant Colonel told the Committee of the wretched and miserable class of recruits that were obtained, he would ask him to settle some of his accounts with the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Henry Havelock) below him, who had come forward with a eulogy upon Lord Cardwell, who he (Mr. G. Hardy) wished most emphatically to observe had not been attacked by him. The hon. and gallant Baronet had complained that some one had spoken of skeleton regiments, but he himself had indulged to his heart's content in the same line of remark, for he stated that 20 per cent of them were at the present moment a delusion. The hon. and gallant Baronet also expressed himself as very much opposed to conscription; but when he proposed that every man when he reached the age of 21 should be balloted for and serve four years in the Militia, he was advocating what the country would scarcely, he thought, be disposed to look upon as voluntary service.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked whether he might be allowed to explain?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Baronet was in Order if he thought that anything he had said had been misrepresented; otherwise, it would perhaps be more convenient to follow the usual course, and defer his explanations until the right hon. Gentleman had concluded.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he was very far from wishing to misrepresent the hon. Baronet; but the words in his letter were to the effect that every Englishman, without exception of caste, should be liable to the ballot at 21 years of age. He thought that was hardly misrepresentation. Much, he might add, had been said in the course of the discussion as to the inferiority of our recruits, especially by the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down, but no one had pointed out how a better class of men were to be obtained. He had heard, too, a proposition made which he thought would frighten his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with respect to the increase of the rations of the soldier which would add £500,000 to the Estimates if it were acted upon. But it should be borne in mind that the Army Estimates were already very large, and that it was his duty to keep as far as possible within those Estimates, although he, at the same time, should, if he found they were not large enough to make the Army efficient, have no hesitation in coming down to ask the House to vote such sums as would enable him to effect that object. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had further said it was a sin and a shame to send thousands of our troops to be destroyed in India, but he found that the rate of mortality was only 13 per 1,000, which was really a low rate considering the climate. The Medical department reported that there was no greater influx into the hospitals than there was in former days, and if those men were so wholly unfit for service as had been represented, surely the hospitals would be full and the deaths much more numerous. The hon. and gallant Gentleman said we used to have so many Irish recruits. The great reduction of the population, and the better condition and payment of the working classes in Ireland had tended to deprive us of them in the Army. Did they suppose when those men were more prosperous that they could tempt them away from their country as easily as when they were starving? And in England they must have regard to the change of circumstances. There was a gradual migration of the population from the country to the towns. Therefore, in regard to England, it was a serious question whether many of the depôts were placed in the right locality for recruiting purposes. In one case some of the worst specimens of recruits that he saw, all came from a particular Brigade Depôt, and he was informed that in character also they were by no means good. But in many of the recruiting places the recruits were unexceptionable. When he visited Aldershot his sole object was to get at the facts, and he believed that the officers had really told him the facts. They had only received warning the day before, and no preparation was made. He spoke freely to the officers, and there was no check upon conversation. His only object was to get at the facts, and he should certainly not have thought ill of any officer who gave him any representation he thought it his duty to make. Although some expressed regret that the men were not better, the great majority said that while the men were weakly at first, they became strong in five months or a year, or, at the outside, two years. He was not there to gild deformities, and he had told the accurate truth with regard to the Army. He did not admit the figures of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms) with respect to desertions. The desertions for 1874 were given at 5,572, but if the hon. Member would look further he would see that 2,052 joined from desertion, so that the amount was much reduced. [Mr. J. HOLMS: Does not the 2,052 refer to the previous year's desertions?] It might include some; but he was showing that a certain number came back, and those who joined from desertion went on the strength of the Army. The hon. Member further said they wanted nothing but common sense and organization. He could not help thinking of a noble Lord who spoke from a hustings near Reading, and as he was getting on rather badly, some one in the crowd called out—"Why don't you do it better?" He said—"I wish you would come up here and try yourself!" They had every desire to bring the Army into a perfect and efficient state, but he hoped the hon. Gentleman would show them a little more consideration, and allow them time to think over the statements which had been made and to make inquiry. In conclusion, he hoped the Committee would allow the Vote to pass.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £4,543,000, Pay and Allowances, &c. of Land Forces.

CAPTAIN NOLAN complained that although when the Staff College was established it was the intention to require, as a general rule, that officers appointed to the Staff should have gone through a special training, yet, as a matter of fact, that qualification was insisted upon with reference to only about a sixth of the officers.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY replied that it had never been intended to appoint none but officers who had passed through the Staff College. The importance of that qualification, however, was fully recognized, and, in point of fact, a considerable number of the appointments was reserved exclusively for these officers. They had at the same time an equal chance with other officers of obtaining the appointments not so reserved.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, that the system aimed at was an examination of Staff officers of the nature of a University examination, which should be the threshold to Staff appointment, without being exclusively connected with the Staff College. He hoped that the Secretary of State would inquire into the matter referred to by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway, as he thought there was a mistake in the present regulations.

Vote agreed to.

BOSTON ELECTION.

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, as followeth:—

"Most Gracious Sovereign,

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave humbly to represent to Your Majesty that Sir William Robert Grove, knight, one of the Justices of the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, and one of the Judges selected for the trial of Election Petitions, pursuant to "The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868," has reported to the House of Commons that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the last Election for the Borough of Boston:

"We therefore humbly pray Your Majesty, that Your Majesty will be graciously pleased to cause inquiry to be made, pursuant to the provisions of the Act of Parliament passed in the sixteenth year of the reign of Your Majesty, intituled, "An Act to provide for more effectual inquiry into the existence of Corrupt Practices at Elections for Members to serve in Parliament," by the appointment of Aeneas John McIntyre, esquire, one of Her Majesty's Counsel, Wyndham Slade, esquire, barrister at law, and Douglas Straight, esquire, barrister at law, as Commissioners, for the purpose of making inquiry into the existence of such corrupt practices."

Ordered, That the said Address be communicated to The Lords, and their concurrence desired thereto.—(Mr. Attorney General.)

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock.

INCREASE OF THE EPISCOPATE BILL.

(The Lord Lyttelton.)

(NOS. 8-35.) COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee."—(The Lord Lyttelton.)

LORD HOUGHTON rose to move an Amendment that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee. The noble Lord (who was very imperfectly heard) was understood to express his regret that he should feel bound to take this course with a Bill brought in by his noble Friend (Lord Lyttelton) who paid so much attention to the subject, and who combined so much industry with the highest possible knowledge. If he could see his way to avoiding the course which he now proposed he would gladly do so; but he did not see that it was at all possible that the Bill could be so amended in Committee of the Whole House as to be made a workable measure, and therefore the best course was to refer it to a Select Committee, where the objections he had to its details could be better considered. The first objection he had to the measure was that, as an Act of Parliament, it was permissive only; whether or not it would ever be put into operation at all would depend on the will of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; but he was not aware that those distinguished Gentlemen had expressed any desire to put such a Bill into operation, and there was nothing to indicate how it could be put into action should the Commissioners decline to do so. It was to be left to their choice whether the Bill should ever be put in force in any single case. There was no way of bringing public opinion to bear on the Commission. Even where it was manifestly the desire of a district to obtain a Bishop, he did not see any way in which the Commission could be compelled to give effect to that wish; for, at best, any pressure which might be brought to bear on that body would be very indirect and inadequate. He believed that to be a fundamental objection to the Bill; and that giving power to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to grant or withhold an increase to the Episcopate at their discretion was a course which would never receive the approbation of their Lordships. His next objection was that there would be a risk that the Bishops appointed under this Bill would not be either financially or socially of equal status with the existing Bishops. There was no minimum of remuneration named in the Bill, and therefore there would be the danger of an acceptance of inadequate remuneration by persons who might desire the appointment. He thought, therefore, that the Bill ought to make an endowment to a certain amount obligatory in every case before the scheme for the formation of the new Bishopric could receive the sanction of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; and his own opinion was, that the amount to be provided ought to be such as would give the new Bishop a remuneration equal to what was the revenue of the present Members of the right rev. Bench. He must express his opinion that a sufficient case had not been made out for such a measure as this, because we knew from the precedent afforded by the See of Manchester that new Sees could be created now.

Lord Houghton

Again, he held that you might make as many new Bishops as you pleased, and still the numbers would be insufficient if the right rev. Prelates continued to discharge a large amount of duty which could be performed by persons in an inferior ecclesiastical position. He remembered asking the private secretary of a most esteemed Prelate how it was that the Bishop managed to get on so well; and the reason given was, that the Bishop directed his secretary never to let him see any letter that the secretary could answer himself, and to let no business be referred to him that could be disposed of otherwise. The truth was, that the Bishops had undertaken too much, and but for this fact there would be no necessity for the present Bill. He hoped that the Bill would be referred to a Select Committee, where the difficulties connected with it could, if not overcome, be considerably mitigated, so that their Lordships might not sanction the passing of a Bill which would not tend to the satisfaction of their Lordships or to the good of the Church.

An Amendment moved, to leave out from the word ("that") to the end of the Motion, and insert ("the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.")—(The Lord Houghton.)

LORD LYTTTELTON said, he had never before known a Motion for referring a Bill to a Select Committee, unless an intimation of such Motion had been made on or before the second reading. His noble Friend's (Lord Houghton's) arguments could scarcely have been used in earnest. He had commenced by asking—"Who is to put the Bill in motion?" Anyone might put it in motion. The parties who were willing to subscribe money for the endowment of a new Bishopric had only to bring their scheme to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and ask for their sanction. The Bill was not one for increasing the Episcopate, but for enabling persons who wished to increase it, to do so on certain conditions. Those who desired to see a new Bishopric established, and were able to provide funds, would go to the Commissioners and express their wish; and the duty of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would be to prepare schemes, and there was not the slightest reason to doubt that they would discharge that duty. His noble Friend said there were no means of bringing public opinion to bear upon them. But every one of them was friendly to the general purpose of the Bill. As to the status of the Bishops, if his noble Friend had given attention to what passed in their Lordships' House on the second reading of this Bill, he would have known that he (Lord Lyttelton) stood on the same ground with him in that respect. He stated in the debate on the second reading, that he was anxious that there should be no difference whatever between the status of the new Bishops and that of the existing ones; but the latter right rev. Prelates had not all exactly the same income, and as the income which would be sufficient in one place might not be so in another, he proposed to leave that matter to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. As to what his noble Friend had said about the See of Manchester, that was inapplicable to its present position; he knew that if public funds were available for the purpose, new Bishoprics might be created without such a Bill as this; but that was not now in question. He wholly differed from his noble Friend's last argument. If his noble Friend's opinion was that a Bishop should only be a judicial functionary, and that they had undertaken too much in the way they now discharged their duties, he should be much surprised if one other Member of their Lordships' House agreed with him in that view. He trusted their Lordships would not give their assent to his noble Friend's Amendment.

LORD HOUGHTON said that, as he found he was wrong in matter of form, he would not press his Amendment.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND observed that, though the custom was as the noble Lord (Lord Lyttelton) had stated it, the noble Lord (Lord Houghton) was quite in Order. It was quite competent to the noble Lord to move his Amendment, but he had certainly taken an unusual course.

LORD HOUGHTON said, he did not think it right to press the Amendment.

On Question, Whether the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Motion?

Resolved in the Affirmative.

Then the original Motion agreed to; House in Committee accordingly.

VOL. CCXXII. [THIRD SERIES.]

Clauses 1 to 9, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 10 (No endowment from funds of Commissioners).

LORD HOUGHTON objected to the prohibition. He could not see why the funds taken from overpaid Bishoprics should not be applied to the endowment of Bishoprics which were required; but to absolutely forbid the Commissioners to so apply them appeared to him to be monstrous.

LORD LYTTELTON said, he had here again to observe, that if his noble Friend had made himself acquainted with what took place on the second reading he would have known that he (Lord Lyttelton) quite agreed with him as to the propriety of applying the "common fund" to the endowment of Bishoprics; but when his noble Friend asked why the prohibitive clause appeared in the Bill, he must refer him to a noble Earl near him (the Earl of Shaftesbury) who would be able to answer the question.

Clause agreed to.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER rose to move the following clause, to follow Clause 10:—

"It shall be lawful for the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, if they think fit, in any scheme for the formation of a new bishopric under this Act, to attach to the bishopric thus formed:

1. Such portion of the income of any bishopric diminished by the formation of the said new bishopric as shall not reduce the said income below the sum of £4,200 per annum;
2. Any living in the new diocese which may have been hitherto in the gift of the bishop whose bishopric has been thus diminished, such living to be held by the bishop of the new diocese from the date of the next avoidance of the said living;
3. The income of any canonry in the cathedral church of the bishopric thus diminished which may be in the gift of the bishop of the said cathedral church, such income to be thus transferred from the date of the next avoidance of the said canonry, and the canonry to be then suspended."

His reasons for moving that clause was that he feared the diocese of Exeter, which required division more than perhaps any other, would not be provided for under the Bill as it stood. It was not at all likely that the necessary endowments for a new bishopric could be raised in Cornwall, and therefore he was anxious that funds should be provided by other modes. He named £4,200, not because that sum had any abstract fitness, but because it was the amount now appropriated to the Bishops of Manchester and Hereford, and was the minimum now received by any Bishop of the English Church. As to the subsection for allowing the new Bishop to hold a living, the intention was that the Bishop should reside in the living, and with the assistance of his chaplains, acting as curates, discharge its duties. Lastly, as to the stall in the cathedral church, there were five canonries in the cathedral of Exeter, and if it were divided it would be only reasonable that the part cut off should have a portion of the cathedral revenues. He had consulted his Chapter on this point, and though they did not think it was the best plan of providing for a bishopric, he was authorized to say they assented to the proposition. It would diminish their number from five to four, and consequently impose heavier cathedral duties on the latter. He would not propose this plan, only the need was so great. He did not think it would be easy to convey to their Lordships an adequate sense of the necessity of a division of the Diocese of Exeter—the work of the diocese was now so heavy that it could not be well done. But the difficulty of providing the necessary funds would be very great, and unless some means of providing for the new See such as those he had indicated could be found, the Bill would never be applicable to the district.

Moved to insert new Clause after Clause 10.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he thought the Diocese of Exeter would be a suitable one for the experiment; but he objected to the specific sum it was proposed to introduce. He would remind their Lordships that when a Bill the same in principle as the one now before their Lordships was referred to a Select Committee, that Committee recommended that in the Bill itself no sum should be fixed as the income of the Bishop. He would, therefore, suggest to his right rev. Brother to omit the words "the sum of £4,200," and substitute the words "such sum as the Ecclesiastical Commissioners may think fit."

THE BISHOP OF EXETER said, he had no objection to adopt the suggestion.

The Bishop of Exeter

LORD LYTTLETON thought the second item in the clause proposed by the right rev. Prelate open to serious objection—it was a return to the old abuse of holding benefices in commendam—when a man might be a bishop in one place, dean of another, canon in a third, and hold a rectory in another. He had not thought that in these days anyone would propose to allow a Bishop to hold a living in his own diocese. How could a man do the work of a parish properly while he was at the same time discharging the functions of a Bishop? Again, at the time when an Act had just been passed to enable the number of canonries to be increased, he could not consent to a proposition to cut down the number of canons in a diocese in order to find an income for a new Bishop. As to the question of providing a sufficient endowment, if the people of Cornwall or any other county wanted a bishopric, let it find funds to endow that bishopric, as it would find ten times the amount for a new railway, or a harbour, or a breakwater. It was impossible to say that this country, with all its enormous wealth, could not found new Sees; and for a mere fraction, as compared with the amount which they expended for secular purposes, they might surely be content with a spiritual, instead of a pecuniary, return.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he wished to make a few observations on the proposals of the right rev. Prelate. In doing so he would be speaking only his own sentiments—for he did not know how far his noble Friends behind him would agree with him, or whether they might not take a different view. He was not able to agree in the analogy which the noble Lord who had charge of the Bill had drawn between the construction of a railway and the endowment of a bishopric; and he thought his noble Friend had borne a singular testimony to the zeal of the people of Cornwall:—because they had always been ready to employ money for making railways or breakwaters, they would, therefore, employ money for making bishoprics. That was what he ventured to think was taking a rather coloured view of matters. Well, to the second proposal of the right rev. Prelate he entertained great objection. They had been accustomed to hear a great deal about the misappropriation of the estates of the bishoprics and chapters to the "common fund" for the benefit of the parishes—but here were funds intended strictly for the benefit of a particular parish, and the right rev. Prelate proposed to allocate them to the Bishop of the diocese. He knew that the right rev. Prelate proposed that the Bishop should reside in the parish the living of which was to be given to him; but it was obvious that the Bishop was to be appointed for episcopal work, and he could not do the work of a diocese and the work of a parish. The result would be that the work of the parish must be done by the curate, while the funds of the parish would be paid to the Bishop. Talk of a misappropriation of trust funds! Could there be a greater misappropriation than that? Then, as to the proposal to do away with one of the canonries, he did not think the canons of the Church were in excess of the work which there was for them to do. If anything were to be done in the direction proposed by the right rev. Prelate, he would prefer that one or more of the canonries should be taken from the old diocese and given to the new one; but to suppress a canonry in order to apply its revenue to the endowment of a bishopric was a scheme which ought not to receive the approbation of their Lordships' House. He did not propose to submit to their Lordships any Amendments, but he entertained considerable doubt as to the working of the Bill. It was a Bill to enable new Bishoprics to be created without any limit as to number, except that limit which no doubt would result from the difficulty of providing funds. The object was to provide for the performance of diocesan work, which it was admitted on all hands could not be satisfactorily performed at present. The Bill would leave abundant work still to be done in the existing dioceses, but the hope was that it would be better done than it could be now, when some of the dioceses were too large. According to the present constitution of the Church, there were a number of Bishops possessed of ample endowments and having seats in that House, and it was sought to establish side by side with them another class of Bishops having no endowments except such as were to come from private contributions, but who were nevertheless to be entitled to the same privileges as the other Bishops of the Established Church.

He was afraid that the proposal now before the House was capable of being wrested by those hostile to the Church to its disadvantage. Now, if any feasible plan could be devised for the due performance of the work of the Episcopate, he should regret to see it contemplated to a greater degree than at present that where a new bishopric was created and a diocese carved out of an existing diocese, provision should be made out of the existing diocese for the purpose. He did not at all approve a proposal which assumed as a matter of course that by the mere division of an existing diocese a new bishopric should be created. It might well be that the division of existing bishoprics would not suffice to endow new Sees as they ought to be endowed, and, so far as the first part of the Amendment tended in the direction of making up the deficiency, he should not object to it.

LORD HOUGHTON said, he thought that the noble and learned Lord had done him the honour of repeating what he had suggested, and that his observations showed that the Bill ought to have been referred to a Select Committee. He believed that they had been led away by reference to a false historical analogy, for the old commendam system had nothing to do with the present proposal, which was that the new Bishop should not be non-resident, but should reside in the parish. He would take as an instance the case of Dr. Hook when vicar of the large parish of Leeds; under this Bill he could have been made a Bishop and still have retained the vicarage.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON asked how a Bishop could be resident in his parish and perform well all the duties of his diocese, and how would such a Bishop work the Public Worship Regulation Act? Suppose three of his parishioners presented a charge against him. He could not refuse to hear it, and he might by process of law be obliged to suspend himself from, or deprive himself of, his living, which was yet vital to his bishopric, by Act of Parliament.

LORD HATHERLEY wished to remark that Dr. Hook, during the time he was at Leeds, built one church and one schoolroom every year that he was there, and that he could not have done if he had been Bishop of Leeds with other duties to perform.

LORD VIVIAN stated his belief that five-sixths of the people of Cornwall were Dissenters from the Church of England, and that there was no very great desire in that county to have a new Bishop. They considered that their present Bishop did his work very well.

LORD LYTTTELTON said, that was no argument against his Bill, which was not intended to provide for the case of those who did not want a new Bishop, but for those who did. If the people of Cornwall, or of any other place, did not want another Bishop, he did not wish to force one upon them. He did not know about the Dissenters; but he should be surprised if there were not many laity, and still more clergy, in Cornwall, who would be glad to see a Bishop there.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY was also of opinion that a Bishop was very much wanted in Cornwall. He did not see any objection to reducing the canonries in Exeter Cathedral from five to four for the purpose of promoting the object; and he approved of the reduction, to a small extent, of the income of a Bishop, who had been relieved of a portion of his duties. Cornwall might not have a great wish for a Bishop of its own; but, assuredly, it had great need of one. He was afraid the wish was not very strong as yet.

LORD ELIOT said, he did not quite agree with what had fallen from his noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant of Cornwall (Lord Vivian). The amount of Dissent now existing in that county was owing to the neglect of past years. He had heard of the case of a parish in Cornwall in which it was said that a Bishop had not been seen since the Reformation—perhaps he might say since the Conquest. He firmly believed that the people of Cornwall did want a special Bishop, and the appointment of one would set the Bishop of Exeter free to attend to his own diocese of Exeter.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND suggested that the first portion of the clause proposed by the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Exeter) should be adopted; with a modification in the sense suggested by his right rev. Friend (the Bishop of London).

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY thought the better course would be to accept the Amendment of his right rev. Brother, modified as the noble Duke suggested. With reference to remarks made in the course of this discussion—he should be sorry if the impression went forth that the present Bishops found it impossible to perform the duties of their several stations. He by no means agreed in the view propounded that evening by his noble Friend opposite as to episcopal duties. No doubt the Bishops had great difficulties to encounter in performing their duties according to the high standard they had, to their honour, established for themselves; but he had no hesitation in saying that the duties of the episcopal office were most satisfactorily performed by his right rev. Brethren in the difficult dioceses of Winchester and Exeter, although no doubt they might be still better performed under some such sub-division of those dioceses as was now proposed. While anxious to give his best support to this Bill, he confessed that he was not very sanguine as to its success. It might be that the people of Cornwall would be as liberal as some had supposed, or as unwilling to increase the efficiency of the Episcopate as the Lord Lieutenant of that county thought; but he could not help feeling a little doubtful as to the success of his noble Friend's measure. That, however, would be tested in the way that his noble Friend wished it to be. Those who felt a great desire to increase the Episcopate would, no doubt, come forward for that purpose; on the other hand, if such a desire was not really felt, then people would not come forward, and the Act, if passed, would become a dead-letter. Nor was he very sanguine as to the success of the measure when it went elsewhere: but he was, on that very account, all the more anxious that there should be no misconception as to why they urged the measure on their Lordships. It was not that the duties now attached to the episcopal office could not be performed, but that, like all other human duties, they might be better performed, and that they would be neglecting what devolved on them if they did not give every facility for the most perfect discharge of those duties that was practicable. If he had had the management of this matter, and had complete control, both in their Lordships' House and in the other House of Parliament, respecting it, he should have thought it—as he had always done on former occasions—a wiser plan to propose a definite scheme for the formation of a particular bishopric in some one of those cases where there was an obvious want. His right rev. Brother might with great propriety have proposed a definite scheme for the endowment of a bishopric of Cornwall. He might have said there were some exceptional circumstances in regard to the Cathedral of Exeter—namely, that it had five canonries, whereas other cathedrals had four; and he might have proposed that one of those canonries be appropriated to the endowment of that new bishopric. It was possible also that there might be livings in Cornwall, the emoluments of which were so large that it would be right to charge some of them for that purpose. He did not know that there were such livings in his own diocese, or many of them in England; for he believed that the English parochial clergy were poorly paid indeed, and that even those of them who were reputed to possess large livings found a very small sum come to them after all payments for charities and curates were discharged. But they would, perhaps, have been in a better position for discussing that important question if they had before them a definite proposal for the division of the diocese of Exeter. Then, too, all danger as to the jealous feeling of Parliament would have been avoided; because the consent of Parliament would have been taken as to the foundation of the bishopric. It might also be desirable that a distinct scheme should be submitted to Parliament for the division of the diocese of Winchester—the most trying case of all the dioceses in England—and a plan suggested for providing sufficient funds for the new See. He hoped that at some future time such an idea might be entertained. At the same time, the only practical plan before them was that of his noble Friend (Lord Lyttelton); therefore, he thought the Episcopal Bench had no course left them but to give it their cordial support, and he should be very glad indeed if the hopes of the noble Lord were fulfilled, and if a great number of persons were found ready to assist in the formation of new Sees.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER said, he would not press that portion of the clause to which objection had been made. He admitted that he had his own diocese in view in proposing it, and there might be serious objections to taking that diocese as a type. This Bill appeared to afford the only opportunity of procuring the necessary resources for carrying on the work of the Church. He pointed out that the canonries of Exeter differed from those of other cathedrals as to the number, and that one of them might be appropriated to the formation of a new bishopric without any improper alienation of funds.

Clause withdrawn, and new Clause inserted, as follows:—

“It shall be lawful for the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, if they think fit, in any scheme for the formation of a new bishopric under this Act, to attach to the bishopric thus formed a portion of the income of any bishopric the diocese of which is diminished by the formation of the said new bishopric.”

THE BISHOP OF EXETER moved that the following clause be added:—

“It shall be lawful for the patron of any benefice situated within a diocese formed under this Act to charge the said benefice with a perpetual annuity, payable from the date of the next avoidance of the said benefice, to the Bishop of the said diocese: provided always, that in the judgment of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, having regard to the area and population of the said benefice, the payment of the said annuity shall leave a full and sufficient income to the incumbent of the said benefice.”

It was at present the law of the land that the patron of two livings might, with the consent of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, increase the endowment of one at the expense of the other. The exercise of this power was of great advantage in cases where one of the livings was rich and the other poor. By the present proposal the same principle was sought to be applied under different circumstances; and it would afford many private patrons an opportunity of assisting in the formation of a new bishopric.

After short conversation.

On Question, resolved in the negative.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Thursday next; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 35.)

TURKEY—ROUMANIA AND SERVIA.

QUESTION.

LORD CARLINGFORD asked the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office, Whether he would lay on the Table any Correspondence which might have passed in regard to claims made by the Governments of Austria, Germany, and Russia to negotiate commercial Treaties with Roumania and Servia without the intervention of the Porte?

THE EARL OF DERBY replied that the Correspondence in question could not be produced at present, except in a partial and incomplete form, and that it would, therefore, be more convenient and more for the public interest to defer the publication. If, however, the negotiations should continue much longer he would in the course of the present Session, although no definite conclusion might have been reached, place on the Table of the House such of the Papers as it would then be possible for him to present.

BOSTON ELECTION.

Message from the Commons that they have agreed to the following Address to be presented to Her Majesty (under the provisions of the Act of the sixteenth year of Her present Majesty, chapter fifty-seven,) relating to the Election for the Borough of Boston, to which they desire the concurrence of their Lordships:

"Most Gracious Sovereign,

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave humbly to represent to Your Majesty that Sir William Robert Grove, Knight, one of the Justices of the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, and one of the Judges selected for the trial of Election Petitions, pursuant to 'The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868,' has reported to the House of Commons that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the last Election for the Borough of Boston:

"We therefore humbly pray Your Majesty, that Your Majesty will be graciously pleased to cause inquiry to be made, pursuant to the provisions of the Act of Parliament passed in the sixteenth year of the reign of Your Majesty, intituled 'An Act to provide for more effectual inquiry into the existence of Corrupt Practices at Elections for Members to serve in Parliament, by the appointment of Æneas John M'Intyre, esquire, one of Your Majesty's counsel, Wyndham Slade, esquire, barrister-at-law, and Douglas Straight, esquire, barrister-at-law, as Commissioners, for the purpose of making inquiry into the existence of such corrupt practices.'"

OYSTER BEDS ON THE IRISH COASTS. QUESTION.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, What steps have been taken to oblige the owners of Oyster Beds on the Irish Coasts to stock them, as required by the 29 and 30 Victoria, chapter 88, section 3, and by chapter 97, section 14, of the same Statute?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, in all licences granted by the Inspectors of Fisheries for oyster beds there is a provision inserted that the bed shall be properly cultivated within three years from the date of the licence, and with regard to licences granted heretofore, the Inspectors last year held a number of inquiries to ascertain whether the beds were properly cultivated before taking the steps required by the 14th section of 29 & 30 Vict. c. 97, and the 3rd section of 29 & 30 Vict. c. 88, to revoke licences when the licensees had neglected to stock their beds, and it was decided upon to give the licensees another year to do so. Further inquiries will be made during the present year, and the Inspectors will then revoke all licences where, in their opinion, the licensees have not taken the proper steps to form and cultivate their oyster beds.

INDIA—IMPORT DUTIES ON COTTON GOODS.—QUESTION.

MR. J. CROSS asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If can give the House any information as to the probability of an early abolition of the protective duties at present imposed by the Indian Government upon the import of cotton goods and yarns; and, if not, whether he can inform the House when these duties will be materially reduced?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, the Government of India appointed a Committee to inquire into the working of the Tariff Act of 1871, and their attention was specially directed to the duties imposed upon cotton goods and yarns. They have not yet reported; but when their Report has been received and considered I shall be very happy to give the hon. Gentleman the information he requires. As these duties are imposed on fiscal grounds and not for purposes of protection, may I point out to the hon. Gentleman that the word "protective" does not very correctly designate the character of the duties referred to.

MASTERS AND SERVANTS ACT—CASE OF LUKE HILLS.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has received a memorial from St. John's Common, Sussex, signed by 1,302 persons, calling his attention to the case of Luke Hills, an agricultural labourer sentenced by the Cuckfield magistrates to three months' imprisonment on a charge of breach of contract; and, whether, taking into consideration the peculiar circumstances of the case, and the fact that the man has already been imprisoned for about a month, he will recommend that the rest of his sentence should be remitted?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that he had only that morning received from the committing magistrates a reply to a communication which he had caused to be addressed to them in reference to this case. He had not as yet had time to read the document, but it should have his immediate attention.

NAVY—THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

QUESTION.

MR. FORTESCUE HARRISON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true that all applications from the navigating officers of the Naval Service for permission to accompany the Arctic expedition have been refused; and, if so, whether he will reconsider this decision in favour of a class of officers eminently qualified by their education and training and peculiar knowledge of the laws of magnetism, for employment on this occasion?

MR. HUNT: A selection of officers for the Arctic Expedition below the rank of commander was made from a list of 138 applicants, of whom 13 were navigating officers. None of that class were selected. Only one of them was supposed to have any special knowledge of magnetism, and his age was against his being chosen. As I have before stated in the House, great pains were taken to select the fittest men, and, as all those who were chosen have passed the medical examination, no other appointments can now be made.

NATIONAL DEBT COMMISSIONERS—ALLEGED DEFICIENCY.

QUESTION.

MR. PULESTON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether his attention has been drawn to a recent article in the "Pall Mall Gazette," referring to a deficiency of over four millions and a-half incurred by the National Debt Commissioners in their account with the Trustees of Savings Banks and Friendly Societies; whether such deficiency is still increasing; and, whether Her Majesty's Government propose to bring forward any measure to remedy a system which makes such accumulating deficiencies possible?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he had read the article mentioned in the Question of the hon. Member, and which referred to a question frequently brought before the attention of the House in connection with certain yearly accounts supplied under the provisions of an Act of Parliament. The accounts between the National Debt Commissioners and the Trustees of Savings Banks and Friendly Societies showed a deficiency against the Commissioners, arising from the fact that in former years a higher rate of interest was allowed by them than they could earn from the investments then open. Of late years the rate of interest allowed by the Commissioners had been reduced, while they had been able to earn a larger amount; but, in consequence of the deficiency which occurred before the corrections between the two rates of interest were made, a deficiency was created which for some years had gone on accumulating. It continued to increase, and would ere long demand the attention of Parliament. He hoped to have an opportunity in the course of the Session of calling the attention of the House to various matters in connection with their National Debt, and this would be one of the matters to which he would direct attention.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT—GAS AND WATER WORKS—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

MR. COLMAN asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill, during the present Session, for better enabling municipal corporations or sanitary authorities to acquire gas or waterworks; and whether the Local Government Board have made any recommendation thereon?

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH: Sir, it is not intended to introduce any Bill specially dealing with the subjects referred to. But it may be convenient to the hon. Member and to the House that I should state shortly what are the existing powers with respect to gas and water, and to what extent they will be varied by the Public Health Bill, which was delivered this morning. Under the existing law, sanitary authorities can purchase waterworks by agreement, and provide waterworks in places where there is no company, or where a company is unable or unwilling to supply sufficient water for all reasonable purposes. The Bill will extend these powers by enabling a local authority to carry water mains outside their district, and to supply water to the authority of an adjoining place. At the present time sanitary authorities have no power under the general law to construct or purchase gasworks. They can only contract for public lighting and provide lamp-posts, &c. The Bill will enable them to purchase gasworks by agreement, and where there is no company they may, by Provisional Order, obtain authority to establish gasworks for their district.

POST OFFICE—NIGHT MAIL SERVICE TO BASINGSTOKE, &c.—QUESTION.

DR. LUSH asked the Postmaster General, Whether, notwithstanding the fact that the boroughs of Andover, Salisbury, Wilton, and Shaftesbury are situated upon the main line of the London and South Western Railway to Exeter, it is the intention of the Post Office to continue the present system of mail carts for the night mail service between Basingstoke and Yeovil, or whether he will, at an early period, utilize that Railway by the establishment of a night mail train through the district specified, in addition to the day mail train now in use?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, he admitted the desirability of sending the mails by train to the more important of the towns mentioned in the Question of the hon. Gentleman; but, as far as Andover was concerned, the present system was found to be best, for the reason that it was necessary to employ carts in conveying the mails to the surrounding small towns and villages.

POST OFFICE TELEGRAPHS—STATION ON LUNDY ISLAND.—QUESTION.

MR. A. P. VIVIAN asked the Postmaster General, Whether he will take into consideration the establishment of a telegraph station on Lundy Island, in the Bristol Channel, with the object of establishing communication with the vessels forced there for shelter during bad weather?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that the question was considered during last summer and autumn. The cost of establishing and maintaining such a station was found to be so far beyond the amount which would be earned that he was then and still continued to be unable to sanction its establishment.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES BILL—FEES TO AUDITORS.—QUESTION.

DR. CAMERON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is in a position to inform the House what fees the Treasury contemplate charging for the services of the official auditors proposed to be appointed under the Friendly Societies Bill; and, whether he will give any assurance that the charge sanctioned for a quinquennial valuation of the assets and liabilities of such a society shall in no case exceed a given per centage of its gross annual income; and, if so, what per centage?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that before considering what fees should be given to the official auditors, the Treasury must first ascertain whether they could get them. The Question of the hon. Gentleman had better be discussed when that part of the Bill which related to these officers came under consideration.

NEW GUINEA—CORRESPONDENCE.

QUESTION.

Mr. W. M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he will consent to lay upon the Table of the House any recent Correspondence relative to New Guinea?

Mr. J. LOWTHER: There is, Sir, no Correspondence of a recent date at the Colonial Office relating to this subject which can with propriety be laid upon the Table; but there have, I believe, been reports made to the Admiralty by the naval officers employed on recent explorations, though I am, of course, unable to say how far their production may be desirable.

VALUATION RETURNS (METROPOLIS).

QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. J. HOLMS,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that, in the remarks he had made with reference to these Returns, he did not cast any reflection upon the local authorities.

JURY LAW AMENDMENT—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. NORWOOD,

Mr. LOPES said: Sir, the Bill I introduced last Session for the amendment of the Jury Laws containing over 100 clauses was read a second time and passed through Committee, with the approval, I think I may say, of hon. Members on both sides of the House. The Bill, however, ultimately fell through, owing to causes over which I had no control. Having no reason to believe those causes might not still prevail, I feel I should not be justified in asking hon. Members again to expend much time and labour on so long a Bill. I shall not, therefore, re-introduce the Bill this Session.

DURHAM CAPITULAR ESTATES— (CUSTOMARY TENANTS).

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

Mr. PEASE: I rise to move that a Select Committee be appointed—

“to inquire into the nature of the estates and interests and the present position of the Customary Tenants of Lands held lately under the Dean and Chapter of Durham, and now under the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England, by renewable leases made by the Dean and Chapter, who have transferred their estate and interest in such lands to the Commissioners; and to report the opinion of the Committee as to further legislation thereon.”

I had the honour to place upon the Notice Book of this House last Session a Motion of a very similar character to that which I have the honour to introduce to-night; but the difficulties which so often attended the Motion of private Members attended me, and obliged me, at the request of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, to postpone my Motion until this Session. Whilst I feel that in this Notice I have given a somewhat local bearing to this question, I still feel that it is a national question, as it affects funds and estates in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, which are to be used at their discretion for national purposes. It is certainly no question of Party politics in the usual sense of the term. What I ask for is inquiry into the working of the laws which affect a very large number of my own constituents, and which are looked upon with interest by the country at large. I ask for inquiry by Members of this House into the grievances of which they complain, and if I prove that the law as it stands is administered harshly, or in a manner not contemplated by Parliament; or if I even prove that, under its operation, great injustice is done to any body of persons, however few they may be, I trust that I shall have made out a case for such an inquiry as I ask for. The parties for whom I ask this inquiry are the customary tenants of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. They were lately tenants of the Dean and Chapter of Durham, and, before that, they were tenants by court roll. In their Petition they bring forward one or two grave allegations. They complain that the Commissioners refuse to renew their leases, and also throw difficulties in the way of their enfranchising. They state that by this refusal of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners they make the Act compulsory as regards the Petitioners, and voluntary as regards the Commissioners, compelling the Petitioners to purchase the fee-simple, or surrender their interest in the land held by them at such prices as the Commissioners may choose, under penalty of having their leases run out, their interest taken away and their property in them destroyed, or they have the alternative only of defending their estates at the cost of enormous expense and delay. Their main allegation, however, is, that the leases are not renewed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and that that large and powerful body refuses to do that which the Dean and Chapter of Durham have done ever since as Dean and Chapter they came possessed of these estates in the reign of Henry VIII. I have said they also complained of the difficulties thrown in their way in enfranchising. The number who last year complained of this was 180, and now I believe nearly 400 have signed the Petitions I have presented. The Petitioners are not merely the men in possession, but also trustees, mortgagees, and reversioners, and various other persons interested directly or indirectly in these estates. But every caution has been taken to secure that those who signed the Petition should be persons who were personally interested in the matter. They represent that the annual value of these estates is £50,000, and the gross value not less than £1,000,000. I have been kindly told by the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Mowbray)—one of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners—that I ought to accept these figures with some caution; but I believe they are based upon a Return presented to this House, by which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners showed that during the two years which had elapsed between September, 1870, and September, 1872, there were 214 leases, the renewal of which was refused; and that the fines paid upon these leases at their last renewal were no less than £18,656 8s. 11d., or on an average of about £9,000 per annum. Taking these figures to represent one-fourth or one-fifth the annual value of the leases, we arrive pretty nearly at a sum of between £40,000 or £50,000, the annual value set out in the Petition. Some of these may be considered small holdings; but they are of the greatest importance to those who are interested in them. But many are of considerable extent. I have the cases before me of Mrs. Watson, who holds 110 acres; Messrs. Ord, 700 acres; Mr. Abbs, 100 acres; Miss Russell, 200 acres; Mr. Holmes, 115 acres; and Mr. Robinson, 213 acres, making

1,438 acres in all, and I have a long list of very important and considerable holdings. Many of these lands have been held, subject to fines, for upwards of 300 years, and in many cases they have remained for 200 years of that period in the same family. They have regularly paid, from time immemorial, one and a-half years' rent every seven years for their 21 years' leases. I am told that in the time of Elizabeth an Order in Council was made that three years' rent should be paid as fine every twenty-first year. Some dispute arose between the Dean and Chapter and the lessees in the reign of Charles I., and the present system was adopted by Order in Council. It consisted of paying one year's rent as fine every seventh year; this afterwards became one and a-quarter to one and a-half year's increased value. The men who hold these leases belong to the independent race of yeoman farmers, who ought to be encouraged in every way, as they form the stay and backbone of the country. I have looked at their leases, and every right seems to be preserved to them that a holder of land has, and they have exercised their rights upon the estate. They have no conditions as to crops, and they make their own roads and fences, and erect their own boundary. They have been transferred from hand to hand, and up to a certain date the form was used in transfer, but the transferor transferred the tenant-right and right of renewal. They allege that when they ceased to be copyholders in the reign of Henry VIII. they covenanted for the right of perpetual renewal. This was before the restraining statutes of the reign of Queen Elizabeth were passed restraining ecclesiastical bodies from granting leases for more than 21 years. The question of the right of renewal was hardly ever, if ever, in dispute. Only one or two cases have occurred in which men have been refused renewal for waste of the estate. But the lease in other cases was invariably renewed. They alleged that, before the dissolution of the monasteries, they were not Bishop's tenants, but held the land by court rolls, and in every other way acted as feudal tenants. These men had rendered good service to England, for they were said to be those who had brought the Coronation Stone out of Scotland—whatever interest that fact may have; but I will not go minutely into this question of antiquarian research. These rights have existed up to the present time, and have been carefully guarded. Take a Report out of a Committee of the House of Lords, which is more unfavourable to them than any others, which says—

“That the lessees, with comparatively few exceptions, have had de facto for more than two centuries the advantage of renewals.”

To destroy these is to shake the foundation on which all landed property is held in England. With the leave of the House, I will take a few cases of actual holdings of these estates as examples of many more. There is the case of Mrs. Watson, who has 110 acres of ground, purchased in 1830. Her husband's father paid £6,000 for the land, which was equal to a purchase based on a rental of £300 a-year, for a term of 20 years. One of his two sons, after his father's death, obtained a mortgage on the estate of £3,000, which was paid to the younger brother as his moiety of the estate. The Commissioners offered her £4,000 for the estate, which cost her husband in 1830 or 1832 £6,000, the land in the meanwhile having much increased in value. Mr. Ord, of Newton, bought 366 acres in 1810; but the same estate had been held by his family since 1739 as tenants. In 1810 he paid £7,000 for the estate. This was in a time of war, when rents were high. The present value is at least £200 per annum, and he had not been able to enfranchise. Mr. Abbs, of Cleadon House, held 100 acres, and the land had been in the family for 150 years. It was purchased at the price of freehold by the trustees of the great grandfather of Mr. Abbs. It was purchased from the Hyltons, of Hylton Castle, who held it before the Dean and Chapter got it from Henry VIII. The present owner had built the farm buildings, farmhouse, and a villa residence. I could give half-a-dozen cases. I call the special attention of the House to the fact that these leases were regularly renewed up to 1870. When the Dean and Chapter began to listen to the blandishments of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the tenants began to feel alarmed when their leases were refused renewal, and they appealed to the Privy Council against the Dean and Chapter transferring their rights to the Commissioners. The question was before Lord Selborne, and he said—

“It seems to me that your position, as Petitioners to Parliament, would not be different after the transfer from what it is now. Your case before Parliament would surely be exactly the same. Indeed, it would be better if the consequence of the transfer was, that you were placed in more jeopardy than you were before. If it were just, there would be more reason for Parliament to interfere in your favour, and if your view is that justice can only be done by special legislation, it must be presumed that justice would be done upon you showing a case for it after this transfer.”

I say there is a strong prima facie case that should be dealt with. These tenants passed into the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. They dreaded the change, because, instead of being under the hands of those who knew them, their circumstances and wants, they would be in the hands of those who have no local sympathies, and little understand the claims they had to their estates, and who were 250 miles away from them. This scheme was passed at a Council at Windsor on November 27th, 1872. The scheme was dated 3rd August, 1871, and sets forth that it is made under the powers of the Act of 1868. The figures in it would rather surprise the Fathers of the early Christian Church. It reserved 10,500 acres of land to the Dean and Chapter, set forth in Schedule A. It laid down that £11,000 a-year was to be paid to the Dean and Chapter or estates yielding that sum clear of rates, and taxes, and agency; £2,000 pension to the Dean; £700 pension to the Chapter clerk; £600 pension to mining engineer; £10,000 to Dean and Chapter to be spent on farm buildings on reserved estates, interest not to be expended; £20,000 for drainage of reserved estates, interest not to be expended; £20,000 for Cathedral repairs, interest to be expended; £3,000 for their Dean, £1,000 each for six canons, £3,000 for the Cathedral school, £2,000 for repairs; and they also reserved 10,500 acres of land, as I have already mentioned. The only persons left out in the cold were the tenants, from whom all this money was obtained. Having entered upon these responsibilities this huge Commission at once began to refuse the renewal of those leases, which had been renewed almost without exception since the reign of Henry VIII. I allege that considerable delays took place in treating with those who wanted to enfranchise. Mr. Jeremiah Abbs, of Westholme, asked for the terms of the sale of reversion in October 31st, 1871, and, after repeated excuses and seem to imply that those enfranchised have been duped into parting with their property, because they were enfranchised under an erroneous impression. They had been duped into parting with their property, and I think the Petitioners are perfectly justified in refusing again to become dupes; but the fact is the Commissioners will not see—and there is nobody so blind as the man who will not see—they refuse to see the whole of the argument which I have urged to show the difference between voluntary and compulsory enfranchisement. I would wish to press this point strongly on the House. We are here to deny that Parliament has ever sanctioned compulsory enfranchisement in any shape. I am not here to deny that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have tried to obtain compulsory powers. They tried to introduce compulsory clauses into two or three Acts, and in both instances they were compelled to withdraw them. Further, if Parliament had granted compulsory powers, it would have been bound to grant protection to the long-continued right of renewal, unquestionably possessed by these tenants. The Commissioners say that it is desirable, in the interests of the Church and its property, to abolish this old, wasteful, and improvident system of tenure on renewal by payment of fines. I am afraid that the strong desire of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to get hold of the land, arises from the motive that they are very valuable lands, and that they have been rendered valuable by the investment of capital of the tenants; because we know that fixity of tenure is the great inducement to the tenant to invest his capital in the land, and I am afraid I must characterize this as a rather unworthy motive. It is said that it is desirable to get possession of the lands in the interest of the Church. I think, however, the interest of the Church would be best promoted by nobler impulses and higher motives than these, and that they would not be promoted by this impatient ardour for acquisition. But we may be told that this is not a question for Parliament. We may be asked, why do not these men go to the Courts of Law? My right hon. Friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) said, not very long ago, that Parliament ought always to be extremely careful in interfering with the action of the Courts of Law. Well, I wish that he had always acted on that wise maxim. But it is precisely because we wish to save our clients—these unfortunate and threatened Petitioners—from the gigantic expenses of a suit at law, that we wish Parliament to take this matter into its own hands. In such a suit they would have to face the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, with funds amounting to something like a million and a-quarter annually at their back. How unequal that contest would be! I hope and trust, therefore, that Parliament will not force these men into a contest against such a power as that. I think I shall be able to show that this is especially a question for Parliament to take into its own hands, and the High Court of Parliament is the fittest tribunal to try the allegation of this Petition. That brings me to the last part of my argument. I say that the faith of Parliament is deeply involved in the solution of this question. My hon. Friend has referred to the proceedings before the Privy Council in 1870, when the customary tenants were heard against the transfer of their estates to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The counsel for the Ecclesiastical Commissioners used this language. They actually contended that the Petitioners' estates would not be affected or prejudiced by the scheme of transfer; and my Lord Selborne used this language, and I am sure that anything which falls from him will always be listened to with respect. He said that it may be right when the Commissioners had got the estates to recognize any legal powers and attend to any equitable considerations, but for that they must first have the estates. Well, but this is exactly the declaration we should expect from an eminent and high-minded Equity lawyer; for what is the status of the customary tenants? I believe I am not wrong; but if I am wrong, there are many lawyers present to correct me. I believe that at Common Law the heir of the customary tenant to whom the lord objects, or the customary tenant himself at the expiration of his term cannot enforce his possession against the lord. But whatever rights he possesses must be defended in a Court of Equity, and I believe that one of the earliest functions of the High Court of Equity in this country was to defend the rights of the customary tenants. Therefore, I am not surprised to hear that the greatest Equity lawyer in our land should have made use of these expressions and spoken of these equitable considerations. Were the Petitioners wrong to accept it as a pledge, and will the House allow the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to ignore equitable considerations? This recognition of the right of renewal was not heard for the first time within the walls of the Privy Council. Every Committee and Commission have in their Reports to either branch of the Legislature used the same language and the same phrase. It has, in fact, become a stock phrase, and a key-note in every one of those Reports, that due regard must be had to the long-established right of renewal which the Commissioners now dispute for the first time. But not only have Committees and Commissioners recognized the right which the Petitioners now claim, but great statesmen, Law Officers of the Crown, Prime Ministers of England in their places in Parliament, have repeated the same pledge. Lord Palmerston, Lord Russell, and the Law Officers of the Crown at that time made the same declaration that due regard must be had to the accustomed right of renewal. I would make an appeal to the present Prime Minister. I would ask him to be true to the traditions of his high office, to recall the utterances of eminent Prime Ministers before him, and to pay a due regard to the rights of renewal which these tenants possess. I believe that in doing so he would be doing an act of justice to those whose cause we have to-night humbly, but to the best of our ability, been endeavouring to maintain.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the nature of the estates and interests and the present position of the Customary Tenants of Lands held lately under the Dean and Chapter of Durham, and now under the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England, by renewable leases made by the Dean and Chapter, who have transferred their estate and interest in such lands to the Commissioners; and to report the opinion of the Committee as to further legislation thereon."—(Mr. Pease.)

MR. CUBITT, as a member of the Ecclesiastical Commission, said, the Mover of the Resolution had rather wandered from its strict terms, to which he would confine himself. The Motion and the Petition directed attention, not to cases of hardship, but to a claim for customary tenure, or, in other words, perpetuity of tenure. The estates of the Dean and Chapter of Durham were not transferred to the Commissioners until 1871, when they were so transferred by Order in Council. Before that time 500 of the 700 leases under which they were demised had been dealt with by voluntary agreements between the Dean and Chapter and the lessees, sanctioned by the Church Estate Commissioners. Therefore, when the Ecclesiastical Commissioners came into possession of the property the leases were few in number compared with the number originally granted. The Commutation Scheme was dated the 3rd of August, 1871, and, according to the Report recently presented to Parliament at the time the scheme was submitted for confirmation, opposition was offered by certain lessees. The Petition was heard in November, and Her Majesty was advised to ratify the scheme. Then the lessees transmitted to the Commission a memorial urging that, if some ancient court rolls were produced, the lessees would be found to have been copyholders before they began, 300 years ago, to be lessees, and that their estates should therefore be treated as customary estates, renewable for ever. The Commissioners declined to entertain this claim, and the memorialists announced their intention to take proceedings in Chancery. The Commissioners had no knowledge of the existence of the court rolls, and, if they were found, they would not countervail the fact of the property having been held like other leaseholds from the establishment of the Chapter on its new foundation in 1555. A large amount of evidence had been taken by the Commission and the Committees between 1837 and 1851, but no such claim was then set up; and the lessees who then advocated the claims of themselves and their co-lessees had all effected the enfranchisement of their leaseholds, either by sale of the leasehold interest or by the purchase of the reversionary interest. The hon. Member who had introduced the Motion did not base his case upon perpetual tenancy, nor did he (Mr. Cubitt) think it could be upheld upon any such foundation; and, that being so, of what use would the proposed inquiry be? He would leave it to Members themselves to decide whether a

He complained most, however, of the Dean and Chapter consenting to discontinue the customary renewals after 1870, for the system of voluntary enfranchisement had been working admirably, and under it, without any disturbance of the lessees' interests and without any alarm, the desired change of tenure would have been equitably effected. The speech of the hon. Member for Surrey was a renewal of that mixture of alarming pretensions on the one hand, and of vague assurances of tender consideration on the other, with which the Commissioners had treated the lessees. What he himself desired was enfranchisement on an equitable basis. If the Commissioners chose, they could effect this on terms advantageous to the Church and also to the lessees, and the very able agents of the Commission could readily adjust the terms of such a settlement. He felt bound to say that, though after too long delay, a large number of cases of enfranchisement of house property were being effected in his own borough and on very equitable terms, and he saw no reason why leaseholders in the country should not also be fairly dealt with. The houses he referred to were being conveyed to the holder of the existing 21 years leases on new leases of 999 years, at a fixed annual ground-rent, which, however, was to be revised every 100 years, and re-adjusted according to the price of corn. There was also a licence of alienation, costing £2 2s., required every time the property changed hands or was mortgaged or redeemed—a very heavy charge on a small house. The conveyance was very lengthy and wholly in manuscript. He complained also of the severe and elaborate clauses for the reservation and working of minerals which were sought to be imposed even where the Commissioners conveyed the land as freehold for building, reducing the ownership of the ground to nothing more than the use of the surface for tillage. The South Shields School Board successfully resisted the insertion of such monstrous reservations in one case; but in the case of another school site, the same objectionable clauses had again been proposed.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he thought the House but imperfectly realized the importance of this question or the magnitude of the interests involved. This was not so much an inquiry into the conduct of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners as into the conduct of Parliament during the last 40 years. The matter was brought under the notice of Parliament in 1837 by Mr. Spring Rice, under the Government of Lord Melbourne; and the Committee which sat in 1838-9 reported that the system of raising revenues by fine, always improvident, was particularly disadvantageous to the Church from the peculiarity of its tenure; that it prevented the investment of capital in the permanent improvement of an estate, put a check upon the extension of buildings in some places where they were very much required, and shut out extensive plots of land from the most improved system of agriculture. From that date the system of leasing Church property then in existence was condemned as vicious, and notice was given that it would soon come altogether to an end. The Commissions and Committees which sat between 1839 and 1850 never reported in favour of perpetual renewal. The Committee of the House of Lords in 1851 reported expressly against the right of perpetual renewal, and they were now asked, after two investigations of the subject by Parliament, to set aside the legislation which had been founded on the Reports of the Committees of this and of the other House of Parliament. The Act of 1851 recognized the rights of the lessees, and under that Act respect had been paid to the long-continued practice of renewal, and what was wanted now was that Parliament should recognize a perpetual right of renewal. The legislation of 1854 and 1860 was still more favourable to the lessees. It had been said that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had administered the law harshly, and in a sense not contemplated by Parliament. He repudiated that statement. They had followed the course prescribed by Parliament, and the law had been justly and fairly administered. The inquiry which they were invited to make would lead them to remote historical periods; and if it was extended in the way proposed by the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney), it would involve an inquiry into the titles of all the lands possessed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Parliament had decided this question long ago; and it was only because there were so many Members now in the House not acquainted with the course of legislation on this question that they were asked to re-open it. In the interests, not of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who were quite ready for such an inquiry, but in the interests of the consistency of the Legislature he hoped the House would not grant the inquiry.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, his only object in rising was to point out to the House what was the actual question before it. Every one who had read the memorial of those parties must have been struck by the fact that they had some notion of their own that they were not leaseholders, but customary tenants, and were entitled to be treated differently from other beneficial lessees, who had come under the operation of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners' Act. That case had to a very great extent broken down, and they had, therefore, brought a sort of imaginary grievance before the House, and the administration of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners was impugned. If these persons claimed any right which they did not now possess, let the question be decided in a Court of Law and not in the House of Commons. The hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment (Mr. Goldney) wanted to extend the inquiry from the particular, real, or supposed grievance of these persons to the whole acts of the Commissioners. Now, it would be hardly fair, when they were considering a particular grievance, to discuss the whole work of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners without the slightest notice either to the Government or the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The Commissioners had discharged their difficult duties most thoroughly and most honestly, and the fact that during 25 years no inquiry had been asked or granted into their conduct was a sufficient proof that no great grievance had arisen under their administration. He hoped the House would not now grant any such inquiry; and if the parties whose case had been brought forward suffered any hardship from the character of this Bill, let the question be decided in a Court of Law.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he would withdraw his Amendment, and bring it forward as a substantive Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—NEW CODE, 1875.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. DIXON rose to call attention to the New Code; and to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to direct that the New Code be amended by the omission of Article 19 D."

The hon. Member said, that every new Code issued by the Education Department possessed an increasing interest, in this respect at any rate—that it affected a greater number of persons and interests of increasing magnitude; and the Code had the power of regulating the principles which guided the education of the country to an extent that was not always understood, and certainly had not been fully considered. One point connected with the new Codes issued by the Education Department had not received sufficient attention—namely, the great difficulty of properly discussing their provisions by the House. The Act of 1870 provided that the Code must be laid on the Table of the House for 30 days before it became effective; but it might happen, as in the present instance, that the Easter holidays would deduct a considerable portion of that time, and thus the chance of a Member who wished to bring forward the subject of obtaining priority by ballot on Tuesday was lessened considerably. He had been compelled to bring the matter forward after a consideration of merely a few hours. The exact operation of these Codes, moreover, was very difficult to understand, and how were Members not only to make up their own minds within the 30 days, but to obtain the opinion of those persons in the country to whom hon. Members were accustomed to turn for advice and assistance in such matters? He would suggest to the Government that when any future Code was challenged the Government should be bound to find a night for the discussion before the Code came into operation. He did not approach the Code in any unfriendly spirit. On the contrary, he expressed his gratification—he might almost say his gratitude—to the Vice President of the Committee of Council for the great improvement that the Code had ushered in. The great object of the Code, if he understood it correctly, was to improve the quality of education in the elementary schools, and that was done by making the condition of the grant more difficult, or, in other words, by making a larger amount of education necessary for the attainment of the same amount of grant. In this feature of the new Code he fully concurred. This matter had been fully discussed by the London and provincial school boards, which agreed that education in the elementary schools was to be chiefly developed by a more complete adoption of the system of payment by results. The difficulty in the way was the necessity for 250 attendances before any grant could be made on the examination in the Standards. It was felt that this necessity had a very discouraging effect upon many schools. It deprived them of grants in the case of children who, though they had not made 250 attendances, were yet able to earn grants by passing in the Standards. The proposition was almost unanimously adopted that the 250 attendances should be done away with, and that a system based upon payment in proportion to increased attainments should be substituted. The new Code did not follow the first part of the recommendation, and he was very much afraid that a very deserving class of schools throughout the country would find that they were in a worse position than they were before. The schools that would mainly suffer would be the board schools in the large towns. He would notice some of the reasons why he thought that effect would be produced. Under Clause 19 A a new condition of the grant was imposed, whereby, in the event of a deficiency of discipline and organization in the school, a deduction of 1*s.* would be made. To that he did not object. The next point was that the standards were certainly raised very considerably, in this way—that it was necessary that in the higher standards the reading should be “with intelligence.” This was, undoubtedly, an enormous step in advance. Another advance was made in writing, though not to so great an extent. He entirely approved of the provision that from Standard II. upwards the children should be required to pass an elementary examination in grammar, geography, and history; but the effect of this increased stringency of the Code would be to diminish the grant. In time the schools would no doubt work up to the Standard; but for the moment

the effect would be a diminution of the amount of grant earned. Besides, there was an important reduction of 3*s.* in the grant on reading, writing, and arithmetic—namely, a reduction from 4*s.* to 3*s.* in each of those subjects. On the other hand, an advance was promised on the average attendance of children above seven years of age, provided they were to pass the examination creditably in two of the four subjects—grammar, geography, history, and needlework; and an addition was made to the grant for passing in additional subjects. But there was a condition attached to the grant of 4*s.* on the average attendance—namely, that 40 per cent of the scholars must be presented in Standards IV, V, and VI, and if that condition were not fulfilled the amount would be reduced to 2*s.* Now, with regard to the probability of the fulfilment of that condition, what was the result of the examinations last year? It was found that only 16 per cent of the children who were present at the examination were presented in Standards IV. and upwards, and therefore an enormous jump had been made all at once from 16 per cent to 40 per cent. So that it was absolutely impossible for some years to come to have the 4*s.*, and it was in reality a question of only 2*s.* But then there was a condition attached even to the 2*s.*, that condition being that one-half of the children must pass creditably; and what were the chances of one-half passing creditably? He had no figures as to the probable result with respect to the 2*s.*; but last year the Report showed that of the children on the register of the schools only one-third passed the examination in the three R's. Now, what was required was that 50 per cent of the numbers who had been on the register for three months should pass, and he would ask, if only one-third passed in the three R's last year, what were the probabilities of one-half of the children passing now that the standards were raised? He was inclined to think that the value of the 2*s.* was very considerably diminished by that consideration. Again, the grant for specific subjects had been increased from 3*s.* to 4*s.* That, of course, everybody would approve of; but the value of this increase was diminished by the condition appended, that 75 per cent of those who were present must pass. Whilst strongly in favour of raising the Code, and whilst he hoped that the same course would be adopted by succeeding Ministers, he could not help thinking that it had been done with too little regard to pecuniary considerations. The schools which would be most disadvantageously affected would, he believed, be the board schools in large towns. With respect to the second part of this subject, he found in Clause 19 B that the schools in the country—the small schools in the rural districts—were not affected by any means in the same way. Instead of trying to uphold the principle of payment by results and, as far as possible, to strengthen and carry it out—even at the cost of a large pecuniary sacrifice in the case of many schools in large towns—he found that instead of trying to carry out that principle still further, the Government was deviating from it, and a re-action was setting in in a direction which was the very reverse of payment by results. Certain grants were to be made without any reference to increased efficiency or greater results. He did not expect to be able to induce the Government to alter their decision in that respect: but he wished to enter his protest, in order that he might reserve to himself the right to oppose any further changes in the same direction. There was another point. There were a great many schools in the country of the kind referred to which were in a somewhat embarrassed condition; and the question we had to consider was whether they should go on struggling as they were now doing under all the disadvantages of want of means, or whether we should adopt what he believed to be the right and proper course—the alternative offered by the Act of 1870, of establishing school boards. He trusted it would not be supposed that he was by any means unfriendly to the Code: he was prepared with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stratford, Mr. W. F. Forster, to thank the Vice President of the Council for the admirable review as there were in it; but he had thought it is duty to make these remarks, and he trusted that the Department would see the advantage of having the Code freely and fully discussed.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
That in the Bill now before the House, the words "and the Secretary of State" be inserted.

pleased to direct that the New Code be amended by the omission of Article 19 D."—(Mr. Dixon.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was responsible for the clause limiting the time for the Code being laid upon the Table, and for the reason that it was exceedingly inconvenient for managers and teachers to have a Code hung up a long time after it had been promulgated. It was competent for any hon. Member to move a Resolution with regard to it at any time, and he could not conceive any Government disregarding the result. A special case might be made out for special assistance to the schools described in the Article, which was only to come into force when there was only one public elementary school within three miles of a population of not more than 300. There was a great difficulty in getting good schools in villages so situated. The description in the clause meant, generally speaking, a very poor and sparse population. He hoped it would not be supposed that this was a question of school boards versus denominational or voluntary schools, for it was quite likely that, taking Wales into account, school boards even at present would be as much benefited as voluntary schools by the arrangement in the Code. He was trying to find out what it would be possible for a school to get with 300 inhabitants within three miles, and he could not see that even a capital school, making the best of the Code in such a position, could at present earn more than £30, and for that sum it would not be possible to get good teachers. On the whole, he should have preferred a larger grant for average attendance in the case of such schools, so reserving the system of payment by results. This, however, after all, was a difference in form rather than reality. In fact, his hon. Friend Mr. Dixon, while submitting a Motion, to the effect that the Government was giving too much money, had made a speech rather to the effect that they were giving too little. The hon. Member seemed rather to underestimate what the Government were giving. The alterations in the Code had been made with a great deal of care in that respect, and he trusted whether any hon. Member made it an expensé could say exactly whether it was a gain or a loss. The hon. Member said they would lose; but he did not appear to have quite taken into consideration that they were much more likely to get money out of an increase of the average attendance than from money paid on individual examinations. Four shillings on the average attendance was very considerably more than 4s. on the passes. He differed from his hon. Friend in regard to the desire he expressed that the provision for 250 attendances should be departed from. While they were aiming at a higher standard of education, their great difficulty was the attendance; and they might depend upon it, that if any relaxation of the kind which the hon. Member suggested were made, there would be a falling-off in the attendance every year. He confessed that he was glad to find that the Government had adopted the principle of the Scotch Code, and had said that something was to be paid for the examination of classes in matters which were not confined to the "Three Rs." The time had quite come in which we might so far deviate from the principle of the Revised Code as to make the examination of the classes one of the things for which a grant should be made. He approved very much of the alteration in the standard which required some knowledge of history and geography. It was quite as easy to give children a complete mastery of reading, and make them learn a little geography and history at the same time, as to do so without touching those subjects at all. Thus far he had approved what had been done; but now he would ask the Vice President of the Council to consider whether his hon. Friend was not right in thinking that the turning of 4s. into 2s., unless 40 per cent of the children above seven passed in Standard IV., was not just now requiring too much? In his opinion, it was impossible for any school to fulfil that condition at present. What he looked forward to was this—that as we improved in the number of attendances, and therefore in the quantity of knowledge imparted, we should have to screw up the Standards from time to time. He was afraid managers and masters of schools would consider that money offered on such terms was a mockery. He understood that the examination under C 1., for which 4s. was to be given, was an examination of classes, and not of each child; and that it would appear by the instructions given to the Inspectors that what was meant

was that some children would be picked out and examined, half of those so examined to pass creditably. He did not object to the stipulation that in order to get the money for special subjects 75 per cent must pass in the Standards; because we must always guard against the danger of masters neglecting the children generally, in order to pass some in the special subjects. His noble Friend was grappling with a difficulty which he himself had not been able to combat—that of making needlework a subject of actual examination. He wished his noble Friend success; but he had found it impossible to carry out the object in view, owing to the difficulty of getting from the Inspectors an adequate knowledge of the subject. His noble Friend was liberal with regard to night schools—in fact, perhaps, too generous. The night school, no doubt, had social advantages; but when it came to a question of granting Government money, he thought a school ought to be open 60 times in the year in order to get it. His noble Friend however, had reduced the number of times from 60 to 40. Neither did he like the reduction of the time from an hour and a-half to one hour. There was danger in such a course, of creating among ignorant persons a notion that when public money was obtained on such terms, the education given was not worth the having. At present, night schools were prevented from sending up scholars for special subjects, but such a restriction ought not to be maintained. It might be said, that when we got to higher education we might rely on the South Kensington grant; but that grant was confined to science, and there were many young people who took naturally to history or literature in preference. He was glad to find that the 15s. limit, which he (Mr. Forster) never could get rid of, was to be abolished. He had lately come to the conclusion that it was working badly, because the expenses were increasing. Few things were more dispiriting to managers and teachers than to find that, having earned the money, they lost it, because, in fact, they had earned it. He should support the present or any other Chancellor of the Exchequer in saying there was another safeguard which it would be most dangerous to pass—that for every shilling of Government money another shilling should be found in the locality, either in the shape of fees or voluntary contributions. That was the present provision, and if we departed from that we should lose our grasp of the great principle, which had been hitherto maintained, of Government supervision and inspection combined with local interests and local management.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he thought the House ought to be grateful to the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) for bringing this subject under their consideration. Notwithstanding the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), he could not but regret that they had not had more time to consider the new Code, particularly as he understood the Government intended it to be final for some years. He was, however, happy to find, from his inquiries out-of-doors, that the points of difference which were likely to arise were very few, and that the Code was likely to meet with a great amount of approbation; and, if the 40 per cent restriction on the examination of children in special subjects were modified, the higher class of teachers in the metropolis would offer no objection to the rest of the Code. There was only one school in the whole of Westminster—a district which contained a large number of high-class schools—which could pass 40 per cent of its scholars in the three higher Standards—IV., V., and VI.—and that was the upper school of the Wesleyan training college, which was a commercial and not a elementary school. The National Schools of St. James's, Piccadilly, and St. Martin's-in-the-Fields could not, at the present moment, pass 40 per cent of their scholars in the three higher Standards. It must be remembered that every addition to the standard of attainment required was an additional strain on the teachers; and, if they "screwed up" the standards much higher, they would have to add to the teaching power of our schools. The teachers were employed from 9 to 6 o'clock, with an hour for dinner; and the evening was often spent in preparation or in working with pupil-teachers; while in some places, they were under moral compulsion to teach for an hour or two in the evening. It was a great concession, which would be hailed as a boon, that voluntary and uncertified teachers might in future conduct night schools.

He understood from some of the best elementary teachers in London that children were now leaving school at an earlier age than they used to do, and that was because the London bye-laws spoke of 13 as the limit; it was inferred by parents that that was the age at which elementary education was supposed to be completed, and they were only too ready to avail themselves of such a suggestion. As to the special grant of £10 or £15, he did not see why the limit of three miles was inserted, and why a school in a sparsely-populated district should be denied the grant because there might be a school two miles away from it. They had reason, however, to be thankful to the Government for the consideration they had given to the demands of the teachers. As to night schools, in country districts they were of the greatest advantage and importance, because they gave the children an opportunity of making up for that irregularity of attendance which rural occupations rendered inevitable. Although they might not be so essential in manufacturing districts like those represented by the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster), in agricultural and rural districts night schools were doing a substantial part of the elementary education of the working classes by filling up, as it were, the interstices of their early training. To understand the Code itself was a serious intellectual study; but as far as he had been able to master it, there seemed to be a provision for letting the girls off some portion of the subjects, which the boys were expected to master, in order that they might devote more time to needlework. He regarded that provision as a great advantage to the community generally, for it was a matter of no small importance that the future wives and mothers of this century should be good needlewomen. Another change for the better was that children should be examined after attending for three months, instead of after a certain number of attendances. The additional grant to the teachers was a great boon; and he would like to know whether this grant should be given to all the pupil teachers who were employed in the best schools or whether only to a minimum number? The postponement of the age clauses would be considered a great advantage, and another sensible alteration was the reduction of the time of attendance of infants. He thanked his noble Friend (Viscount Sandon) for the practical improvements which he proposed, and thought the House was indebted to the hon. Member (Mr. Dixon) for the opportunity which had been afforded of discussing these important changes. In the schools with which he was acquainted the managers were willing to co-operate with the Government in raising the standard of education as far as it could properly be raised. This end could not be too quickly attained: progress in this, as in other things, to be sure must be expected to be slow.

MR. STORER, in opposing the Motion, said, the inhabitants of rural districts were exposed to greater difficulties in the maintenance of schools than in the urban districts, and paid much higher rates, while the education given in these schools often caused the boys to migrate to the towns, so that they were educated at the farmers' cost but not for the farmers' advantage. He hoped the hon. Member (Mr. Dixon), on consideration, would not grudge these small rural schools the encouragement which the Government had been kind enough to give them under this clause.

MR. STEVENSON asked whether it was within the power of the Education Department to impose a restriction upon the choice of electors, as had been done by declaring that no teacher of an elementary school would be recognized as a member of a school board? Surely this was a question for the consideration of the electors, and it was going beyond the Education Act of 1870, which disqualified from being elected as members of a school board only the teachers of schools under the Board. Such cases must be rare, and it was not well to prevent the electors from availing themselves of the services of experienced teachers.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD thanked the Government for proposing these alterations in the Code. They suggested a decided improvement in the character of the education which was to be given throughout the country. The remarks of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon), however, as to the difficulty of earning the same amount of assistance as was earned before, seemed to be perfectly well founded. In reference to the requirement that 40 per cent of the children should pass the three higher Standards, he was informed that a considerable number of the teachers and managers of some of the best voluntary schools in the metropolis were of opinion that even in the best schools, 25 per cent would be nearer the mark than 40. If so, that would make a serious deduction from the amount of assistance to be given to voluntary schools. Whether the board schools excelled or failed in their teaching, their pecuniary position was unimpeachable; because the board could levy additional rates to make up any deficiency in their receipts from the grant. Every restrictive rule in the Code, however, operated seriously on the voluntary schools. The hon. Member for Birmingham recommended the universal adoption of school boards; but before those boards could be made acceptable throughout the country, the Elementary Education Act must be restored to its original form, by which more liberty was given than was the case now for religious teaching. A community that was desirous of having a denominational school could not have it under the Act as it stood at present. The people of Scotland under their Elementary Education Act enjoyed that privilege; and he asked, why should it be denied to the people of England? Without greater freedom of religious teaching, it was idle to talk of establishing school boards all over the land. He suggested very seriously to the Government, that in conducting these revisions of the Code, they should bear in mind the peculiar difficulty under which the voluntary schools were now working. If those schools were to hold their ground, they must regain some portion of their liberty, and the teachers must not be muzzled when they spoke on any subject—least of all when they spoke on a subject of such transcendent importance as religion. He trusted no difficulty would be found in considering the point which had been so well raised by the hon. Member for Birmingham.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH complained that the discussion, instead of being confined to the Code, had ranged over the whole subject of the Education Act. His opinion was, that a good deal of exaggeration had been indulged in by both sides. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) and his Friends, on the one hand, exaggerated the amount of sectarian feeling thrown into the

much care into the matter, he was led to believe, upon the best authority, that the effect of the considerable changes to be carried out by the Code—reflecting as it did the idiosyncrasy of England as much as the Scotch Code did the idiosyncrasy of Scotland—would be that ordinary schools would get just as much as before, that good schools would get more, and that very good schools would get a great deal more. That was a result which the House would doubtless wish to see brought about. It was exceedingly difficult to calculate the effect of these large changes, operating as they did over the large surface of more than 2,000,000 of children; but it was hoped that their results would prove satisfactory in every respect. As regarded inspection, he might state that the Government had increased the English staff of Inspectors by 12, and if the number was still too small to secure an efficient system of inspection, it would be increased. An inspection, to be efficient, must not be hurried; it must not consist chiefly of adding up the number of attendances on the part of the children; but it must be such as to awaken the intelligence of the children, and to help and encourage the teachers in their work. He agreed with the suggestion that visits without notice—as they would be termed in future, instead of being called “surprise visits,” which was an objectionable phrase—would be a most valuable mode of increasing the zeal of our school teachers. He would now run rapidly through the points referred to by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon). In the first place, he believed that the effect of the Code would enable the board schools—which, having the resources of the ratepayers at their backs, would be able to secure efficient teachers—to attain the rank of very good schools. The hon. Member had rather blamed him for putting 1s. of the sum given for attendance upon the discipline and organization of the school; but where children were brought together in large masses, the discipline and the organization of the school become of the utmost importance. The hon. Member had further contended that the Standards were too stringent; but he did not think that, upon consideration, the hon. Member would find that his charge was well founded. The truth was that, under the old system, too much credit was given for the mere mechanical acquirement of reading, and it was often discovered that the children having got a certain page by heart, were pretending to read with their books turned upside down. Therefore, by working into the mere mechanical reading a little grammar, physical geography, a little knowledge of the geography of England, and a certain amount of history, it was thought that the mind of the child would not be overburdened, and that the teaching would be rendered more lively. He believed also that the acquirement of reading would thus be rendered more easy. Those were the principal additions which the Government had made to the Standards. They, however, had ventured to require that the children should learn certain standard passages of poetry; and, by adopting this rather high type of education, they had not taken a mere theoretical flight, but had adopted a course that was essentially popular among the poorer classes, and he hoped that the minds of the children would be impressed with the lines taken from many of our best authors, and that these might sometimes be a consolation to them in their hours of labour. The hon. Member had complained of the vote of £10 or £15 in aid of the small board schools; but he had overlooked the fact that that sum was not merely put into the pockets of such schools without any return being required, inasmuch as to get that £10 or £15 they must first obtain £30 to meet it. He did not see his way to get effective schools in the midst of small populations without affording some stimulus of this kind. In a population of 300 there ought to be 50 children at school, and there was to be a certificated teacher, who should be a woman, part of whose duty would be to manage the rough boys of the district. She ought to have £60 a-year, but how was this to be secured without some provision of this sort? Under these circumstances, therefore, he felt that he could appeal with confidence to the hon. Member not to press that part of his Motion which related to this subject. In reducing the grant from 4s. to 2s. for grammar and geography unless 40 per cent of the scholars were presented under the Fourth Standard, their object was to induce teachers to push their scholars into the upper Standards.

Select Committee was a proper tribunal for conducting such an inquiry. He warned those persons in the county of Durham who were inducing the lessees to put forward claims which they could not establish, that great responsibility would rest upon them. Enfranchisement had already been effected to a considerable extent. From a Return made last year it appeared that during the five years ending October 31, 1873, between 70,000 and 80,000 acres of land had been enfranchised, and he believed the number of cases of enfranchisement which had been effected in various ways amounted to about 9,500. The Report of the Commissioners showed that their operations were in a very advanced state; and if the question of perpetuity of tenure were set aside, was there any ground for supposing that they would not be able to deal with the comparatively small matters now in question? At the same time, the Commissioners had only a public duty to discharge, and whatever the judgment of the House might be they would bow to that decision. He could say that the cases of hardship which had been mentioned were wholly unknown to the Commissioners, and that the only claim brought before them had been that for perpetuity of tenure.

MR. GOLDNEY maintained that the petitioners in this case had preferred a claim which was founded in justice. It was all very well to ask what was the use of a Committee; but he, for one, foresaw that it would be productive of great good. A Committee would help Parliament to frame remedial legislation if it were proved that injustice had been done. The lessees in question had for a long time past been trampled upon by the Commissioners. He thought the Commissioners should remember those who had fought the battles of the Church Estates during the Commonwealth. At that period the whole of those estates were sold at 16 or 17 years' purchase, and an Act was passed to confirm those sales. The estates of the Dean and Chapters were exempted from the Act of oblivion. By subsequent Acts it was decided that the claims of lessees should be decided by arbitration, and the Commissioners themselves recognized the claims of the lessees to perpetual renewal. He hoped the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. Pease) would not confine his Motion for a Committee to inquire into the nature of the capitular estates of Durham, but would strike out the word "Durham," and enable the Committee to deal with capitular estates generally. He held it was perfectly reasonable in the present case that the petitioners should appeal to Parliament against the Commissioners. He thought the House ought to grant the inquiry if for no other purpose than to see the enormous power which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were becoming possessed of. It had long been the policy of this country to prevent ecclesiastical corporations becoming largely possessed of property, and the House might therefore be surprised to learn that the net income of these Commissioners in the year 1873 was not less than £903,583. There was no complaint made against the Commissioners as regarded the application of the funds; and they were no doubt appropriating them to very useful purposes; but they were doing, on the one hand, a good act at the expense of a serious wrong on the other. He begged to move, as an Amendment, that the words "Dean and Chapter of Durham" be omitted from the Motion, and the words "Deans and Chapters" substituted.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in line 3, to leave out the words "Dean and Chapter of Durham," in order to insert the words "Deans and Chapters,"—(Mr. Goldney,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'Dean and Chapter of Durham' stand part of the Question."

MR. STEVENSON said, that the leaseholders were fully justified in the alarm they felt on account of the way in which the Act of 1860 had been officially stated as applicable to their case. That Act gave 24 years' enjoyment a-head to the leaseholders then under the Commissioners; but those gentlemen were apt to confound Bills with Acts, for the clause in the Bill of 1860 intended to terminate all church leases in 1884 was struck out, and it was not till the Act of 1868 was passed, that power was obtained for the transfer of the Durham capitular estates; and leases were continually and legally renewed up to 1870, some of which therefore did not expire till 1891.

He complained most, however, of the Dean and Chapter consenting to discontinue the customary renewals after 1870, for the system of voluntary enfranchisement had been working admirably, and under it, without any disturbance of the lessees' interests and without any alarm, the desired change of tenure would have been equitably effected. The speech of the hon. Member for Surrey was a renewal of that mixture of alarming pretensions on the one hand, and of vague assurances of tender consideration on the other, with which the Commissioners had treated the lessees. What he himself desired was enfranchisement on an equitable basis. If the Commissioners chose, they could effect this on terms advantageous to the Church and also to the lessees, and the very able agents of the Commission could readily adjust the terms of such a settlement. He felt bound to say that, though after too long delay, a large number of cases of enfranchisement of house property were being effected in his own borough and on very equitable terms, and he saw no reason why leaseholders in the country should not also be fairly dealt with. The houses he referred to were being conveyed to the holder of the existing 21 years leases on new leases of 999 years, at a fixed annual ground-rent, which, however, was to be revised every 100 years, and re-adjusted according to the price of corn. There was also a licence of alienation, costing £2 2s., required every time the property changed hands or was mortgaged or redeemed—a very heavy charge on a small house. The conveyance was very lengthy and wholly in manuscript. He complained also of the severe and elaborate clauses for the reservation and working of minerals which were sought to be imposed even where the Commissioners conveyed the land as freehold for building, reducing the ownership of the ground to nothing more than the use of the surface for tillage. The South Shields School Board successfully resisted the insertion of such monstrous reservations in one case; but in the case of another school site, the same objectionable clauses had again been proposed.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he thought the House but imperfectly realized the importance of this question or the magnitude of the interests involved. This was not so much an inquiry into the conduct of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners as into the conduct of Parliament during the last 40 years. The matter was brought under the notice of Parliament in 1837 by Mr. Spring Rice, under the Government of Lord Melbourne; and the Committee which sat in 1838-9 reported that the system of raising revenues by fine, always improvident, was particularly disadvantageous to the Church from the peculiarity of its tenure; that it prevented the investment of capital in the permanent improvement of an estate, put a check upon the extension of buildings in some places where they were very much required, and shut out extensive plots of land from the most improved system of agriculture. From that date the system of leasing Church property then in existence was condemned as vicious, and notice was given that it would soon come altogether to an end. The Commissions and Committees with sat between 1839 and 1850 never reported in favour of perpetual renewal. The Committee of the House of Lords in 1851 reported expressly against the right of perpetual renewal, and they were now asked, after two investigations of the subject by Parliament, to set aside the legislation which had been founded on the Reports of the Committees of this and of the other House of Parliament. The Act of 1851 recognized the rights of the lessees, and under that Act respect had been paid to the long-continued practice of renewal, and what was wanted now was that Parliament should recognize a perpetual right of renewal. The legislation of 1854 and 1860 was still more favourable to the lessees. It had been said that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had administered the law harshly, and in a sense not contemplated by Parliament. He repudiated that statement. They had followed the course prescribed by Parliament, and the law had been justly and fairly administered. The inquiry which they were invited to make would lead them to remote historical periods; and if it was extended in the way proposed by the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney), it would involve an inquiry into the titles of all the lands possessed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Parliament had decided this question long ago; and it was only because there were so many Members now in the House not acquainted with the course of legislation on this question that they were asked to re-open it. In the interests, not of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who were quite ready for such an inquiry, but in the interests of the consistency of the Legislature he hoped the House would not grant the inquiry.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, his only object in rising was to point out to the House what was the actual question before it. Every one who had read the memorial of these parties must have been struck by the fact that they had some notion of their own that they were not leaseholders, but customary tenants, and were entitled to be treated differently from other beneficial lessees, who had come under the operation of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners' Act. That case had to a very great extent broken down, and they had, therefore, brought a sort of imaginary grievance before the House, and the administration of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners was impugned. If these persons claimed any right which they did not now possess, let the question be decided in a Court of Law and not in the House of Commons. The hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment (Mr. Goldney) wanted to extend the inquiry from the particular, real, or supposed grievance of these persons to the whole acts of the Commissioners. Now, it would be hardly fair, when they were considering a particular grievance, to discuss the whole work of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners without the slightest notice either to the Government or the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The Commissioners had discharged their difficult duties most thoroughly and most honestly, and the fact that during 25 years no inquiry had been asked or granted into their conduct was a sufficient proof that no great grievance had arisen under their administration. He hoped the House would not now grant any such inquiry; and if the parties whose case had been brought forward suffered any hardship from the character of this Bill, let the question be decided in a Court of Law.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he would withdraw his Amendment, and bring it forward as a substantive Motion.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—NEW CODE, 1875.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. DIXON rose to call attention to the New Code; and to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to direct that the New Code be amended by the omission of Article 19 D."

The hon. Member said, that every new Code issued by the Education Department possessed an increasing interest, in this respect at any rate—that it affected a greater number of persons and interests of increasing magnitude; and the Code had the power of regulating the principles which guided the education of the country to an extent that was not always understood, and certainly had not been fully considered. One point connected with the new Codes issued by the Education Department had not received sufficient attention—namely, the great difficulty of properly discussing their provisions by the House. The Act of 1870 provided that the Code must be laid on the Table of the House for 30 days before it became effective; but it might happen, as in the present instance, that the Easter holidays would deduct a considerable portion of that time, and thus the chance of a Member who wished to bring forward the subject of obtaining priority by ballot on Tuesday was lessened considerably. He had been compelled to bring the matter forward after a consideration of merely a few hours. The exact operation of these Codes, moreover, was very difficult to understand, and how were Members not only to make up their own minds within the 30 days, but to obtain the opinion of those persons in the country to whom hon. Members were accustomed to turn for advice and assistance in such matters? He would suggest to the Government that when any future Code was challenged the Government should be bound to find a night for the discussion before the Code came into operation. He did not approach the Code in any unfriendly spirit. On the contrary, he expressed his gratification—he might almost say his gratitude—to the Vice President of the Committee of Council for the great improvement that the Code had ushered in. The great object of the Code, if he understood it correctly, was to improve the quality of education in the elementary schools, and that was done by making the condition of the grant more difficult, or, in other words, by making a larger amount of education necessary for the attainment of the same amount of grant. In this feature of the new Code he fully concurred. This matter had been fully discussed by the London and provincial school boards, which agreed that education in the elementary schools was to be chiefly developed by a more complete adoption of the system of payment by results. The difficulty in the way was the necessity for 250 attendances before any grant could be made on the examination in the Standards. It was felt that this necessity had a very discouraging effect upon many schools. It deprived them of grants in the case of children who, though they had not made 250 attendances, were yet able to earn grants by passing in the Standards. The proposition was almost unanimously adopted that the 250 attendances should be done away with, and that a system based upon payment in proportion to increased attainments should be substituted. The new Code did not follow the first part of the recommendation, and he was very much afraid that a very deserving class of schools throughout the country would find that they were in a worse position than they were before. The schools that would mainly suffer would be the board schools in the large towns. He would notice some of the reasons why he thought that effect would be produced. Under Clause 19 A a new condition of the grant was imposed, whereby, in the event of a deficiency of discipline and organization in the school, a deduction of 1s. would be made. To that he did not object. The next point was that the standards were certainly raised very considerably, in this way—that it was necessary that in the higher standards the reading should be “with intelligence.” This was, undoubtedly, an enormous step in advance. Another advance was made in writing, though not to so great an extent. He entirely approved of the provision that from Standard II. upwards the children should be required to pass an elementary examination in grammar, geography, and history; but the effect of this increased stringency of the Code would be to diminish the grant. In time the schools would no doubt work up to the Standard; but for the moment

the effect would be a diminution of the amount of grant earned. Besides, there was an important reduction of 3s. in the grant on reading, writing, and arithmetic—namely, a reduction from 4s. to 3s. in each of those subjects. On the other hand, an advance was promised on the average attendance of children above seven years of age, provided they were to pass the examination creditably in two of the four subjects—grammar, geography, history, and needlework; and an addition was made to the grant for passing in additional subjects. But there was a condition attached to the grant of 4s. on the average attendance—namely, that 40 per cent of the scholars must be presented in Standards IV, V, and VI, and if that condition were not fulfilled the amount would be reduced to 2s. Now, with regard to the probability of the fulfilment of that condition, what was the result of the examinations last year? It was found that only 16 per cent of the children who were present at the examination were presented in Standards IV. and upwards, and therefore an enormous jump had been made all at once from 16 per cent to 40 per cent. So that it was absolutely impossible for some years to come to have the 4s., and it was in reality a question of only 2s. But then there was a condition attached even to the 2s., that condition being that one-half of the children must pass creditably; and what were the chances of one-half passing creditably? He had no figures as to the probable result with respect to the 2s.; but last year the Report showed that of the children on the register of the schools only one-third passed the examination in the three R's. Now, what was required was that 50 per cent of the numbers who had been on the register for three months should pass, and he would ask, if only one-third passed in the three R's last year, what were the probabilities of one-half of the children passing now that the standards were raised? He was inclined to think that the value of the 2s. was very considerably diminished by that consideration. Again, the grant for specific subjects had been increased from 3s. to 4s. That, of course, everybody would approve of; but the value of this increase was diminished by the condition appended, that 75 per cent of those who were present must pass. Whilst strongly

in favour of raising the Code, and whilst he hoped that the same course would be adopted by succeeding Ministers, he could not help thinking that it had been done with too little regard to pecuniary considerations. The schools which would be most disadvantageously affected would, he believed, be the board schools in large towns. With respect to the second part of this subject, he found in Clause 19 B that the schools in the country—the small schools in the rural districts—were not affected by any means in the same way. Instead of trying to uphold the principle of payment by results and, as far as possible, to strengthen and carry it out—even at the cost of a large pecuniary sacrifice in the case of many schools in large towns—he found that instead of trying to carry out that principle still further, the Government was deviating from it, and a re-action was setting in in a direction which was the very reverse of payment by results. Certain grants were to be made without any reference to increased efficiency or greater results. He did not expect to be able to induce the Government to alter their decision in that respect; but he wished to enter his protest, in order that he might reserve to himself the right to oppose any further changes in the same direction. There was another point. There were a great many schools in the country of the kind referred to which were in a somewhat embarrassed condition; and the question we had to consider was whether they should go on struggling as they were now doing under all the disadvantages of want of means, or whether we should adopt what he believed to be the right and proper course—the alternative offered by the Act of 1870, of establishing school boards. He trusted it would not be supposed that he was by any means unfriendly to the Code; he was prepared, with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), to thank the Vice President of the Council for the admirable provisions there were in it; but he had thought it is duty to make these comments, and he trusted that the Department would see the advantage of having the Code freely and fully discussed.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously

pleased to direct that the New Code be amended by the omission of Article 19 D.”—(Mr. Dixon.)

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he was responsible for the clause limiting the time for the Code being laid upon the Table, and for the reason that it was exceedingly inconvenient for managers and teachers to have a Code hung up a long time after it had been promulgated. It was competent for any hon. Member to move a Resolution with regard to it at any time, and he could not conceive any Government disregarding the result. A special case might be made out for special assistance to the schools described in the Article, which was only to come into force when there was only one public elementary school within three miles of a population of not more than 300. There was a great difficulty in getting good schools in villages so situated. The description in the clause meant, generally speaking, a very poor and sparse population. He hoped it would not be supposed that this was a question of school boards versus denominational or voluntary schools, for it was quite likely that, taking Wales into account, school boards even at present would be as much benefited as voluntary schools by the arrangement in the Code. He was trying to find out what it would be possible for a school to get with 300 inhabitants within three miles, and he could not see that even a capital school, making the best of the Code in such a position, could at present earn more than £30, and for that sum it would not be possible to get good teachers. On the whole, he should have preferred a larger grant for average attendance in the case of such schools, so reserving the system of payment by results. This, however, after all, was a difference in form rather than reality. In fact, his hon. Friend (Mr. Dixon) while submitting a Motion, to the effect that the Government was giving too much money, had made a speech rather to the effect that they were giving too little. The hon. Member seemed rather to underrate what the Government were giving. The alterations in the Code had been made with a great deal of care in that respect, and he doubted whether any man, however much of an expert, could say exactly whether schools would lose or win. The hon. Member said they would lose; but he did not appear to have quite taken into consideration that they were much more likely to get money out of an increase of the average attendance than from money paid on individual examinations. Four shillings on the average attendance was very considerably more than 4s. on the passes. He differed from his hon. Friend in regard to the desire he expressed that the provision for 250 attendances should be departed from. While they were aiming at a higher standard of education, their great difficulty was the attendance; and they might depend upon it, that if any relaxation of the kind which the hon. Member suggested were made, there would be a falling-off in the attendance every year. He confessed that he was glad to find that the Government had adopted the principle of the Scotch Code, and had said that something was to be paid for the examination of classes in matters which were not confined to the "Three Rs." The time had quite come in which we might so far deviate from the principle of the Revised Code as to make the examination of the classes one of the things for which a grant should be made. He approved very much of the alteration in the standard which required some knowledge of history and geography. It was quite as easy to give children a complete mastery of reading, and make them learn a little geography and history at the same time, as to do so without touching those subjects at all. Thus far he had approved what had been done; but now he would ask the Vice President of the Council to consider whether his hon. Friend was not right in thinking that the turning of 4s. into 2s., unless 40 per cent of the children above seven passed in Standard IV., was not just now requiring too much? In his opinion, it was impossible for any school to fulfil that condition at present. What he looked forward to was this—that as we improved in the number of attendances, and therefore in the quantity of knowledge imparted, we should have to screw up the Standards from time to time. He was afraid managers and masters of schools would consider that money offered on such terms was a mockery. He understood that the examination under C 1., for which 4s. was to be given, was an examination of classes, and not of each child; and that it would appear by the instructions given to the Inspectors that what was meant

was that some children would be picked out and examined, half of those so examined to pass creditably. He did not object to the stipulation that in order to get the money for special subjects 75 per cent must pass in the Standards; because we must always guard against the danger of masters neglecting the children generally, in order to pass some in the special subjects. His noble Friend was grappling with a difficulty which he himself had not been able to combat—that of making needlework a subject of actual examination. He wished his noble Friend success; but he had found it impossible to carry out the object in view, owing to the difficulty of getting from the Inspectors an adequate knowledge of the subject. His noble Friend was liberal with regard to night schools—in fact, perhaps, too generous. The night school, no doubt, had social advantages; but when it came to a question of granting Government money, he thought a school ought to be open 60 times in the year in order to get it. His noble Friend however, had reduced the number of times from 60 to 40. Neither did he like the reduction of the time from an hour and a-half to one hour. There was danger in such a course, of creating among ignorant persons a notion that when public money was obtained on such terms, the education given was not worth the having. At present, night schools were prevented from sending up scholars for special subjects, but such a restriction ought not to be maintained. It might be said, that when we got to higher education we might rely on the South Kensington grant; but that grant was confined to science, and there were many young people who took naturally to history or literature in preference. He was glad to find that the 15s. limit, which he (Mr. Forster) never could get rid of, was to be abolished. He had lately come to the conclusion that it was working badly, because the expenses were increasing. Few things were more dispiriting to managers and teachers than to find that, having earned the money, they lost it, because, in fact, they had earned it. He should support the present or any other Chancellor of the Exchequer in saying there was another safeguard which it would be most dangerous to pass—that for every shilling of Government money another shilling should be found in the locality, either in the shape of fees or voluntary contributions. That was the present provision, and if we departed from that we should lose our grasp of the great principle, which had been hitherto maintained, of Government supervision and inspection combined with local interests and local management.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he thought the House ought to be grateful to the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) for bringing this subject under their consideration. Notwithstanding the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), he could not but regret that they had not had more time to consider the new Code, particularly as he understood the Government intended it to be final for some years. He was, however, happy to find, from his inquiries out-of-doors, that the points of difference which were likely to arise were very few, and that the Code was likely to meet with a great amount of approbation; and, if the 40 per cent restriction on the examination of children in special subjects were modified, the higher class of teachers in the metropolis would offer no objection to the rest of the Code. There was only one school in the whole of Westminster—a district which contained a large number of high-class schools—which could pass 40 per cent of its scholars in the three higher Standards—IV., V., and VI.—and that was the upper school of the Wesleyan training college, which was a commercial and not a elementary school. The National Schools of St. James's, Piccadilly, and St. Martin's-in-the-Fields could not, at the present moment, pass 40 per cent of their scholars in the three higher Standards. It must be remembered that every addition to the standard of attainment required was an additional strain on the teachers; and, if they "screwed up" the standards much higher, they would have to add to the teaching power of our schools. The teachers were employed from 9 to 6 o'clock, with an hour for dinner; and the evening was often spent in preparation or in working with pupil-teachers; while in some places, they were under moral compulsion to teach for an hour or two in the evening. It was a great concession, which would be hailed as a boon, that voluntary and uncertified teachers might in future conduct night schools.

He understood from some of the best elementary teachers in London that children were now leaving school at an earlier age than they used to do, and that was because the London bye-laws spoke of 13 as the limit; it was inferred by parents that that was the age at which elementary education was supposed to be completed, and they were only too ready to avail themselves of such a suggestion. As to the special grant of £10 or £15, he did not see why the limit of three miles was inserted, and why a school in a sparsely-populated district should be denied the grant because there might be a school two miles away from it. They had reason, however, to be thankful to the Government for the consideration they had given to the demands of the teachers. As to night schools, in country districts they were of the greatest advantage and importance, because they gave the children an opportunity of making up for that irregularity of attendance which rural occupations rendered inevitable. Although they might not be so essential in manufacturing districts like those represented by the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster), in agricultural and rural districts night schools were doing a substantial part of the elementary education of the working classes by filling up, as it were, the interstices of their early training. To understand the Code itself was a serious intellectual study; but as far as he had been able to master it, there seemed to be a provision for letting the girls off some portion of the subjects, which the boys were expected to master, in order that they might devote more time to needlework. He regarded that provision as a great advantage to the community generally, for it was a matter of no small importance that the future wives and mothers of this century should be good needlewomen. Another change for the better was that children should be examined after attending for three months, instead of after a certain number of attendances. The additional grant to the teachers was a great boon; and he would like to know whether this grant should be given to all the pupil teachers who were employed in the best schools or whether only to a minimum number? The postponement of the age clauses would be considered a great advantage, and another sensible alteration was the reduction of the time of attendance of infants. He thanked his noble Friend (Viscount Sandon) for the practical improvements which he proposed, and thought the House was indebted to the hon. Member (Mr. Dixon) for the opportunity which had been afforded of discussing these important changes. In the schools with which he was acquainted the managers were willing to co-operate with the Government in raising the standard of education as far as it could properly be raised. This end could not be too quickly attained: progress in this, as in other things, to be sure must be expected to be slow.

MR. STORER, in opposing the Motion, said, the inhabitants of rural districts were exposed to greater difficulties in the maintenance of schools than in the urban districts, and paid much higher rates, while the education given in these schools often caused the boys to migrate to the towns, so that they were educated at the farmers' cost but not for the farmers' advantage. He hoped the hon. Member (Mr. Dixon), on consideration, would not grudge these small rural schools the encouragement which the Government had been kind enough to give them under this clause.

MR. STEVENSON asked whether it was within the power of the Education Department to impose a restriction upon the choice of electors, as had been done by declaring that no teacher of an elementary school would be recognized as a member of a school board? Surely this was a question for the consideration of the electors, and it was going beyond the Education Act of 1870, which disqualified from being elected as members of a school board only the teachers of schools under the Board. Such cases must be rare, and it was not well to prevent the electors from availing themselves of the services of experienced teachers.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD thanked the Government for proposing these alterations in the Code. They suggested a decided improvement in the character of the education which was to be given throughout the country. The remarks of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon), however, as to the difficulty of earning the same amount of assistance as was earned before, seemed to be perfectly well founded. In reference to the requirement that 40 per cent of the children should pass the three higher Standards, he was informed that a considerable number of the teachers and managers of some of the best voluntary schools in the metropolis were of opinion that even in the best schools, 25 per cent would be nearer the mark than 40. If so, that would make a serious deduction from the amount of assistance to be given to voluntary schools. Whether the board schools excelled or failed in their teaching, their pecuniary position was unimpeachable; because the board could levy additional rates to make up any deficiency in their receipts from the grant. Every restrictive rule in the Code, however, operated seriously on the voluntary schools. The hon. Member for Birmingham recommended the universal adoption of school boards; but before those boards could be made acceptable throughout the country, the Elementary Education Act must be restored to its original form, by which more liberty was given than was the case now for religious teaching. A community that was desirous of having a denominational school could not have it under the Act as it stood at present. The people of Scotland under their Elementary Education Act enjoyed that privilege; and he asked, why should it be denied to the people of England? Without greater freedom of religious teaching, it was idle to talk of establishing school boards all over the land. He suggested very seriously to the Government, that in conducting these revisions of the Code, they should bear in mind the peculiar difficulty under which the voluntary schools were now working. If those schools were to hold their ground, they must regain some portion of their liberty, and the teachers must not be muzzled when they spoke on any subject—least of all when they spoke on a subject of such transcendent importance as religion. He trusted no difficulty would be found in considering the point which had been so well raised by the hon. Member for Birmingham.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH complained that the discussion, instead of being confined to the Code, had ranged over the whole subject of the Education Act. His opinion was, that a good deal of exaggeration had been indulged in by both sides. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) and his Friends, on the one hand, exaggerated the amount of sectarian feeling thrown into the teaching in the elementary schools connected with the denominations. But, on the other hand, there was quite as much exaggeration in asserting that the teaching in board schools was purely secular. Returns recently presented, showed that an amount of religious teaching was given in board schools which might fairly satisfy the hon. Gentleman who had last spoken. He begged to thank the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council for the improvements he seemed to have introduced into the Code of this year. Many of the changes now made were such as he and others in that House had urged when the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) was at the Education Office, and, as a whole, they were in a wise direction. Another improvement was the introduction of a standard above the Sixth, the object of which was to enable children to be presented in extra subjects. This would serve as an inducement to parents to keep their children longer at school. It was, moreover, gratifying to see that in addition to the periodical examinations, it was proposed to have something like a regular system of visits by Inspectors without notice. But, at the same time, he thought that if that system was to be properly carried out, the staff of Inspectors would have to be increased. In regard to the Agricultural Children Act, he was glad to see that facilities had been given for obtaining the certificates needed under it, and he thought that steps should at once be taken with a view to putting that Act into force; inasmuch as there might otherwise be a serious interference with farm work, by suddenly requiring that the children were to be sent to school, after the farmers had been led to think that the old system was to be allowed to go on. As to the Motion of the hon. Member for Birmingham, he thought it a very small matter, affecting but few schools and involving no great principle.

Mr. LYON PLAYFAIR said, he hoped the hon. Member for Birmingham would withdraw the Motion which he had submitted. He assumed, in making this suggestion, that his noble Friend would keep to the conditions of the Code as it stood. If the proposition of the hon. Member for West Kent (Mr. J. G. Talbot) was adopted, it would simply be a premium to small schools. If there were any managers of schools or teachers who complained that the Code established too high a standard, their fears might be allayed by the fact that this was practically the Code which had been in operation in Scotland, where it was found that a great deal more money could be made by that than by any inferior Code. The principle of this improved Code was a very wise one, because it did less for mere mechanical results, and more for intellectual teaching. It infused a higher intelligence into the schools, and it was that higher intelligence which produced the good results. All experience showed that unless schools were forced to pass the higher Standards—above the Fourth—the money spent on the education of the children was almost thrown away, because it was only then that they came to acquire the knowledge that was necessary to fit them for the ordinary business of life. Any increased grant given in that direction was given for permanent results useful to the nation, and he congratulated the noble Lord on the advance he had made in the Code, which would be of great use to the country.

SIR THOMAS AGLAND said, that under the operation of the Code, of late years the tendency had been to push needlework aside, which was a very serious matter with regard to the happiness of the working man's family. He would suggest whether something might not be done to check that tendency, and restore needlework to its proper position in our schools.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he could not sufficiently thank the House for the cordial reception it had given to the new Revised Code, which, on the part of the Government, he had had the pleasure of laying on the Table a few-days ago. He must, however, demur to the complimentary remark of the hon. Member for West Kent (Mr. J. G. Talbot), that in preparing that Code he had risen above the prejudices of the Department to which he belonged, and had struck out a new line for himself. He wished it to be clearly understood that, although the Government had taken much trouble in perfecting the Code, the chief credit in preparing it belonged to Sir Francis Sandford, the head of the permanent staff of the Department, to whose indefatigable labour, mastery of details, and public spirit the merit of the Code was principally owing. Having gone with much care into the matter, he was led to believe, upon the best authority, that the effect of the considerable changes to be carried out by the Code—reflecting as it did the idiosyncrasy of England as much as the Scotch Code did the idiosyncrasy of Scotland—would be that ordinary schools would get just as much as before, that good schools would get more, and that very good schools would get a great deal more. That was a result which the House would doubtless wish to see brought about. It was exceedingly difficult to calculate the effect of these large changes, operating as they did over the large surface of more than 2,000,000 of children; but it was hoped that their results would prove satisfactory in every respect. As regarded inspection, he might state that the Government had increased the English staff of Inspectors by 12, and if the number was still too small to secure an efficient system of inspection, it would be increased. An inspection, to be efficient, must not be hurried; it must not consist chiefly of adding up the number of attendances on the part of the children; but it must be such as to awaken the intelligence of the children, and to help and encourage the teachers in their work. He agreed with the suggestion that visits without notice—as they would be termed in future, instead of being called “surprise visits,” which was an objectionable phrase—would be a most valuable mode of increasing the zeal of our school teachers. He would now run rapidly through the points referred to by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon). In the first place, he believed that the effect of the Code would enable the board schools—which, having the resources of the ratepayers at their backs, would be able to secure efficient teachers—to attain the rank of very good schools. The hon. Member had rather blamed him for putting 1s. of the sum given for attendance upon the discipline and organization of the school; but where children were brought together in large masses, the discipline and the organization of the school become of the utmost importance. The hon. Member had further contended that the Standards were too stringent; but he did not think that, upon consideration, the hon. Member would find that his charge was well founded. The truth was that, under the old system, too much credit was given for the mere mechanical acquirement of reading, and it was often discovered that the children having got a certain page by heart, were pretending to read with their books turned upside down. Therefore, by working into the mere mechanical reading a little grammar, physical geography, a little knowledge of the geography of England, and a certain amount of history, it was thought that the mind of the child would not be overburdened, and that the teaching would be rendered more lively. He believed also that the acquirement of reading would thus be rendered more easy. Those were the principal additions which the Government had made to the Standards. They, however, had ventured to require that the children should learn certain standard passages of poetry; and, by adopting this rather high type of education, they had not taken a mere theoretical flight, but had adopted a course that was essentially popular among the poorer classes, and he hoped that the minds of the children would be impressed with the lines taken from many of our best authors, and that these might sometimes be a consolation to them in their hours of labour. The hon. Member had complained of the vote of £10 or £15 in aid of the small board schools; but he had overlooked the fact that that sum was not merely put into the pockets of such schools without any return being required, inasmuch as to get that £10 or £15 they must first obtain £30 to meet it. He did not see his way to get effective schools in the midst of small populations without affording some stimulus of this kind. In a population of 300 there ought to be 50 children at school, and there was to be a certificated teacher, who should be a woman, part of whose duty would be to manage the rough boys of the district. She ought to have £60 a-year, but how was this to be secured without some provision of this sort? Under these circumstances, therefore, he felt that he could appeal with confidence to the hon. Member not to press that part of his Motion which related to this subject. In reducing the grant from 4s. to 2s. for grammar and geography unless 40 per cent of the scholars were presented under the Fourth Standard, their object was to induce teachers to push their scholars into the upper Standards.

The observations that had been made on the subject of the alteration by his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) and other hon. Members would, he could assure the House, receive the most careful consideration of the Department. Allusion had also been made to the night schools, to which he might say he attached much importance. Whether or not night schools were to become part of the general system of the education of the country was a problem which probably those who came after them would settle. Children now left, and would, he feared, continue to leave the schools at 10, 11, or 12 years of age, and it would be difficult, if not impossible, for them not to lose most of what they had learnt at school. He imagined that when the State adopted the principle that the people should be educated, it was intended that even if children did not remain at school after the age of 12 they should retain what they had already acquired, and no way of enabling them to keep the education they had got was so good as leading them to attend night school voluntarily. It was therefore worth while for the State to encourage them to do so. His right hon. Friend had referred to the fact that there had been an alteration of the hours of teaching—that alteration had been made after much consideration, and had been made in the hope that if instead of an hour-and-a-half's dry teaching they substituted an hour of steady work with a half-hour of singing and other subjects of attraction, a greater number of children would be induced to attend the schools. They were also prepared to allow volunteer teachers to attend the night schools, provided the Inspectors passed them as qualified—in the hope of enlisting a great deal of the educational enthusiasm of the country in the work in which they were engaged. The suggestion of his right hon. Friend that grants should be given for special subjects in the night schools would receive careful attention; but it was one as to which he could not give an answer off-hand, concerning, as it did, the Treasury as well as the Educational Department. He (Viscount Sandon) thought he had touched on all the principal subjects alluded to in the debate, and he was glad to find that the hon. Member for West Kent (Mr. J. G. Talbot) supported the Government, because he had large experience in the question of education. The hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. Stevenson) demurred to the provision forbidding masters of schools to be members of school boards. In the Department they had looked at this point from the side of the schools, and thought it their duty to follow former rules prohibiting schoolmasters from undertaking any business which would interfere with their school duties. But they had no idea of casting a slur upon the masters or teachers, many of whom were far superior to some of the members of small school boards. This was a complicated matter, and before he could give any answer with regard to it he must consult the Lord President and others. He quite concurred in what the hon. Member for North Devon (Sir Thomas Acland) had said as to the importance of teaching the girls in the schools needlework, and could assure him that the subject had not been overlooked. Within the last fortnight he had communicated with every Inspector in England on the subject, and a large number of them had assured him that needlework was well taught; and the object in view was that every encouragement should be given to that branch of instruction. It was said that girls were oppressed with an undue amount of arithmetic; but the fact was that the general usage of the Inspectors had been to put to girls less difficult questions on arithmetic than to boys because they found that they were rather over-burdened with needlework. It was not the case that needlework was to be treated as an extra subject; but a provision was made to meet the views that had been expressed. It was absolutely necessary that the girls should learn needlework, or the schools would not get the grant; and if the girls did the work in the presence of the Inspectors, and it was taught systematically, they would get a grant of 2s. more. He altogether sympathized with the wish of the hon. Member for North Devon that everything that was possible should be done to improve the homes of the labourers, and that they should have good and practical wives, and he would venture to call attention to the specific subjects in the 4th Schedule—mechanics, physiology, and all sorts of grand things—to which he had ventured to add “domestic economy” for girls, which included the subjects of food and its preparation; clothing and materials. The dwelling; warming, cleaning, and ventilation. Washing materials and their use. Rules for health; the management of a sick room. Cottage income, expenditure, and savings, in which subjects if they passed they would obtain an extra grant of 4s., just as boys would in physical geography. In the present Code the Government had endeavoured to carry out the promises they made last year. Their great object was to secure that there were thoroughly good schools within the reach of all the population of this country, providing that sort of education which the best class of labourers would think most fitted for their children. In that object he trusted they would succeed. He thanked the House for the support they had received, and he looked forward to considerable effects resulting from an improved Code which had been the joint work of hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he had on a former occasion explained to the House that the Acts on the subject of Corrupt Practices at Elections and Election Petitions would shortly expire, and, in conformity with the pledge he had given to the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon), he begged now to move that a Select Committee be appointed.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of 'The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854,' 'The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868,' and 'The Corrupt Practices Commissioners Expenses Act, 1869,' and the several Acts by which the same have been respectively continued and amended, and to report whether any and what further measures are necessary for the prevention of Corrupt Practices at Parliamentary Elections."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

MR. CHARLES LEWIS proposed, as an Amendment, to add, "and what, if any, improvements may be made in the law relating to the trial of Election Petitions." He feared the concluding words of the Motion would have the effect of narrowing the inquiry. Many

hon. Members believed there was no necessity for imposing on candidates for seats in the House more restrictions with reference to corrupt practices, and as regarded the modern trial of Election Petitions, they were not satisfied with the present system, and therefore were anxious to satisfy themselves that this inquiry would not be entered upon with a foregone conclusion. If an understanding could be arrived at that the inquiry and Report should not be limited, both sides of the House would be content.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to add the words "and what, if any, improvements may be made in the Law relating to the trial of Election Petitions."—(Mr. Charles Lewis.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he believed there was no substantial difference between the Attorney General and himself with regard to the Motion before the House; but he wished to add at the end of the hon. and learned Gentleman's Motion the words, "for the trial and determination of Parliamentary Election Petitions, and otherwise to amend the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868." His object was merely to guide the Committee as to the subject-matter on which they would have to Report. He thought they ought to give the new system a fair trial; but they had observed it far enough to see that it had not worked with such success as to be incapable of improvement. If the hon. and learned Attorney General thought the words of his Amendment were too large he should be glad to accept any limitation which might be considered desirable.

MR. GREGORY said, he thought it would be well for the Attorney General to consider the suggestion thrown out by the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry, that the two last lines of the original Motion should be struck out, and that the Committee should be simply one of inquiry into all these Acts.

MR. O'CONOR supported the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry. He was anxious to see a Committee which would have the largest possible powers of inquiry, and he should altogether object to limiting the scope of that inquiry. It ought to have power to go into the Act of 1868, and to suggest any alterations it might think proper as to the constitution of the Court. He also thought that all the three countries—England, Ireland, and Scotland—should be represented on the Committee.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER objected to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. C. Lewis), as it would give the Committee more work than it could do in the present Session. Instead of one Committee there might be two if the Amendments were accepted—one to inquire into the working of the Prevention of Corrupt Practices Act, and the other to inquire as to the Act of 1868, also to devise the best mode of obviating its defects, and to decide questions affecting the validity of Returns.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL explained that although the Motion had not been brought on at the previous night's sitting, he had, at the close of that sitting, given Notice that he would bring it on the next evening. Nothing was further from his intention than to limit the scope of the inquiry by the last words of the Motion. It was his desire that the Committee should inquire into the operation of the three Acts of Parliament and examine whether they had worked well or worked ill, and what Amendments should be made in them. He would have no objection, however, to leave out the concluding words of his Motion—namely, "whether any and what further measures are necessary for the prevention of Corrupt Practices at Parliamentary elections," and to substitute for them the words "and to report them to the House."

Mr. O'CONOR stated that he had not intended to impute any irregularity whatever to the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "report," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "thereon to the House,"—instead thereof.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Words added.

[BILL 60.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Sheridan).

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would assent to the second reading, on the understanding that the Bill should not proceed further until the Select Committee had had an opportunity of examining it.

Motion agreed to.

Bill committed to the Select Committee on Loans to Foreign States.

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Cawley, Mr. Cooper-Temple, Mr. Norwood, Sir Henry Wolff.)

COMMITTEE. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [3rd March], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for Committee on the Public Worship Facilities Bill;" and which Amendment was, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Monk),—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. J. G. TALBOT was quite ready to admit that there were grievances which this Bill would meet, and which, as an attached member of the Church of England, he did not desire should remain undressed. It was undesirable, however, to alter any part of their ecclesiastical arrangements without showing absolute ground for making such an alteration, and this Bill would make a considerable alteration in their parochial system. The case which he had been especially anxious to meet was that in which an incumbent neglected the cure of souls committed to his charge, and, at the same time, prevented anybody else from doing so. If the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) would withdraw his Amendment he would propose not merely that the Bill but that the whole subject should be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. RAIKES, while admitting that the Bill intended to carry out a very desirable object, observed that it affected, to a considerable extent, the whole fabric of the Church establishment in this country. In its essential principle the Bill was opposed to the parochial system, and substituted for it another system, which, while it might be a good one, ought, at all events, not to be adopted without the fullest deliberation and inquiry. If the Bill became law it would constitute in every parish, to which it applied, a divided authority, and would establish a system under which two clergymen of the Church of England would be the only two men in the parish who under no circumstances would speak to each other. It would create a state of schism within the Church which they had hitherto believed was to be found only in bodies outside of the Church, and would give facilities to parties in the Church to carry out those extreme tendencies on the one side or the other which they thought they had gone a long way to repress by the Act of last year. The hon. Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) spoke of providing churches of refuge in the Church of England; but he (Mr. Raikes) thought that the existence of these little ecclesiastical Alsacias was alien to the principle of an Establishment. The Bill would also create a new sacerdotal caste within the Church of England. It would establish an order of clergymen who would not have the cure of souls, but who would be preachers, and it would recognize a sort of regular order of clergy as opposed to the secular order of clergy. The clergy to be appointed under the Bill would only have the power to administer the rites of the Church in the buildings in which they were entitled to preach; and therefore if any members of their congregation happened to be in extremis they would have to call on the incumbents whose services they had discarded, or the preachers whom they followed must break the law in order to administer to them on their death-beds the last rites of the Church. The most obvious objection, however, to the Bill was that it was the corollary of disestablishment, and ought not to be proposed first. In a parish where the incumbent was unpopular another clergyman would be introduced, who would probably be a good preacher, and who would therefore attract a large number from the parish church. They would thus see the parish church empty, and the man who did no apparent work receiving the emoluments; and if they desired it they could scarcely have a stronger argument for disestablishment. He hoped, therefore, that the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt) would consent to refer the Bill to a Select Committee.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he only desired in supporting the Bill to promote union in the Church. On the whole, he thought the best course would be to adopt the proposal to refer the Bill to a Select Committee.

MR. WHITWELL said, he hoped the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) would withdraw his Amendment. He took an entirely different view of the subject from that taken by the hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Raikes), and trusted that it would be referred to a Committee upstairs.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, the Notice Paper showed that it would not be an easy matter to get the Bill through Committee. He thought the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt) would best consult his own intentions in agreeing to the Motion to refer it to a Select Committee, where the subject could be thoroughly thrashed out, and where, at the same time, the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) would have the best opportunity of stating his objections to this measure.

MR. ASSHETON said, when he came to look with quiet attention at this question he saw the necessity for considering it seriously. There was one reason why he wished to touch upon the subject, and it was this—that there was no provision in the Bill for payment of clergymen who might be appointed to officiate in licensed houses. Now, that was wrong. It was to any clergyman who might officiate in such houses a question of bread and butter, and if provision in the way of payment were not made for him, how was he to subsist? If the hon. Member for Gloucester pressed his Amendment he would vote with him.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS observed, that the object of the hon. Member for Stafford was to give further facilities for public worship. No one could doubt that there were cases in which incumbents were unable to afford the facilities which were required by their parishioners. The Bill, there was no doubt, had been viewed with considerable alarm in some quarters as being calculated to produce discord rather than unity in several parishes in the country. But he thought the hon. Member deserved the thanks of the House for the way in which he had dealt with this subject last Session and this Session. The hon. Gentleman's object was the good of the Church of England. He (Mr. Cross) believed that the subject required some further discussion, and that the best course to adopt would be to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. He therefore hoped the hon. Member for Gloucester would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. MONK, concurring in the opinion that the Bill ought to be referred to a Select Committee, was willing to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. SALT, referring to the observations of the hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Raikes), said, he demurred to that hon. Gentleman's theories, and had very great doubt about his facts. He accepted the proposal to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, not only with readiness, but with gratitude.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Order for Committee of the whole House be discharged, and that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, with power to report upon the present facilities for providing additional means of worship in parishes, with or without the consent of the incumbent, and also upon the desirability of extending such facilities,"—(Mr. J. G. Talbot.)

—instead thereof.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Order for Committee of the whole House discharged:—Bill referred to a Select Committee, with power to report upon the present facilities for providing additional means of worship in parishes, with or without the consent of the incumbent, and also upon the desirability of extending such facilities.

SUPERANNUATION ACT (1859) AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 64.]

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. William Henry Smith.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

MR. W. H. SMITH, in moving that the Bill be now read the third time, said, it would be impossible for the Government to accept the Amendment which had been placed on the Paper by his hon. Friend the Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane)—who was not now in his place—namely, to re-commit the Bill. The Bill was based on the principle that a superannuation should be based on the average of the last three years' salary of the officer about to be superannuated. No doubt cases of hardship might occasionally arise; but it would be better to deal with them in an exceptional manner, as the Treasury could do by laying a Minute before Parliament, stating the particulars, instead of altering the whole law, and allowing the Departments to deal with such cases in a way that might occasionally provoke remarks and cause injury to the public services.

Motion made, and Question proposed "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

Motion agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

HYPOTHEC (SCOTLAND) BILL—[BILL 5.] (Mr. Vans-Agnew, Mr. Baillie Hamilton, Sir William Stirling-Maxwell, Sir George Douglas.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. VANS AGNEW: In asking the House to read a second time a Bill to abolish the landlords' right of hypothec, except as regards dwelling-houses, in Scotland, I fear that I must trespass on its patience for a short time, and I must ask for its indulgence while I deal with a subject which is of a dry and somewhat technical nature. It is much to be regretted that, on former occasions, this has been treated rather as a party question than as what it truly is—one of political economy, and it is the latter sense that I ask hon. Members on both sides of the House to consider it. I am aware that there is authority entitled to the utmost respect in favour of the maintenance of the law of hypothec, for a Royal Commission which was appointed in 1864 reported in the following year in favour of retaining the principles of the law, but recommended the removal of some of its most objectionable provisions, and Parliament in 1867 passed an Act carrying out, with one not very important exception, all the recommendations of the Royal Commission, thus sanctioning at that time the law as it now is; and later a Select Committee of the House of Lords sat in 1869, and reported their opinion that no further change was required, and that it was premature to make one. Besides, in the last Parliament several Bills were rejected, the object of which was to abolish generally the right of hypothec. I will admit further that the strongest opinions and feelings against the law were formed and entertained before the amending Act was passed in 1867. Still, it has failed to satisfy the country at large; the privilege of hypothec is complained of as bitterly as ever, and we may believe that those who wear it know best where the shoe pinches. The Bill to which I have to direct the attention of the House consists of one clause only; to abolish the agricultural landlord's rights of hypothec. It does not effect house property; it reserves the right of landlords during the currency of existing leases, and it is proposed that it shall not come into operation till Martinmas (November 11), 1876. If we were to approach this subject from the same standpoint as the last Parliament did, or even if this were the same measure as that which was rejected by the last House of Commons, I will admit that it would be presumptuous in me, or any hon. Member to ask Parliament to reverse the decision which it then pronounced; but I hope to show the House that the circumstances and the Bill are different. During the latter part of the life of the last Parliament several single elections took place in Scotland, and they all turned on what were called the farmers' questions, of which this of hypothec was the most important; and so entirely was this recognized at the late General Election, that every candidate who wooed a Scotch constituency, avowed himself willing to abolish, or at least not to oppose the abolition of the law of agricultural hypothec; and the result is that the Members who represent Scotland are practically unanimous in supporting the Bill. There may be a few exceptions; but I shall be surprised if the division does not show that by 10 to 1 Scotch Members are in favour of the second reading of this Bill. I do not mean to say that because Scotland, as far as it can constitutionally express its opinion, is all but unanimous in asking for the abolition of the agricultural landlord's right of hypothec, therefore the House ought to pass this Bill. I might almost ground my Motion on the fact that a part of the United Kingdom whose laws and conditions differ from those in the rest of the Kingdom, desires a change in a law which affects it alone, with an amount of agreement which is perfectly unprecedented; but that is hardly a constitutional doctrine, though at least an argument for bespeaking careful examination of the subject. I propose, therefore, to state the objections to the law as far as it concerns agriculture, and to show that its abolition will be advantageous to the whole agricultural interest. The objections to this law are comparatively recent, and are mainly caused by the change which has taken place of late years, within the memory of most of the Members of this House, in the relative amount of capital invested in Scotland by landlords and tenants in the cultivation of the soil. I do not mean to dwell on the very great impulse which has been given to the agriculture of Scotland of late years; but I may remind the House that it is only 50 years since bones were introduced as a fertilizing agent, little more than 30 years since guano was first imported, that practical agricultural chemistry dates no further back, and that the immense trade in artificial or chemical manures has grown up within that time. This has caused a very large increase in the capital invested in Scotland in farming, and a very large increase in the produce raised, and it will not be disputed that the extra manures have been paid for by the tenants, and that the capital required to cultivate a farm profitably, and to pay the increased rents now given in Scotland, is much greater than it used to be. This being so, the policy of the law of hypothec was called in question. I myself have thought the objections to it well founded—as was admitted by the Royal Commission and by Parliament—and with others I was willing that the amended law of 1867 should have a fair trial, and that legislation on the subject should be gradual and tentative. It has had that trial, and it has been found wanting. It has not settled the question, and I now ask the House to read a second time a Bill which I believe will do so with benefit to every class engaged in the agriculture of Scotland. I propose to consider its effect on the farmer with capital, the landlord, and the small farmer; and in the observations I shall make, I mean the arable, not the pastoral farmer. In the first place, I will say that the principle of this law was perfectly equitable in its origin, and that its operation in times gone by has been beneficial to many tenant farmers. I am not one of those who declaim against it as unjust, or as a piece of class legislation; but I maintain that it has done its work, and that, like the leading strings of a child who can walk alone, it can only fetter and restrain the agriculture of Scotland, which no longer requires its support. To understand the origin of this law, we must glance back for a moment to a much earlier state of society, when all land was held, not by a legal fiction, but in reality, direct from the Crown or other feudal superior, when the law commanded little or no respect, and the old rule was in full force, that he should take who had the power and he should keep who could. In those early days, what little corn was grown—and no more was grown than would barely feed a scanty population—was absolutely the property of the owner of the soil, who supplied the seed, and employed, maintained, and protected the cultivator. From that time to this, the relation of owner and cultivator has developed into that of landlord and tenant through the various stages of a fixed share in the produce being given to the cultivator, the introduction of tacks or leases, under which a mail, or fixed amount of grain, cattle, and other things—but little money—was paid to the landlord, and the present system of a fixed money rent, or a fixed quantity of grain, commuted into money according to the fiars' prices, or the average annual market value as officially declared every Spring. Through all these various changes, the presumption which has underlaid the law on the subject is that the stock and crop on his land are the property of the landlord, as was once the case. This principle, established by ancient decisions of early Judges in the Scottish Courts of Law and the privilege founded on it of a preferential right to everything on the farm, once called "the privilege of the master of the ground," was continued after the introduction of leases and fixed rents under the law of hypothec. This principle is thus laid down in Erskine's Institutes (B II., Tit. VI., sec. 56). The landlord's right of hypothec in rural subjects is a "real right in the fruits of the ground, and in the cattle brought up on it by the tenant," and in sec. 57. "All fruits while growing belong truly to the proprietor of the ground in consequence of his right of property." By the law of hypothec prior to 1867, in so far as agricultural subjects were concerned, a landlord had a preference for his rent over the crop of the year for which that rent was due, however long that crop remained unconsumed, and a preference over the live stock for the rent of the current year, this latter right expiring three months after the last conventional term of payment of the rent for the year. He had also a similar preferential right over all goods and chattels for the current year's rent. By the amending law of 1867, it was enacted that over agricultural produce sold, delivered, and paid for the right of hypothec should cease, and its duration in other cases was limited to three months after the last term of payment; and household furniture, implements, manures, lime, drain-pipes, feeding stuffs, &c., were exempted from it. This to a great extent mitigated the harshness of the old law, but as it was left the present law is this—Not only after rent has become due, but before any rent is due, a landlord may apply to the Sheriff for a sequestration on reasons given, which, if applied for, would be granted as a matter of course, and may prevent his tenant selling crop or cattle as long as any part of the rent for the year in which the crop is grown remains unpaid, and in the case of cattle as long as any part of the current year's rent is unpaid, this power terminating in both cases three months after the last conventional term of payment of rent. The tenant can be relieved from this sequestration before the term of payment only by finding security for payment of his rent, and after it only by payment in full. Now, in early times, when little or no capital was expended by the tenant, and the landlord was the principal or only creditor, such a law had its uses. The tenants, far poorer as a class than they are now, were more dependent on the seasons, and the landlord, having a right to all the tenant possessed on his farm, was able without risk to himself to give him credit in bad times to the full value of his whole property. The law operated beneficially in obtaining for the tenant credit from his largest, if not his sole, creditor. But does this same law at this date add to or diminish the credit of the farmers of Scotland? I maintain that its effect is injurious to them. The landlord is no longer the sole, or even the largest, creditor of the farmer. The money spent on seed, artificial and imported manures, implements, and labour, exceeds, and in some cases very largely exceeds, the amount of the rent. But there is one with whom the farmer is in closer relation than any other, and that is his banker. It is to him and not to his landlord, that a farmer would go in any temporary pressure, and it is of the greatest importance to him to maintain his credit at the bank. In so far as a preference is given to any one of the farmer's creditors to that extent his credit is reduced as concerns each of the others; but credit is very sensitive, and the landlord's privilege injures the farmer's general credit with the public in a greater measure that it increases it with his landlord. It will not be disputed that it is a national advantage that the greatest possible amount of produce should be raised at the least possible cost, and agriculture, like all other industries, is most successful when capital is invested in it and judiciously expended. Now, I have shown that a very great part of the capital invested in farming in Scotland belongs to the tenants, and the best authorities tell us that, taking one year with another, they do not make a profit of more than 8 per cent, which is much less than the ordinary profit of other trades, but is in some degree compensated by the healthy life, the agreeable occupation, and the lightness of the risk. Now, I claim for the Scottish farmer that, having invested his capital, he should have the utmost commercial freedom, and be placed in the best position as regards credit; so that, being thus enabled to carry on his business under the most favourable conditions, he may augment his production, and, by so doing, add to the national wealth. While attaining this result his own profits will increase, and, as a necessary consequence—to which I beg to call the attention of those who think the landowner may be injured—the value of land will rise. It is asserted, also, that by the existing law men without means are tempted to offer for farms, and that, having nothing to lose, they offer more than farms are worth, thus increasing the competition for land and raising rents unduly. There is no doubt that theoretically this must be the consequence of the law, and, if it has had this effect in practice—and I believe it has in some cases—it is an evil, and an additional reason for change. But on this point I agree fully with the Royal Commissioners who, in 1865, reported as their opinion, that it was not “a general practice among landlords, in reliance on the security which the law of hypothee affords them, to entrust their farms to a class of tenants whom otherwise they would not be disposed to accept.” I think that land, like everything else, will find, and does find, its true value in the open market, and that the competition of men without sufficient capital is much more fostered by the custom of back-renting than by the landlord’s right. Allow me to explain the term back-renting. In some parts of Scotland, a tenant pays his first half-year’s rent six months after he enters a farm, the second at the end of the year, and so on to the end of the lease. He pays before he has reaped a crop, and is said to be fore-rented. In other parts of Scotland, and by far the greater part of it, a tenant does not pay any rent till he has been a year or a year and a-half in the farm—sometimes as much as two years. He does not pay any rent till he has reaped a crop, and he is said to be back-rented. In the first case, the tenant on entering must have sufficient capital to pay a year’s rent before he has sold a crop; in the second, the tenant need not have so much capital, and he looks to the sale of his first crop to pay his first year’s rent. One of the natural effects of the abolition of the right of hypothee will certainly be that the practice of back-renting will in a great measure cease, and landlords will require earlier payments than they have hitherto done. If, on the one hand, this result may not be agreeable to the tenant-farmers, and I know that it will not, on the other, they will be relieved to some extent of the competition of which they complain. If, then, by this law, a tenant can be sequestrated before rent is due; if his credit is diminished, and the expenditure of his capital thereby discouraged; if, in some cases, competition by men without capital is stimulated and rents are thus unduly raised, there are good grounds for removing it from the Statute Book. This brings me to the consideration of the subject as it affects the landlords of Scotland, and I hope to be able to show that they can dispense with the preference now secured to them by the existing law. First, I would say that this privilege is of little importance to them, and this is shown by the fact that it is very seldom exercised. It was stated in the Report of the Royal Commission, when the old law was in force, under which the powers of the landlord were much greater than they now are—

And I find by a Return of the number of “petitions for sequestrations for rent for agricultural subjects,” which was moved for by the hon. and gallant General opposite, that the whole amount for which such petitions had been applied for in 6½ years, since the passing of the amending Act of 1867, is £171,182, or an average of £26,335 a-year in all Scotland, which is only 7s. 6d. per cent on the gross rental, and the warrants for sale are not one-third of that, or less than one-eighth per cent of rental. Another suggestive fact is this—that a great proportion of the landlords of Scotland do not collect their rents till after the period during which they could exercise the right of hypothee, thus voluntarily placing themselves in the same position as ordinary creditors. Again, leases are all but universal in Scotland, and this Bill does not touch farms held under existing leases, and, to meet the cases in which leases do not exist, the date proposed for its coming into operation is 11th November, 1876, thus giving time to landlords to give 12 months' notice to tenants without leases of any conditions they may require in consequence of the change in the law. A landlord may secure himself in many ways if he wishes a further guarantee than his knowledge of the character and circumstances of the tenant. He may have a sum of money deposited in bank, as is done for the value of tillages in Prussia. He may have payment in advance. He may require to have third parties as securities, or, on the ground that his security is lessened, he may require a higher rent to cover the risk than he would now accept—if he can get it. In any one of these ways, he can take care of himself, and, therefore, the right of hypotheec is unnecessary for his protection. A point has been made by those who wish to maintain this law, that its abolition will reduce the value of securities on land. If I was of that opinion, I should be an advocate for its continuance, for it is only if the value of the land itself is deteriorated that that of the security over it can fall; but if the existing law operates to check the flow of capital to the cultivation of the soil, as it is believed and felt to do, its removal will have the contrary effect, and the result will be "increased produce," "higher rents," "greater value in the land," and thus better security to the lender. But it will be said that the lender may not think so, and is not a party to the transaction, and it is quite right that he should be satisfied. First, let me remind the House of the condition of Scotland as to this. It is only a proportion of the land which is held under mortgage, for much is under strict entail, and cannot be burdened. As to that which is mortgaged, the custom is that money is borrowed, not for a fixed, but for an indefinite time, and may be called up on certain notice at any term of Whitsunday or Martinmas. If, then, a creditor should think he is not as safe as he was, he can call up his money, and as it is not proposed that the Act is to come into operation before November, 1876, and existing leases are not affected by it, he runs no risk at all. An extreme case has been put to me by an advocate of the existing law, and, if I can meet it, I think I shall have disposed of this head of objection. It is this—Suppose a small estate, mortgaged as heavily as possible, belonging to a man who has no other means, and all let to one tenant, and that tenant to fail suddenly, the landlord would not have the means of paying the interest on the mortgage. The answer is this—If such an estate is under lease, the Bill will not affect it till the expiry of the lease, and if it is not, then not till 11th November, 1876. In either case the landlord will have the opportunity to enter into a new lease, in which he can stipulate for security for punctual payment of rent. Should he neglect to do so he would only have himself to blame, and in such a case would be compelled to do so by his creditor. It is admitted by those who wish to maintain the law as it is, that this is rather a tenant's than a landlord's question; that the landlords do not require to retain the right of hypotheec for themselves; but in the interest of their smaller tenants, who will be sufferers by its repeal. Let us examine whether this really is so. I would first define the class of small tenants to mean those who are rented at and below £50, who perform with their own hands and those of their families nearly all the labour on the land they occupy, and keep not more than one pair of horses. As a class they are industrious and thrifty, but they are often poor, ill-lodged, ill-clothed, ill-fed, and hard-worked, and not so well off in these respects as farm servants on large farms. Further, they pay higher rents in proportion to the value of their land; and this must be the case, because the small tenants, not having capital, the rent is not so secure, and the landlord's outlay on small farms must always be greater in proportion to the rent than on a larger one. Now the argument I have used with regard to the tenant's credit applies in full force to the smaller tenant. He requires credit from his neighbours, from tradesmen—the smith, the carpenter, the village grocer, whom he must employ, to as great an amount as he may get it from his landlord. I will not deny that a landlord may be a loser to some extent, as he probably would be now, by the failure of small tenants, who have not made up for their want of capital by thrift and industry and skill. In such cases, a want of caution and prudence in the selection and retention of the tenant must have been shown; and to obviate a few such possible instances, which can, and do, occur under the present law, we should not refuse to carry out that which will be a benefit to a large and important interest. It is objected that if the right of hypothec is abolished, landlords will no longer let land in small farms, and consequently the country will lose this valuable class of small farmers. With all respect for those who hold this opinion, I believe no greater fallacy can be uttered. It is not the existence of hypothec which has made the small farmer—it is the necessity of the landlord. It cannot be denied that farming on a large scale is more profitable than on a small one, and wherever the soil is good and comparatively easy of cultivation, the farms are large, and are occupied by men who bring capital into the business; but where land is being brought in, or has lately been brought in, from a state of nature, much more labour is required to raise a crop than in the longer settled and cultivated districts. The farmer with capital will not take such land, and it is that which is let in small lots to hard-working men, the pioneers of cultivation, who do the first rough work, and make land for the owner. He in process of time finds it to his advantage to throw several small farms together, to erect proper buildings, and to let them to a man with capital. As long as there is rough land to be brought in, so long will there be found men willing and ready to take it; it will be let in small farms, and whether or not the right of hypothec exists, landlords must let such land to the same class of men as now occupy it, and as they have not been in the habit of putting their right in force against this industrious class, things will go on much as they have done, with this difference—the landlord will see that the man to whom he lets a small farm has a little more capital or security than he now looks for, and the tenant will carry on his work with more freedom. If the effect of passing this Bill should be that a man ambitious of rising from the position of a labourer to that of a small farmer must save a little longer, or find some friend to back him with money or credit, this result will be nationally beneficial. More capital will be brought to the cultivation of the soil, and if our friend, the small farmer, was a good man before, he will be a better man with larger means and extended credit. But the small tenants of Scotland do not ask for the continuance of the law of hypothec. On the contrary, they are utterly blind to the benefits which it is said by its advocates to confer upon them. In the counties in which they are most numerous, the desire for its repeal has been strongest, and the hon. Members for those counties have pledged themselves to support any Bill for its abolition. I have now endeavoured to show that the abolition of this ancient privilege will, in Scotland, be of advantage to the agricultural interest generally, and that no injury to it, or other evil result, need be anticipated, and I ask the House to read the Bill a second time as a matter of expediency, because suited to the circumstances of Scotland only, and asked for with at least the general concurrence of its constituencies. I admit that the principle of giving to the landlord a preferential right over the crop and stock in some countries, and at some times, may be just and useful, and that it has been so in Scotland; but I hold that this is an exceptional case, and I ask the House to pass this law to meet a state of things which does not exist elsewhere. The Bill is expressly limited to agricultural subjects, as was the inquiry by the Royal Commission, and the Act of 1867. No serious complaint has been made about hypothec in regard to urban subjects, and there is no general wish in Scotland that it should be repealed as regards them. But some authorities tell us that we cannot consistently abolish the one, unless we also abolish the other. I do not agree with them. I see a difference in their origin, in their operation, in their policy, and in their effect. The one had its origin in the presumption that all that was raised on the soil was the property of the owner: the other in the Roman law, when the household furniture—insecta et illata—was a pledge for the payment of the rent. In the one case, the tenant hires the use of the surface of the ground, on which he has to expend largely his own capital and labour to produce the landlord's rent, and, as a rule, he improves the subject. In the other, the tenant lays out no money, and, as a rule, the house is deteriorated. The policy of the first was to secure the landlord's rent, when tenants had little capital, and to extend the tenant's credit; the policy of the other is to enable a man to secure one of the first necessities of life, a house to live in, on the security of his personal property. The effect of the one is to reduce the farmer's credit; that of the other is to make his personal property the best security an industrious artizan has to offer. If he had it not, his landlord would require security, or a bill of sale. I will not go further into this part of the subject, and I hope the House will consider that it is expedient to make the change so urgently asked for by the Scottish constituencies, and not expedient to tack to it a change which is not wanted, or to refuse it because what is not wanted is not asked for. We are told also that to alter the law of hypothec for Scotland would form a precedent for altering the law of distress in England, and if the circumstances were alike in the two countries and the laws were alike, there is no doubt it would do so. It is because the conditions are different, and the laws—though somewhat analogous—differ in so many respects, that the one need not be taken as a precedent for the other. Rents in Scotland are proportionally higher, leases are all but universal, the relation between landlord and tenant is almost purely commercial; and, to come to details, the law in Scotland allows a landlord—but only after application to a Court of Law—to sequester his tenant before rent is due, and this sequestration is effective without possession. These conditions do not prevail in England, where distress may be made for six years' rent, while it is limited to one in Scotland. But the main point is, that the law of distress has not created dissatisfaction in England, and it is therefore unnecessary and inexpedient to touch it, while that of hypothec has caused such wide-spread discontent in Scotland, that her constituencies unanimously ask for its repeal as far as it relates to agricultural subjects. The right of hypothec is complained of by the tenant-farmers of Scotland as injurious to their credit, and limiting the amount of produce which they could and would raise from the soil if it were removed. It is admitted by the landlords to be unnecessary for their protection, to be of little use to, and to be little used by, them; and if this Bill, which I now ask the House to read a second time, is passed, it will stimulate agricultural enterprise in Scotland, and the benefits which will accrue from it will far outweigh any temporary inconvenience which may arise from the loss of an irritating, unnecessary, and injurious privilege.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Vans Agnew.)

Mr. GREGORY, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months said, that if he required justification for troubling the House with opposition to this measure, he might rest his case on the speech of the hon. Member for Wigtonshire (Mr. Vans Agnew), because that hon. Member admitted that the law of hypothec was ancient, equitable in its conception, and had, on the whole, been beneficial in its operation; that notwithstanding its existence there had been a large outlay in artificial manures; and that the agriculture of Scotland had been enormously developed. If that were so, he might rest his case there, and ask what ground had been shown for the abolition of a law, under which that state of circumstances had taken place. He felt, however, that he ought to state the grounds upon which as an English Member he opposed the Bill, and they were that it was a question not affecting Scotland only, but the Empire generally, and that the principles upon which it was sought to rest the abolition of this law must, if this measure were to pass, be extended to England. The hon. Member for Wigtonshire had told them that the differences between the law of Scotland and that of England on the subject were differences of detail rather than of principle, and, in fact, in detail they were slight, because they had been nearly abolished. The Act of 1867 had tended to place the law of the two countries very much on a similar footing, and had taken away from the law of Scotland that which was harsh and unjust in its original enactment. By the Act of 1867 sequestration could be made only on application to the sheriff, and for one year's rent. It was true that it might be made for accruing rent, and in that respect the law of Scotland and England differed, because in England distraint could only be made for rent which had actually accrued. When this measure was before Parliament last Session, he (Mr. Gregory) met it by a suggestion for assimilating the law of the two countries, and he for one should have no objection to such an assimilation taking place; but he did not desire that it should take place in the direction proposed by the present Bill. It might be that the period over which the power of sequestration in England operated was too long, while in Scotland it might be too short. He thought the law in Scotland, as to the mode in which distraint was to take place, was better than that of England, and might prevent abuses by committing it to the sheriff, and not any chance person whom the landlord in England might employ to put the process in execution, and who very often were not persons of the highest character. On the other hand, it might be desirable to provide that, as in England, distraint should only take place in Scotland for rent that had accrued. The law of Scotland proceeded on the assumption that the tenant could not pay his rent—which was unjust to the tenant, because the landlord ought to presume that the tenant would pay his rent, and it was only when the rent was not paid in accordance with his contract that his power should be put into operation. These were points on which the law of the two countries might without any difficulty be reconciled; but he could not doubt that the principles of the law being so analogous, if the law of hypothec were altogether abrogated in Scotland, they would have an agitation for the abolition of the law of distraint in this country. The hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill, said that the existing law had run up the competition for farms to an exaggerated and dangerous pitch, and he argued in favour of the Bill, that one effect of it would be to diminish that competition. But how would the competition be diminished? Why, by squeezing out the small tenants—and the question really for the House to consider was, whether the principle of squeezing the small tenants out of their holdings could be defended, either on the ground of justice or of expediency. They were asked to exclude from competition a class of men from whom had sprung many of the foremost agriculturalists of Scotland, and it was in evidence that but for this law of hypothec, those men would not have been able to obtain that start in life which had proved so advantageous to themselves and to the country. One of the principal arguments urged against the existing law was, that it gave to the landlords a preference over the other creditors of their tenants, and that therefore the credit of the latter would be extended by its abolition. In considering that point a landlord might be considered either as the quasi-partner of his tenant, reserving to himself a certain share of the profits, and retaining a preferential right to recover it; or, as a man who gave to another a temporary occupation of his property, on condition that a certain proportion of the produce of the property in question should be reserved to himself. In either case, it was almost incidental to a relation of this nature that the person so committing his property to another should have a preferential charge, and an easy means of enforcing it. It was urged further that the tenants had creditors other than their landlords. That was true; but it seemed to be forgotten that those creditors were the persons who supplied the stock and manures, and who knew perfectly well that they were dealing with tenants who were bound to pay their rent first, and that what they had to look to was what the tenants could make out of their farms after paying the rent. It was upon this footing that the farmers and the general run of their creditors did business; and it would be unfair to place on the same footing, landlords who had parted with the possession of the land, relying upon this preferential charge and who could not recover it except by a tedious process of litigation, and creditors who, knowing the relation between the parties, could either give credit for the goods they had to sell, or refuse so to do. Tenants had no right to expect to obtain credit at the expense of their landlords. Credit so obtained could only be false and fictitious, in that it would be holding out to the world as possessing resources and capital, men who could not pay the rent of the very land they occupied. There was another result to be anticipated from the abolition of the existing law, to which he thought it right to allude—namely, the effect of doing so upon securities on land. It was stated by witnesses of considerable weight before the Lords Committee, that if the present security for rents was abolished, mortgagees could not be expected to continue their investments on the same terms. It was answered that they were at liberty to call in their money, but independently of the loss to landowners. Surely there ought to be stronger grounds than had yet been urged for making a legislative enactment which would necessitate the trouble, difficulty, and probable loss of calling in and re-investing large sums of money at present legitimately invested on the security of real property. Relations similar to those existing between landlord and tenants under the operation of the law of hypothec—so far as the question of lien was concerned—existed in the case of charterers of ships or holders of bottomry bonds, and the owners of freights carried. No inconvenience or injustice had arisen, so far as he knew, in such cases, and he really failed to see why an exceptional law should be made in the case of the land in Scotland. On the whole, he could not bring himself to believe that the change proposed in the Bill would, for a long time at any rate, be desired by English agriculturists or advocated by English Members of Parliament.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Gregory.)

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he wished to call the special attention of the House to the circumstance that although the Bill proposed an amendment of a law affecting Scotch interests alone, yet no Member from Scotland had been found to move its rejection, and it had been reserved for an English Member to do so. Indeed, the hon. Member who had moved the second reading had told the House very frankly that hon. Members even on his side of the House had been forced to pledge themselves to vote for the total abolition of this law in order to secure their return by agricultural constituencies. They had heard elaborate arguments from the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory), in moving the rejection of this Bill; but he (Mr. Barclay) must warn the House that those arguments were not really in the interests of the landlords, however much the hon. Member might think so, nor yet in the interests of the smaller tenants, but in those of a class well known in Scotland as lawyer factors. That was the class in whose interest really the hon. Member had spoken. The lawyer factors in Scotland were, as a class, gentlemen belonging to the legal profession, who resided in the metropolis of Scotland or the large towns. He did not say that they managed the estates of which they had charge, for in point of fact they confined themselves very much to the letting of the farms and the collection of the rents, visiting the estates only for that purpose, and then even frequently by deputy. Thus situated, they endeavoured to manage the estates by rules and regulations which were certainly of the most extraordinary kind that could well be imagined. He was sorry to hear the other day from a friend, that there were similar instances to be found in England, for mentioning the circumstance to him that many rules and regulations affecting large estates in Scotland were dated 30, 40, and even 50 years ago, his friend said he could produce a more extraordinary case even than that. A brother of his had recently taken a farm, and on being asked whether he had read over the lease, he replied—"No; there are so many skins of parchment, and if I had done so I am sure I could not have understood it." The farm had been in the possession of the family for several generations, and several old leases were in existence—one granted to his informant's grandfather in 1790. On examination, it proved that the lease of 1874 contained the same conditions of cropping and husbandry as the one issued to the grandfather in 1790. It was thought that estates could be managed by rules and regulations; but the real effect of them was, that they hampered and restricted good tenants in the management of their farms and in endeavouring to develop its resources, while they were impotent to prevent bad farming. It was a fact that on those estates which were most strictly tied up by these rules and regulations, the worst farming was to be found. Indeed, if he were asked whether the law of hypothec or the management of the land by the lawyer factors had the worst effect in Scotland, he should be at a loss to decide between the two. The lawyers raised difficulties and created alarm in the minds of those proprietors who had abundance of money and capacity to manage their estates. They persuaded the landlords that tenants could not be entrusted to farm the land judiciously or without injury to the landlord, and must in consequence be bound up by rules and regulations. In fact, to hear how they endeavoured to raise alarm in the proprietors' minds might lead one to fancy that some of the tenants would run away with the acres. But there was another and a very different class of men with whom the lawyer factors had to do, who might be said to consist of the impecunious landlords; and in their case, the business of the lawyer factors was further to provide money for the spendthrift, and to facilitate his progress to ruin. He was not drawing any fancy picture, because, although there were sufficient exceptions to strengthen the rule, yet this picture of the lawyer factors as a class would be recognized in Scotland as only too true. As regarded the tenants and the administration of the estates, the great business of the lawyer factor was to increase the amount of the rent-roll, and he knew cases where the lawyer factor had, by putting the farm up to competition, got a most excessive rent for a time; but in course of two or three years the tenant failed, and in order that the rent-roll might not be ostensibly reduced, the factor had taken the farms into his own hands and farmed at a greater loss to the landlord than if it had been let at a moderate rent. The great advantage of the law of hypothec to these lawyer factors was, that without troubling themselves particularly about the tenants with whom they engaged, or really managing the estates, the rents were always secured to the landlords. Should the tenant run short of his rent, it only remained for the factor to sequester him, not only for the rents which might be actually due, but for the rents which were coming due. Thus, as regarded the money part of the question, he was always able to keep the landlord secure. It was evident that the abolition of the law of hypothec would necessitate a better management of estates than at present existed, and he contended most strongly that the abolition of this law, by inducing a better management of estates in Scotland, would be quite as, if not more, beneficial to the landlords than to the tenants, whether they were large or small. If Parliament, by passing this Bill, should abolish the law of hypothec, he believed it would to a great extent abolish the lawyer factors, and he did not know which of the two would be the greater blessing. He was not prepared to say to what extent the lawyer land agent in England corresponded with the lawyer factor in Scotland; but he apprehended that there was about as much similarity between the two as there was between the law of hypothec and the law of distress in England. Yet they had now been told, to scare the landlords in that House, that if the law of hypothec were abolished, the law of distress must also be abolished in England. He was not sufficiently acquainted with the operation of the law of distress in England to speak with confidence on the subject, but if it were as bad as the law of hypothec in Scotland, the sooner it was abolished the better. He hoped, therefore, that the House might not be deterred by any such consideration from voting for the second reading of this Bill. But, even on the ground of expediency, he considered the policy of the hon. Member for East Sussex a mistake, because, as the hon. Member for Wigtownshire had told the House, the tenant-farmers of Scotland were fully determined on the abolition of this law. As a matter of policy, if on no higher ground, he thought the hon. Member would have done well to have allowed this Bill to be read a second time. Although the farmers of England might not yet be aware of the indirect evil effects which arose from this law in their own case, yet he had no doubt that by-and-by they would, become educated to the subject, and that they should have a pressure in that House from the farmers of England for the abolition of the law of distress quite as great as that which now proceeded from the farmers of Scotland in regard to the law of hypothec. Scotland had got the credit for many years of managing its own affairs, and of managing them quietly, and he trusted that hon. Members from England would allow this practice to continue. Now he would consider briefly the arguments of the hon. Member—first, the statement that the law was for the advantage of small farmers. He had never heard it argued that the law of hypothec induced landlords to break up large farms into small ones. In point of fact, the opposite process was going on, for reasons which it would take him too long to state; but it was not because the landlords were getting higher rents for the larger farms, for it was notorious that small farmers paid a higher rent per acre than the larger farmers. If the statement meant anything, it meant that the law of hypothec enabled small farmers to compete for farms which they could not otherwise do. It was manifest that this meant increased competition for small farms by small people. But the result of competition was simply that the greater the competition the higher the rent. The consequence was that if a poor man with limited means wanted to take a farm, he would, under the operation of the law of hypothec, have to pay a higher rent for it than he would otherwise have to do, because he would have a larger number of small people competitors than he naturally would have—that was what the law did for the small people. If any doubt were entertained upon the question, it would be removed by an examination of the Return which had been prepared of sequestrations, which showed that from the passing of the last Act on hypothec to 1873 the number had been 1,493. Of that number the sequestrations over £100 were 525; those under £100 were 968; and those under £25 were no less than 319. The effect of the law of hypothec was that it enabled possibly some few farmers to get farms who could not otherwise obtain them, but it usually sent them adrift again into the world bankrupts and ruined. If the hon. Member for Wigtonshire, in moving the second reading, had admitted that the principle was just, he was prepared to join issue with him on that point. It was admitted that the law whereby the landlord got a preference over other creditors was exceptional in its nature, and therefore the onus lay upon the landlords to justify this exceptional legislation. It was said the landlord was entitled to this preference, but he gave only the use of his land—the manure merchant parted with his property altogether. The hon. Member for East Sussex had stated that, as it was well known that the landlord had this preferential right, there was no injustice or harm done to the tenant's other creditors. But it was because this was well known that it was complained of, and if such an argument were to prevail, what ground would there be for asking for the abolition of any other unjust law? The hon. Member further said that a manure dealer or person dealing with the tenant on credit gave him a fictitious capital. But surely if a landlord put the tenant in the position without sufficient capital he, though keeping himself safe under all circumstances, gave the tenant fictitious credit.

MR. GREGORY explained that what he said was that, when they held out to a man who could not pay his rent that he might extend his credit, they gave him a fictitious capital.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY confessed he could not see the distinction. He was very much surprised to hear the hon. Member for Wigtonshire assert that the landlords in many cases gave the tenants 12 months' credit. He (Mr. Barclay) was pretty well acquainted with the customs of land-letting in Scotland, and he was not aware of a single case in which such a thing was done. The hon. Member seemed to suppose that because a tenant entered into possession of a house at Whitsuntide, and did not pay for 18 months afterwards, he thereby got 12 months' credit from the landlord; but such was really not the case, because the tenant entering at Whitsuntide had to pay the outgoing tenant for all the crops of that year, so that it was not until the succeeding year that the incoming tenant began to deal with the landlord at all, or got possession of the land from him. In fact, there was no back rent in Scotland properly so-called. In the majority of cases, where the farmer entered at Whitsuntide, he was called upon to pay the first half-year's rent as soon as ever he reaped the corn, and before he began to realize any part of it. Indeed, the landlord got his money from the farmer as soon as if he had the farm in his own hands, cultivated it himself, and realized the produce. The hon. Member for Wigtonshire had referred to a class of small improving tenants who had done a great deal for Scotland. He fully endorsed that statement. If it were not that he did not wish to introduce personal matters into that House, he might refer to particular estates upon which the practice he was about to describe had obtained. Many of these small farmers had squatted down, he might say, by the side of some moor which was worth to the landlord perhaps 6*d.* or 1*s.* an acre. After spending the best of their lifetime—10, 15, or 20 years—upon that barren moor, and converting it during that time into such a state of fertility that the landlord might get 15*s.* or 20*s.* an acre for it, these people had been turned out because they had no particular holding, or, if they were allowed to remain, their improvements were confiscated, and it was at a rent representing its absolute worth. It was true that the law of hypothec directly affected them very little, because the landlord had no rent, except a very small one, to get from the land during the time the tenant had been improving it. But he had felt very strongly on seeing these tenants, after they had got the land into such a condition as to enable them to live upon it comfortably to the end of their lives, turned out without a farthing into the world, to begin life anew, or sometimes to find refuge in the poor-house. He could assure the House that the farmers of Scotland would not allow the question to sleep until Parliament had acceded to their just demands. He must refer to the endeavours made by hon. Members and other gentlemen outside the House to create a division between the large and the small farmers upon this question; but these attempts had proved and would prove ineffectual, because the small tenants had found by experience that the law of hypothec was a very great oppression and hardship to them. He hoped the decision of this question would be left very much to the Scotch Representatives, and he could assure the House that if the abolition of this unjust and class law were sanctioned, it would give a great stimulus to agriculture in Scotland, not only directly, but indirectly, by inducing a more intelligent and careful management of the land than had hitherto been the case.

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME said, he should support the Amendment, as he believed the present law worked very efficiently for the agricultural classes, as well as for the interests of the community generally. In upholding the law as it now existed, and opposing its abolition, he did not consider himself advocating the interests of any particular class. Certainly not the interests of landlords as against their tenants. The hon. Member who had just spoken had spoken of class legislation; but for his part he (Sir William Cuninghame) did not see that he was speaking in the interests of any class. It was not in the interests of the landlords, for they would be less affected by the abolition of the law of hypothec than probably any other class, as they could perfectly easily find some other means of securing the payment of their rents. The only serious evil likely to arise to them from the proposed change was, that they would have more difficulty in raising money to improve their property, while as regarded the smaller tenantry, it would be a matter of life and death. It meant to them driving them out of an occupation for which they were admirably fitted, and to those not quite so impecunious, it meant in times of pressure greatly increased difficulties. Another of its consequences would be to deprive the country of a class of the population, the smaller tenants, who had done an immense deal to improve agriculture. It was said that agriculture would be benefited by the change of small for large holdings; even if it were so, it would be dearly purchased by the desertion of homesteads to which it would lead. Those who were acquainted with Scotland knew how exceedingly sad a sight was presented by the ruined cottages already in that country. He (Sir William Cuninghame) for one deplored very much that inexorable law which seemed to have decreed that sooner or later the smaller tenantry as a class should disappear, and he looked with extreme disfavour on any proposal which, like the one before the House, tended to hurry on that change. He would ask the House, was there any reason for the abolition of hypothec? It was said that the law of Scotland was exceptional. He considered, on the contrary, that the proposal to abolish the law was exceptional. It was proposed to put the tenant-farmers of Scotland on a different footing from the tenant-farmers of other parts of Great Britain, and also, as was shown by a Report presented to the House of Lords, in a different position from the tenant-farmers of almost every other country in the world. If that was not putting Scotland in an exceptional position, he could not imagine what would be. Then, since it was exceptional, it seemed to him some very strong reason should be shown for making the change. A reference to the agricultural statistics of the country would show that between 1857 and 1874, Scotland had made an advance that was perfectly astonishing. In 1857 the number of acres under cultivation was 3,500,000, while in 1874 it was something like 4,600,000. That did not look like adversity or pressure, or suffering under unjust laws. It might of course be said that this extraordinary advance in Scotch agriculture had taken place in spite of the law, and that the advance, rapid as it had been, might have been even more rapid had the law been abrogated. That might be the case, though it seemed unlikely; but he ventured to remind them—and his hon. Friend the Member for Wigtonshire in particular—of a fable and a proverb: the fable was the dog and the shadow; the proverb was let well alone. The general arguments against making the change had been so well stated by the hon. Member for West Sussex (Mr. Gregory), that he did not mean to go into them; but he might make a remark as to the argument that the credit the farmers got from tradesmen was interfered with by the law of hypothec. It must be remembered, on the other side, that they were amply compensated for this by the longer and larger credit which the existing law enabled the landlords to give them. The question for the House to consider was, whether the amount of capital that was thereby left in the tenants' hands for a period varying from a year to 18 months equalled the decrease in credit which they got from tradesmen. He admitted that that might not be so in large farms; and if the proposal had been limited to an abrogation of the law in regard to tenants whose rent was, say, over £200, he would have been inclined to support it; but as regarded small tenants, the increase of credit they would get from tradesmen would not by any means equal what they got from their landlords. This was strongly borne out by the evidence given before the Lords' Committee of 1869 by manure merchants and others, who said that there was so much competition among manure and seed merchants that a farmer could never have any difficulty in getting credit; but that, on the contrary, it might even be said, they got more credit than was good for them, being much in the same position as young gentlemen of known expectations, who were offered any amount of accommodation by speculative parties. To say that the law placed the tenant with capital at a disadvantage by exposing him to competition with poorer men was no argument for a change. The possession of money did not give a prior claim to the possessor; on the contrary, one argument in favour of the law was, that it gave the poorer man the chance of raising himself to a better position in spite of his disadvantages. The more this became known the less popular would become the cry for the abolition of hypothec. There were many other points that he might refer to, but he did not wish to weary the House, and would confine himself to the popularity of the proposed change. It was said on the other side, as a strong evidence of the feeling of Scotland being in favour of the change, that nearly every Scotch Member would support it; and it certainly was a fact that the large majority of the Representatives, both of agricultural counties and of burghs in Scotland, would support the Bill of the hon. Member for Wigtonshire. He maintained, however, that this position of hon. Members had been caused by a mistake with regard to the popular feeling in Scotland on the subject. There were many able and interested tenant-farmers in Scotland who agitated this question with great energy, and the opinions of this minority had, he contended, been mistaken for real popular feeling. One reference to the evidence given before the Committee would show this. It was the evidence of Mr. Adam, a farmer in Rossshire, who described the proceedings at a meeting which was numerously attended by farmers, and supposed to represent fairly the feelings of the district, and where a resolution to petition against Mr. Carnegie's Bill was carried unanimously. That, at all events, proved that there was not quite such unanimity as was supposed. In conclusion, he asked the House to pause and consider well before it decided to abolish a law which had been in existence for a great length of time, and during the operation of which it was admitted the agriculture of Scotland had vastly improved, and the abolition of which would drive a large number of the smaller tenantry from their present occupations, and would lead to great difficulties being placed in the way of many hard-working and industrious people.

VISCOUNT MACDUFF: As a Scotchman, Sir, and one much interested in all questions relating to Scotch agriculture, I venture to address a very few remarks to the House in support of this Bill. In the first place, I cannot help thinking that it should not be mixed up with other and more intricate questions connected with this side of the Tweed, but that it should be regarded purely as a Scotch question and from a Scotch point of view. The law of hypothec, as it now stands, even in its present modified form, is a remnant of the legislation of centuries ago. I do not dispute the wisdom or necessity of such a law in former times, for in those days tenants, as we now understand the term, did not exist. Not only the farms but the stocking, and even the implements of husbandry, were the property of the landlord. When the present class of tenants gradually came into existence, they were often under the necessity of borrowing largely from their landlords to carry on their operations, and this right of hypothec was the only security available. But now that there is a bank in every village, and plenty of capital at the command of the farmer, I fail to see the necessity for maintaining this antiquated right, when all which made it reasonable has long since passed away. It has been suggested that this law is favourable to small tenancies, and that its abolition would abolish their number. I cannot think so; if it were so, my vote would not be recorded for its abolition. But the only result of the present law is that tenants are sometimes induced to take farms beyond their means, while landlords are induced to trust them, relying on hypothec. Insolvency is, and must be, the only consequence of this artificial state of things. By the Hypothec Amendment Act of 1867 the old privileges of the landlord were very much pared down, and to my view the whole principle of this measure was conceded by that Act. By its further extension in the same direction, the Legislature would simply be withdrawing its sanction from privileges rarely, if ever, exercised on well-managed properties, and which are capable of being exercised very oppressively—in fact ruinously—as regards the tenant. I venture to think that the security of the landlords does not depend upon any such powers, but upon the mutual reliance which exists in Scotland between them and their tenants. I fear, however, that an idea has got abroad that the relations between landlord and tenant in the north of Scotland are not as good as might be wished. In a recent debate mention has been made of the existing dissatisfaction in the north of Scotland; and I have on several other occasions heard the farmers in that part of the country described as men labouring under positive disaffection to their landlords. Without entering upon topics foreign to the measure now before the House, I am anxious to state most emphatically that the relations between landlords and their tenants in the north are quite as satisfactory as in other parts of the United Kingdom. I have the pleasure and the advantage of a large acquaintance among farmers not only in the county I have the honour to represent, but in several other counties in the north, and I have never heard any expression of such a feeling among them. I do not for a moment deny that disturbing questions exist—grievances arising from the over-preservation of game in some cases, and from a feeling that farmers have not sufficient security for the capital invested in their farms; but I am certain that there are none which cannot be amicably settled by practical legislation. It has hitherto been a matter of regret to me that the House does not seem disposed to entertain favourably several questions upon which there is a good deal of feeling in Scotland; but I am quite sure that the true friends of the Scotch farmer are not those who make immoderate demands in their name, and who indulge in strong expressions about landlords. My very short experience has shown me that such a course, while it alienates the sympathies of moderate men on both sides, does not in the least advance the cause professed to be represented. I intend to vote for the second reading of the Bill, because I believe its tendency will be to strengthen the good feeling between farmers and their landlords in Scotland, which I firmly believe to be the landlords' best and only real security.

Sir William Cuninghame

MR. DALRYMPLE said, he agreed entirely with the noble Lord who had just sat down (Lord Macduff) that those were not the real friends of the tenant-farmers who urged immoderate demands on their behalf; and, he might add, that it was very much because the demands had seemed to the House so immoderate, that so little legislation on subjects which concerned them had passed through Parliament. But he rose for the special purpose of explaining why he intended to vote for the second reading of this Bill, while in the last Parliament he had voted and spoken in favour of the law of hypothec. As he had not changed his opinions, it was not without considerable thought that he had come to the conclusion he now had. In the late Parliament the Bill introduced to their notice was of a very different kind from that now under consideration. He had never supported the law of hypothec in the interest of the landlord, who had other and ample means of getting security, and if the law were abolished to-morrow no landlord would be any the worse for it, but because he believed—and he still held to the belief—that the law was favourable, not only to small tenants, but also in bad times, to persons who could hardly be described as small tenants. He knew of many instances where in bad times, if it had not been for the law of hypothec, farmers would have run the chance of losing their farms; but in consequence of hypothec the landlord had been able to give them time—and it was doubtful if they would have got it from any other creditor. In so speaking, he spoke from personal knowledge, and he retained the belief that many farmers profited by the law. The law was much misunderstood, and it often happened that those who were loudest in advocating its abolition were precisely those who knew least about it. The personal relations between Scotch landlords and their tenants were of an extremely satisfactory kind, and he would be sorry to see the time when they would be entirely of a commercial character. The hon. Member for Forfarshire had referred in tones of something like contempt to the faded parchment of old leases, such as had been held from father to son on some estates, and he spoke of the year 1790 as a very remote date. The hon. Member's reference was made to what he (Mr. Dalrymple) was glad to think was a common state of things, and the distant date did not astonish him, for he knew of a case lately occurring where a tenant died, unfortunately childless, but who, together with his father and grandfather before him, had occupied the same land for 150 years, on the property of a near relative of his (Mr. Dalrymple's) own. In cases such as that, there was little of the commercial relation, and the advantage, as far as money consideration went, was all on the tenant's side. If it were merely on the ground of the outcry against the law, he would not be found among the supporters of the change; but he supported it for the almost opposite reason—that the question had really passed out of the regions of stock election cries. There was not nearly so much excitement about it now, and comparatively little was heard about it at the last Election, when candidates rather volunteered to support the abolition of the present law than had any pressure brought upon them to induce them to do so. He thought, therefore, that the time had come when a calm opinion might be formed. He had been aware of the ignorance which existed on this question, and at a time when there was no political excitement existing in the country at the end of 1873 he called together a meeting of farmers in his district to consider the question, and to ascertain if they were really in favour of an amendment of the law. Well, there was a clear majority of 7, in a company of about 40, in favour of the retention of hypothec as it was, so that the decision to which he (Mr. Dalrymple) had come could hardly be said to have been pressed upon him. It was true the Farmers' Society to which he alluded could not be considered altogether as representatives of the class to which they belonged, because their circumstances were peculiar. The feeling so expressed might be partly due to the fact that in that particular district sequestrations were almost unknown—but he admitted that there was a general feeling in other parts of Scotland in favour of the alteration of the law as regarded agricultural tenancies. The present Bill was confined solely to agricultural subjects, and for this reason he was able to take the course he proposed to take by voting in favour of the second reading. If the Bill had been introduced in its old form, and the proposal had been to abolish urban as well as agricultural hypothec, he could not have supported it; because, though it might turn out that if the one kind were abolished, the other would follow, at all events there was no movement in Scotland against urban hypothec, and he (Mr. Dalrymple) could be no party to its abolition. He would himself have preferred an alteration of the law regarding agricultural hypothec, and would have been willing that the hypothec, instead of being as at present on stock and crop, should have been placed on furniture, implements, and manure, which were not now hypothecated. While the former subjects might well be set free, the latter would afford ample security to the landlord, as they ought to represent a half-year's rent of any farmer worth the name. In conclusion, he said that he found himself able to vote for the second reading, because the Bill was limited in its scope; and because the subject, having been removed from the region of controversy, it had been better considered, and yet in spite of some variety of opinion, a very wide-spread dislike to the law prevailed in Scotland. He (Mr. Dalrymple) had been anxious to make these remarks in explanation of his vote, though as far as his own feeling, derived from observation of the law, went, he remained very much of the same mind as formerly, and his change of opinion was more apparent than real.

MR. M'COMBIE: Sir, I have great pleasure in supporting this Bill. It vitally affects the interests of my constituents and the tenant-farmers of Scotland. The game laws only affect the farmers on game preserving-properties; whereas the law of hypothec affects every farmer paying rent, and is the worst of all class laws. It has raised a fictitious value over farms large and small in Scotland. Now, we are told every day that the tenant-farmers are quite fit to make their own bargains. I wish it were so. Why, he has not the ghost of a chance. In Scotland the proprietors have all printed estate regulations—many of the most tyrannical description, even binding the tenant to keep neither cat nor dog. The first question asked by the proprietor or his agent is—"Do you agree to our regulations?" Should the applicant raise any objection, he is polately shown the door. But he is in no better position with other proprietors in 99 cases out of 100, and he must submit, or betake himself to some other occupation. In every neighbourhood there will be some proprietors who will advertise their farms, and will accept of the highest offer—an offer that never can be paid from the produce of the farm. In many such cases a rent is never paid: but the landlord falls back on the crops and whatever stocking there may be on the farm, and secures his rent by the law of hypothec, although there should not be a shilling left to the other creditors. In other cases, the tenant applies to the landlord, and he gives a reduction of rent; and perhaps he may obtain a second reduction. Now, it is a bad sign of a farmer and a farm when a reduction is called for. I have no sympathy for tenants promising rents that never can be paid—it is a great injustice to the country, and they ought to be made to fulfil their bargain or quit, as such conduct raises a fictitious value for farms over the whole country. During the last 50 years I have taken many leases of different farms, but I never asked my proprietors for a reduction of rent, neither did I ever sign a printed regulation or a lease binding myself to preserve game. But mine is a quite exceptional case. As my own nearest connections have generally been my proprietors, they dispensed with their printed regulations, as they knew I would never submit to such degrading and tyrannical rules. Why, Sir, it is to no purpose for proprietors and their land-agents to hold out that the tenants are quite fit to make their own bargains. I say most emphatically that they have no fair chance, and it is a mere delusion to think otherwise. It is only another attempt of the proprietors and their agents to throw dust in the eyes of the public. The tenants are practically at the mercy of the proprietors. Another of the cases raised by the proprietors and their agents is that if the law of hypothec was repealed, it would ruin all the poor tenants. Now, I think I can prove that it is a law to hold a poor man always poor. Believing that the fictitious value of land has been raised under the hypothec law, I have remonstrated with proprietors who had let their farms at rents that never could be paid from their produce;—and what was their reply—

"What did they care, they could be no losers. They would have the law of hypothec to fall back upon, and other creditors might just take their chance." Such, Sir, is the law of hypothec. I will give an example or two as the working otherwise of the law and our estate regulations on a farm of 400 acres, where the tenant had expended on houses, dykes, roads, &c., £4,000. He became bankrupt, the proprietor appropriated for his own behoof the whole houses, dykes, &c., and the creditors were promised 3s. in the pound. The proprietor re-let the farm at a great rise of rent. Another example, and I will not trouble the House with more, for they would only be repetitions. A poor and foolish man took a hill farm at an absurd rent; his family became security for him; he improved a tract of "bog" land; he built a slated house and steading with his family's money. They paid the rent for several years. As last they saw that it was no good, so they gave up the lease, with the expectation of getting some remuneration for the houses and improvements. They were turned about their business, and never got a farthing. I could give hundreds of cases of the results of the tyrannical and unjust estate regulations, and of the working of the law of hypothec in Scotland. It is marvellous that the landlords of Scotland, who are stated to have little interest in the question of hypothec, have almost been alone in their desire to retain the law, and the tenant-farmers, who are said to have the greatest interest, are almost unanimous in their urgent desire for its repeal. Aberdeenshire is a county of small farmers. 2,481 farmers of that county signed a Petition in favour of the abolition of hypothec. This is just another tactic of the landlords to throw dust in the eyes of the public, and to create sympathy for the poor farmers. Sir, the tenant-farmers have never been represented in this House. The proprietors have had all their own way, and made laws exclusively for their own behoof. And why are we sitting here to-day on this side of the House? Because the late Government ignored the claims of the tenant-farmers of Scotland. When the late Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Carnegie) introduced his Bill for the abolition of the law of hypothec, instead of giving us any relief for our grievances, they saddled us with additional taxes. The farmers of Scotland were incensed at their conduct, and turned round upon them at the late Election—turned out the Liberal Members, and put the hon. Gentlemen opposite in their place. I believe I am better acquainted with the feelings of the tenant-farmers of Scotland than any Member of this House. I would advise the present Government, if they wish to retain their seats and the seats of their supporters in the Scotch counties, not only to support this Bill, but give us relief as to the game and land laws, or else at the next Election—I believe it to be as sure as I am addressing you—the present Government will meet the same fate as the former Government, as far as the Scotch counties are concerned. It is thrown in our teeth that owing the law of hypothec some have risen from being small farmers to large farmers. I should wish they would condescend on their number. I am acquainted with very few, and the one or two I am acquainted with would have risen in whatever position of life in which they might have been placed. It is a law of serfdom; such is the law of hypothec. We should bear it thoroughly in mind that if the tenant-farmers of England, Ireland, and Scotland would only be true to themselves, they can make a Parliament—sending none but those who will advocate their rights. Then Parliament will grant them their just rights, and not till then. Looking at the benches opposite, it is marvellous to me to think how the English tenant-farmers have packed the benches with landlords who do not represent their interests. Is that the way to obtain our rights? We will never obtain our rights until we send our own representatives, and not be depending on landlord representatives. Why is it that the English farmers do not send to the House of Commons more representatives like my hon. Friend the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read)? I beg to support the Bill.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he only spoke on this occasion as an Aberdeenshire proprietor. In that capacity he had had the management of an estate in that county for a number of years, and he was now nearly as old a man as the hon. Member opposite (Mr. M'Combie)—he might, therefore, claim to have some little knowledge of the agriculture and the farmers of Scotland. This question of hypothec was not only bound up in the agricultural interest—it entered into the very soul and marrow of the whole commercial system of this country—it was not merely a farmer's question, it was a merchant's and a banker's question; and the interests could not be separated. He did not see how—looking at the fundamental principles of commerce—they could not dispense with this system of agricultural hypothec. The law of hypothec was as old as any system in the world. The word, he believed, was derived from the Latin noun hypotheca, which meant “a pledge.” The man pledged his stock to the man who furnished him with the material to carry on his business. It was not the landlord's but the manure merchant's question—they viewed a farm as a young man was viewed by money lenders—they induced the farmer to keep the land in a state of intoxication for 18 years, and then left it poor and stripped of its energy when the lease was up. Had the question concerned merely the rights of the landlord, he should vote for the second reading of the Bill, because it would tear off from the hon. Members for Aberdeenshire and Forfarshire the only garment that covered them, and would leave them in a state of political nakedness. From his long experience of them he was proud to say that in the whole of Great Britain there were no such tenantry as those of Aberdeenshire. They were the men who turned land into cultivation that would have absolutely appalled the labour of any other country. Land had been cleared and brought into cultivation in places where you could not see it in the first instance for the stones that covered it. Well, but did these men enter on this without security? Not one of them; they did it with the understanding that they should occupy the ground for a certain number of years free of rent; in the second term of years there would be a small rent, and in the third term of years there would be a larger rent. During this time the landlord frequently supplied the farmer with guano, and afforded him other assistance. These men always improved their condition in Aberdeenshire—as they did also wherever they went—all over the world they were found in positions of trust, to which they had raised themselves by their own industry and energy. This Bill was to strike at the root of these people. It struck at the root of this hardy peasantry to cover the land with large farmers. The hon. Member (Mr. M'Combie) knew as well as he did the character of the farmers in Aberdeenshire, and must know that their sons had fallen in India and in the Peninsula, and had carried the British flag to the ends of the earth. These were the men who founded our East Indian possessions, and whose blood had been shed in every battle-field in the service of the British Crown. These men had sprung more from the lower tenant-farmers than from the upper tenant-farmers. Standing there as an Aberdeenshire proprietor, he had never known a single tenant turned off any of the farms he was fortunate enough to possess, and there never should be. On the contrary, he should be glad to break down the system of large farms, and to produce again that bone and sinew which it had been the pride of Scotland to possess, and which it was the object of those opposite to sweep off the land, and in their place to produce a bloated aristocracy of large farmers.

Mr. M'LAGAN said, he should vote for the second reading of the Bill, and as that was the first time he had voted against the law of hypothec, he hoped the House would listen to him for a few minutes. He never supported hypothec on principle, but he thought it a law to be supported on grounds of expediency. The principle was that of class legislation, and on account of its being class legislation he was determined to vote against it on this occasion, and because he thought there were no longer those exceptional circumstances that required its being kept up. When the law was first passed it might be urged that it could have been supported on principle. The tenant received the land from the landlord on condition that he should pay rent in kind to the landlord, but these times were passed. Then, the only security the landlord had for his portion of the produce was that which the law of hypothec gave him. The tenant was now a man of capital. Formerly, he had little or no capital—on the contrary, he had to borrow capital from his landlord. Formerly, a tenant had only one creditor, and that his landlord; now the tenant had numerous creditors, and some of them were larger creditors than the landlord. Farming was now being conducted on more commercial principles than formerly; and as he believed this, he believed it would be wise on the part of that House to place the regulations affecting landlord and tenant on a basis possessing more of a commercial character. He should not object to the arguments which had been used by the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) in favour of the law. He was not one of those who thought this law had been an iniquitous law; on the contrary, he would say the law of hypothec had been of great benefit to Scotland and to the agriculture of Scotland. He believed that without the law of hypothec the agriculture of Scotland would not have been in the position it now was; but these times were passed. We lived in new times, under different circumstances, and we required different laws. One reason why he voted for the Bill was that the population of Scotland had increased to an enormous extent, though the land had not increased at all. Competition for land was, therefore, also very greatly increased. There could be no doubt this law of hypothec tended to increase the number of applicants for farms. If these were only tenants with capital there would be no great harm; but, unfortunately, it tended to the increase of applications by tenants without capital. Landlords sometimes selected tenants for their farms who had not sufficient capital for the purpose. This was a great cause of complaint at the present time, and it was because the law tended to keep up such an evil as this that he opposed it. Another reason was, as he had said, that the landlord was not now the only or even the largest creditor of the farm. He should not mix up in the question some of the statements that had been made by hon. Gentlemen who had preceded him. He did not think the law of hypothec was one which was much connected with the bitter feeling which existed between landlord and tenant, and he should say nothing now which would tend to evoke the feeling. It was injudicious on the part of those who called themselves farmers' representatives, that they should come up to Parliament and stir up the bad feeling which all would like to allow to pass away. He could not say he altogether approved of the Bill. That of Mr. Carnegie, the late Member for Forfarshire, was a Bill which abolished the law of hypothec, both in agricultural and urban communities. He should vote, however, for the second reading of this Bill, because he did not approve of the principle of hypothec. The hon. Member for Wigtonshire (Mr. Vans Agnew) said, he saw a difference in the principle between agricultural and urban hypothec. He could see no difference in the principle whatever. As regarded agricultural hypothec, the landlord had a claim on the stock, but had none on the furniture. An urban landlord had a claim on the furniture. See how that might be exercised. A tenant entering a house bought the furniture from an upholsterer, but did not pay for it, neither did he pay his rent. The landlord entered and seized the furniture, which did not belong to the tenant. The baker and the butcher were in exactly the same position when they supplied the tenant-farmer, but if the Bill was carried in its present shape, the baker and the butcher would be placed in a different position with regard to the tenant-farmer and the tenant of a house. If the Bill should pass, and go into Committee, he should support Amendments on these points. There were two classes of constituents in the counties in Scotland — the tenant-farmers, who wished to have the law abolished, and the house proprietors, who wished no change; but if he disapproved of the principle, he should go against it whether it suited one class of his constituents or another. Another difficulty in the way was indicated by the evidence of a tenant-farmer before the Commissioners in 1864, who said that if the law of hypothec were abolished it would be absolutely necessary to have a limit to the lease if a tenant did not pay his rent, or as it was called in Scotland a statutory irritancy of the lease. He knew it was said in all leases that the tenancy should come to an end if rent was not paid; but he would ask in how many instances had a landlord been able to put out a tenant who had not paid rent? If he happened to be a litigious tenant, he could keep his place there in spite of the landlord and in spite of the law. A case had been stated in which a tenant kept his place three years simply by raising an action against the landlord for not taking certain improvements. The witness said that if the tenant did not pay rent the tenancy should cease at that moment. The hon. Member for Wigtonshire had stated that every time a Bill had been introduced for the abolition of the law of hypothec it had not been carried in that House. In 1868, he believed, a second reading of the Bill was carried, and it was after the carrying of that Bill he was led to re-consider the course he had taken in neither voting for nor against it. When he had considered the subject more fully, he arrived at the conclusion that the time had come when it was expedient that this law should no longer exist. The House should bear in mind that discussion had taken place on the subject not only within, but outside the walls of Parliament. One question which must soon come up for discussion here would be that of the land laws, and in the front of these was the law of hypothec. If the law of hypothec was abolished in Scotland, the time would not be far distant when the law of distress would be abolished in England. If these laws raised up bad feeling between landlord and tenant, it was right that Parliament should do all it could to smooth down those differences. He fully sympathized with sentiments that had been expressed by the noble Lord the Member for Elginshire (Viscount Macduff), that the future prosperity of the agricultural interest depended very much on the good relations between landlord and tenant; on a tenantry with capital, zeal, and enterprize; on an educated peasantry, and last—but not least—on equal laws between the parties.

MR. CLARE READ said, that although the opposition to this Bill had come from an English Member (Mr. Gregory), he should not have ventured to take part in this purely Scotch debate if it had not been for the special appeal made to him by the hon. Member for West Aberdeen (Mr. M'Combie). The hon. Gentleman concluded his interesting speech by saying why could not the tenant-farmers of England send more tenant-farmers to that House? Why—because so long as the gentry of England would be so good as to really represent the tenant-farmers of England there was no necessity for such a sacrifice being made by the tenant-farmers as to become representatives in Parliament themselves. Although they both had one object in view on this question, there seemed to be a different opinion between the Scotch and English tenant-farmers on many points. For instance, take what was said about game. Scotch tenants wished to abolish the whole of the game laws; whereas in England farmers wished simply to protect themselves from ground game. Again, Scotch tenant-farmers wished to abolish the law of primogeniture and entail—the English did not go half so far—all they asked for was that the tenant for life should have certain powers to grant leases, and to give compensation for improvements on his property. It might be said that the tenant-farmers of England were “the residuum” of an ignorant class; but they had no desire to benefit themselves at the expense of their landlords. He considered this was a question rather affecting the public and the creditors than the tenant-farmers of England. When they came to compare the two laws he believed it would be found that the law of hypothec, as recently modified, was, on the whole, rather more just than the law of distress. At all events, it was open and above board. The landlord had to go before the sheriff, or a Judge of some sort, before he could seize the tenant's crops—and he believed it was an unknown thing for that to be done in Scotland, unless the tenant were in arrear of rent—whereas, as had been said by his hon. Friend the Member for West Sussex, an English landlord could distrain back for six years, and thus deceive the creditors in regard to the state of the farmer's finances. Of course, he should be classed by his hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) as a “bloated aristocratic farmer.” He was much obliged to the hon. Baronet for the compliment he had paid the large farmers of England and Scotland. As a man of capital he might have some objection to the law of distress, for he believed it did tend to foster undue competition for land, and that now and then it was an inducement for the landlord or his agent to accept a man of straw: but when he came to regard it practically, he must say that, with respect to those who occupied small holdings, he believed that the law had been beneficial. Take his own county, where it was thought the proportion of large farmers were unusually large:—there were in Norfolk 10,000 occupiers of land whose farms were under 20 acres, and the whole average of the county gave only 60 acres to a farm. Landlords were but human beings like the rest of creation, and they would not be so kind and generous if they had great risks to run; therefore, he could not shut his eyes to the fact that a great and meritorious class of farmers were benefited by the law of distress, because their landlords were enabled to be kind and considerate towards them. He knew very well how hard was the lot of these small cultivators, and how they had to labour from morning to night in order to gain a most scanty subsistence. He knew that the only way in which a small English farmer could succeed was by doing the work of two agricultural labourers, and living at the expense of one. Consequently he could do nothing that would in any way injure their condition. He could not vote therefore for the present Bill; but, at the same time, he was so much of a Home Ruler, that he would accept the opinion of the Scotch Members on the question. He believed the tenant-farmers of Scotland were nearly unanimous on the subject; and that being the case, he should be compelled again to act as he had done of late years, and to abstain from voting on the question altogether.

COLONEL MURE desired to make a few remarks on the speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth. The hon. Baronet had drawn a very melancholy picture of the evils which would result to commerce if the law of hypothec were abolished. Now, as he understood the author of this Bill, it applied only to agricultural subjects. Hypothec was, in fact, an artificial lien which a landlord had upon his tenant's property. Now, there were various kinds of liens. There was the lien a lawyer had over his client's papers; a sailor had a lien on the cargo of his ship; the Custom House or the Government had a lien on goods deposited, which could not be freed until the dues were paid. But these were all natural liens—namely, liens on goods in possession, in keeping or manipulating which expenses had accrued. In Scotland, however, the greater part of the land was let on lease. In the old times, to which his hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. M'Lagan) had referred, there was a dis-ting partnership between the landlord and tenant, much on the old métayer system, the landlord supplying, besides the land, sometimes even stock and implements, and the rent was the proportion of profit accruing to the landlord, and not a fixed annual payment. But in these days the case was totally altered—the land was let principally on lease for 19 years, for a fixed money rent. Now, under the stringent power of a Scotch lease, the land belonged to the tenant, and not only for usufruct, for it was necessary that the landlord should introduce a clause in the lease providing for his free entry upon the land to seek for game or for other purposes. Practically, therefore, for the duration of the lease, the land was in the tenant's possession—not in that of the landlord; and, consequently, the tenant's goods could not be subject to a lien unless it was an artificial lien—this, therefore, was not a lien which ought to be recognized by the law of hypothec. He quite agreed with some remarks which fell from his hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow, to the effect that it was very wrong to introduce into the present discussion topics which might tend to impair the good relation subsisting between landlord and tenant. He had no hesitation in saying that the relations between landlord and tenant in Scotland were excellent. He meant to support the Bill because he had promised to support it; but he denied that there was any reason for supporting the measure on the ground that the law of hypothec created a bad feeling between landlord and tenant. He supported it on political economic grounds purely. The hon. Member for Aberdeenshire (Mr. M'Combie) had stated that the tenant-farmers required relief. Well, looking at the distinguished position which the hon. Member had achieved in the commercial and agricultural system of the country, entirely by his success as a tenant-farmer, he did not think he required either out-door or in-door relief. If the hon. Member came before the House as a specimen of a poor Scotch farmer labouring under the law of hypothec, and seeking relief, he must be regarded as a very infirm advocate of the cause. An argument had been adduced that by the law of hypothec the market for farms was unnaturally raised, and that the unnatural credit which a tenant had from his landlord often enabled a farmer with little or no capital to take possession of the soil. These arguments had been worn threadbare; but he had no hesitation in saying if we had absolute free trade as it existed in other countries, farmers who possessed sufficient capital, and were otherwise qualified to occupy farms, would be sure to find them; while other persons who had not sufficient capital, or who were not qualified to be farmers, would have to seek some other occupation more suited to their capacity. In the course of his travels and his reading, he had learned a little about land tenure in foreign countries. At the time of the discussions on the Irish Land question, a great deal was said about the charming position of the small cultivators and small proprietors in Belgium. Probably, there was not so miserable a class of men in the world. The small tenant of a petit propriétaire was obliged to take small patches of land, and he and his wife and children literally watered the land with their sweat. The children were worked to the bone as soon as they were old enough to work, and were brought up in the grossest ignorance. Moreover, in Belgium, at the close of the last hour of the last day of the agricultural year, the landlord might step in and sell up his tenant without any warning whatever. Now, could anything present a more striking contrast than the position of the hon. Member for Aberdeenshire, or of the hon. Member for South Norfolk, compared with that of the small tenants of the petits propriétaires of the plains of Belgium? With regard to hypothec, he wished to assure the House that landlords and tenants could live in perfect security without that law. In Schleswig-Holstein, where the tenure of land was very much the same as in this country, there was absolutely free trade between landlord and tenant—that was to say, there was no artificial law that pointed out a statutory means of security, such as the law of hypothec in Scotland. Formerly, hypothec was not statutory, but merely a stereotyped custom. Now, however, it had become almost statutory, because the custom had been regulated by statute. In Schleswig-Holstein the land was usually let on lease, and there the landlord and tenant had absolute freedom, and decided between them what security should be given. The consequence was that both met on equal terms. Again, in Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, or rather in those districts of the country where nine-year leases were usually granted—for the greater part of it was let on the métayer system—there was no law whatever at all resembling hypothec. Neither was there in the lowlying lands on the fertile banks of the Po, which might be termed the Garden of Southern Europe. There the farmers were men of great intelligence and comparative wealth, while the landlords, like our own, generally had large estates; but there was no interference whatever, either by custom or law, between landlord and tenant. But this curious practice prevailed: the tenant usually agreed to pay down three years' rent—and the chances were that he would have to borrow the money—but the landlord paid him 7 or 8 per cent interest for it during the term of the lease, which was generally for from 9 to 12 years. Practically, this amounted to a custom; and there was a graduated scale, according to the demand for farms, of the amount of interest which accrued to the money. He had no hesitation in saying that, in these days, men without capital had better go and work as labourers until they got capital—and then they might become farmers; for in these days, to carry out farming successfully, costly appliances were necessary, and no farmer could compete in the great agricultural markets who had no capital. If the law of hypothec were abolished, he believed rents would at first fall on paper, but as the land became better cultivated would eventually rise. At the close of the Abyssinian War, when the right hon. Gentleman the present Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) was Chancellor of the Exchequer, he was at a loss for funds to supply a rather grave deficit. What did he do? Why, he changed the incidence of taxation from assessed taxes to licences; he put £500,000 into his pocket and made a very good business of it, while nobody felt any the worse. If the abolition of the security of hypothec resulted in forehanded rents—it was clear that, in the case of a landowner of an estate let in the aggregate for £5,000 a-year, on 19 years' leases, from the moment forehanded rents were enforced, in the course of 19 years he would put £5,000 in his pocket. That, he thought, would be a very satisfactory result, and, therefore, he should give his support to this Bill. He had warned the tenant-farmers in his district what the result would be; but they were so anxious for the repeal of the law that they were prepared to make the sacrifice—if, indeed, it could be called one. He had been anxious to say a few words respecting this measure, more especially as he desired to assure this House that he supported, not on account of any supposed differences, which in reality did not exist, between landlord and tenant, but because he believed that while free trade would result, perhaps, in landlords having less rent on paper, they would, under a free system, be more careful in choosing tenants, and get better security. In his own district the result of the law of hypothec had been that a vast number of agricultural tenants, without capital, were retained on the soil, and the landowners had not been able to take advantage of the increased intelligence, the increased capital, and the increased agricultural science, which was now happily in the possession of Great Britain.

SIR GEORGE H. SCOTT DOUGLAS: I quite admit the many benefits which the law of hypothec has conferred upon Scotland, and I fully acknowledge the very great assistance that law has given in developing the agriculture of Scotland, and raising it to its present high position; but we must not forget the very great changes which have taken place during the last century, not only in the condition of Scotland, but also in the conditions of agriculture there. Scotland formerly was very poor, the greater part of the country an uncultivated waste, whilst those portions under tillage were worked by tenants who depended almost entirely upon their own intelligence and persevering industry, the resources of their farms, and the kindly feeling of their landlords. Now, Scotland possesses a fair amount of capital; her uncultivated wastes have been converted into fertile and highly productive districts; the science of the chemist and the inventive skill of the engineer have been called in to aid the farmer in the cultivation of the soil, by supplying him with manures, artificial and imported, feeding stuffs, and agricultural machinery, the accounts for all of which form heavy items on the working expenses of a farm; and the merchants who furnish these necessaries naturally feel it to be a hardship that they should run the ordinary risks of trade, while the rent of the landlord is secured to him by an exceptional law. I am quite aware it is said, that if the law of hypothec is abolished, competition for farms will be lessened, rents lowered, and the security of the landlord taken away. I have no fear of any such consequences, for I believe that the country contains abundant capital, and a farmer's life is a pleasant and healthy occupation much sought after—and, moreover, I have always noticed that when farms are vacant on well managed estates, there is no lack of competition for them; and a landlord has only to select, not the highest offerer, but the man who can show good antecedents and sufficient funds, and then by making careful conditions and a proper bargain, his rent will be as secure as at present. The question of hypothec has now for some years been a cause of agitation in Scotland, where it is felt as a grievance by the tenants and the public; whilst the landlords, whose interests the law was framed to protect, are indifferent as to its continuance. I know that what I have said is the feeling in the highly cultivated country which I have the honour to represent, and such is my own view. I shall, therefore, support the second reading of the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Wigtonshire—and before sitting down, I must say that in that part of Scotland from which I come the feeling between landlords and tenants is very good, their interests are almost identical; and I believe that it is outcries and denunciations like those indulged in by the hon. Members for Forfarshire and Aberdeenshire, which have, to a very great extent, retarded and obstructed legislation on this and other agricultural subjects.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR supported the Bill of the hon. Member for Wigtonshire because he thought it a good thing to get rid of laws which were no longer necessary, and because he believed that the law of hypothec tended to retard or prevent that investment of capital on the land which was one of the necessities of our times. He regretted that English Members had been found to urge the retaining of this law in a country where the conditions on which agriculture was carried on, through the aid of long leases differed so materially from those prevailing in England, but the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Read) had acted more wisely in saying that Scotch Members should be allowed to decide the question for themselves. The law of distress was widely different in England from that of the hypothec of Scotland, and he could assure the House that a large portion of the sequestrations which had taken place was for the purpose of having security for the rent to become due. Why were the landlords to be supposed to be incapable of looking after their own interests? Why not leave them to look after their own affairs instead of providing them with a special law? A point had been raised as to landlords being so liberal by allowing men to undertake the cultivation of land who had not sufficient capital; but if the landlords were left to consider their own interests, without the protection now given by the law to an unjust contract as against the farmer, they would look about them in order to select only those men who by means of capital, intelligence, and good conduct would do justice to the land. He was not there to speak with regard to assisting poor farmers, for he wished to see them rise by their own exertions to independence; but he might say that he believed that Scotland had risen to her present position in spite of this law. When they looked back for nearly 100 years, they would see what a great change in the cultivation of the soil had taken place through the Montgomery Act giving long leases. A great portion of the wealth from the land rentals of Scotland had been made mainly by long leases, whereby persevering and industrious farmers had without aid from landlords brought land into cultivation and improved and benefited the land fit for agriculture. He thought this was an unjust law, which favoured a powerful interest that no longer required such protection, while the feeling of Scotland was totally opposed to the longer continuance of such a law. He trusted the English Members would permit the Scotch Members to deal with this question which peculiarly affected Scotland. The Scotch Members did not desire to interfere with the English land laws. On those grounds he should support the second reading of the Bill.

General Sir George Balfour

MR. MARK STEWART said, the district which he represented contained amongst the constituency many gentlemen who were interested in the question, and who had long expressed the decided opinion that hypothec ought to be abolished. After having given great consideration to the question, he was prepared to support the second reading of the Bill. It contained principles which had not been alluded to so far in the debate, and the Bill not only concerned what was agricultural, but it had also reference to mills, shops, and places of manufacture. That involved a different consideration, and if the Bill reached Committee it would be necessary to go thoroughly into the question, and to use other arguments than those already heard. The hon. Member for Aberdeenshire declared that the tenant-farmers of Scotland could not take care of themselves. He understood the hon. Member to say that he had never been bound by any writing or parchment, and never would be. He was a very fair sample of the kind of tenant-farmer who came from Scotland, and his career and independence did him great credit; but at the same time when he held up the tenant-farmers, as he might say, almost to the ridicule of the House of Commons and the country by saying that they were utterly unable to look after their own interests, the hon. Member branded them in a manner which they did not deserve. He also laid great stress on the opinion that the question was a landlords' question. He (Mr. M. Stewart) utterly denied that it was a landlords' question. He was interested in land both as a farmer and a landlord, and he wished to tell the hon. Member that he had not, in the management of the estates of which he had experience, ever known a single case of hypothecation. The House, then, might say—"Why come here to advocate the abolition of a law under which no material injury has arisen?" Because it was the opinion of all persons during his election contest that he had come in contact with, that it was undesirable to continue the law of hypothec. The House should recollect that hypothec originated at a time when the landlord had to give everything for the cultivation of the soil—not only to look out for a tenant, but to provide the stock, implements, and seed, and other necessities for carrying on the farm; but now of that was done away with. In his part of the country all the farms were fore rented, and practically the abolition of the law of hypothec would not much influence the proprietor. He utterly denied that the matter was a landlords' question, for if hypothec were done away with the landlord would not allow himself to be defrauded of his rent. He would put in some clause, in some agreement, or in some way, he would take precious good care of his own rights. The hon. Member had suggested that the tenant-farmers were a down-trodden class, but the landlords had nothing to fear in the discussion. Distinctive and class privileges were doubtless doing a great deal to embitter the feeling between landlord and tenant; but there were not engendered all those feelings which the hon. Member opposite had attributed to the landlords of Scotland. It had been said in the course of the debate that small farmers would suffer. No doubt they would suffer. He thought, in fact, that was the very strongest argument that could be used against reading the Bill a second time, and if he were opposing it, that would be his sole argument; but he was influenced in his present views by the fact that in the country he came from there was in his experience, and, so far as he had heard, little or no difference of opinion on the question, not only amongst the large tenants, but also amongst the small tenants. It had been found that men of straw did offer for farms. Although at first the landlord thought he was getting a great rise of rent, it did not last, as these men, having no capital, could not stand in bad seasons. The farm got badly cultivated, and in the end both the landlord, the tenant, and the country were injuriously affected. Competition was also, in another way, unduly fostered. A man came into a country new to him, and offered for a farm. He saw the surrounding farms let at a very high rent, and he thought he was safe in doing the same thing. He would not take into consideration that the landlord's right of hypothec virtually protected him against loss from an injudicious offer on the part of the tenant, and he offered a fictitious rent. Sometimes a man's goods were sequestrated from year to year, and there could be no doubt that under such management the farm suffered. He did not attach such great importance to the diminished credit of the tenant under the law of hypothec, though, no doubt, it operated harshly on occasional emergencies. Not only would the manure agents and seedsmen decline to trust a man; but the person on whom the tenant was, in these days, most dependent, the banker, would not trust him. There were other classes of persons who also would suffer. The blacksmith, the joiner, the clothiers, the ironmonger, and other small tradesmen, wholly depended for their livelihood on the well-doing of the tenant-farmer. On well-managed estates these hardships were not, he believed, often felt; but still there was no blinking the fact that they might rise up any moment, as had been said that though the majority of the landlords might be good landlords, there were bad ones as well. That was perfectly true; and if he were opposing the second reading he should give very strong advice to let well alone. It had been said that capital would flow into other channels; but there was no evidence for the use of the argument. The statement that the Bill would interfere with long leases was very serious; but when a landlord chose a tenant, he had to consider the class of tenant he had to get, the best rent—from a reasonable point of view—that could be obtained, and how to get his farm into the best condition, for on that depended any fair rise which might be expected at the end of the lease; and taking that and other matters into consideration, he did not think the landlord would be inclined to take short leases in place of long ones. The House must not forget that the customs relating to land in Scotland were on a very different footing from those of England. In Scotland the landlord paid half of the poor-rate, the whole of the county rate, half of the school rate, the whole of the minister's stipend, the repairs of the manse and church, and, till lately, those of the parish school. This might be taken as an argument against the Bill; but the House should consider both sides of the question. In his opinion it was not; as the landlords, he believed, were generally of opinion that it was a tenant's and not a landlord's question; and opposition on their part mainly arose on that score; and no doubt there was many a poor man who had risen to opulence and to be a large farmer owing to circumstances certainly to be traced to the protection the law of hypothec had given. It had already been remarked that hypothec had done its work, and if that was the feeling in Scotland, where its operation was best known, the House need not scruple to give its sanction to the principle of the second reading of this Bill. One word as to urban hypothec. During the two keen contests in his group of burghs last year, embracing many rural as well as urban voters, he had never heard of any wish to abolish it, or any grievance on that score. It seemed to him the first necessity to a poor man was the shelter of a house to protect him. The rent of a man's house was very small, and very different from that of a farm, which not only afforded shelter, but in it was embarked all a man's capital for the purpose of carrying on the farm. He would not trouble the House at greater length; but he wished to say he intended to support the Bill, because he considered that in course of time it would allay agitation and repress any feeling of bitterness that might exist between landlord and tenant, and which the common weal of the country required should not exist. He trusted, if the measure were carried, that great care would be taken in Committee to make it effective and conducive, to the welfare of the country.

MR. R. W. DUFF was not singular, he thought, in asking the House that the Bill should be made to apply to the towns as well as the country. Speaking as a landlord, he did not at all object to the Bill so far as related to agricultural hypothec, because the landlords could take care of themselves—but he did object to getting the thin end of the wedge in, to having one law for the town and another for the country. He could understand hon. Members saying that they would abolish hypothec for the country but not for the towns—because the owners of house property in towns were a very powerful body—almost as powerful as the publicans—but he could not approve such a policy—and if he gave his support to the second reading it would be on the distinct understanding that if the same law was not allowed for both town and country, he would take the opportunity of voting against the Bill on every occasion. As to the rent system, he was quite certain, speaking from the knowledge of his own constituency, that the tenants had not capital sufficient to go from one system to the other. In that part of the country it was impossible for the landlord to look to “forehand rent;” and he thought the majority of the tenant-farmers in the north of Scotland had not sufficient capital to give forehand rent. He hoped that there would be some expression of opinion from Her Majesty's Government on the Bill before the debate closed. The hon. Member for South Norfolk had certainly addressed the House; but he said that he would not vote at all on the question; and as the Lord Advocate was then, or had recently been in the House, he hoped the right hon. and learned Member would favour them with the opinion of Her Majesty's Government on the question. He would support the second reading, but on the distinct understanding which he had mentioned.

MR. RAMSAY pointed out that the measure dealt not only with agricultural subjects, as the term “heritable” used in the Bill would include warehouses, factories, and all descriptions of property except dwelling-houses, which were expressly exempted. That was a point on which he would have liked to have heard the opinion of the Lord Advocate. In regard to the discrepancy between several of the speakers as to the state of public opinion in Scotland, he begged to explain that the feeling against the law of hypothec existed chiefly in the arable districts on the east coast, while he had not heard of a Petition against it from the pastoral districts in the west of Scotland. That was an important consideration. If it were the intention of the hon. Member for Wigtonshire to include urban tenements, as well as those which were agricultural—and he believed the true construction of the Bill would be that both were included in its provisions—it ought to be distinctly stated. He wished the Lord Advocate had been in his place, because he might have favoured them with his views on the general question. As to the question of “forehand rents,” there were strictly entailed estates, and if hypothec were abolished there must be an alteration of the law, or a tenant might be liable to pay twice. He (Mr. Ramsay) would be glad to support the abolition of the law of hypothec, but their legislation should be devised with reference to other existing laws, and not merely for the removal of an apparent defect without any regard to the consequences that would ensue, or the effect which such removal might have on the legal position and rights of owners and occupiers respectively.

LORD ELCHO said, he was anxious to press one or two points upon the attention of the House. He certainly agreed with his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. R. W. Duff) that the question was one of such great importance that they ought to have some expression of opinion from some responsible representative of the Government. He said it was a most important question; and on this ground—although his noble Friend (Viscount Macduff), who spoke so well in the earlier part of the debate, said he hoped that the question would be treated as a Scotch one, he (Lord Elcho) trusted that it would not be so treated. It was not a Scotch question. It rested on a much broader question, for it affected England and Ireland quite as much as it did Scotland. What was the principle of the Bill? It was a very short Bill; it consisted only of 12 lines, but in those 12 lines there was embodied an absolute revolution as regarded the security enjoyed by the owners of property for their lands and rents. That was not a question which ought to be disposed of in 12 lines. It not only affected England and Ireland as well as Scotland, but it affected only one description of property—namely, that of land. Why should not other property be dealt with in the same way? The question was not one that should be dealt with in that haphazard manner, and they ought to have a distinct expression of opinion from the Government. For instance, did they or did they not think it was right for owners to have some security? Did they or did they not think there was any reason why Scotland should be legislated for differently from England and Ireland? If the Government did think so, then they ought to bring in a Bill. If, on the other hand, they thought there was no reason for dealing exceptionally with Scotch property as compared with Irish and English property, then he thought they ought to say so. With regard to the statements that it was a landlord and tenants question, he, speaking as the son of a landlord, denied that it was. After the passing of the Bill—if it should pass—any landlord could secure himself against any loss; but it would be at the expense of the small tenant. The hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) had in his speech in that debate stated that he could not shut his eyes to the fact that a great and meritorious class of farmers were benefited by the English law of distress, which was the counterpart of the Scotch law. He also stated—and he (Lord Elcho) was astonished at the statement—that in his own county there were 10,000 tenants with holdings under 20 acres, while the average quantity held by the small tenants and the “bloated aristocracy of farmers,” as they were called by the hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth, amounted only to 60 acres. The question was a wider one than many persons supposed. He thought that the Bill, if carried, would operate most injuriously on what the hon. Member for South Norfolk had most justly described as a most industrious and hardworking class—the small tenants of Scotland.

MR. LEEMAN said, he was anxious to call the attention of the House to some facts connected with the history of this measure. In 1871 a similar Bill was introduced, and was rejected by nearly two to one; in 1873 the same thing happened; but it seemed that the gentlemen promoting this agitation had resolved to continue it, whatever the decision of the House, until they had succeeded in carrying their proposal. It was what one hon. Gentleman had called a “noisy agitation in Scotland,” but a great deal of the agitation might be confined to a very few persons. Full consideration had been given to this subject by a Royal Commission, which sat in 1864, and reported in 1865. That Commission, which was composed of many very eminent Members, examined 102 witnesses from Scotland, and the conclusion arrived at was to the following effect—

“In the general principle of the law, under which the landlord of an agricultural subject has, in security of his rent, a preference over the crop raised on the ground, and the stock brought upon it by the tenant, we are not disposed to recommend any alteration. Our investigations have regarded the results of a system which has existed for centuries, not only without complaint, but as a subject of commendation, both by legal writers and by persons practically conversant with its operation. That system is intimately interwoven with the land rights of Scotland. Numerous analogies to it are found in other branches of our jurisprudence, and under its influence this country has undoubtedly made great advances in the science and practice of agriculture. We are inclined to think that, both on the part of the opponents of the present law of hypothec and of its supporters, the consequences which would be likely to result from its repeal may have been to some extent exaggerated. But such a measure would, in our opinion, certainly be followed by alterations in the tenancy of land in Scotland, which must act injuriously on the tenants, and especially on the smaller tenants, and would probably remove many of that valuable and industrious class from their present possessions. We should also anticipate, from the abolition of the existing law, other changes in the relation between landlord and tenant, which might operate very differently in different parts of the country, but the ultimate consequences of which it is impossible to foresee."

The Commissioners went on to say that they felt there were some hardships in the operation of the law which should be modified or removed, and they made certain recommendations with regard to the modifications which they thought might be introduced. The effect was that in the following year a Bill was brought in which carried out to the full the recommendations of the Commission and becoming law, removed many of the objections which existed to the old law. The landlord was prevented from following the crop, beyond three months after the rent became due. Before that he could have followed it for a considerable time. Further, there had been power to seize the cattle belonging to another person which might be found on the lands of the tenant for rent due. The new law provided that the cattle taken to graze should only be liable to be seized for the value due from their owner to the farmer upon whose land they were in respect of the grazing. The amelioration of the old law was very considerable in several respects. Complaints, however, continued to be made, and in 1869 a Select Committee of the House of Lords was appointed, which called a great number of additional witnesses. That Committee said in its Report:—

"The next objection to the law of hypothec was that it stimulated an unhealthy competition for land, and raised rents above their natural level."

The broad ground on which the present Bill was based was, that it was to have the effect of destroying competition on the part of the small tenants.

Mr. VANS AGNEW said, he never stated that the competition of the smaller tenants would be discouraged. He spoke of the competition of men without capital—without sufficient means.

Mr. LEEMAN said, the hon. Gentleman had spoken of the small tenant as a gentleman who had a farm at £50 a-year, and who worked it with his own family and two horses. There were thousands of such men in Yorkshire. He (Mr. Leeman) objected to the Bill because the abolition of the law of hypothec must be followed by the abolition of the law of distress. The hon. Gentleman went further, and quoted the language of a witness before the Commission, to the effect that if hypothec was abolished, the small tenant must go to the wall. The Commissioners stated that by the existing law, rents were usually paid after the tenant had the benefit of the crop. The doctrine of the present Bill was, and its consequences would be, that the tenant should pay the money down before he saw a crop. The Commissioners went on to say—

"With regard to the arable land, the first payment for land seldom takes place in less than twelve months, more frequently in eighteen, and in some cases not until twenty-one months after a tenant has entered on the farm. This long credit enables them to enter on the farms with less command of capital than would otherwise be necessary: while it is affirmed by those who support the law that if the security derived from the law of hypothec were withdrawn from the landlords, they would consider it unsafe to give such advantage to the tenants, and would insist on having the rent paid, if not in advance, at all events at the end of the first half-year."

To that Report the late Lord Advocate (Mr. Young) and Mr. Carnegie, the hon. Member for Forfar, were the only objectors. In 1869 Mr. Carnegie brought in a Bill in direct contrariety to the Report from which he dissented, to abolish hypothec; but the Government supported the Report. In the debate the Lord Advocate admitted that the logical consequences of the Bill must be the abolition of distress in England—for which indeed he contended, honestly enough, from his point of view. The debate was more than once adjourned; but on a division the second reading was carried by 127 votes to 91. Owing to the time of Parliament being occupied by another subject, the Bill proceeded no further that session; but in 1871 Mr. Carnegie again introduced the Bill; but upon this occasion it was rejected by nearly two to one—the numbers being 105 in favour of the second reading against 186 against it. Something had been said of the difficulty in which the introducer of the Bill involved himself by having omitted to include the urban portions of Scotland. On the occasion of Mr. Carnegie's Bills the urban population was included; and the proposal was met by the Members for Edinburgh and other large towns in Scotland, who said the effect of the abolition of the law of hypothec would be that in Edinburgh alone there were 15,000 houses under £12 a-year rent—the occupants of which would be unable to get habitations if the law of hypothec were abolished—it was the present law that enabled those people to get houses over their heads; with the law abolished, every man who went to take a house must take his money in his pocket for the first quarter's rent, or he would not be admitted. Mr. Carnegie and the Lord Advocate said if the law of hypothec was abolished for the country districts, it must be abolished for the urban districts also. The Bill was lost as he (Mr. Leeman) had stated. In 1873 it was again introduced by Sir David Wedderburn, and rejected by 83 to 147—the English Members showing by their votes, that if Scotch Members were prepared to act injuriously to the small tenants in Scotland by the abolition of the law of hypothec, English Members were not prepared to follow their example by the abolition of the law of distress in England. The landlord's power of distress, in fact, gave him the means of adding to the capital of the poor man, who, if this law were abolished, would never be able to get a bit of land. He could mention the case of a man who commenced life as a humble shepherd, and who got on until he became possessed of considerable property; that he could never have done but for the operation of the law of hypothec. He hoped the House would pause before it passed this measure. Since the Royal Commission and the Select Committee that had inquired into this subject had made their Reports, nothing had occurred in the circumstances of Scotland to induce the House to alter its determination on two previous occasions, not to abolish the law of hypothec.

The House divided:—Ayes 138; Noes 156: Majority 18.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday, 18th March.

MERCANTILE MARINE HOSPITAL SERVICE BILL.

On Motion of Captain PRY, Bill to provide for the organisation of a Mercantile Marine Hospital Service and the Medical Examination of Merchant Seamen, ordered to be brought in by Captain PRY and Mr. WHEELHOUSE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 91.]

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

PARLIAMENT—THE EASTER RECESS.

EARL GRANVILLE inquired of the Government, what were the arrangements they intended to propose in connection with the Easter Recess?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he proposed if it met the convenience of their Lordships, that they should adjourn on Friday, the 19th inst., and re-assemble on Tuesday the 6th of April.

THE CLERK OF THE PARLIAMENTS.

The letter from Sir John George Shaw Lefevre, K.C.B., tendering his resignation of his Office of Clerk of the Parliaments, considered (according to Order).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My Lords, I have now the opportunity, which I accept with great pleasure, of paying my tribute of respect and regard to Sir John Lefevre, and to express my regret at the course which he has felt bound to adopt, of resigning the office of Clerk of the Parliaments which he has so long held. I cannot refrain from saying that I consider I have an hereditary right to express the feeling of respect and regard which I entertain for him, because I know that it was also entertained by my late Father, who was associated on many occasions, both in public and in private, with Sir John Lefevre. No man stood higher than he did in my Father's estimation. After what was said the other evening, I do not think that I should be doing right in trespassing any further on your Lordships' time—the more particularly as the subject is one on which the utmost unanimity exists. I beg to move the following Resolution:—

"That this House has received with sincere concern the resignation of Sir John George Shaw Lefevre, K.C.B., of the office of Clerk of the Parliaments on account of recent indisposition and his advancing age, and they think it right to record the just sense which they entertain of the zeal, ability, diligence, and integrity with which the said Sir John George Shaw Lefevre, K.C.B., has executed the important duties of his office during the period of nearly twenty-seven years."

LORD SELBORNE: I wish, with your Lordship's permission, to make a few observations, founded on experience before I was a Member of your Lordships' House, as to the kind assistance given by the late Clerk of the Parliament to the counsel and solicitors who had duties to discharge at the Bar of the House on Appeals. For very nearly the same period of time that Sir John Lefevre has been Clerk of the Parliaments, I was constantly in the habit of practising in this House, and I must say that during the whole of that time, even if I had been a Member of your Lordships' House, I could not have received more courtesy and assistance than I received from Sir John Lefevre. On all occasions he was ready to give to every one—solicitors as well as members of the Bar—all the assistance that was in his power to give. From which I infer that all the officers and servants of your Lordships' House, from the highest to the lowest, would bear their testimony, with one accord, to the universal courtesy and untiring assiduity with which he discharged his duties.

Resolution agreed to nemine dissentiente.

Ordered that the Lord Chancellor do communicate this resolution to the said Sir John George Shaw Lefevre, K.C.B.

Then, on the Motion of the Duke of Richmond, it was—Ordered, nemine dissentiente, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty laying before Her Majesty a copy of the letter of the said Sir John George Shaw Lefevre, K.C.B., and likewise of the resolution of this House, and recommending the said Sir John George Shaw Lefevre, K.C.B., to Her Majesty's Royal Grace and Bounty.

Ordered that the said Address be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS BILL.

(NOS. 15-36.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clauses 1 to 5, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Examiners of Patents).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that certain verbal Amendments in this clause were necessary, in order to give effect to an alteration which he proposed to make in those provisions of the Bill which applied to the Examiners and the Referees. As the Bill stood, it was proposed that the Examiners who were to make reports for the Law Officers should not be more than four or less than two in number, and it was intended that each application for a patent should be examined by one Examiner and one or two Referees. This plan had been much considered in various quarters, and numerous representations on the subject had been made to him. As the result of the best consideration he could give the point, he would move Amendments in Clause 6 and other clauses, having for their object to effect this alteration—that there should be two, and not more than six Examiners; that the list of Referees should be made by the Commissioners of Patents without the necessity of the concurrence of the Board of Trade; and that the association of a Referee with an Examiner should not be obligatory, but permissive. It was in consequence of this last alteration that it was thought advisable to provide that as many as six Examiners—instead of four, the number at present in the Bill—might be appointed.

Amendment moved, Clause 6, page 2, line 31, to leave out (“four”) and insert (“six”).

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET wished to make this inquiry of the noble and learned Lord—who would be responsible for giving a patent after this Bill passed? Would it be the Commissioners of Patents, or would it be the Law Officers? He apprehended that it was not usual to grant such a power to unpaid Commissioners; and as to the Law Officers, he believed they had too much other business to do, to attend to patents in such a way as would enable them to act as judges. He wished also to ask as to the progress of the register and index of existing patents? He believed that there was a great deal yet to be done, and he doubted whether the proposed staff would be adequate to overtake the work in arrear and to keep abreast with the new work.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he concurred with the noble Duke, that there was a great deal to be done in the way of indexing and classifying existing patents, but a great deal in that way had already been done. He was led to believe that the arrears might be cleared up by the time the working part of the Bill would come into operation with the assistance of the Examiners, who could be appointed immediately on the passing of the Act. In reply to the noble Duke's question—“Who was to be responsible for giving a patent?” his reply was, that beyond doubt the Law Officers would be responsible, subject to an appeal to the Lord Chancellor or a Judge of the High Court designated for the hearing of such appeals. No doubt the Law Officers were very much engaged; but up to a recent period, when a fixed salary was settled on them in lieu of fees, those learned Gentlemen drew an income of £4,000 or £5,000 from patents. From experience he knew that the hearing of applications for and objections against patents was a very troublesome duty for the Law Officers; and the most troublesome point about it was that although they heard both sides, they had to hear one side in one room and the other side in another room. It was proposed under this Bill that when any objection was made against the granting of a patent, the Law Officers should hear and dispose of it; and he did not think that was too much to expect of them.

Amendment agreed to.

Clauses 20 to 47, inclusive, agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 48. (Power for Commissioners to make general rules regulating details, business of office, &c.).

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, he proposed to ask their Lordships to omit from the clause these words—

"For establishing, subject to the approval of the Treasury, and opening to public inspection, a museum or collection of models of inventions, and other objects relating to patents and to inventions.

Reading these words by the light of the Reports of the Commissioners of Patents, he thought it was not difficult to see why this provision had been inserted in the Bill. During a considerable period those Commissioners had been clamorous, and with good reason, for better accommodation for themselves, their officials, and their library, and in the Report of 1873 they dwelt on the necessity of providing it. No doubt, it was the purpose of these words, that the increased accommodation should it be accorded, should be appropriated to the purposes of a Museum of Patents. Now, he could not but think that the Patent Commissioners were not the best body to whose care and management such a Museum should be intrusted, composed as the Commission was of 13 gentlemen, no fewer than eight of whom were judicial or legal officials, whose time was occupied with other matters. He objected to any such addition to the duties of the Commissioners, upon the ground that the formation and custody of a collection of inventions had nothing to do with the real purpose of this Bill. It was not desirable to have in this country such a collection of patents as was to be found in the United States and other countries, where before an inventor could get a patent it was necessary for him to deposit a model. The result of the American system had been, he was informed, the accumulation of a mass of models, a great part of which were of a more or less rubbishy character. In this country our Patent Museum would be made up of models and specimens voluntarily contributed. From an inscription which was sufficiently prominent at South Kensington it must be pretty generally known to their Lordships that we already had what was called a Patent Museum in the metropolis. As the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack lived in the neighbourhood, perhaps he occasionally visited the Patent Museum; and if that were so, he thought the noble and learned Lord could scarcely think the arrangement there afforded a favourable example of the management of such a museum. The first object that caught the eye was a glass case containing a collection of articles illustrating the manufacture of india-rubber, conspicuous amongst which was a pile of small india-rubber objects, over which was an inscription "Omnium Gatherum Tobacco Pouches." And "omnium gatherum" was a very proper description of the contents of the Museum. It was true that more important objects, such as the locomotive which had killed Mr. Huskisson, another known to its admirers as "Puffing Billy," and other venerable locomotives, occupied the centre of the Museum. Now, a collection of models of steam engines and locomotives was both interesting and instructive; but he thought the noble and learned Lord and his Colleagues scarcely desired to be the custodians of a collection so extraordinary and ill-assorted as that now in the Museum at South Kensington. But what he wished more seriously to point out was that the subject of such collections had recently been under the consideration of the Royal Commission on Scientific Instruction and the Advancement of Science, of which Commission he had the honour of being a Member, and that Commission, after suggesting in their Report, the formation of a collection of physical and mechanical instruments "submit for consideration whether it may not be expedient that this Collection, the Collection of the Patent Museum, and that of the Scientific and Educational Department of the South Kensington Museum, should be united and placed under the authority of a Minister of State." He believed the step which the noble and learned Lord was about to take was opposed to the spirit of that recommendation, and he trusted the noble and learned Lord would consider whether means might not be arrived at for reconciling the provisions of this Bill with the recommendation of that Royal Commission. He begged to move the omission from the clause of the words quoted in the commencement of his observations.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he should give the noble Marquess's proposition the most unqualified resistance. No communication had been made to him on the subject of an interference with the present management of the Patent Museum. As to the suggestion of the noble Marquess, it was already under a Minister of State—the Minister who held the Great Seal. Before the Committee of the House of Commons there was given a large body of evidence quite sufficient to justify the proposition contained in the Bill. It was quite true that the present Patent Museum was not well arranged; a state of things which had been complained of for many years. It was said that the present Museum was simply a warehouse. What the Royal Commissioners recommended was that as the existing collection of patents had cost the country a large sum of money, a portion of the building at South Kensington should be appropriated to their collection and arrangement; and a Committee of the House of Commons recommended that a portion of the large sum of money which remained in the hands of the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851—upwards of £170,000 he believed—should be appropriated to the same purpose. There were already proper officers to arrange the models, and if at any future time it was thought desirable, it might be placed under a State Department. As to what the noble Marquess had said about the collection of tobacco-pouches, facetious observations might be made on the contents of every Museum, though he doubted that the term "rubbishy" was applicable to the Patent Museum at Washington. The Committee of the House of Commons recommended that the Museum of Patents should be in connexion with the Patent Office, and in the absence of a more definite alternative scheme than that shadowed forth in the recommendation to which the noble Marquess had referred, he would ask their Lordships to reject the Amendment, and concur in the proposal made by the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE would remind the noble and learned Lord that the Committee of the House of Commons sat in 1864, while the Royal Commission had held its sittings very recently. He was aware that the Patent Commissioners were not to blame for the disorder at South Kensington. But what he objected to was, that the Patent Museum should be under the Commissioners at all—he desired to see it and other collections and museums under the control of a State Department. He wished to ask who was to be responsible under the Bill for the selection of the men of science who were to form the Board of Management? As for what he had said of the American collection, he did not wish to be disrespectful towards the Museum at Washington; but when models of all the inventions for which patents were asked in the United States must be deposited, he thought some of the models must be very trumpery objects.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR quite agreed with the noble Marquess that some of the models must be of the character he described; but, as a whole, the Museum at Washington would not deserve such a character.

LORD SELBORNE said, that the difference between his noble Friend (the Marquess of Lansdowne) and his noble and learned Friend was scarcely any difference at all, and as the clause in its present shape did not pledge anyone against any step which Parliament might think fit to adopt hereafter with reference to the hands in which such Museums should be placed, he would recommend his noble Friend to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 48 and the remaining Clauses agreed to, with Amendments.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Friday the 19th instant; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 36.)

INCREASE OF THE EPISCOPATE BILL. (Nos. 8-36.)

(The Lord Lyttelton.)

Report of the Amendments.

On the Report of Amendments in this Bill,

LORD COTTESLOE gave Notice that on the third reading he would move to limit the operation of the Bill to the five cases which were considered most urgent.

LORD LYTTTELTON said, he would ask their Lordships to reject the Amendment of which the noble Lord had just given Notice.

The Report was then agreed to.

OWNERS OF LANDS, &c., (ENGLAND AND IRELAND)—THE RETURNS. QUESTION.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX asked the Lord President of the Council, When the Returns of the owners of Land in England and Wales, presented to the House on the 6th of August, 1874, would be delivered to Members of the House; also the Returns of owners of Land in Ireland?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that in the case of England the Returns would be completed with all possible despatch, and would, he hoped, soon be in the hands of Members. As to Ireland, he was unable to give his noble Friend any positive answer; but he should endeavour to get the necessary information without delay, and would communicate to his noble Friend the result.

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, 'till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

Thursday, 11th March, 1875.

METROPOLIS—TOWER OF LONDON.

QUESTION.

MR. RITCHIE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he can say when the arrangements for the free opening of the Tower of London will be completed?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, the new rules regulating the free opening of the Tower of London on Mondays and Saturdays would come into force on the 1st of April next.

ARMY—LONGFORD BARRACKS.

QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he can state how soon the long contemplated improvements in the married soldiers' quarters in the Cavalry Barracks at Longford are likely to be carried out?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that estimates for improvements to be made in the different barracks throughout the Kingdom were sent in to head quarters and were dealt with in order. The case of Longford Barracks would not for a year, in all probability, come on for consideration by the War Office, which was now proceeding with those cases which were most pressing.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE ACT, 1873—MR. WALPOLE'S NOTICE OF RESOLUTION.—QUESTION.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN asked the right honourable and learned Member for the University of Cambridge, What course he intends, under existing circumstances, to pursue in regard to the Motion of which he has given Notice respecting the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, and the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords?

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE: Sir, my hon. and learned Friend will allow me to remind him that the Motion of which I gave Notice was, that I would on an early day call the attention of the House to the defective state of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act with reference to Appeals, and move a Resolution. It is obvious, I think, under the existing circumstances to which the hon. and learned Gentleman seems from his Question to refer, that the branch of the subject to which I more particularly wish to call the attention of the House will require a very careful and calm consideration. If I am right in that conclusion, as I think I am, the course I propose to pursue is not to attempt at present to push forward that Motion; but to reserve to myself the fullest power of bringing it forward at a future period, in case I should find it advisable to do so.

PASSENGERS ACT, 1865—SURGEONS IN PASSENGER SHIPS.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is true that both British subjects and foreigners have been and are still permitted to sign the Articles of British Ships as Surgeons, and to serve on such British Ships as Surgeons, who are not possessed of a diploma or other qualification required by Act of Parliament, and whose names do not appear on the Medical List published under authority; and, whether such persons are authorized to sign the usual and necessary professional certificates without their names having so appeared in such authorized Medical List?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, some few foreign practitioners have been appointed to British passenger ships with diplomas of their own country, as provided for insuitable cases under the Passengers Act. Neither British nor foreign subjects have, to my knowledge, been appointed as medical officers of passenger ships not duly authorized under the requirements of the Passengers Act, 1865, which, however, are specially excepted from the Medical List Act. Either of these practitioners, British or foreign, are, therefore, authorized to sign the usual and necessary professional certificates.

NAVY—RETIREMENT OF ADMIRALS—ORDER IN COUNCIL, 1870.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If it is under the so-called "temporary provision" of 1870 that the three Admirals of the Fleet are still on the "active" list, in seeming contravention of the general regulation that Admirals of seventy years of age must go on the "retired" list; if it is under the same "temporary provision" that the Senior Admiral also remains on the "active" list; and, if he will not now set aside the "temporary provision," and put those officers on the "retired" list?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, that in the temporary provision of the Order in Council of 22nd February, 1870, the following reserve was made in favour of the officers referred to in the Question:—

"Admirals of the Fleet and Admirals in command of ships, Captains, or Commanders, prior to the termination of the war in 1815, will be allowed to remain on the active list, such officers to be eligible for promotion to be Admirals of the Fleet."

It was quite true that Admirals of over 70 years of age could not be considered to be on the active list in the sense of being likely to be actively employed; but there was no doubt that standing at the head of the list under these circumstances was a very coveted distinction among naval officers. He considered that privilege had been secured to the four distinguished officers in question by the Order in Council, and that it would not be proper to deprive them of the position. But supposing that the retirement of these officers were brought about in the way suggested, the interests of other officers would be affected, and some of them affected injuriously. He was therefore not prepared to force those four gallant officers to retire.

NAVY—THE PACIFIC ISLANDS—ALLEGED CONFLICT WITH NATIVES. QUESTION.

MR. ASHLEY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true, as narrated in the "Times" of February 19, that there have been, between Her Majesty's schooner "Sandfly," and natives of the Islands of Tapona, Santa Cruz, and Api, three affrays, in one of which thirty natives were killed; if so, whether he will state what number of men, if any, belonging to the "Sandfly" were killed or wounded, and whether there was an interpreter on board, or any means of communicating with the natives; and, whether he has directed any inquiries to be made of the officer in command as to the necessity for his burning native villages after the attacks on the schooner had been repelled?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, the account given in The Times of the occurrence set forth in the Question of the hon. and learned Gentleman was substantially correct. The information received at the Admiralty was to the following effect:—The schooner Sandfly was engaged in cruising in the New Hebrides group for the suppression of kidnapping and the regulation of the labour traffic. In August she visited Api for the purpose of discovering the perpetrators of an outrage on the British schooner Zephyr, in which some of the crew were murdered. Negotiations were opened with the Natives, the captain of an American trading vessel acting as interpreter; but the murderers were not captured. There was no actual encounter with the Natives, but some boats and huts were destroyed. The Sandfly visited Tapona in September, when the Natives evinced a friendly disposition; but they suddenly made an attempt on the schooner, which compelled the lieutenant in command to fire. Sixteen canoes and two villages were destroyed, and it was stated that only one Native was killed. In September the vessel visited Santa Cruz, and upon her arrival was immediately surrounded by 200 canoes, with a Native in each. A native acted as interpreter, and informed the islanders, in reply to their questions, that the schooner was a man-of-war. They disbelieved him, and commenced a fierce attack, which failed, and the commanding officer fired upon them and destroyed some villages and canoes. The number killed was not stated, but the Natives were said to have suffered severely. There were no casualties on board the Sandfly. He was not at all satisfied that the retaliatory measures taken were not too severe, and he had sent for a report on the subject from the Commodore in charge of the station.

NAVY—H.M. SHIPS—CORK MATTRESSES.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether there have been complaints of want of buoyancy and stability in Her Majesty's ships; and, whether, considering the acknowledged efficiency of cork mattresses for the purpose of saving life at sea in cases of fire, wreck, or foundering, it is the intention of the Admiralty to introduce these mattresses generally in Her Majesty's Naval Service?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, he was not aware of any complaints of the nature referred to; but if any had reached the hon. Member he should be happy to have them passed on to him. The question of the introduction of cork mattresses had recently been under consideration and experiments directed to be made. It was found that when cork mattresses had once become damp, either from the state of the atmosphere or otherwise, it was exceedingly difficult to dry them again; and, under those circumstances, they were not thought suitable for the naval service.

ARMY—AGE OF RECRUITS TO INDIA.—QUESTION.

COLONEL MURE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, either by General Order, War Office Circular, Private Memorandum, or any other method, the age at which soldiers may go to India has been relaxed to one year after enlistment or nineteen years of age?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, if the hon. and gallant Gentleman had looked into the Parliamentary Papers, he would have become acquainted with one which was presented in June, 1872, by Lord Cardwell—namely, the Report of the Committee who had been appointed to consider the age at which recruits should be sent to India. The Committee consisted of Major-General Edwards and other officers. Having considered the question, they recommended as follows:—

"It remains to consider with respect to the Medical Examination of these drafts, which, last season, was based first upon the actual age of 20, whether it might not be desirable to substitute a certain length of service, whereby the physical constitution of the recruits may become fully known, for a simple declaration of age which is often deceptive. The Committee having ascertained that the declared age shown in the recruit's attestation can be no sufficient guide, as it is in the recruit's power to make that declaration according to his desire to proceed abroad, and that this declaration cannot be proved in most cases by baptismal certificate, nor can any experienced medical officer give any definite opinion as to the age between 18 and 22 years, recommend that till the new organization has come fully into play, the decision of the fitness for foreign service rest, not upon declared age, but the knowledge of the physical constitution of each man, acquired by not less than a period of 12 months' effective service, which can be fully ascertained by the commanding officer, and surgeon in medical charge of the regiment or depot."

Upon that recommendation a letter was issued from the Horse Guards, I think in 1872, containing the following regulations:—

"The men to compose these drafts are to be selected in the following order:—1, Men who have completed one year's service and have not been to India; 2, men of less service, but who will be 20 years old and have completed their drill by the above date; 3, men who have served in India and, are fit to return, but no such men who have been sent home as invalids are to be again embarked before they have completed one year's service at home. The men to embark must be in every respect fit for service, and no man is to be included in these drafts who has less than 18 months to serve of the term for which he enlisted, unless (in the case of men in their first term) he is eligible and willing to re-engage."

These regulations have been acted upon since 1872.

MERCANTILE MARINE—ST. TUDWALL'S ROAD LIGHTHOUSE.

QUESTION.

MR. HOLLAND asked the President of the Board of Trade, When will the promised Lighthouse proposed to be erected at St. Tudwall's be commenced, several shipwrecks and disasters to shipping in Cardigan Bay having occurred this winter for want of it?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, the Trinity House informs me that the plant is being prepared, and that they hope to commence the work this season.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—THE STEAMSHIP "THORNABY."

QUESTION.

MR. PLIMSOLL asked the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been called to the case of the steamship "Thornaby," lost with all hands, twenty-nine, which sailed from Cardiff for Bombay on the 10th of December, she having a mean clear side of 2 feet 10½ inches only, though drawing 19 feet 10 inches forward and 21 feet 2 inches aft, and having on board 2,122 tons of coal and patent fuel, her net register tonnage being 957 tons; and, whether he is prepared to institute a prosecution against the owners on a charge of sending a ship to sea unseaworthy by reason of her excessive overloading?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, I believe the ship Thornaby is lost, and probably with all hands. Before she left Cardiff she was reported by the Board of Trade surveyor as heavily laden; but owing to the length of her poop and forecastle he did not think it necessary to telegraph for immediate authority to stop her. He communicated by post, and it was then too late for the Board of Trade to take any steps further than to communicate the nature of the surveyor's report to the owners. We have now put the Papers in connection with the subject in the hands of the solicitor of the Department, and an inquiry is proceeding, and it will depend upon the issue of that inquiry whether there shall be material for a prosecution.

In reply to Mr. GOSCHEN,

MR. HUNT said, that Captain Fairfax's Report had been sent to the papers as being matter of public interest.

IRELAND—ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.—QUESTION.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill during the present Session regulating, not merely for a period of twelve months but until further legislation, the Pay and Pensions of the Royal Irish Constabulary; and, at what time of the Session he intends introducing any measure on the subject?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that the section of the Act of last Session regulating the pay of the Royal Irish Constabulary had been made temporary, in order to afford time to the Government to consider the question of the incidence of the expenditure upon that body. The question was under the consideration of the Government, and if he had any proposals to make with regard to it which would necessitate a change in the law he would make them in proper time for full consideration by the House.

MASTER AND SERVANTS ACT—CASE OF LUKE HILLS.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has received a memorial from St. John's Common, Sussex, signed by 1,302 persons, calling his attention to the case of Luke Hills, an agricultural labourer sentenced by the Cuckfield magistrates to three months' imprisonment on a charge of breach of contract; and, whether, taking into consideration the peculiar circumstances of the case, and the fact that the man has already been imprisoned for about a month, he will recommend that the rest of his sentence should be remitted? There was some mistake in the Answer which the Secretary of State gave the other day on this subject. Therefore, he wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that a communication from the Home Office was sent on Monday, the 8th, the day before he gave his answer to the memorialists, which stated that Mr. Secretary Cross had thoroughly examined the question and was unable to comply with the prayer thereof?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: What I stated, Sir, was perfectly true—namely, that my attention had been called to this matter by the Question of my hon. Friend, and that when I asked for Papers they were placed in my hands that very morning. I was not aware that a letter had been sent. But the matter has been very carefully investigated, and I am not aware that there are any very peculiar circumstances in the case. The man was not an agricultural labourer, but a carter, and was brought up under the Master and Servants Act because, having been engaged for 12 months, and, although warned not to do so, he gave a fortnight's notice. His master proceeded against him, not for fine, but because his horses were left idle, and he had thus incurred damages to the extent of £10. The master asked for a fine of only £5. The magistrates, after very carefully considering the case, came, in my opinion, to a very proper decision—that the master had a perfect right to have damages awarded to the extent of £5, and 18s. 2d.

costs, not £3 18s. 2d., as stated in the memorial. It is quite true that, in default of payment, the man was sentenced to be imprisoned, with hard labour, for three calendar months. Having taken this into consideration and considering also that the Commission on the Labour Laws have come to an unanimous conclusion that matters of breach of contract should be treated simply as civil questions, and not as criminal questions, I will consider how far the remaining portion of the sentence may be remitted. The Report of the Commission is not in the hands of the magistrates; but I will consider whether the sentence shall be remitted in order that the man shall not be put at a disadvantage because he happened to be convicted just before this Report was made.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR gave Notice that on going into Committee of Supply on Friday, the 19th, he would call attention to the case of Luke Hills, and move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She would be graciously pleased to grant him a free pardon.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: The hon. Gentleman must have misunderstood me. What I stated was that it was under my consideration how much of the sentence ought to be remitted, and probably long before the hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity of bringing the matter before the House it will be entirely settled.

EMPLOYMENT OF YOUNG CHILDREN— CRIMINAL LAW—DANGEROUS EXHIBITIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. WILSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the employment of young children at public entertainments in a manner dangerous to their lives or otherwise; and if he will consider the advisability of making such regulations as will lessen the risk or prohibit these performances?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the subject. The invariable practice had been in the first instance to send a warning to the parties concerned that they would be held responsible for any damage that might occur. That warning had been almost always attended to. No complaints relating to this subject had been brought under the notice of the Home Office of late; but if his hon. Friend would bring under his notice any case he would undertake that a proper warning should be sent to the parties.

MR. WILSON said, he understood that a child engaged in connection with a Chinese troupe at Stoke-upon-Trent had been injured.

NAVY—H.M.S. "VOLAGE."

QUESTION.

MR. GORST asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether his attention has been called to the following Report of Captain Fairfax, as to the behaviour of Her Majesty's ship "Volage," under his command, on a voyage from the Cape to Kerguelen Island:—

"All the poop cabins were deeply flooded, and on several occasions the depth of water on the lee side of the quarter-deck was such as to cover the guns, and two men were carried off their legs, washed over the guns, and nearly over the netting. The freeing ports under the gun-ports relieved the ship very soon of the water; without them such an immense weight of water, accumulating each roll and rushing from side to side, would have been most serious. As neither I nor any officer in this ship had seen a vessel ship water in this way, perhaps you may think fit to draw their Lordships' attention to it;"

and, who was the designer of the "Volage," and how many other ships in Her Majesty's Navy, whether composite or iron-clad, are built upon the same scientific plan?

MR. HUNT: Sir, I have read the letter from Captain Fairfax to which my hon. Friend refers. The designer of the Volage was the late Chief Constructor of the Navy (Mr. E. J. Reed), whom I have the pleasure of seeing opposite. There is another ship in the service, the Active, which is similar to the Volage. I have to state, however, that my hon. Friend has not read out that part of the Report of Captain Fairfax in which he describes the seas in which the ship was in as exceptionally heavy. I have to inform my hon. Friend that this ship was built for great speed, and that ships built for speed cannot be expected to keep as dry as other ships. I believe that Captain Fairfax has never been in a ship of that kind before. I have special means of knowing something about the Volage, because the gallant officer who acts as my private Secretary (Captain M. C. Seymour) commanded her some time back; and he reports to me that he considered her a perfectly safe and sound ship. The Volage served one commission in the detached squadron, and both captain and admiral reported extremely well of her.

MR. GOSCHEN asked in what Report the statement was made?

MR. HUNT said, Captain Fairfax had been engaged to conduct an observation of the Transit of Venus, and had furnished to the Admiralty an official Report of his proceedings in that service. The subject was of so much interest that it was deemed advisable to send copies of his Report to the newspapers.

PARLIAMENT—THE EASTER RECESS.
BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. DISRAELI: It may perhaps be convenient that I should refer to the probable state of Business before Easter, and a few days after Easter, so that the House may know as accurately as possible the situation. I hope the discussion on going into Committee upon the Artizans Dwellings Bill will be concluded to-night, and in that case the Bill will be proceeded with in Committee on Thursday next. The Friendly Societies Bill will be in Committee to-morrow, and the Regimental Exchanges Bill will be the first Order on Monday. I trust we shall pass it through Committee on that day; if not—but I will not anticipate such a result—we may have to ask the House to consent to an arrangement of another character. The Peace Preservation Bill will be the first Order on Monday, the 22nd, and we intend to proceed with it until the House adjourns, on Thursday, the 25th instant, until Monday, the 5th of April. On the latter day we propose to take Supply. On Thursday, the 8th of April, we shall propose the second reading of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Bill, and we shall take it as the first Order of the Day. On Thursday, the 15th of April, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will make his Financial Statement.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: It is most important that the measures which have been introduced by the Government should not be placed on the Paper as second Orders. Last Monday the Regimental Exchanges Bill was put down as the second Order, and a great number of hon. Gentlemen were kept here at considerable inconvenience to themselves until a late hour in the expectation that the Bill would come on. This evening the first Order is the Navy Estimates, which usually give rise to a protracted discussion, while the Artizans Dwellings Bill is put down as the second Order. To-morrow I understand the same course is to be followed; and, after a discussion on going into Supply, the Friendly Societies Bill is to be discussed at a late hour of the evening. Confining my attention for the present to the Artizans Dwellings Bill, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, looking at the fact that there are two very important Motions on the Question that the Speaker do leave the Chair, it would be convenient to attempt to enter into a discussion upon that Bill?

MR. DISRAELI: I quite agree with the noble Lord that it is very desirable that every measure of the Government should stand as the first Order of the Day; but that is impossible, especially with a Government which has many important measures. The noble Lord is, I think, completely mistaken in supposing that discussions on the Navy Estimates absorb the whole night, for I think, on the average, they are brought to a close about half-past 10 or 11 o'clock, and the noble Lord will hardly think that is too late to proceed with business of grave interest. I think that, on the whole, the noble Lord will find that the arrangements of the Government are most convenient for the House to adopt. I can truly say that the convenience of the House is always considered in making them consistent with the progress of Public Business, and, indeed, the progress of Public Business is a common cause. Of course, I shall be very glad, whenever I possibly can, to meet the views of the noble Lord by putting our measures as first Orders of the Day; but I believe that, in practice, it will be found very difficult in every case to make arrangements of that kind.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked if the Friendly Societies Bill would be taken after 11 to-morrow?

MR. DISRAELI: No.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

INCOME TAX—EXEMPTIONS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. SANDFORD rose to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, incomes not exceeding £300 per annum should be exempted from the payment of Income Tax."

The hon. Gentleman remarked that, considering the exemptions proposed by Mr. Pitt, Sir Robert Peel, the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), he did not think it was too much to ask the House to exempt incomes up to that amount. He believed the income tax was a proper tax if fairly levied, and if it were repealed the revenue would be mainly derived from the Customs and Excise duties. The burden would then fall almost exclusively on the shoulders of the working classes. If there were one class more than another interested in the maintenance of the income tax, it was the county Members. Now, if they endeavoured to shift the burden of local taxation and place it on the Imperial Exchequer, he believed such a system would not be tolerated for one moment. While the working classes at any period of national prosperity shared that prosperity by a rise in wages, people with fixed incomes suffered by the rise in prices. To repeal the income tax on incomes not exceeding £300 a-year would, he calculated, not cost more than £300,000 or £350,000 a-year, and he did not know how relief could be so largely afforded to a suffering class by any other similar remission of taxation. He did not appeal to this House on behalf of any wealthy classes or interests, but for a class upon whom direct taxation pressed most severely, and he hoped that he should not appeal in vain. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Resolution.

LORD ARTHUR RUSSELL seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, incomes not exceeding £300 per annum should be exempted from the payment of Income Tax,"—(Mr. Sandford.)

—instead thereof.

MR. HERMON must oppose the Motion, fearing that it would put recipients of £300 a-year to much trouble and vexation in proving their exemption, and would be as bad as paying the tax. The chief objection to the income tax was its inquisitorial character. Apart from this objection it was a fair tax.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not object to the discussion of financial questions at whatever time seemed convenient to hon. Members; but it would be very inconvenient for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to enter prematurely into these discussions, raising as they did many important points connected with Imperial taxation. With respect to the principle involved in the Amendment of the hon. Member, it was a principle which had been admitted ever since we had an income tax—that was, that there should be some limit of income below which people should not have to pay the tax. The precise limit, however, raised a question of a very delicate and difficult character, and one which ought to be approached with sufficient preparation, and at a time when the attention of the House was directed to subjects of this kind. He thought that at the present moment the House was hardly prepared to enter into a full consideration of all the points which had been raised; and therefore he hoped his hon. Friend would feel that it was from no want of respect to him or appreciation of the importance of the question that he asked to be excused from entering now into any discussion of the question. To adopt such a Resolution as had been proposed was, in the first place, rather to anticipate and settle the question as to the permanence of the tax itself, a question to be discussed at the proper time; and, secondly, it raised a great number of questions which ought to be discussed when the whole finance of the country was before the House, and they could deal with the subject as a whole. He hoped, therefore, that the House would consent now to proceed with the business of the Navy Estimates, and that his hon. Friend would reserve any other discussion on this subject till the 15th of April, when practical proposals would be submitted on the part of the Government, and that of his hon. Friend might be brought forward in opposition to or in competition with them.

MR. HANKEY said, that, according to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the time being, Motions like that submitted by the hon. Member were never submitted at the right time. When brought forward before the Budget they were too soon, and after the Budget they were too late. Having acted for many years as an Income Tax Commissioner in the City of London, he did not agree with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hermon) that there would be much practical difficulty in proving the exemption. He trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would, before making his Financial Statement, give the question his serious consideration, with a view to bringing about some relief from the tax. What he would himself propose would be to exempt everybody up to a certain point, which he thought would be a very equitable mode of dealing with the matter.

MR. WHITWELL said, the circumstances were very different when the limit of exemption was fixed, and therefore the minimum below which incomes were not charged ought to be raised. He trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would take this matter into serious consideration in making his financial proposals.

NAVY—OFFICERS OF THE ROYAL MARINES.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GORST rose to call the attention of the House to the present unsatisfactory position of the Officers of the Royal Marine Corps. The hon. Gentleman said, it was not now, by the Forms of the House, in his power to ask hon. Members to express an opinion on this important subject by a formal Resolution, but he trusted that he should be able to elicit the views of the House respecting it; and he did not anticipate any reluctance on the part of the Government to promise their attention to the matter. Before he proceeded to the details of his case he would make a few general observations on the Marine service, in order to show that that service had disadvantages attached to it which were capable of being mitigated. At the present moment active routine service afloat was, unfortunately, not popular amongst the officers, and it was easy to see why that should be the case. Officers of Marines were placed under the command of officers belonging to an unsympathetic branch of the service. Their position and duties on board ship were not very clearly defined; they were, of necessity, under the command of the senior officer of the sea branch of the service, and they were often interfered with in a disagreeable manner. The effect was that active service, which was so much coveted in all other branches, whether of the Army or Navy, was not much sought after by the officers of the Marines. Of course, when they were afloat they discharged their duties to the best of their ability, and no complaints against them, so far as he knew, had ever been made. But though they served efficiently they did not like it. In their peculiar position, being neither of the Army nor of the Navy, Marine officers were deprived of those opportunities of distinction which formed the attraction of the services—they had no power to win those honours which were the object and the admiration of both Army and Navy. Besides this, they had no collateral advantages—no employment on Commissions or Scientific Committees, or in any of the lucrative civil posts which fell to the lot of the officers of the Artillery and the Engineers. It seemed to him that the officers of the Marines had all the disadvantages which appertained to service in the Army and Navy and none of the advantages. He did not say that it was possible, from the nature of the service, for any arrangement to be made by which all their grievances could be remedied; but he was anxious to draw attention to those which were capable of being mitigated, if not done away with altogether. It was generally supposed that the Royal Marines had good pay, regular duty, and better retirement allowances than other branches of the service; but he would ask the House to consider how far the present system secured the promotion and retirement which were the sole inducement for its officers to enter the service? If they looked at the actual position of the officers of the Royal Marines they would find that the subalterns had scarcely any chance of promotion or advancement. In 1860 there was an increase of 104 in the officers of Marines and in 1870 a scheme was settled for their promotion and retirement which greatly affected the position of all the officers in the service. That scheme was accompanied by a great reduction of officers. The number of men remained unaltered—it was 14,000 in 1869, and it was 14,000 still; but the number of officers in the Light Infantry in 1869 was reduced by 61, and in 1870 by 33, making altogether 94; which, out of a total of 287, it must be admitted was a very considerable reduction. He found on inquiry that the senior lieutenants in the Marine Light Infantry had all been in the service more than 15 years, and since 1870 only 16 lieutenants had been promoted to the rank of captain, and in the present year only one. In the next five years there would be only a promotion of 18 lieutenants, and if they carried their view to the end of the five years the senior would have been 20 years in the service without attaining a single step in promotion, he would be 40 years of age, and he would be receiving the munificent pay of 7*s.* 6*d.* a-day. He would ask the House whether it was reasonable, when men served for 20 years in a profession without making a single step in promotion, and received no more than 7*s.* 6*d.* a-day, to expect them to be much attached to their profession, or to serve with much zeal and activity? The lowest pay of officers of corresponding rank in the Navy was 10*s.* a-day, and the highest pay of the Marine Lieutenant was 7*s.* 6*d.*, a fact which of itself placed the latter in an entirely inferior position. But those who obtained captaincies did not find that they had much bettered themselves. The present senior captain had been 29 years in the service, and the 25 senior captains had all served more than 24 years. Since 1870 only eight captains had been promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and there would be no more promotions until September, 1876; so that for a year and a-half there would literally be no promotions, and in the whole of the next five years only 11. At the end of that time the senior captain would have served 31 years, and the senior lieutenant 20 years. It was evident, then, that promotion in the Marines was decidedly slow. Under these circumstances, it was not surprising that the captains should take means, if possible, to accelerate their promotion; and the other night the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) pounced on two unfortunate captains of Marines, who were charged with purchasing, or trying to purchase, the retirement of one of their seniors. The zeal of that hon. Member in the public interest no doubt entitled him to admiration, and the First Lord of the Admiralty very properly said he would take steps to put a stop to the practice supposed to exist. It would have been better, however, to have shown equal zeal in order to put a stop to the present stagnation of promotion, which was the cause of the misconduct—if it could be so regarded—of these two captains. A few captains did get promoted to lieutenant-colonelcies, but they did not find that a state of advantage and unmixed satisfaction under the present regulations. The great prize of the service was the position of colonel-commandant, which a senior captain of not less than 30 years service might hope to obtain. The pay, however, was only £1 a-day, and by some evident mistake the colonel-commandant of Marine Light Infantry got 6*s.* 3*d.* a-day less than the colonel-commandant of Marine Artillery. This he supposed to be a mistake made in drafting the orders, because there was no such difference in other ranks. Thus the difference between the pay of a lieutenant of Marines and a lieutenant of Light Infantry was only 4*d.* per day, in the next rank it was 6*d.*, then 1*s.* 6*d.*, and then came this extraordinary difference of 6*s.* 3*d.* Then in the matter of retirement they were placed also at a disadvantage. While the age at which admirals and rear-admirals had that privilege was fixed at 60 and 65, in the Marines the age for general officers was fixed at 70. The quartermasters, who were the only commissioned officers who rose from the ranks were subjected to a similar injustice. Since the year 1857, whilst 20,000 Marines passed through the ranks only five had obtained commissions, and two of these had been waiting no less than 18 years. Thus the attraction held out in all other branches of the service was practically denied to the Marines. He thought he had given figures enough to show that there was a great stagnation of promotion among the officers of the Royal Marines. It was not exactly his duty to point out how this block might be remedied. That was a question for the consideration of the Government. But the custom existing in the Navy showed very clearly and very simply the remedy that might be supplied. All that was wanted was, to make the senior officers of Marines retire at the same age as the corresponding officers of the Navy; to do away with the position and rank of reserve colonel altogether, and to give to the captains, as we gave to the lieutenants in the Navy, a bonus of £75 a-year, adding to it a regulation that the total retiring allowance should not exceed a certain sum. That would immediately clear the lists, and create a healthy and steady flow of promotion. He would also give a retirement sum to the quartermasters as well as to the other officers. These simple measures would, in his opinion, remove the discontent and despair existing among the subalterns and captains, and quicken their zeal and their devotion to the service. Very probably, although the Government would admit the correctness of his statements and the aptness of his remedy, they would put in a claim for delay. Well, all he could say in that case was that delay was dangerous. Many of the officers who were now suffering injustice would soon have to retire, and no justice could then be done to them. But apart altogether from that, delay would increase the prevailing discontent, and cause it to pervade the whole corps, so that when the remedy came to be applied that discontent would not easily be removed. When, as in the present case, they had a large body of men suffering under a real grievance, it was desirable to relieve that grievance as soon as possible. But he might be told that there was a Commission sitting just now on the question of Army Promotion, and that it would be undesirable to deal with the question of promotion in the Marines until that Commission had presented its Report. In reply to that he would urge that the Commission had nothing to do with the Marines, nor had the Commissioners any jurisdiction in respect to promotion in the Marines. The case of the Marines was so entirely different from that of the rest of the Army, and promotion in the

Marines was so different from promotion in the Army generally, that no prejudice to anyone could arise from dealing with the case of the Marines, quite irrespective of what the Report of the Commission might be. He had some figures which would at once make his case clear, and illustrate the difference in the rate of promotion between the Army and the Marines. The average service of captains and majors in the Cavalry was 17 years; in the Infantry 19 years; while of captains in the Marines it was 22 years, an average which would now be enormously increased. The average service of lieutenants in the Cavalry was five years; in the Infantry eight years; whilst in the Marines it was 10 years; and from the causes mentioned they would now serve longer in the Marines. The promotion in this corps was the slowest in the Army. Then, again, during the last five years one officer in 33 had been promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the Artillery and Engineers, as contrasted with one officer in 75 in the Marines. The captains, moreover, came out quite as bad, for in the Artillery and Engineers the promotion of lieutenants and captains was 1 in 20 as contrasted with 1 in 45 in the Marines. These figures proved that promotion in the Marines was twice as slow as in the Artillery and Engineers. It was altogether unreasonable to say that promotion in the Marines should not be accelerated for fear it should make it faster than it was in the Army. Delay might be urged upon another ground—namely, that reform would cause a slight increase of annual expenditure by the Treasury; but that surely was no valid reason to urge against the improvement of the service. Everybody must admit the truth of the facts he had submitted. Everybody, moreover, must recognize the importance of putting the important branch of the service to which he was alluding in a proper state of efficiency. Officers who had joined the Marines ought not to be left to despair of promotion, or to have the feeling confirmed in them that their branch of the service was not sufficiently recognised by the country. Both sides of the House must desire that these men should have a fair position secured to them. He would therefore leave the matter in the hands of the Government, trusting that they would take it into their consideration on the ground that the present condition of things was unsatisfactory, and therefore adverse to the efficiency of the public service.

MR. ANDERSON said, the hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had passed some strictures upon a question which he had put to the House a few days ago; but the hon. Gentleman apparently did not know the grievance of which he complained. The circumstances were that there was a captain who was to be put on compulsory retirement on account of reaching the age of 48; but he having found a lieutenant-colonel who agreed to retire before his time, the captain got a step and a lease of six years' longer service. The effect of that moneyed transaction on the junior officers was that, whereas they would have got one step in a month and a second in about a year, yet as now arranged they got one step now, but they would not get their second step for six years, and therefore they were defrauded of that promotion which they had every reason to expect. He admitted it was a little hard that a captain should be obliged to retire at 48, as a man had still a good deal of fight left in him at that age; but he was very doubtful whether the hon. Member for Chatham would be successful in obtaining any improvement in the position of the Marine officers from the present Government, as they had that day given himself a reply about the Navy which was not encouraging.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he thought that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty might, with great propriety, take into his consideration the best mode of improving the position of the officers of our Marine corps. There was no corps in the service where the pecuniary advantages of officers was so small, and where the promotion was so much retarded. He was convinced that if the Government would endeavour to effect a flow of promotion it would not be necessary to interfere with the previous arrangements which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract had made. He could testify to this fact, that there was no branch of the military service with so few officers above the rank of captain as in the Marines, and there was no branch of the service which could supply so many privates or gunners at so moderate a rate [per head as the marines now furnished. This was entirely owing to the far greater proportion of captains and subalterns to senior officers than existed in any other branch of the service. It was also mainly due to the few head-quarters of corps, and to the diminished number of companies which to the other branches of the service so greatly increased the charges. It would be easy to show this by merely comparing the number of battalions and companies into which the privates of the Marines would be distributed if they were organized in the expensive form followed by the infantry of the Line. He would therefore urge that it was wise to maintain the existing great disproportion of senior officers, but to counterbalance the evils which must follow in having slow promotion for the rank of captain, it was only just that openings for retiring old officers should be provided to a greater extent than at present, in view to guard the Marine service from those evils which must attach to captains and subalterns of long service and advanced age.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT cordially joined in the appeal to the Government to take the just grievances of a gallant body of men into their consideration. During the last year and a-half he had had frequent opportunities of coming into contact with officers of the Marines, and he was firmly convinced that their complaints were not without foundation. They had the authority of a distinguished officer for saying that the exertions of the Marines at the Gold Coast laid the foundation of the victories which ensued afterwards.

MR. CHILDERS believed there was no more gallant body of men either in the Army or the Navy than the Marines, and none whose well-being ought to be more attended to by the Government. There was, moreover, nothing that he would see with greater regret than any weakening of the efficiency of that most valuable corps. But as to what the hon. Member for Chatham had said with reference to the disinclination of these officers for sea service, he must give it the most absolute contradiction. It was the primary duty of the Marines to serve afloat, and when in office he had never found that there was any reluctance on the part of parents to place their sons in that corps, or any indisposition on the part of young officers to remain in it. The Marines, however, were not, as the hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) appeared to think, merely a branch of the Navy. They stood between the Navy and the Army; their organization was military, while their services were chiefly naval, and in making arrangements for promotion in, and retirement from, a corps of that kind they had to consider what relation those arrangements bore to the corresponding arrangements, not only for the Navy, but also for the Army. He was Chairman of a Committee of that House, which in 1867 entered very minutely into that very case of the Marines which the hon. Member now brought forward. That Committee had to inquire into promotion and retirement in connection with the Artillery and Engineers, as well as with the Marines. But anyone dealing with the question would be met at once with this difficulty—that in the Army the officers were on their regular active service up to the rank of colonel or general; whereas in the Marines it hardly ever happened, except in the case of great expeditions, that officers of higher rank than subalterns and captains went to sea at all, field officers being only employed in garrison towns at home, and hence arose the main difficulty of the case. In 1867, when the Committee made their inquiry, there was no certain rule for retirement from the Marines except that officers commanding divisions of that corps had to retire at the age of 60 unless the Admiralty thought it desirable to retain them. The system then existing was, as the Committee reported, “complicated, uncertain, and based on no principle”; and they recommended that there should be a code of regulations under which officers of different ranks should be compelled to retire after certain ages, their pensions being on a graduated scale, much exceeding the former rate. When he afterwards went to the Admiralty he had to carry that out in the best way he could. The hon. Member for Chatham seemed to think that a great reduction was made by him in the number of officers when these rules were promulgated. Technically the hon. Gentleman was right; but that reduction had nothing to do with the new rules, except that it took place within a year of their coming into force. It was the result of the reductions made in the number of men in 1867 and 1868 by his predecessor; and all that he did in 1869 was to bring down the number of officers in the Marines to the proper proportion with the number of men. He found a draught Order in Council on his table when he went to the Admiralty, and he carried it out in 1869. But it must not be forgotten that the arrangements of 1870 were a very great improvement on those previously in force, which provided no compulsory retirement except for officers commanding divisions above 60 years of age, unless the Admiralty thought proper to retain their services. If the former system, or no system had been now in force, there would have been the most gloomy outlook for the officers, whose promotion would have appeared hopeless. The complaint now was rather that the compulsory retirement was enforced at a too early age than that promotion was at too late a period of service. When, therefore, the hon. Member for Chatham spoke of the present age being high, and the present years of service being long, he was bound to say that, looking at the state of the Marines in past times, if it had not been for the Rules of 1870 the stagnation in the corps would have been two or three times as great as it was now. The principles laid down in that Order in Council and by the Committee of 1867 were the only principles on which any self-acting system of retirement could be carried out. They were principles which they hoped to see applied to the Army, which had been applied to the Navy, and which, after a few years’ working, would have a satisfactory effect. What he would suggest was that anything which was done to improve the conditions of retirement from the Marine Corps should be done at the same time, and, to a certain extent, though not wholly, on the same lines as any improvement with regard to the Army. There was a Commission now sitting to inquire into the subject of Rules for retirement in the Army, and his impression was strong that those Rules would be of a liberal character and would provide for a considerable amount of compulsory retirement. He thought that, with the Report of this Commission before them, and keeping in view the principles of the Orders in Council of 1870, as recommended by the Select Committee, the Board of Admiralty would have no difficulty in dealing with the comparatively moderate grievances complained of by the senior officers, especially the senior captains, of Marines.

SIR JOHN HAY said, his hon. Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had omitted to allude to one point of some importance. He (Sir John Hay) was a Member of the Committee referred to by the right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), and had the Report of that Committee been carried out, the subject would have been in a very different state from what it was now in. It was quite evident that if the rank of major had been given to the Marines, as it had been restored to the Artillery and Engineers, the officers in question would be placed in a position more like that which they ought to have at the age they had attained, and which would hold out to them some chance of promotion. This would be only a temporary remedy, he knew. Allusion had been made as to the difficulty of employing Marines as field officers, but it had been found perfectly practicable and useful to give them employment.

NAVY—THE "BRITANNIA"—CADET TRAINING SHIP.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BASS drew the attention of the First Lord of the Admiralty to a report, published in The United Service Gazette, of five naval cadets having been flogged on board the Britannia training-ship. Flogging had been abolished in the Army, but it still flourished in the Navy. In the last week in October, five cadets were flogged for fagging, and, setting aside all other considerations, it was a question whether it was legal on the part of the Admiralty to take the course which they had adopted. In 1867 this question was brought before the House of Commons, when the late Mr. Corry was First Lord of the Admiralty, and after some discussion, Mr. Corry stated that the Admiralty had come to this conclusion—that the punishment of flogging on board the Britannia should be now discontinued, and an Order to that effect was issued on the 8th of June, 1867. He (Mr. Bass) was decidedly against the flogging of young men who in a short time would be themselves in command. Flogging would never contribute to the improvement of the discipline of the Navy. It had been abolished in the Army—why should it be continued in the Navy? Those young men who had been thus publicly flogged would feel the degradation as long as they lived. He hoped they would hear from the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord, either that these punishments should not be repeated, or the grounds upon which it was considered expedient to break the decision of 1867, to which he had adverted, and to renew that which was disapproved of by the parents of the cadets and by the majority of the country.

NAVY—WARRANT OFFICERS.

OBSERVATIONS.

CAPTAIN G. E. PRICE rose to call the attention of the House to the present unsatisfactory position of the Warrant Officers of the Navy. The hon. and gallant Gentleman said, those officers performed duties that were both onerous and responsible. In years gone by they used to rank next to the captain of the ship, and at present, they took sole charge of the ship during the watch. The Commission on the Manning of the Navy, appointed in 1859, had spoken of them in eulogistic terms. The warrant officers had been described on very high authority as being the backbone of the Navy, and it was, therefore, very desirable that their position should be made satisfactory to them. The subject was really more important than it appeared on the surface, because it was related to the larger question of manning the Navy. By improving the position of the warrant officers, a considerable check would be placed upon the desertion of our seamen to another English-speaking nation. It was well-known that great difficulty was at present experienced in getting the best men to become warrant officers, the principal reason being because there was not sufficient inducement held out to them. What they required was increased pay. At present on being appointed they received 5s. 6d. per diem, and during the whole of their service did not receive any addition to it; and what they asked for was 6s. a day to begin with, with a rise of 1s. a day at the end of every five years' service up to the 18th year, when they would retire with the rank of chief gunner or chief boatswain. There were several reasons why, independently of the good effect it was likely to have upon the Navy, these requests should be complied with. In the first place, when on shore they were no longer employed on harbour duty, which they regarded as a kind of pension. It should be remembered, too, that since the present scale of pay of the warrant officers was fixed the price of the necessities of life had risen some 45 per cent, and that the petty officers who in our Navy received £40 a-year, received £62 in the American Navy. Their position, too, relatively to the other officers was not a comfortable one. The commissioned officers could not associate with them, and they could not associate with the petty officers, so that the three officers on board a ship-of-war were limited to their own society. On some ships there were only two, and should any disagreement arise between them, each would be in an isolated position; and he knew that good seamen refused to go in for their warrant because of this seclusion. He complained that the Royal Warrant of 1853, which provided for the promotion of warrant officers to the rank of lieutenant, with a donation of £100 for outfit, had never been carried out. He would like to see that warrant acted upon once or twice a-year, and would recommend that the officers so promoted should be put in command of gunboats, or have appointments in the coast service. There would be more than a mere "bubble" in the reputation to be gained by such promotion, as it would render the sons of the warrant officers so advanced eligible for positions to which they could not otherwise aspire. He might mention that as between the present year and the year 1870 there was a reduction in the number of warrant officers from 1,063 to 860, and a saving under the head of £10,000 in the Estimates of this year; while the number of seamen in the Navy had been increased by over 1,000. The men desired to retire from the service at the age of 45, but he, himself, thought they ought to serve until 50. He was sure Her Majesty's Government felt the importance of the subject, and regarded it as one which merited their consideration.

MR. BRUCE concurred in the views expressed by his hon. and gallant Friend, and observed that the expenses of the warrant officers were now considerably greater now than they formerly were. It ought not to be forgotten that the warrant officers were the backbone of the Navy. Upon their efficiency and trustworthiness the discipline of the ships, under the control of their superior officers, rested; and it was, therefore, of the utmost importance to secure the services of a trustworthy, intelligent, and steady class of men. The inducements now held out for that purpose were not, in his opinion, sufficient. If the Navy was called into active service, the ranks of the warrant officers must be filled up by men who would require great care and exertion on the part of those placed over them to bring them rapidly into a state of efficiency. It was of much importance that the position should be made sufficiently attractive to induce the best men to look forward to attaining it. He trusted that the Admiralty would feel justified in taking the case of these warrant officers into their favourable consideration, and he felt certain that in so doing they would receive the support of the House.

NAVY—SWIMMING—OBSERVATIONS.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, that, having been for 15 years a member of the Committee of the Royal Humane Society, it had come to his knowledge that by far the greater number of seamen in Her Majesty's Navy were unable to swim. He had received a letter from a gentleman on board one of our largest line-of-battle ships, who said that when she came into the harbour at Gibraltar, it was found that, while all the officers could swim, not more than a third of the sailors could swim, and they were obliged to bathe in a sail. Such a state of things could not occur in a public school, or even in a private school. Some most valuable lives were sacrificed in the attempt to save the seamen who could not swim. It seemed to be a point of honour on the part of the officers or men who could swim, that if a sailor fell into the water, they were to jump over and attempt to save him. He had consulted with a great many Naval officers, who all agreed that there was no reason why the men should not be compelled to learn to swim. In all the preparatory Naval schools swimming was taught. The life of a seaman in the Royal Navy was the property of the State; and it was not the lives of the men who could not swim that were alone in question, but the lives which were sometimes sacrificed in futile attempts to save them. He thought it high time that something should be done in this matter with regard to the Navy.

MR. HUNT said, he would refer to the different topics which had been brought before the House as briefly as possible, because he would, when the House went into Committee, have to speak at some length. The question of swimming was a very important one. He could not say what proportion of seamen in the Royal Navy were able to swim; but he could assure his hon. Friend (Sir William Fraser) that in the different training ships, swimming was taught systematically, and that in all ships on foreign stations, when the weather and climate permitted, every facility was given to the men to learn swimming. Just as, however, you might take a horse to water, but could not make him drink, so you might take men to bathe but could not make them swim. The seamen certainly showed in too many cases a great inaptitude, although he agreed that they ought to be encouraged to learn to swim as much as possible. With regard to the question put by the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Bass) he (Mr. Hunt) entirely differed from the view taken by the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman thought it a degrading thing that young men should be flogged with the birch. Five of these youths, between 13 and 14 years of age, were thus flogged in the Britannia last October. If flogging was degrading, many of them who had been to public schools had been degraded in the same way, but they had survived the disgrace—if disgrace it were—and had become all the better for it. The hon. Member said that the Admiralty had taken away from the captain the power of inflicting corporal punishment; but they had specially ordered these young men to be flogged. They had thoroughly deserved it for insubordinate conduct. Fagging had been persisted in, notwithstanding that minor punishments had been inflicted; and a solemn warning was then sent down from the Admiralty as to the consequences that would follow if the practice were persisted in. In the teeth of this warning, evidently by concerted action, the offence was repeated, and at last it became a question whether the Admiralty or the cadets were to govern the ship. It was absolutely necessary that some strong measure should be taken, and the boys must either be dismissed or flogged. The hon. Member said the parents of the boys would have preferred that they should be dismissed; but he (Mr. Hunt) knew the contrary to be the case. One parent wrote that he preferred that his son should be flogged, rather than dismissed. He heard that the punishment had had a satisfactory effect upon the discipline of the ship, and that the ordinary minor punishments had since diminished in number. He had been asked to assure the House that the punishment should not occur again. All he could say was, that he hoped there would be no occasion for it; but if the offence were repeated, it would be the duty of the Admiralty to repeat the punishment. It was his duty to maintain the discipline of the ship, and in dealing with young gentlemen of that age, the right course had, he thought, been adopted under the circumstances. He now came to two matters of a different character—the question of the Marine officers, so ably brought before the House by his hon. Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), and the warrant officers, whose case had been stated by his hon. and gallant Friend behind him (Captain Price). The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), who was Chairman of the Committee on the Promotion and Retirement of the Marines and other corps, advised him not to deal with this subject until the Royal Commission now sitting on Army Promotion and Retirement had reported; and in doing so, he gave the reason why this matter had not been dealt with by the Admiralty. The grievance of the officers of the Royal Marines was very well known. It was one of the most painful parts of his duty to witness the stagnation of promotion, and it did not need the able advocacy of his hon. Friend the Member for Chatham to make him (Mr. Hunt) fully alive to the evils from which they were suffering. Anxious as he had been to do justice in the matter, he found that under the state of things existing with regard to promotion, and retirement in the Army it would be perfectly impossible to deal with the question of Marine officers until the principles upon which the Army was to be treated were settled. He hoped his hon. Friend would see that it was from no unwillingness on his part, but simply owing to the position of affairs, that he had not been able to settle it at present. With respect to the case of the warrant officers, which had been introduced by his hon. and gallant Friend (Captain Price), it must come before the House before long. Their case was deserving of consideration, and he hoped before long to be able to hold out some prospect of improvement. The present was not a very favourable time for proposing an increase in the Estimates. The circumstances of the year were so peculiar, as the House would shortly be informed, that it was a remarkably unfavourable time for putting these claims before Parliament. He trusted that this difficulty would be only temporary, and that he should be enabled at no distant period to place before the House a satisfactory proposal in regard to the claims of the warrant officers.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that when Mr. Corry informed the House that the punishment of flogging on board the Britannia was to be discontinued, nothing was said as to the power of the Admiralty to interpose on special occasions. For his own part, he objected more to the manner in which the punishment was inflicted than to the punishment itself. This particular punishment for such small boys was not altogether undesirable; but, in the present case, it was inflicted by the ship's corporal in the presence of all the other boys and of the officers. Now, when flogging was inflicted in public schools, it was not administered before the other boys. [Mr. HUNT: It was in my time.] He believed that in the early part of his own career it used to be public; but the public flogging was discontinued while he was at school. It destroyed the self-respect of the boy who was flogged, and the flogging on board the Britannia should have been in private, as in our public schools.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(1.) 60,000 Men and Boys, including 14,000 Royal Marines.

MR. HUNT said, it was customary in moving the first Vote for the Minister occupying the position he had the honour to fill to enter upon a general review of the Estimates and the naval policy of the year. On the present occasion, before entering upon any question of figures, it might be interesting to the Committee that he should glance at a few questions affecting naval services during the past year, together with changes that had been made and others that were in contemplation.

The first matter he would bring under the notice of the Committee was a very gratifying movement which had emanated spontaneously from the crews of several ships in commission, and which, while unexpected by the Government, would probably be surprising to the Committee. It was a proposal made by the crews of a considerable number of ships, and also by the Marines, to establish a fund, by means of stoppages from their own pay, for the benefit of their widows and children. It was well known that British seamen and Marines possessed many noble qualities; but they had always had the character of being a thriftless sort of men, and it was exceedingly gratifying to find that habits of forethought and providence had taken root in their minds, and that they had come forward to make this proposition. They had applied to the Admiralty for assistance in carrying out their wishes in the matter, and he need scarcely say that the Admiralty had, with the utmost alacrity, done their best to fall in with their views. It was impossible, however, for the authorities to decide as to the best course to be adopted without knowing how much the men were willing to contribute. He had, therefore, caused a Circular to be issued to the Fleet on the subject. The whole of the replies had not yet been received; but when they had all come to hand, they would doubtless furnish the material for actuarial calculations as to the kind of provision it would be possible to make. It was hoped that if sufficient funds could be contributed the wishes of the men could be carried out with the as-stance, in a business point of view, of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners.

The next subject upon which he wished to touch was the patronage promotions. It had been decided within the last few months that hauling down promotions and promotions on death vacancies should cease. Where the numbers in each rank were limited as at present it was impossible that this system of promotion could continue without prejudice to the service. Supposing the choice of officers for flag-lieutenants was exercised in favour of the young men most distinguished by their talents, it would be an advantage to the Service that they should gain rapid promotion and so get into the upper ranks in an active period of life; but there was no security that the choice would be regulated upon this principle instead of upon motives of friendship and ties of kinship. In consideration of this fact and of the very limited promotion at the disposal of the Admiralty, it was thought right that this kind of patronage should be abolished.

One of the most important questions that had come before him since he went to the Admiralty had been the primary education of naval officers in the duties of their profession while they were in the cadet stage. He appointed a Committee to inquire into the question of the training given on board the Britannia, opinions having got abroad that the conditions of life on ship-board were not those best suited to boys of the age of naval cadets. The Committee which he appointed consisted of naval officers, medical men, and distinguished University men, and they reported unanimously as follows:—

“As the result of the most careful consideration of this important question, we are led to the opinion that it would be desirable to substitute for the two years' course on board the Britannia a three years' course at a College on shore, broken by two summer cruises in sea-going training-ships. One reason for this proposal is the doubt whether it is possible in two years, without undue mental strain, to pass the cadets through a course of training adequate to their future position as officers and as gentlemen. Another and broader reason is that we are convinced that a man-of-war, to whatever excellence she may be brought as a place of residence, is not and cannot be made a desirable place of education. The necessary presence of naval discipline is, in our opinion, antagonistic to the work of the schoolmaster.”

He was led very much to the same conclusion by a visit which he paid to the Britannia. What with the discipline enforced on board, and the time taken up with studies, it seemed to him that, with the exception of the time allowed for them to go ashore, the boys were kept on the stretch from the time they got up until the time they went to bed, and that they had none of that relaxation between the hours of labour that was essential. He had therefore to inform hon. Members that the Government had determined upon carrying into effect the recommendations of the Committee in this respect. The right hon. Gentleman who preceded him at the Admiralty (Mr. Goschen) had under his consideration the advisability of establishing a College such as was now contemplated, and he went so far as to institute inquiries as to the best site for the purpose. The proposal of the present Government would come before the Committee in the form of a small Vote for a site. There were many recommendations in favour of Dartmouth. It was a healthy place, the harbour was well closed in, and it had other advantages for the training of young men for service. A proprietor in the immediate neighbourhood, or the trustees of a proprietor, had offered as much land as they wanted at a very moderate figure.

Another matter which had engaged his attention was the present system of competition on entrance as naval cadets. On this point, too, the Committee had unanimously reported in entire disapproval of the present method of entry by competition. Even when restricted as at present by the nomination of only two boys for each vacancy, the system was hurtful to the boys, and therefore injurious to the service. He had acted upon this recommendation, and the nominations granted for the next examination had been granted without reference to competitive examination. There had been a change made in the examination, also recommended by the Committee. They proposed that Latin should be included in the subjects of examination, on the ground that it would be impossible for boys to be crammed on that subject, and that it would be a better test of educational acquirements. The Committee also disapproved of the enormous number of subjects in which the boys were examined on the Britannia, and in accordance with their recommendation, the course of study had been altered, and the subjects of examination reduced. Until the College was opened, it would not be possible to act upon the recommendation of the Committee as to the three years' course of study, broken by summer cruises, but it would be carried out, if Parliament sanctioned the institution of the College.

With regard to the higher education of officers, he had to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goschen) on the success which had attended the institution of a Naval College at Greenwich. He stated last year when he moved the Navy Estimates, that the number of officers studying there was 194; the number of officers now studying there was 230. He believed the institution of the Naval College at Greenwich would tend very much to the efficiency of the service.

Probably it was known to Members of the Committee that a short time ago a new Order in Council was made with reference to the position of Medical Officers. The feeling of the medical profession generally had been that medical officers did not hold their proper place on board ship—that they were not sufficiently considered with regard to relative rank and other matters. The Order in Council had given them a further advancement as regarded rank, a corresponding small change had been made in their uniform, and an improvement had been made with regard to retirement. No addition had been made to their pay; but now every medical officer who entered the Service would, after he had been 20 years on full pay service, be able to retire on 15*s.* a-day, if he preferred it. The new Order had not been long enough in operation to ascertain whether the objections of the medical gentlemen would be removed; but from the tone of the organs which represented the medical profession, he thought the new rules would give satisfaction.

As to the Boys who were being trained as seamen, the Admiralty found that the advantages which were offered to them were not sufficient. The boys, on joining, had recorded against them a debt for their kit, and it was impossible for them to have any money to spend, or anything to send to their parents. They contrasted the unfavourable nature of their employment in this respect with that of occupations on shore, and that led to a very considerable falling-off in the number of boys that the Admiralty were able to recruit for the service. A very short time ago the number of boys was less by 900 than the number required. Now, considering that we depended for our best seamen on the boys we trained ourselves, that was a very serious matter. Without waiting for the bringing forward of the Navy Estimates, he appealed at once to the Treasury on the subject, and the result was that the boys now received free kits on joining, and the deficiency in the number had been reduced by nearly one-half.

He now came to a question which his hon. Friend the Member for Hastings (Mr. T. Brassey) had on several occasions brought before the House—namely, the question of the Naval Reserve. That was a matter to which he (Mr. Hunt) had given—as was probably known to the Committee—a great deal of personal attention. In the course of last autumn he had an opportunity of visiting nearly all the principal training ships and stations on the coast, and of talking to the men themselves, to those who enrolled them, and to those who trained them. He was accompanied in his inspection by a late Colleague (Sir Walter Tarleton) who took great interest in the matter. They found the facilities for drilling given to the men, particularly to second-class men, were not sufficient; that they had to go very great distances for drill; and also that there were other impediments in the way of men joining which the Admiralty hoped to get rid of when the rules were revised—and they were now undergoing revision. They found that the distance of the drilling place from their ordinary residences deterred a great number of men from joining. The Admiralty had established a drilling station at Stornoway, and had received 400 or 500 men; and at Inverness, a considerable number of men had been obtained. On the 1st of March, 1874, the number of men of the first-class was 11,606, and the number of men of the second-class was 2,122. The number of men in the current month of the first-class was 12,392, and of the second-class 4,599. The number of men provided for in these Estimates was 18,000, and it would be seen that the two last numbers added together amounted to nearly 17,000. With regard to the second-class, he knew that a great many people of authority rather disparaged men of that class, and thought it was hardly worth while to recruit them. He did not share that opinion, and the specimen he had seen of them, consisted of very strong, powerful, and active men. They acquired their drill very easily, and one great advantage was, that you could always find them when you wanted them, whereas a great many of the first-class men were in distant parts of the world, and could not be got when they were wanted. The second-class men were thoroughly acquainted with the coast, and when drilled, they could fight the guns well. It was true they could not, as a rule, go aloft or steer with a wheel; but they were very useful men, and would be ready to go afloat if wanted. The Admiralty thought that the organization of the Reserve Force might be carried still further. As was well known to hon. Members of the Committee, there was now a movement with regard to training ships for the Mercantile Marine. The hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. T. Brassey) had often urged the utility of training boys to employment in the Mercantile Marine, in order that they might join the Naval Reserve. There were, as the Committee knew, many training ships now, but they were mostly philanthropic institutions. Some of them were more or less a species, he was going to say, of gaols, but that, perhaps, was too hard a term. Some of them were a sort of reformatory schools, and others were industrial schools—boys in destitute circumstances who had been rescued from the temptations to a life of crime being placed on board these ships. The Admiralty were not disposed to ask any boys in reformatory schools to join the Naval Reserve; but as regarded boys trained on board industrial ships, he saw no reason why they should not be invited, and he proposed that those who managed these ships should be asked to allow guns to be placed on board those ships for the purpose of drilling. He did not think these ships could furnish a very great number of boys whom the Admiralty could invite into the Reserve; but the proposal to train boys for the Mercantile Navy in various ships around our coasts he thought opened a much larger field. In fact, he felt so strongly the importance of movement as regarded our Reserves, that he had been considering in what way the Admiralty should assist the establishment of those ships in a national point of view. His right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade (Sir Charles Adderley), a short time ago informed the House what contribution he proposed should be given to the men per head from the Mercantile Marine for training boys in these ships. What the Admiralty proposed was this—it must be understood, however, that they could not undertake to do it all at once—they would provide a ship, her moorings, and an amount of rigging sufficient for training purposes. They proposed to put one or two heavy guns on board, and to pay a pensioner as an instructor. The Admiralty must be entirely at liberty to limit the number to be received, but those who were received would be required to produce certificates of good conduct and proficiency in drill, and for those so received £3 per head would be paid to the ship. He did not mean £3 per annum, but £3 for every boy who was taken into the Naval Reserve. For this purpose it was proposed to institute a third-class of the Naval Reserve. Then it was intended that every boy who was taken into the Naval Reserve should receive a suit of clothes every year; but as a condition of his service he would be bound to go to sea. Thus the boys, after being trained on board the ships, would not be received into the Naval Reserve, unless they had actually served at sea or were prepared to do so. The actual regulations with regard to that were not yet framed, but these would be their main provisions. Besides, it was proposed that the boys, when they reached the age of 18 years, should be enabled to pass into the other classes of the Naval Reserve; and he looked forward to the time when we should have an ample supply in the higher classes of the Naval Reserve of men who had been trained as boys on board these ships, who had been accustomed to the use of arms of all kinds from their earliest years, and who had been thoroughly drilled. We should then feel that we had a real Reserve which we might depend upon in case of emergency. The Commission on Manning the Navy recommended that 30,000 should be the number to be enrolled in the Navy Reserve. Whether that number would be fixed upon now that the crews of ships of war were smaller than they used to be, was a matter remaining to be settled. Therefore, the limit to be put to the Naval Reserve had not yet been fixed. We had lately, however, had 17,000, and it was now proposed to have 18,000. While upon this subject, he ought not to omit saying that the consideration of all these matters had led him to the conclusion that there ought to be a head to this Force. Of late years the Naval Reserves had been under the administration of the Second Naval Lord. Inspections were made from time to time by the Commander-in-Chief of the District, but there was no head of the force to whom the officers employed in the service could refer, and nobody who could stimulate the zeal and ability of the officers concerned in the drilling, or of those employed in enrolling the men. Therefore, he had appointed an Admiral Superintendent of the Naval Reserve outside the Admiralty, and he looked forward to great advantages accruing from that appointment, because the officer in question took the deepest interest in the matter, and had had great experience with regard to the Reserve Forces. Although the extra expense figured a little larger in the Estimates, it would be only £2,400 a-year after allowance was made for the abatement on Vote 1, by reason of the officer not drawing half-pay. So small a sum ought not to stand in the way of the most efficient organization we could get. He had discussed this subject with a great many naval authorities, and had been unable to find two opinions with regard to it.

And now he wished to touch upon a question which had been a matter of great concern to him—namely, the stagnation of promotion generally throughout the service. In the year 1874 three captains were promoted to be admirals, eight commanders were promoted to be captains, and 15 lieutenants were promoted to be commanders. Of these lieutenants, one had been promoted from the Royal yacht and six were promoted for services during the Ashantee War. He could not say he was satisfied with this state of things. It might be said that this was only a temporary evil. Well, perhaps it was only a temporary evil; but, at all events, it was an evil which would last long enough to wear out the hearts of some of the best officers in the service. He could not disguise from the House that he must look forward, before a very long interval elapsed, to introducing a measure on the subject. He did not wish to go into details about the measure now; but he would only say that having accepted the office he now held without having had any previous experience in it, he was unwilling to make any sudden proposals or to attempt to frame a scheme without due and mature consideration; and therefore he had not been in haste to do so. It was a subject of very great difficulty, in which the interests of the officers and the advantage of the public service were involved, and it required to be well considered; but he looked forward to proposing a scheme at no distant date to remedy what he regarded as a most undesirable state of things.

There were one or two other matters to which he wished to refer. One of them was the getting rid of what last year he called the "old lumber" of the Admiralty, when he remarked that when a ship was useless and never likely to be useful again, she ought to be broken up and disposed of. This policy he had endeavoured to carry out last year, and the House had assented to his taking an additional sum for breaking up ships in the Dockyards. £4,000 was taken in the original Estimate, and £2,000 in the Supplementary Estimate presented a few days ago. He had also made a contract with a firm of shipbuilders for the sale of some 35,000 tons of old vessels. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Reed) had spoken of the exceptional mode in which these ships had been disposed of; but when he saw the Returns moved for by his hon. Friend the Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre) he would find that the bargain was more advantageous to the Admiralty than any previous one. The sum it would bring into the Exchequer in the financial year was £128,000.

Last year a good deal was said on the subject of boilers. That question, he was sorry to say, had not yet been solved. He had appointed a Committee to consider it, and they had made a short preliminary Report. He had been promised another Report before he moved the Estimates, but it had not yet come to hand. The Committee had examined boilers of all descriptions; but considered it necessary to prosecute their inquiries further, and he was told the information was exceedingly valuable. [Mr. E. J. REED asked, whether the right hon. Gentleman would lay the Report before the House?] He (Mr. Hunt) was not sure whether the first Report would be of sufficient importance to submit to the House alone; but if his hon. Friend wished to look at it, he should have no objection to show it to him. He hoped the Report he was likely to have in the course of a few days would go more fully into the matter, in which case, perhaps, both the Reports might be laid upon the Table together.

He now proposed to go into the more dry part of the subject, and that was the figures in the Estimates. The total amount of the Estimates was £10,784,644. That was the gross amount; the net amount, after deducting extra receipts and Indian contributions, which together amounted to £322,000, was brought down to £10,462,644. But he was bound to add a certain sum to this. It was well known to the House that the Army Estimates provided a sum for naval ordnance, while there was no sum in the Navy Estimates for the transport of troops. The balance against the Navy was £60,419, and this made the total of the net charge £10,523,063, or, in round numbers, £10,500,000. This net charge was almost to a pound £500,000 in excess of the net charge for 1874-5 according to the original Estimates he laid upon the Table, and according to the statement he made about 11 months ago. Taking the gross sum he had stated—£10,784,644—there was a net increase of £344,539 as compared with that of 1874-5, including the Supplementary Estimates. This comparison, however, was not altogether a just one, because the Estimates for 1874-5 included an exceptional service of a peculiar description—namely, the Arctic Expedition. The Vote for this expedition in 1874-5 was £98,620, while for the present year it was only £13,000. The increase this year might, therefore, be more justly taken at £430,000. The year 1875-6 was an exceedingly unfortunate one. He had been obliged to include under different Estimates a sum of £43,000 which did not really belong to the year at all, but was required to satisfy the claims of India in past years, the amount of those claims having only just been arrived at. But the financial misfortune did not end there. Next year was Leap Year, which not only added another day's pay, but a 53rd weekly pay-day instead of 52; and these two disturbing elements together caused an increase of no less than £25,000. There was an increase for the non-Effective Service, over which he had no control whatever. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lowe) used to call that an automatic increase; and there was an automatic increase this year to the extent of £38,000. These figures taken together amounted to about £106,000. India had been his bane again. The terms on which we found men and officers for the Indian troop-ships had been re-adjusted; he had been bound to admit that we had been too exacting, and that the amount, formerly charged in respect of these ships, charged for the whole year was not what India ought in justice to be called upon to pay. One Indian troop-ship had also been put out of commission, so that there were now four, instead of five. These re-adjustments threw upon the Estimates a sum of £8,000 spread over two Votes. It was a question whether the number of seamen should be reduced on this account, but it was thought unadvisable to make any reduction in numbers. The sum just named, however, was not all lost, because the result was that the country had the advantage of the services of 100 men throughout the whole year and of 500 for five months of the year, while otherwise these men would have been bound to serve India and India alone. A slight increase of pay to the Artificers of the Fleet would account for about £7,000 of increase, and the free kit to the boys would cost £15,000. On the Victualling Vote there was an increase of £21,000; about £18,000 was due to the increase of numbers in the Naval Reserve, and about £8,000 on account of an issue of clothing to some of the Marines, which happened to fall within the present year. The addition to the Royal Naval Reserve increased that Vote by £25,000, of which about £2,400 was due to the establishment of the new office of Admiral Superintendent. There was an increase under both sections of Vote 10—Naval Stores and Machinery for Ships and Ships built by Contract. The increase appeared to be £160,000; but if allowance were made for the increase in 1874-5 on account of the Arctic ships in victualling, the increase would be £182,000. The increase in the Vote for Stores was, in a measure, owing to the fact that experience had shown that the sum taken last year was insufficient. Only a few nights ago the House was called on for a large excess Estimate for 1873-4, in which the item of Stores figured largely; and in 1874-5 there would be an excess upon the Store Vote. At this period, it was impossible to say exactly what the excess would be, and he was in hopes it would be met, to a great extent, if not entirely, by surpluses on other Votes; at all events, the Estimate for Stores in 1874-5 would be insufficient. In proposing the Supplementary Vote, he stated that he hoped there would be a saving upon the Stores. It turned out that, though prices were lower, the quantities would be greater, and therefore, instead of a surplus upon that Vote, he feared there would be a deficit. The sum taken for the present year, though in excess of the previous year's Estimate, was not in excess of the expenditure. The sum now asked for, however, was intended to cover the increased consumption of Stores, because it was proposed to do more work in the Dockyards. With regard to that part of the Vote relating to Machinery for Ships built by Contract, there was nothing new involved in the way of policy. The increase was due to the sums it was necessary to take for instalments under existing contracts, and partly to provide machinery for ships being built by contract, and for breaking up of ships. That was only the natural sequel of the Votes already taken in previous years, and the policy which had been pursued. The Scientific Vote showed a decrease of nearly £6,000, due almost entirely to the cessation of expenditure with reference to the Transit of Venus, and to a slight extent in connection with the scientific branch of the Arctic Expedition. There was a decrease of nearly £30,000 in Vote 11, for Works, but the amount taken includes a small sum for preliminary operations in connection with the building of a naval college at Dartmouth.

With regard to New Works, one of the chief was the extension of the Dockyard at Chatham. The original Estimate for this work was £1,700,000. As the work went on, however, prices rose and unforeseen difficulties of a physical character presented themselves; some changes were found necessary, and a revised Estimate was made, adding to the original Estimate no less than £250,000. Nearly the whole of the sum originally estimated had been spent already. Of these works Colonel Pasley, the Director of Works, said—

“Of the three basins or floating docks, four dry docks, two locks, and the public wharf at Gillingham which form the principal features of this work, two basins, all the four dry docks, and the public wharf are completed and in use. [The position in which the steamboat landing-stage is intended to be placed being at present blocked by the dam at the eastern end of the third basin, it has been temporarily placed in another site, from which it will be removed eventually at the expense of the Admiralty. This will be a work of very trifling cost; and in all other respects the wharf is complete.] Of the third basin, rather more than one-half is, with trifling exceptions, finished, and the remainder, together with the two locks and the river wall adjoining them, has yet to be completed. The ground in which these are to be constructed has been laid dry by the construction of a great earthen dam, and the excavation for the basin walls has been commenced.”

Thus the Committee would see from this Report the beginning of the end of the works at Chatham. For the extension of the Yard at Portsmouth the original Estimate was £2,207,000, the revised Estimate, £2,350,000, showing an increase of £143,000. The works there were still more nearly completed than at Chatham. Colonel Pasley said of them—

“The repairing basin, with its two dry docks, and the tidal basin with the deep dock, as well as the two entrance locks, are now completed, and only await the removal of the dam, and the fixing of the caissons in their places, to be brought into use. Some delay has arisen from the novelty and complexity of the machinery and arrangements connected with sliding caissons of such unprecedented dimensions as these, but I hope nothing will occur to prevent the opening of the two basins and three dry docks early in the coming summer.”

There was a new item of £18,000 under the head of Keyham for the construction of a pontoon for docking vessels of 1,000 tons and under. There was a great want of accommodation for docking this class of vessels, and Colonel Pasley said—

“The small docks at Woolwich and Deptford are no longer available, and no new ones have taken their place. Under existing circumstances, therefore, ships of small tonnage have frequently to await a chance of going into docks which are much too large for them, in which they cannot be economically or conveniently accommodated, and which they can only occupy to the exclusion of ships for which the docks are better adapted."

This work was represented to the Admiralty as one of urgent necessity. At first new docks were thought necessary, but the plan of a pontoon was devised for docking vessels of 1,000 tons and under, and, of course, cost much less than docks did. The next point to which he would refer was the extension of the works at Haulbowline. That was a subject which was brought before the House by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Ronayne) last Session, and on that occasion the Junior Lord of the Admiralty (Sir Massey Lopes) promised that they would go and have a look at the works. In the course of last autumn they did go, and experienced some very rough weather in doing so. The conclusion which they came to was that if the work was worth going on with at all it ought to be proceeded with faster. Great importance was attached to this work by naval authorities of great judgment. As it was now dragging on from year to year, we were getting no benefit from what was already done; and therefore he had come to the conclusion that the work should be carried on with greater expedition. He therefore proposed to increase the Vote for 1875-6 to £30,000, being an addition of £10,000 to last year's Vote. The revised Estimate for the work amounted to £420,000, which was an excess of £90,000 over the original Estimate. He came then to the question of Alderney. There was a Report from Colonel Pasley on that subject, which suggested one of three courses. Colonel Pasley said—

"It may be dealt with in any one of the three following methods:—namely, 1, the whole work may be abandoned to its fate; 2, the whole may be maintained; and 3, the outer portion may be abandoned and the inner maintained."

And he added—

"In every respect the abandonment of the outer and the maintenance of the inner portion of the work appears to me to be the best policy to pursue."

He proposed to adopt the course which had been thus recommended by Colonel Pasley. That completed the observations which he had to make upon Works Vote, and also upon the increase and decrease in the Estimate with one exception. That ex-referred to the employment of men in the Dockyards. He had not taken that subject before, because, being a question of policy, it appeared better to deal with it separately, inasmuch as it was possible that some controversy might arise on the point, though he hoped that would not be the case. The increase under Vote 6, for Dockyards, &c., was given in the Estimates at £68,743; but, as £18,000 under that head was taken for the Arctic Expedition in 1874-5, the increase was really £86,000. Of this £22,000 was for the 53rd weekly pay-day of Leap Year. The main part of the increase, however, was due to the proposal to add 880 men to the existing dockyard strength, which would bring the total numbers up to 16,000. He was unable to deal with this question without referring to a matter which caused some excitement last Session, namely—the state of our Fleet. He hoped the same animated discussions on the matter would not again arise. He had no wish to treat it in a controversial spirit; but it was utterly impossible that he could avoid dealing with the subject. He made a statement last year with regard to the condition of our iron-clad fleet, which was forced upon him by the fact that there was a Motion for Inquiry into the matter, and there were letters in the papers, from persons more or less acquainted with the subject, giving an exaggerated account of its condition. He felt it his duty, therefore, to lay what he believed to be the actual state of our iron-clad fleet before the House. He did so after laborious investigation, and to the best of his ability. That statement was criticized very much in this House, and still more in the Press; but he could only say that now, after 11 months' reflection and inquiry, he entirely adhered to what he had then said. It was argued in the Press that the statement he had made was utterly impossible, and it was attempted to put the First Lord of the Admiralty in this dilemma—either that he had exaggerated the ill-condition of the iron-clad fleet, or that he had not taken sufficient means to remedy it. Well, he would admit, to a certain modified extent, the truth of the latter charge, and his repentance in that respect would be seen in the proposals now about to make—namely, in addition to the Dockyard works as well as other proposals for the improvement of the condition of our Fleet. He had said to "a modified extent;" but, with regard to his proposals generally, he did not consider himself open to the charge. Those who looked to the Navy Estimates simply were apt to say—"Oh, the Navy Estimates were originally £10,000,000, and the First Lord of the Admiralty only proposes to add £150,000." But those who went carefully into the matter knew that was not a fair remark. First of all, the Navy Estimates were not entirely taken up with the building and repairing of ships. That formed but a small part of the total sum taken in the Estimates. When they struck off about £2,000,000 for the non-Effective Services, and took into account what was spent on the personnel of the Fleet and other matters, that would leave out of £10,500,000 in round numbers, the Estimates of last year, only about £3,000,000 for the building and repairing of ships. The addition, therefore, to this total to which he proposed to make in the Supplementary Estimate was, in his view, not a very small one. Besides, those who made the charge against him omitted to observe what a large addition to the number of men in the Dockyards was made the year before by the right hon. Gentleman his Predecessor. In 1863-4, 640 men were added; in 1874-5, 700 men were proposed to be added by the right hon. Gentleman opposite; while he, himself, added 800 men, 100 in the original and 700 in the Supplementary Estimate. So that 2,140 in the course of two years were added to the Dockyards. That was a very formidable addition, and one which ought not to have been disregarded, when the means which he proposed to take for improving the conditions of the Navy were criticized. He pointed out in his speech on that occasion, that the Navy Estimates which had gone down for some years, had of late been swelling in the hands of his Predecessor. Therefore, the conditions of things was to be considered, not with reference to the Estimates framed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite last year, but to the Estimates put before the Committee in previous years. His out-of-door critics of last year had this year returned to the subject, and said that in the Estimates now lying on the Table was to be found a decisive argument for invalidating the statement which he made as to the condition of our Fleet last year. He had shown what the total net addition to the Estimates this year was. The proposal which he now made was, to add 880 men to the Dockyard establishments; but he would like the Committee to see what the difference was between the money which he proposed should be devoted to the building and repairing of ships this year, and what it was under the Estimates of 1872-3. The Paper which he held in his hand had been prepared for him by the Departmental officers, and it was well known to the Members of the House who studied the Estimates, that the sums taken for the matériel of the Fleet were comprised in Votes 6 and 10. In Section 1, Vote 10, there were some matters which had no reference to the matériel of the Fleet; but these had been eliminated by the Departmental officers who drew up the Paper. That being so, he came to these figures—In 1872-3, £2,189,000 was taken for the matériel of the Fleet, and according to the Estimates now on the Table £3,280,000 were taken; so that there was this year a difference of a little over 1,000,000, or an addition of some 50 per cent to the amount taken in 1872-3. So that those who said that the proposals which he now laid before the Committee were inadequate for putting the Fleet in proper condition had not their attention directed to the difference of the Estimates now proposed as compared with those of 1872-3. He knew it would be said that there had been a rise in prices since that time. According to the Estimate made by the Department that rise did not exceed 20 per cent, and if hon. Gentlemen deducted that, they would still find £800,000 and over as the addition to the expenditure on the ships. He had thought it necessary to state so much, because he had been somewhat roughly handled in reference to this matter. One representing such a Department might expect to be duly and sharply criticized; he did not complain, but he thought the criticism should be tempered by all the knowledge that could be brought to bear on the subject. The facts he had stated would, he hoped, be duly considered. When he said that he adhered to the statement he made last year, he was going to make a qualification. He stated that there were nine ships of war not worth repairing for seagoing purposes. It had been thought that one of those ships might possibly be worth repairing

—the Royal Alfred. It appeared in the programme for this year; but it could not be known that she would be worth repairing till she was examined. But with that qualification he adhered to the statement he made last year. He also told the Committee last year that there were at that time 14 ships thoroughly effective for service "in the proper sense of the term," and he meant those words to be part of his statement. He said also, that in the course of the year four more would be ready, making 18 ships "in the proper sense of the term" thoroughly efficient, and that expectation had been realized. He now would inform the Committee how they should stand in the immediate future. By the end of the financial year there would be four more, and by the end of 1875-6 four others, making 26 thoroughly efficient vessels altogether. He was not speaking of what were termed at the Admiralty "special ships," such as the Devastation and the Thunderer. He did not undervalue ships of the Thunderer and Devastation type; but he had been speaking of ironclad ships fit for cruising purposes. But by the end of the year their Fleet would be strengthened by the addition of the Thunderer, which would be completed. The difference that would result from the addition of the men he had asked for would be that one ironclad would be completed in 12 months instead of two years; and one, coming in for repairs, in 8 months instead of 20; and they would make progress with the Inflexible and Téméraire to the extent of 300 or 400 tons each more than they would have done. They would also be able to commence and make some progress with a new class of vessels to which he would allude presently. That was the prospect before them, supposing the proposals he now made to the Committee were accepted. It might be asked, considering the condition of the Fleet to be such as he had pointed out, why had nothing more been done? He had been governed by these considerations. He thought it exceedingly undesirable to add an enormous number of men to the Dockyards for one or two years. The shortness of the employment was bad enough in itself, and when they were discharged great distress very often was the result. A disturbance in the labour market was also created which it was exceedingly desirable to avoid. One, of course, had to consider whether such a spasmodic effort was necessary, and he came to the conclusion that though things were not in a satisfactory state there was nothing either in the condition of other fleets or in the condition of our own to make such a spasmodic effort necessary. He thought it better to proceed more quietly, making considerable additions, and, at the same time, spreading the work over a greater number of years. He said just now, he admitted he had not made sufficient provision last year. It was said by many that the Treasury was the obstacle—that he had formed grand notions of spending millions on the Fleet; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not accept the bills he drew on him. There never was the slightest foundation for that assertion. His right hon. Friend and he were entirely at one on the matter. He generously accorded him all he had asked, and if anyone in the Government was to blame for the proposals made last year he was alone to blame. He did not say his knowledge was now all it ought to be; but with the experience he had since acquired he came to the conclusion that the number of men he had asked for last year was insufficient. He was not ashamed to say he was then entirely new to the work. He was exceedingly anxious to give full weight to the administrative ability of the right hon. Gentleman who preceded him, and he shrank from proposing a larger addition to what the right hon. Gentleman recommended to the House. But the experience of the last year, and the discussions which had occurred at the Admiralty, satisfied him that unless additions were made to the Dockyard strength they would not be able to make much progress, and the Fleet would not be what it ought to be within a moderate length of time. Under these circumstances, he now made the proposition he had stated to the Committee.

Now, with regard to the programme of ships, he did not propose to contract this year for any new ship except a torpedo vessel. In some respects the contract work would be greater, but it would be on ships already commenced. In the Dockyard he proposed to commence two new ships of the Arab class and two vessels of an entirely new type—very fast despatch vessels, the exact design of which had not yet been settled. But it was proposed that they should be vessels having a speed of 17 or 18 knots. There were ships building in foreign yards of that speed. They would be exceedingly useful in overtaking an enemy's ships of commerce or protecting our own, and they would be able to render great service in case of war. It was proposed that some progress should be made on one of these in the course of the financial year; the other would be commenced, but little progress would be made with her. With regard to the ironclads, the Committee would remember that last year two new ironclads were sanctioned. They were being built by contract. He proposed now to do no work on new ironclads, but to get the sanction of the House for the laying out of two new ironclads in the Dockyards, so that they might be ready to put the men upon them when they were taken off the ships about to be completed. The designs for those two new ships were not yet matured; but in getting the consent of the Committee without laying the plans before them he was only following the example of the right hon. Gentleman two years ago.

Mr. GOSCHEN: But they will be laid on the Table before the end of the Session if you follow my example.

Mr. HUNT said, he would be happy to do that as soon as the designs were settled. Perhaps the Committee were hardly aware of the number of ships now in course of construction. There were in the Dockyards and by contract no less than 42—8 ironclads, 4 iron corvettes wood-sheathed—6 composite corvettes, 9 composite sloops, 5 composite gunboats, 2 troopships, 1 paddle vessel, 1 tug-boat, 2 iron barges, 1 wood barge, 2 armed despatch boats, and 1 torpedo vessel. He did not count the two ironclads he proposed to lay down this year. The Committee, he thought, would be of opinion that when these were completed they would form a large addition to the efficiency of our Fleet. It was proposed to build in Her Majesty's Dockyards in the course of the year 13,812 tons, and to employ for building work 5,194 men. The contract work proposed to be done was 5,853 tons, making with the work in the Dockyards a total of 19,665 tons. The principal work undertaken by the Government this year was the repairing rather than the building of ships. Last year he pointed out that the expectations held out by the late Government as to the amount of tonnage to be built had not been realized, and he was sorry to say that in this respect he was no better than his Predecessors. The total tonnage which the Government proposed to build last year was 19,962; but the actual work done was only 15,258 tons, so that they had been behindhand in the year's operations to the extent of 4,704 tons, including the contracts. This deficit, however, was partly due to the fact that the work connected with the ships of the Arctic Expedition had employed a great number of men who would otherwise have been employed on new ships. With regard to the work done by contractors, he believed that in many cases strikes and difficulties with their workmen prevented them making so much progress as was expected. Perhaps, as he said something about the desirability of doing more boiler work in the Dockyards it might be as well that he should state what they had done during the last financial year. The total number of horse power of boilers completed in the year was 3,299, or about 15,000 indicated horse power. They proposed last year to take on 100 additional men for boiler work, but those were only taken on after May in that year; the increase of boiler work due to those additional men was 1,010 horse power; and the additional boiler work per annum, owing to the additional men, if employed for the whole year, was estimated at 2,000 nominal horse power.

Now, he believed that he had gone through all the matters that he had thought it necessary to bring to the attention of the Committee. He had occupied the Committee a considerable time; yet it might be that he had omitted many things upon which the Committee might have desired information. It was almost impossible upon any one occasion to advert to all the matters of interest; but they all knew perfectly well that hon. Members would have an opportunity of putting questions and eliciting information with regard to the different Votes; and therefore that night was not the last occasion upon which he should have to be upon his legs as to the Navy Estimates of 1875-6. He thanked the Committee for its kind attention, and concluded by moving the Vote for the number of men.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he was not sorry to take part in the ceremony of that evening, which included, among other things, the burial of a great many past controversies. Some of these controversies had been long and fierce, and after having heard so much of them for the last five years, the House would no doubt be heartily glad to part with them. The right hon. Gentleman, in his clear exposition of the various topics which came under his notice, alluded to much which was of great interest to the Committee, and to all who paid attention to naval affairs. But perhaps many hon. Members were as much interested by the omissions from that speech, as by that which was contained in it. They were happy to hear that the number of Men proposed was precisely the same as the number which had been submitted to the House for the past four or five years. There was a time when very lively attacks used to be made on the late Government in regard to these matters. The hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) was always complaining in former days that our ships were under-manned, and the Estimates insufficient; but the right hon. Gentleman in the speech which had just been heard, made no mention whatever of an insufficiency of men. Again, it used to be said that the number of boys was deficient, but that number had been for years past either 7,500 or 7,000. This year it was to be 7,000. Both as regarded Men and as regarded Boys, the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman were satisfactory. Then there was the question of our foreign establishments, the number of squadrons which were to be employed, and the number of ships in those squadrons. About these things also there had been animated controversies. Now, however, the controversies had died out. The right hon. Gentleman had not thought it necessary to say a word with regard to the number of ships to be kept in commission; and it might, therefore, be assumed that in respect to the amount of naval force which was deemed necessary for the protection of our Colonies and the general service of the Empire, the right hon. Gentleman had thought it right to abide by the lines laid down by his Predecessors. Another subject which every one must have been glad to find omitted from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was the organization of the Admiralty. It was to be hoped they had heard the last of this subject, and that the right hon. Gentleman found the machinery of his Department working in a fairly smooth and satisfactory manner. The time of the House would be infinitely better employed in debating the work of the Admiralty than in constantly disturbing the Department by taking its machinery to pieces. In regard to the Coastguard, as in other important respects, the policy of the late Government had been accepted. 4,300, the force which had existed during the last five years, still remained on the Estimates. Altogether, there was good reason to be satisfied that so many controversies had been got rid of. For his own part, he had always been anxious that naval matters should be discussed in that House without Party spirit, and that the important and difficult questions which naturally arose in connection with these Navy Estimates should be considered solely on their merits. The right hon. Gentleman had alluded to one controversy which still remained—namely, as to the number of men employed in the Dockyards—but that was a small matter in comparison with the disputes which now seemed to be at an end. He was happy to be able to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman upon the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, and upon the ability of the naval advisers by whom he was surrounded. He had called to his councils Sir Alexander Milne, who had been associated with the late Board—Admiral Hornby, than whom no more able officer existed, and Lord Gilford, whom he (Mr. Goschen) had been most glad to appoint to the Steam Reserve at Portsmouth. There was every reason, therefore, to rely upon the advice which the First Lord of the Admiralty would receive from those who formed his council. There were various topics which called for brief notice before coming to the more important subjects which were touched in the concluding part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. In regard to the question—no doubt a difficult and delicate question—as to the Warrant Officers, he thought it a pity the right hon. Gentleman had said they had made out a case, when he was not prepared, on account of the heavy pressure upon this year's Estimates, to deal at present with their grievance. It was rather a delicate matter to hold out hopes to any branch of the profession, though he had no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman would do his best to meet the question. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman was not silent upon the matter, though he (Mr. Goschen) quite recognized the temptation to sympathize with a most deserving body of men; and as the right hon. Gentleman had acknowledged that something ought to be done, it might be wise that he should try, in connection with this year's Estimates, to do what justice required. In connection with the question of "hauling-down" vacancies, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had taken a very wise step. The matter frequently occupied the attention of the Board in his (Mr. Goschen's) time, and he gave the right hon. Gentleman all credit for what he had done. Next, as to the training of cadets, the right hon. Gentleman had correctly stated that the substitution of a college for the training ship Britannia had occupied the attention of the late Board, and he (Mr. Goschen) was himself strongly in favour of the substitution. He believed that, notwithstanding the unanimous view of the Committee appointed by the right hon. Gentleman, there was a considerable difference of opinion among naval officers; but, on the other hand, there was, among men well competent to judge, a desire to see the college substituted. He himself could only say that he wished the latter scheme every success. He could not, however, go entirely with the right hon. Gentleman when he said that he had already abolished competition as regarded entry into the naval service. The new regulations under which the nomination would be given had not been very clearly stated; but perhaps it might be assumed from what had been said, that it would be simply a matter of patronage with a test examination. This would be a very serious change. He admitted there were objections to competitions in the case of very young boys—still, it was well known that there were scholarships offered in public schools to boys about the same age as those who sought to enter the Navy. The whole question of the admission of cadets was involved and required investigation; and it would be well to have a separate discussion devoted to it, in order that all the arguments might be thoroughly threshed out. It was his anxious wish that by some means boys might be drawn into the Navy from the great public schools. He was very strongly opposed to a system which made it necessary for the boys to go to one or other of a very few cramming establishments before admission. These establishments, he was aware, were exceedingly well conducted, and very successful in many respects; but it was desirable that the boys who entered the Navy should have the same general training as other boys. He was obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the complimentary terms in which he had alluded to the College at Greenwich and spoken of its success. There was no reason to find much fault, if any, with the step which had been taken in regard to the admission of boys as sailors, and the grant of free kits to them. Certainly the sum of £15,000 was rather a large one; but if it made the difference of 300 or 400 boys, the expenditure would not have been altogether ill-advised. A number of stringent regulations existed at present in connection with their admission. They occasionally found that by the relaxation of some of the over-strict regulations, the supply of equally good boys might be increased. The number of boys who went into the Navy also varied much at different times of the year. During the first two years that he was at the Admiralty, he was constantly told that the supply of boys was short and the supply of seamen falling off. Nevertheless, at the end of the year the number of boys remained the same, and the supply was increasing. The right hon. Gentleman did not state the number of blue-jackets at present on the establishment; but he gathered from his silence that it was not unsatisfactory. With regard to the Reserves, he was pleased to hear from the right hon. Gentleman that they were increasing in number, and he (Mr. Goschen) hoped improving in quality. He understood that the satisfactory entries of upwards of 4,000 into the second-class Reserve had occurred under the regulations which he had himself made, with certain increased facilities which had been given within the last few months for drill. The controversy with respect to the Reserves had been a warm one for years. Many Gentlemen had declared that they would not be able to get the men; but he and his Colleagues had always believed that they would get them by slightly modifying some of the regulations. He rejoiced that their expectations had been so fully realized, and that at last the number of men had overtaken the amount of money voted for them. He had no doubt that the increased facilities referred to by the right hon. Gentleman would continue to attract men to the service, and that they would be able to raise the number thought necessary. As to the assistance to be given by the State to ships for training boys for the Mercantile Marine, that subject was also considered by the late Government, who, although disposed to give a certain sum of money towards that object if necessary, found that the difficulties connected with the matter were extreme; and he was therefore anxious to see the regulations by which the right hon. Gentleman proposed to carry out that purpose. The great difficulty was to secure a sufficient hold on the young lads. It was absolutely necessary that they should present themselves annually for a certain amount of drill in order to receive the retainer. Again, many training ships took boys almost as late as they were taken in the Royal Navy—so that when they went to the ships they were rather above the age when they should be taken into the Navy. However, if the right hon. Gentleman could solve those difficulties, and insure that the lads should be made efficient by a regular system of drill, he hoped that he would be able to carry out his scheme. With regard to promotion, every one must feel sympathy with the right hon. Gentleman in the difficulty he now experienced, and must also feel that he had been rightly advised in not dealing at all hastily with that matter. Half the existing difficulties arose from the somewhat inconsiderate way—if he might say so—in which naval cadets were entered years ago. He had heard it rumoured that the right hon. Gentleman and his Board had been increasing the entries of cadets. At the close of his own tenure of office he reduced the number considerably, partly with the view of changing the regulations under which they entered; and therefore, in fairness, he allowed that the right hon. Gentleman was entitled to increase somewhat the entries, so as to make up the deficiency of the year before he took office. But he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would be able to show them that he had not by an excessive entry of cadets exposed them to a recurrence of their old difficulties by and by. It was all very well as long as those cadets remained in subordinate ranks; they wanted them as sub-lieutenants and lieutenants; but they would have assuredly to pay the penalty of the system in after years in that stagnation of promotion which was so detrimental to the service. The right hon. Gentleman should, therefore, guard against future danger of that kind by checking any undue entry of cadets. The right hon. Gentleman's next topic—he (Mr. Goschen) took them in the same order—was that of ships and stores, and he had informed the Committee that he had taken vigorous steps to sell 35,000 tons of useless shipping. He had forgotten to include that subject among the buried controversies of which he had already spoken. The late Government had been strongly attacked for parting with a number of ships of the Navy for the sake of a paltry sum of money; and the charge was even brought against them—and it went the round of the papers—that they were going to put up Nelson's ship for sale. Why was that? Because they thought fit to sell some useless ships. Now, however, the right hon. Gentleman was to sell 35,000 tons of useless ships besides those that were to be broken up in the Government yards. It might be well to dispose of those ships provided every care was taken that none were broken up which might be used as receiving ships, training ships, or for any of the other purposes for which there were many applications. Acting, no doubt, under the impression that the late Admiralty were virulently assailed because they put up ships to auction, and thinking it a thing which went against all sentiment that they should be knocked down by the hammer—the right hon. Gentleman adopted the hole-and-corner mode of disposing of them by private contract. Much might be said on the particular method in which that was done; but, on the whole, the late Government had no cause to complain that the right hon. Gentleman had substantially pursued their policy in that matter. The right hon. Gentleman having disposed of his preliminary discussion, came to the figures of his Estimates, and it appeared that he did not know whether the increase of them would be considered large as compared with those of last year, or small; but he (Mr. Goschen) believed the right hon. Gentleman inclined to the idea that they were small. He had pointed out that India had been a very heavy pull upon him—that he had to make an addition to the charge for the non-effective service, and by various items, amounting altogether, in round figures, to £200,000, he accounted for an increase in the Estimates. But in a later part of his speech he tried to show that he had added a great deal to the Estimates; and one could perfectly understand why he did so. The right hon. Gentleman, he might here remark, had taken the lowest year he could find among the late Government's Estimates—namely, 1872-3, and stated that he was adding £1,000,000 to the shipbuilding Votes—Nos. 6 and 10.

Mr. HUNT: I did not say I had added £1,000,000; but I said that the right hon. Gentleman and myself had done so.

Mr. GOSCHEN said, he disclaimed all share in that extraordinary arithmetical transaction. The right hon. Gentleman had said that £1,000,000 having been added to Votes 6 and 10, he had really increased the shipbuilding votes by 50 per cent as compared with 1872-3. But while the right hon. Gentleman asked for 50 per cent more in money, he only asked for an increase of 3,000 men—the number in 1873-4 having been 13,000, whereas he proposed 16,000—but he altogether disputed the correctness of the right hon. Gentleman's accounts, although they might be intelligible if it were intended to devote the £800,000 to building ships by contract. Then as to the stores, the right hon. Gentleman had been obliged to ask an increase of £182,000 under that head [Mr. HUNT said, that included two sections of Votes.] Yes. In the first section he understood there was an increase of £85,000; but the right hon. Gentleman admitted that there had been a continuous rise of prices, and he (Mr. Goschen) was glad that it was not necessary to ask for more. The details of the Vote did not appear as if the Liberal Government had starved the stores and their successors had been obliged to increase the quantity. On timber there was a decrease of £4,000, on coals of £14,000, and on hemp and canvas of £6,800, and the increase was only on metal. The late Administration would plead guilty to having bought as little iron as possible during the years when iron was so high. Upon the face of this Vote it conveyed no slur upon them. To have a sufficient stock of seasoned timber in store was, he might add, a matter of great importance, and he hoped, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman would subscribe to the doctrine which was acted upon by the late Board of Admiralty—that there should be large stores of articles which could not be bought at the shortest notice, but that there was no use in laying up such stores of things which could be readily procured in the market. Coming now to the shipbuilding policy of the Government and the number of men to be employed in the Dockyards, he would congratulate the right hon. Gentleman that as regarded Vote 10 Section 2, and the building of ships by contract, there was no new policy involved. The right hon. Gentleman had informed the House that there were 42 ships being built, two being new ships which were laid down this year, and two which were ordered by him on last year's Supplementary Estimates. Out of the 42, therefore, 38 had been commenced by his predecessors in office, which showed, he thought, that they had not been unmindful of the wants of the Navy. It now appeared that after the right hon. Gentleman had been a year in office he was satisfied that although it was necessary to repair ironclads more rapidly than had been done by the previous Government, yet that it was not necessary to commence, or hurry on the building of, any new ships. He did not propose to begin the building of any new ironclad frigates or corvettes, large or small, but only one small sloop of the Albatross and two of the Arab class. He did not complain of the right hon. Gentleman for adopting that course; on the contrary, he approved of it, although, as he himself had stated, he had not to deal with a close-fisted, but with a generous, Chancellor of the Exchequer, from whom he could if he wished have obtained more money had he deemed it necessary to re-assure the public mind with regard to the strength of our Navy. As he had not asked for it, it was clear the right hon. Gentleman considered the number of ships to be adequate; and while he might, if he wished to be critical, take exception to the proposed repair of some obsolete ships, yet he could not help admitting that the right hon. Gentleman, with a clear field before him, a generous Chancellor of the Exchequer, and a majority behind him, who would have been prepared to sanction the building of a large number of ships, had been exceedingly modest. He was aware, to use his own expression, that it would be wrong to indulge in any spasmodic increase of our Navy, and that the state of foreign Navies as well as public opinion did not warrant him in proposing a larger programme. He was justified, no doubt, in taking that course, and he felt himself to be so, after the expiration of five years during which time his predecessors had been in office, and during which period millions had been saved to the country. He came now to the right hon. Gentleman's allusions to the controversy raised between them last year; and, in referring to this subject, he did not intend to follow the right hon. Gentleman very closely into the defence which he had made upon this point. The right hon. Gentleman said that he did not alarm the country by what he had said last year. But the right hon. Gentleman had to submit to the Committee an increase of 1,000 men in the Dockyards, and his explanation brought out in the most clear—he might almost say in the most charming—manner the exact point of difference between himself and his predecessors in office. The right hon. Gentleman had explained that by the addition of 1,000 to the number of workmen employed in the Dockyards he should be able to turn out two ironclads in 12 instead of in 24 months, and one ironclad in 12 instead of in 20 months, and that he should be able to complete some 300 or 400 tons of shipping besides. That, therefore, was the whole difference between the right hon. Gentleman and his generous Chancellor of the Exchequer and those who had preceded him with their ferocious guardian of the public purse. He took no exception to the right hon. Gentleman's proposals. It did not matter much to this country whether we had 1,000 men more or less in our Dockyards, or whether one or two iron-clads were completed in 12 or in 24 months. Therefore, this old controversy of the number of men in the yards might be buried with the other matters of discord. The right hon. Gentleman had found out, as his predecessors had done, that the point to be kept in view was not the number of men employed in the yards, but the quantity of work which they would be able to do, and that it frequently happened that, from the greater difficulty of supervision, or from some other cause, a less proportion of work was obtained from a larger than from a smaller number of men. It was doubtful whether when these 1,000 men should be added to the yards there would be 1,000 men's work added; and he was not quite sure whether the right hon. Gentleman would not have been better advised if he had given a little more building by contract and kept the number of men in the dockyard at their present point. He should, however, give the right hon. Gentleman such support as he could in his demand for an additional number of men so as to enable him to hasten the completion of the two or three ironclads which he appeared to think it was so necessary for the country to have a year earlier than was originally intended. The work of the year was as disappointing as it had been in many previous years, and there had been few years when the amount of building had been more in arrear than it was this year, notwithstanding the additions that had been made to the number of men. The right hon. Gentleman could not be personally blamed for that shortcoming; but he trusted that he would use his great authority to concentrate the efforts of these additional men and of all the men in the dockyards in real fighting ships, and to prevent any large portion of their force being diverted from such ships to peace ships and those stationary ships on behalf of which demands were always so strongly pressed. He also trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would preserve Chatham and Pembroke as building yards, as opposed to repairing yards; because he had always found that when ships were sent to a dockyard to be repaired the regular building work of the yard was greatly interfered with, and often came to a complete standstill. He had now run through most of the topics to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred, and it was a satisfaction to many who sat on the Opposition side of the House that they were able to give the right hon. Gentleman their support with regard to the main proposals which he had made. He might say that the right hon. Gentleman's Estimates were a very outspoken epitaph upon many mistaken beliefs which had existed before; and he only hoped that our neighbours abroad and the whole service would be able to gather the true meaning and import of those Estimates, and to be able to read in them that two successive Governments, differing in political principles, were of opinion that the manning of the Navy was in a satisfactory state—that two successive Governments differing on many important questions were united in thinking that the squadrons maintained by this country abroad were adequate for the purpose for which they were established, and that the number of ships to be kept in commission need not be increased. He hoped they would also see that the charges of chaotic and disorganized administration in the Department were also unfounded, because, otherwise, some changes would have been proposed; and, above all, that they would see that, while the two parties in this country might differ among themselves on the point whether two ironclads should be built or repaired in one year or in two, and whether we should have a few stores more or less, they were agreed upon one vital point—namely, that about 20,000 tons of shipping was the amount that ought to be built annually, in order to repair the deficiency in our Navy, caused by the wear and tear of our ships, and that they would see that Parliament generally was united in being ready to vote the Estimates, large as they were, in full reliance on the discretion of the responsible Minister who thought it right to ask for them. He cordially hoped that with those £10,000,000, which the generosity of Parliament would place at the disposal of the right hon. Gentleman, he would be able to conduct the naval service of the country creditably and successfully; and he felt sure that no one who had a spark of public spirit would wish to see the authority of the Admiralty lowered for a moment by accusing that Department of administrative failure. The right hon. Gentleman and his Board had many points in their favour—they had started in an open sea, and they had a favouring breeze; those clouds had lifted which had overshadowed their predecessors, and had impeded their freedom of action; and they now set out on their voyage with the good wishes of all. He hoped that they would make the most of their favourable opportunity, and he could assure them that they could rely upon his supporting the authority of the Admiralty to the utmost of his power, because he knew the extreme difficulty there was in securing the smooth working of a system of combined civilian and professional administration presided over by a civilian. He cordially trusted that the right hon. Gentleman and his Board upon whom lay such heavy responsibilities, would, as long as they continued in power, be the strong, respected, and authoritative rulers of a contented service and of an efficient Navy.

SIR JOHN HAY remarked that it would have been gratifying if the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goschen) had been as anxious for the increase in the Navy during the years he was at its head as he was now. It would have appeared from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman as though the increase now proposed in the Navy was a mere continuation of that which had been going on for years. But he should wish to remind the Committee of what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman his Predecessor (Mr. Childers) in making his official statement on the 1st of August, 1870, on the occasion of the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian War. He had then stated that we had 28 sea-going ironclads and 12 special harbour defence ships, making a total of 40 in all, fit for going to sea, besides 8 ironclads which were building. At the present moment we had also 8 ironclads building; and, therefore, the ironclads building might be put aside as being equal. The right hon. Gentleman, the First Lord of the Admiralty, had, however, been obliged to tell the Committee that evening that we had at the present moment only 16 sea-going ironclads in addition to 3 in the first reserve, making a total of 19 ships fit for service as against the 28 referred to, as complete and ready five years ago, by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. As far as he could gather there were now only 9 special harbour defence ships as against 12 which existed on the 1st of August, 1870. Even if he were wrong in that supposition it was clear that the number of harbour defence ships as compared with that of the year to which he had alluded had not been increased. He understood his right hon. Friend to say that he proposed to repair 4 additional sea-going ships this year and an equal number next year; but even that rate of progress would only give 27 ships as against 28 we possessed in August, 1870. [Mr. HUNT said 26.] His right hon. Friend expressed dissent, and he now understood that instead of having but one, they would have two ships less than they had nearly five years ago. It could not, therefore, at all events, be said that his right hon. Friend was making undue efforts in that direction. He quite recognized the fact that, owing to commercial failures in 1866, a large number of men who were thrown out of employment were, rightly or wrongly, taken into the dockyards, and that they were taken in for a particular time and for a special purpose, and that that circumstance accounted for the number of ships in the year 1870—but the fact remained that that number had not been increased. He wished to know whether the Devastation was one of the ironclads ready for sea? Were the Bellerophon and Resistance included in the number? He was glad to hear that his right hon. Friend proposed to revise the condition of promotion in the Navy. The present position of affairs was most deplorable. They had all heard how much the service was injured by the present want of promotion. His right hon. Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had contrasted the dissatisfied state of the Marine with the satisfied condition of the Naval service; but he could state that, so far from such satisfaction existing, there never was a time when the officers of the Navy were so little pleased with the prospect before them. It would, he thought, be for the benefit of the service if his right hon. Friend had continued the "hauling down" vacancies, as that system afforded the only process by which young officers obtained promotion; and nothing could be worse than that promotion should be left to take place entirely by seniority. He had so frequently urged the doing away of the

Britannia and the establishment of a college on shore, that he was greatly pleased to find his right hon. Friend had it in contemplation to carry out that proposal. He looked with some regret to the additional number of cadets which had been entered—namely, 55, as against 41 added by his right hon. Friend's predecessor. The only way, in his opinion, to make the Navy content was to diminish the number of officers admitted to the profession, and 55 was a greater number than could be advantageously advanced; and on this point he would suggest that warrant officers might be increased with advantage, and employed in the discharge of duties which now devolved upon the cadets. Then as to the admission of boys, the fact that it was proposed to give each boy a kit worth £5—and the proposal he regarded as an excellent one—showed that the service was unpopular as compared with the estimation in which it was held 20 years ago, when every boy paid for his own kit and a sum of £2 as well for entrance, notwithstanding which payments, there was no lack of boys desirous of joining. It would be a great advantage if there were training-ships for the Mercantile Marine, as thereby boys would be fitted for the naval service if required. He was glad to find that the expenditure upon the Dockyards at Chatham and Portsmouth was coming to an end. It had been a most necessary expenditure, and in view of the fact that Germany had completed six docks for the reception of the ships of her Navy, three at Wilhelmshaven and three at Kiel, which were as complete as those at Chatham, and had arranged a Budget providing for the addition to her new-born Navy of 10 first-class ironclads and 60 cruising ships, it behoved the Admiralty to see that they did not fall behindhand. The arrangements made by his right hon. Friend seemed very satisfactory so far; but he hoped that next year there would be no arrears of shipbuilding such as those mentioned that night. 4,000 tons was a considerable amount of arrears, although it had been exceeded in previous years. When they were told some five or six years ago that at least 16,000 tons of ironclads ought to be added to the Navy in each year, and found that in two years only 4,000 tons had been added, he did not think his right hon. Friend was open to the taunt that had been levelled at him with reference to the considerable delay which had occurred.

MR. E. J. REED proposed to say a few words on the general question as to the state of our Navy in relation to the Navies of other Powers, for the purpose of deriving indications of the merits of our policy and of what that policy should be. With regard to unarmoured ships, the indications furnished by foreign Navies were of a most decided character, and he was glad to find that they had been fully recognized by Her Majesty's Government. Those indications were in the direction of great speed in unarmoured vessels. Last year the right hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just spoken protested in that House against the multiplication of small and slow vessels, foreseeing as he did what was now taking place—namely, the existence of many fast unarmoured vessels in foreign Navies. Yet, at the same time, this country had been inclining in an opposite direction, because, as they were told, one of the means which had hitherto existed for obtaining very high speed—namely, size—was to be set aside for reasons of supposed economy; though, in fact, they were reasons of extravagance. Only two vessels were building for speed. They were both to be built at Pembroke, and were to attain a speed of 16 knots. Foreign Governments were building vessels of a similar type, and only the other day he himself saw in Venice a vessel which, if the intentions of the designer were fulfilled, would go 18 knots an hour. That speed was to be produced when required by some peculiar device of which he did not know the secret. He doubted whether such a high speed would be attained as was anticipated; but it was quite possible there might be some superior genius at work in the matter, and it was worth our attention. He should be glad if the First Lord saw his way to advance a little faster one of the two vessels building at Pembroke. We had taken the lead in the production of purely coast-defence vessels with enormously thick armour. Whatever might be said about the sea-going qualities of the Devastation, there could be no doubt about her fighting powers. With regard to armour-clad vessels also, there were very notable indications derivable from the practice of Continental nations, and one of the most striking of these was the production of purely coast-defence ships with enormously thick armour. There was another class of vessel being very much built on the Continent, particularly by one Power—a class of very fast vessel, with a very limited amount of armour at the water line. He referred more especially to the two fast vessels being built by Russia, which were no doubt well known to the right hon. Gentleman opposite. We were building ships with a speed in excess of that of their predecessors, of the Shannon class, which might be regarded as a type of fast armoured vessels. There was another class of vessel, heavily armoured and armed, and thoroughly capable of going to sea. The Inflexible was a notable and admirable example of that type of ship. The Italians were building two such vessels, and France and other Powers were turning their attention to the same class. What he observed with great regret was, that this ship of the most modern sea-going type was precisely that ironclad of our Navy from which the work had been taken during the past year. The present Estimates showed that whereas the House was encouraged to believe, when last year's Estimates were moved, that there would be a very considerable advance of tonnage—in fact, it had been advanced only one-half of the expected amount. It was deplorable that the sort of services which fell with such constancy upon Portsmouth Dockyard should be performed at the expense of one great modern vessel. He was glad, however, that the right hon. Gentleman proposed to make up for that deficiency, as far as possible, by giving a great degree of advancement to that ship during the present year; and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman's intention would be fulfilled. The total deficiency upon the ironclad shipbuilding for the year in the Dockyards was 1,300 tons, and upon unarmoured vessels a total deficiency of 1,200 tons. With regard to the two armoured ships that were to be laid down, and of which the designs were not prepared, it was to be wished the Committee knew what sort of ships they were to be. The Admiralty was no doubt responsible; but that responsibility ought to be exercised in view of the House of Commons, and not in disregard of it. The dock question was of great importance. There had been launched this week at Pembroke the Dreadnought. From the Land's End to Liverpool there was not a dock capable of receiving either that ship or the Inflexible. He purposely left out the Bristol Docks on account of the navigation; but there ought to be a means of docking Her Majesty's vessels on the west coast. The House had adopted the policy that the Government ought to avoid making costly docks, but should encourage private enterprise. Now, docks were being constructed at Milford, and the privilege of using them was offered to the Government for a small amount. He regretted that the Government did not see their way to the acceptance of this proposal. If a better place than Milford could be found, he would not find fault; but it was impolitic to build ships 200 miles away, and to have no dock in case of war along the whole west coast into which Her Majesty's Ships could put. He observed that there were three "Chief Constructors" of the Navy. Now, the responsibility for the designing of ships was a very serious one, and the House was entitled to know on whom it ought to be placed. For himself, he certainly did not understand how anybody could be saddled with that responsibility if there were three Chiefs in the same office doing the same work. The falling off in the ironclad shipbuilding at Portsmouth had been attributed in part to the Arctic Expedition. But it was highly unsatisfactory that when money was voted for the Arctic Expedition, the ironclad shipbuilding should suffer at the same time. Then, again, a certain number of men were supposed to complete a certain amount of tonnage; but, although the men had been there, and the money voted, the work had not been done. He thought the Government were to be blamed for continuing to bring forward Estimates based on calculations which always proved to be wrong.

MR. GOURLEY regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had thought it necessary to ask for increased Estimates for the Navy, and would be glad to know where the men they were asked to vote that evening were stationed, or in what ships they were employed. It was his impression that a large number of men were employed merely at hide-and-seek—officials looking after officials, and other officials, again, looking after subordinates; and he suggested a great saving might be effected by contracting with private firms more extensively than was now done for the building of our ships. Then as to our Coastguard service, they were asked to spend about £500,000 upon it, though the great object of such a service had long since disappeared. Smuggling was rarely heard of in these days of low tariffs, and what little remained could easily be dealt with by the country police, the water police, and Customs' officers. Yet he saw that they were to spend £25,000 for coastguard houses. He thought, further, that we had a great deal too many Dockyards. We had 16 Dockyards abroad, many of which were obsolete; but all were kept up as in the days when we had a large wooden fleet. The ironclads only carried fuel for four and a-half days; and in case they had a war with America, how were those ships to reach that country? He would suggest the advisability of the Admiralty introducing a regular torpedo system at all the ports and instructing the men of the Naval Reserve in the use of the weapons. Further, he deprecated the construction of any additional ironclads of the type now in existence in the Navy, and urged that the fighting ships of the future would be small, swift vessels, armed with heavy guns.

COLONEL EGERTON LEIGH said, he knew nothing of naval matters and should not attempt to speak upon them. All he wished to urge was that, instead of relying upon the spasmodic action of charity for the provision of lifeboats round our coasts, they should be provided and maintained, where necessary, by the Government out of Imperial funds.

MR. SHAW - LEFEVRE said, that with regard to the provision of stores for the Navy and the Dockyards he was glad to find that the present authorities at the Admiralty were following the example of their predecessors, to whom they also, in the most candid manner, gave credit for having adopted a sound system. With regard to the sale of disused vessels to shipbreakers, he wished to know by whom the sale was negotiated—and why it was not effected either by public auction or by private tender, following upon public advertisement—the course adopted with advantageous results by the predecessors of the present authorities at the Admiralty. He had long been of opinion that large public Departments could not well discharge the duties of land-owners; and therefore he was glad to find that during the Recess a part of the Greenwich Hospital Estates had been sold for good prices. He should like to hear some explanation respecting the increase of the salaries of the master shipwrights in the Dockyards. He hoped the alteration of title would not affect their position in the Dockyards, and that the late divided authority of the principals would not be re-introduced by the present Government. He was pleased to hear that the Government proposed to abolish the Britannia training ship. Its abolition would have taken place two years ago if the late Board had not been occupied with the more important work of establishing a Naval College at Greenwich Hospital. The expense of the Britannia was out of proportion to any benefit connected with it. There were many places more preferable for a site than Dartmouth, if the Government had not finally decided upon it. As to the advantage of transferring cadets to a college on shore, he thought there would be little difference of opinion in the Committee. If he rightly understood the First Lord of the Admiralty, he had no intention of commencing the building of any new vessel by contract. The right hon. Gentleman stated last year that, out of 27 ironclads, 14 or 15 were unfit for service in consequence of their boilers being out of repair. [Mr. HUNT: The terms I used were "not effective for the service of the year in the proper sense."] Did the right hon. Gentleman mean that they could not go to sea at all? Some of the vessels of which the right hon. Gentleman spoke were actually included in the service of the year.

MR. HUNT explained that what he meant by "not effective in the proper sense" was that in case of war the ships in question could only perform a certain amount of work in an inefficient manner.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: A ship after four or five years' service was not quite so fit as at the commencement of her service. Apart from this, the right hon. Gentleman said four more were added to the list of vessels unfit for service during the past year. But the right hon. Gentleman must recollect that the late Board had provided for the repair of those four vessels. The late Board always admitted that the boilers of a number of ships required repair; and the only question was whether they should be repaired by a spasmodic effort, or whether the repairs should be spread over a number of years, and the arrangement made was that the repair of 12 vessels should be spread over three years. On the whole, he approved of the general policy outlined by the right hon. Gentleman, though he thought the number of men to be employed in the Dockyards was in excess of the normal amount required. The difference between the policy of the late and the present Board was so insignificant that it was not worth while to make any Party fight against it.

MR. SAMUDA said, he could not agree with the remark of his hon. Friend who had just sat down that the number of men in these Estimates ought to be taken as more than the normal number of men required. During each of the past 10 years, he believed, with one exception, the programme of the previous year had never been carried out. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen), when at the head of the Admiralty, stated that 20,000 tons of new shipping was the smallest quantity annually required to meet depreciation and maintain the efficiency previously acquired. But during the last 10 years 20,000 tons had rarely been proposed, and nothing approaching to it had been built in each year on the average. In the present programme, however, it was proposed to build 13,800 tons in the Dockyards and 9,000 tons in private establishments. Consequently, we should get more than the 20,000 tons which were admitted to be the minimum quantity required for the service of the Navy. He thought that more ships should be built in private yards—that would effect a saving in the outlay. He feared that the right hon. Gentleman would hardly be able to fulfil his programme with the number of men he asked for. With respect to the two ships which it was said had been laid down, it was clear, from the fact of only a few men being employed on them, that no progress had been made with them, and no particulars were given to the Committee respecting them. With regard to the designs for ships, the only way in which ships could, in his opinion, become formidable in action, was to have a large number of them almost of the same pattern. No doubt there was a necessity to have several types of ships in the Royal Navy; but, at the same time, he thought it desirable to have a large repetition of similar vessels of each type, and for cruising ships he preferred the class of the Alexandra to that of the Inflexible. His hon. Friend (Mr. Reed) said that the Inflexible was a sea-going ship of the future; he (Mr. Samuda) was of a different opinion; and with respect to the Alexandra, he considered her the finest ship in the service. He wished to impress upon the Admiralty to choose the best types of ships. Some reference had been made to foreign ships which had speed of 17 or 18 knots an hour; but he asserted that that had not been done. He did not at all regret the proposed expenditure on Chatham Dockyard; but it was intended to build only 3,000 tons there during the year, and if the interest on the costs of the extension were taken to represent £60,000 a-year it would be a charge of £20 on every ton of shipping built in the year. This was a serious increase in the cost of building our ships. When the Government, in their transactions with private builders, pressed competition to such an extent, they should recollect, from their own experience at Chatham, what great cost private builders' establishments involved, and if the Government accounts were so kept as to show the cost of corresponding expenses incurred in Dockyards for similar matters, the country would know better than at present how much advantage resulted from employing private enterprize, equally with Dockyards, in the annual additions to the Fleet.

CAPTAIN G. E. PRICE reminded the House that a Naval Power was growing up at our doors—a country determined to have good ships and which had good men to put into them. A struggle with such a Power would be no child's play. He wished particularly to know whether more small coast defence vessels could not be provided, especially gunboats, which exerted a great moral effect in time of war. The Russian gunboats during the last war well protected their shores, while we were now very deficient in this class of vessel, which in the absence of our Fleet, or in case of its defeat, would be very useful. There ought to be at least 100 of them armed with the heaviest guns. Due weight had not been given to the subject of torpedo vessels, and it was the fact that Germany had built or was building a considerable number of these vessels. With regard to the loading of heavy guns, he had heard that was to be done by means of hydraulic pressure, the muzzle of the gun being depressed. Great care in that case would have to be taken lest, while being loaded, the gun should go off and blow the ship to pieces. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Samuda) had stated that 3 per cent would be saved if ships were built by contract in private yards. In his opinion, a very much larger profit than 3 per cent was made by private shipbuilders, and that profit would be saved by building our ships in Her Majesty's Dockyards.

MR. GORST, in reference to Chatham Dockyard, explained that the new works there were not yet available for shipbuilding. A great portion of the extension work was still incomplete, and the part completed was entirely destitute of the machinery and plant necessary for the building of ships. It was now made use of only for the breaking up of old ships. Before the works at Chatham would be available for shipbuilding it would be necessary to make a much larger outlay upon them.

MR. MACGREGOR said, he hoped the First Lord would not take all the advice that had been given him. He had been advised to make a great reduction in the Coastguard service. He (Mr. Macgregor) hoped this would not be done, because if smuggling had been to a great extent abolished, it was due to the efficiency of the Coastguard, who were also extremely useful in cases of shipwreck. He trusted, further, that the right hon. Gentleman would not put torpedoes into the hands of all the Coastguard, and allow them to experiment in all the harbours of the country. The consequences of doing so might be very serious. The suggestion put him in mind of a gentleman of his acquaintance who told him he had discovered a new method of extinguishing fires on shipboard, and asked him for the loan of one of his steamers to experiment upon. He did not feel inclined to agree to this, and in the same way he thought the country would not like to lend the harbours for these torpedo experiments.

MR. BENTINCK confessed to a feeling of disappointment. His opinion agreed with that expressed by others, that this year's Estimates were precisely the same as those of the late Government. That was not satisfactory. He did not think that the Estimates came up to the requirements of the country. We not only required more ships, but we ought to overhaul those which we had. Were a war to arise we should be placed in a position of great difficulty, because we should not have enough of ships, and before we could build as many as we wanted we might be taken at a very great disadvantage. He regretted that it was intended to do away with the Britannia, as he thought that boys being trained for the Navy learnt more in six months on board ship than in 12 months on shore. He agreed with the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Samuda) that we wanted two types of ships; but he should like to know whether we had yet arrived at the right type of ship. As to coasting vessels we were extremely ill-found. Our Army was being re-organized—in other words, it was in a state of disorganization; therefore, a double responsibility rested on his right hon. Friend to look well to the efficiency of the Navy, to whose care the honour, the safety, and welfare of the country were specially intrusted.

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, he had every reason to be satisfied with the way in which his statement had been received generally by the House. It appeared that he had done what his predecessors would have done had they remained in office, with the exception that he had sold ships by private treaty when they would have sold them by public auction and would not have realized so good a price. There was no mystery about it. The gentleman came to him personally and said he could make a good offer if insured a number of ships sufficient to make the business continuous to employ a number of men for a long time. After consultation with the Controller's Department, he was encouraged to send in a formal proposition; it was referred to the Director of Contracts, who communicated with the Controller's Department, and after a good deal of negotiation with Mr. Castle, an arrangement was concluded, the terms of which he believed would be considered quite satisfactory. In reply to the hon. Member for Pembroke, he had to say that the "chiefest" of the constructors was the Director of Naval Construction; he used to be called the Chief Naval Architect. No definite decision had been come to with regard to storekeepers; he could not say the abolition of them had been a success. At all events, not in the larger yards; but the question was in abeyance, and he had not any immediate intention of making a change. The duties of the engineer had been more clearly defined. He was subordinate to the Chief Constructor as regards questions of construction generally, but was the highest authority with regard to engineering matters. The despatch vessels were not to be armoured; but they were to be armed; armour was incompatible with their speed. It had been necessary to increase the number of cadets to make up for the discontinuance of a separate navigating class. He had no intention to reduce the Coastguard. Thanking the House for the way in which it had received his statement, he trusted that he should be allowed to take the Vote for the money as well as the Vote for the Men, as there might be no other opportunity of getting the money Vote before the end of the financial year.

EPPING FOREST (re-committed) BILL.
(Lord Henry Lennox, Mr. William Henry Smith.)
[BILL 52.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

COLONEL MAKINS said, that the Bill in its former state contained no provision to prevent waste or demolition of property by unauthorized persons, but the Select Committee had inserted what he wished to see in the Bill; and that being so, he should beg leave to withdraw the clause for the purpose, of which he had given Notice.

MR. RITCHIE said, there was another improvement in the Bill, and that was the substitution of one year for two for the duration of the powers of the Commission. His constituents felt that the noble Lord (Lord Henry Lennox) had consulted the wishes of those who took an interest in the preservation of the Forest.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, he was glad the clause introduced by the hon. and gallant Member opposite had been withdrawn, and thought that the complaints as to lopping had been exaggerated. He was glad also that the suit in the Rolls Court had ended as it did, as the landowners would otherwise have converted the whole Forest into private property.

Bill considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 12th March, 1875.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Superannuation Act (1859) Amendment * (37); Agricultural Holdings (England) (39).

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS (ENGLAND).

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND, on rising to call attention to the law relating to Agricultural Holdings in England, and to present a Bill on that subject, said: My Lords, probably some of your Lordships may have remarked by the Notice Paper circulated this morning that an alteration has been made in the precise terms of the subject which I shall have the honour to bring before you, and that, instead of dealing with the law relating to agricultural holdings generally, the Bill which I shall lay on the Table of the House will apply only to the law relating to agricultural holdings in England. This is not because I wish to evade dealing with the matter as it regards agricultural holdings in Scotland; but there is a difference in the circumstances and laws which prevail in the two countries respectively, and for this reason, while it would not perhaps be quite impossible, it certainly would be very difficult to combine the cases of the two countries in one and the same Bill. While in Scotland, for instance, the lease will only pass to the hereditary descendant of the lessee, in England a lessee's interest will pass to his executors, administrators, or assigns. In Scotland no one can assign a lease without the consent of the lessor; but suppose a lease there is granted for 19 years, at the expiration of that term, unless notice is given to the tenant, he continues on the same terms by what is termed tacit relocation, until a fresh arrangement is made. Your Lordships will, therefore, understand why we have thought it more advisable not to attempt to legislate for England and Scotland in the same Bill; but I purpose to present before long a Bill to do for Scotland what this measure will do for England, and, as far as possible, to assimilate the laws of the two countries in respect of agricultural holdings. I may, however, observe that what I have to say on this occasion will apply equally well to Scotland as to England. And here, my Lords, I would observe that there is a topic intimately connected with the one on which I am about to address you—I mean the power of limited owners and ecclesiastical corporations and incumbents in respect of the making of leases; but the Acts of Parliament relating to this branch of the subject are so various, and the details connected with it so numerous, that we have found it impossible to master them sufficiently to enable us to include this portion of the subject in the Bill which I shall this evening lay on the Table; but we do purpose, by a separate Bill, to give power to limited owners, ecclesiastical corporations, and incumbents to grant leases, in order that their tenants may be put in the same position as that held by the tenants of other owners. My Lords, I am sure I need not apologize for bringing this subject under your Lordships' consideration. It is in the highest degree important, because it has a very close connection with the production of food for the consuming millions of this country. It has a great importance and interest for your Lordships and all other landowners; it is obvious that it has not less importance and interest for those who cultivate the soil, and all with whom landowners are brought into intimate relations; and if it is important and interesting to those two classes, it is not of less moment to the community at large, who, as consumers, must be exceedingly desirous that the producing power of the agricultural districts of the country should be brought to such a pitch that it will go as close as it can possibly be made to go towards meeting the requirements of the country. My

Lords, this is not a new subject. It is one which has long occupied much attention out-of-doors. At almost every agricultural meeting held for some time past it has been the theme of discussion—and not recently for the first time—because some years ago it was the topic of speeches and inquiries. I am not going to weary your Lordships by taking you very far back; but I think it will be necessary to ask you to bear with me while I refer you to something which occurred in 1848, when the subject was brought more particularly and distinctly under the notice of the other House of Parliament by a Gentleman as competent to give an opinion on it as any one who could have been named—Mr. Philip Pusey, the Member for Berkshire, and Chairman of the General Committee of the Royal Agricultural Society. He endeavoured to deal with the subject in the manner he thought best; and in doing so he was assisted by the late Mr. Evelyn Denison, the Member for Nottinghamshire, a practical agriculturalist of great knowledge and experience. On the Motion of Mr. Pusey, a Select Committee was appointed—

“To inquire into the law and custom of different parts of England and Wales as between outgoing and incoming tenants, and also as between landlord and tenant, in reference to unexhausted improvements or deterioration of land and premises occupied for agricultural purposes.”

When I read the names of the Gentlemen who served on that Committee, which was presided over by Mr. Pusey himself, I am sure your Lordships will be of opinion that a better selection could not have been made, comprising, as the Committee did, men of all shades of political opinion, who came from all the various parts of the Kingdom, and who possessed a personal knowledge of the subject which they were called upon to consider. My Lords, on that Committee were Mr. Pusey, Mr. Newdegate, Mr. Stafford, Mr. Evelyn Denison, Mr. Egerton Tatton, the Earl of Arundel and Surrey, Mr. Henley, Mr. Bouverie, Sir Charles Lemon, Mr. Moody, Mr. Sotherton, Mr. Colville, Mr. Burroughes, Sir John Trollope, and Mr. Hayter. My Lords, that Committee sat for three months and examined something like 52 witnesses; and the general tenour of the evidence of those witnesses was to show that what was the complaint then is the complaint now. The complaint is, that there is insecurity to the tenant for the capital he has invested in the soil, which insecurity prevents the tenant from investing as large an amount for agricultural purposes as he otherwise would, and which therefore results in the producing power of the country not being brought up to the pitch to which it might be raised if the tenant had security for that capital. So much was the want felt in what is called "high farming," that it became necessary where this description of farming was desired, to provide some security for the capital invested in the soil by the tenant; and consequently "customs" grew up. And, my Lords, no doubt, custom is important in considering this case and in arriving at a conclusion as to what we ought to do. It is not my intention to go through the list of all the customs that exist in this country with reference to these matters. To do so, even if my lungs did not fail me in the task, would occupy a longer time than I should venture to trespass on your Lordships, and than, probably, your Lordships would be inclined to grant me; but it may be taken generally that, in respect of compensation, customs attach to the preparation of the soil for crops by tillage, to the hay and straw and dung left on the farm, and to growing underwood. In some places the customs are very good. In Lincolnshire the custom is about as good a custom as any one would wish to live under. I have had the Lincolnshire custom before me in preparing the Bill, and I should have liked to embody it in the measure, but I found it impossible to do so, as it would have made it in some respects imperfect. In the part of the county in which I live the customs are rather loose; but in the north-east part of the county, towards Surrey and Kent, they are extremely onerous on the incoming tenant, putting him in pecuniary difficulties at a time when he wants as large a command of capital as possible. On one occasion a friend of mine took a farm in that part of the county and found himself charged, according to custom, with 19 harrowings for one field. He went to his lawyer, but was told that there was no other course for him but to pay it. I was told of another case, in which an incoming tenant was charged

£200 for a remarkably bad field of turnips. Your Lordships, at a later period, will see how by this Bill we propose to get rid of bad customs; but I may at once indicate it, by saying that a man will not be able to claim both under custom and under this Bill. Before the Committee of the House of Commons it was stated that, in many cases, customs led to fraud by the outgoing tenant taking up manuring before giving up his holding. The first paragraph in the Report sets out:—

"That different usages have long prevailed in different counties and districts of the country, conferring a claim to remuneration on an outgoing agricultural tenant for various operations of husbandry, the ordinary return of which he is precluded from receiving by the termination of his tenancy. That this claim, which is called 'Tenant-Right,' ordinarily extends to one or more of the following objects:—To the crop which the outgoing tenant has sown and leaves in the ground; to remuneration for the preparation of the soil for crops by tillage, for the straw, hay, and dung left on the farm, and for growing underwood. That these local usages are imported into leases or agreements for the letting and occupation of land between landlord and tenant, who are presumed to contract with reference to such usages, unless the terms of the agreement, expressly or by implication, negative such a presumption. That in some parts of the country a modern usage has sprung up, which confers a right on the outgoing tenant to be reimbursed certain expenses incurred by him in cultivation other than those of the ordinary husbandry, above referred to. That among such expenses are included, the purchase of food for stock, the purchase of certain kinds of manure, and the draining, chalking, and marling of the soil; the result of all which outlays is to effect an improvement of the soil, more or less lasting, and requiring more or less time to elapse before the increased productiveness thereby obtained, re-imburse the expenditure incurred. That, except in the districts where this usage prevails, unless by express stipulation, the outgoing tenant cannot claim compensation for any of these improvements, however short may be the time between their completion and the termination of his occupancy."

I think, my Lords, that is a state of things which does require a remedy; because it amounts to this, that as the law now stands—in many places there being no custom—the tenant may put his capital in the soil, and so increase the value of the soil, the benefit of which is unexhausted at the termination of his tenancy, and yet reap no benefit whatever from the investment of his money, but the whole goes into the pocket of his landlord. I think that is a state of matters which is not at all satisfactory, and that the Committee were perfectly right in the opinion stated by them at the close of the passage which I have just quoted from their Report. In another part of their Report the Committee, after referring to certain customs of compensation, state—

“That this wider system of compensation to the outgoing tenant seems to be highly beneficial to agriculture, to the landlord, and to the farmer; to lead to a great increase in the productiveness of the soil and to extended employment of the rural population. That the benefit arising from this system appears to be gradually becoming more extensively known and appreciated, and the system itself seems to be finding its way into other districts than those where it has hitherto been in force. That the improvements above-mentioned, which are very generally required throughout the country in order to develop the full powers of the soil, are greatly promoted by this system of compensation, and therefore it is highly important that all difficulties should be removed which stand in the way of its extension by the voluntary act of landlord and tenants. That any attempt to make its general introduction compulsory would be met by great practical difficulties, and your Committee rely for the general and successful adoption of the system on mutual arrangements between landlords and tenants. That it seems very desirable to your Committee that estates under settlement should be endowed with every practicable privilege for their advantage which is attached to absolute property, and that persons having limited estates, in addition to the ordinary leasing powers generally conferred on them, should be enabled, under proper precautions, to enter into stipulations of the nature of those above referred to, which at present it appears they cannot do. That the power to enter into such stipulations, binding on subsequent interests, might be advantageously made a general incident to leasing powers of land in settlement, by the aid of Parliament; and also be conferred on persons having certain limited interests in land.”

Your Lordships will perceive that the Committee did not recommend at that time that there should be any compulsory legislation on the subject. They proposed to leave it to such general agreement as might be come to between the landlord and the tenant. They point out the great difficulty existing as to settled estates, in the case of which limited owners have no power to charge the estate with compensation. They may agree with the tenant to pay him money for improvements; but if the limited owner should die before the compensation comes to be paid, the charge is merely one on his personal estate, which of course makes the security much less than it would be if the compensation were a charge on the estate. Among the witnesses examined by the Committee was Mr. Wren Hoskyns, and certain opinions given by him are worthy of your Lordships' attention. In the notes of his examination in this passage—

“To take another case: if a landlord in Leicestershire signed an agreement to give five years' compensation for lime, the custom of the country being only for one year, would he be safe as to his personal representative after his decease in so enlarging the existing custom?—I think that it would not charge the estate; the claim would be against his personal representatives. So that if the landlord, desirous of improving his property, were to sign those agreements to a large extent, and the property were to descend to the minor, a distant relative, the guardians of that minor would, in your opinion, not be justified in paying that compensation to the tenants out of the income of the minor?—I think not, as claimed of right. Therefore their legal course would be to throw the claim upon the legatees of the deceased landlord?—Upon the personal representatives. The personal representatives of the deceased landlord?—Yes.”

My Lords, I doubt whether any one in this House will say that is a condition of things that ought to be allowed to continue longer. I think public opinion has been sufficiently roused and that Parliament is now competent to deal with it. After 25 years of agitation this matter has been amply digested, and the feeling now is in favour of legislation. No doubt the subject is a difficult one; but at the same time when we look to the increase of the population of the country, it will be seen that it is necessary to do something. According to the Census Returns in 1851 the population of England and Wales was then 18,054,170; in 1871 it was 22,712,266, showing an increase of 4,658,096 between the two periods. At the former period of 37,324,915 acres of land, 24,905,758 were cultivated. Of course, the total acreage was about the same in 1871, but the cultivated portion was 26,322,477, showing an increase of only about 1,000,000 acres. So that the increase of the population has gone on much faster than the increase in the acreage of cultivated land. My Lords, under these circumstances the Government have thought that a measure should be brought in to secure to the tenant the capital he has invested in the soil. I myself am much in favour of leases. Though I know that is not the common feeling South of the Tweed, I propose in this Bill to deal with yearly tenancies and also with leases. Of course, it is open to any owner of land to grant leases or not as he may think fit, but I am in favour of granting leases. I think that where you give a lease you are almost certain of a good tenant, and any one who has got a good tenant will not want to get rid of him. It is a great mistake to suppose that a landlord wants to change his tenant if he is a good tenant. I never in my experience knew an instance in which the landlord did not lose money by a change of tenant. Therefore on a selfish ground, if not on any higher principle, I like leases. My view is that where a lease is granted there is security—to the holder for his improvements—that is for his unexhausted improvements—and in my view it is a satisfactory arrangement between landlord and tenants. I have heard it stated that leases are objectionable, and especially leases which are put up to auction. Well, I think putting them up to auction is objectionable, for though you get the highest bidder you may probably get the worse farmer. The highest bidder is, perhaps, a man who does not look very far ahead—all he would want would be to get upon your farm, and he would chance whether he would have a good or bad time. I repeat that, to my idea, the best arrangement for both parties is a lease on fair terms; and I believe that if this were offered tenants would accept it in 99 cases out of 100. No doubt the general rule of English tenancies is a holding from year to year, with six months notice to terminate the tenancy. Tenancies at will are seldom found to exist now in respect of land. They are tenancies in which either party gives the other 24 hours' notice; that being the difference between tenancies from year to year and tenancies at will. My Lords, the principle of the Bill which I intend to lay before your Lordships is that where the tenant on his holding makes improvements of a certain kind, which I shall specify, he shall be entitled to compensation in the manner which I will describe to your Lordships. I am very unwilling to enter too much into details; but I am afraid I must do so, my object being that before I sit down your Lordships should understand everything in the Bill. I propose that the improvements shall be divided into three classes—

FIRST CLASS.

Drainage of land. Erection or enlargement of buildings. Making of gardens. Making or improving of roads or bridges. Making or improving of watercourses, ponds, wells, or reservoirs.	Making or protecting of fences. Planting of orchards. Reclamation of waste land. Warping of land.
---	--

Boning of pasture land with undissolved bones. Chalking of land. Clay-burning.	Claying of land. Liming of land. Marling of land. Planting of hops.
--	--

THIRD CLASS.

Application to land of purchased artificial or other manure.	Consumption by cattle, sheep, or pigs of corn, cake, or other feeding stuff.

My Lords, for so much of those improvements the tenant shall be entitled to compensation under the Act and subject to its conditions on the termination of his tenancy by reason of effluxion of time or for any other cause—that is for so much of them as is unexhausted. I propose that as regards the first class no claim is to be allowed unless the improvement has been made within 20 years before termination of tenancy, and with the previous consent in writing of landlord. As regards the second class, no claim to be good unless the improvement has been made within seven years; and as regards the third class, no claim to be good unless it has been made within two years. There is to be some check to prevent unfair outlay on artificial manure towards the end of the tenancy. Your Lordships will observe that the second and third classes of improvement may be made without the consent of the landlord in writing—such consent is required only in the case of the first class. I propose that the tenant should be compensated in this way. The amount of compensation to be a capital sum representing the unexhausted addition—as at the termination of the tenancy—made by the improvement to the letting value of the holding. The amount of the tenant's compensation shall be subject to the following deductions:—(1.) For taxes, rates, and tithe-rentcharge due or becoming due in respect of the holding to which the tenant is liable as between him and the landlord: (2.) For rent due or becoming due in respect of the holding: (3.) For the landlord's compensation under this Act in respect of waste. And in the ascertainment of the amount, there shall be taken into account in reduction thereof any benefit which the landlord has given or allowed to the tenant in consideration of the improvement. On the other hand, when a tenant commits waste, diminishing the letting value of the holding, the landlord will be entitled to receive, on the determination of the tenancy, compensation in respect of the "waste," and I propose that the following acts and things shall be deemed waste diminishing the letting value of the holding:—Breaking up of old grass without the written consent of the landlord; causing or permitting of land to be foul or neglected; damage to plantations, coppices, or timber included in the holding; loss of manure by hay, straw, roots, or green crops removed off the holding without the written consent of the landlord; loss of manure not returned to the holding in lieu of produce sold off subject to the manure being brought back; mowing of meadows, other than water-meadows, without manuring; mowing of old pasture; neglect of drains, outfalls, or water-courses; neglect of gates or fences; neglect of ordinary repairs of buildings for which the tenant is liable; neglect of roads; over-cropping by the taking of too many successive white-straw crops; over-cropping without manuring; but nothing in the Act shall prevent any act or thing not specified in this section from being deemed waste diminishing the letting value of the holding. All these things are to be regarded as "waste," and are to be matters of set-off on the part of the landlord as against the tenant's claim for compensation; and the amount is to be a capital sum representing so much of the diminution of the letting value as continues at the termination of the tenancy. Now, my Lords, as to procedure. This is the mode in which I propose that the arrangements between landlord and tenant are to be carried out under this Bill. Notices of claims are to be given by tenant or landlord to the other of them three months before the end of the tenancy. The landlord and tenant may agree on the amount and mode and time of payment of the compensation. Of course, if both parties agree, there is an end of the matter. In case they do not so agree, the difference is to be settled by a reference. Both parties may agree to appoint a single referee. If they cannot agree upon such a referee, each appoints a referee, and the referees appoint an umpire. If they cannot agree, I propose to give the selection of the umpire to the Judge of the County Court. In such cases I think he would be a very competent person to make the selection. The amount agreed to or awarded, as the case may be, will be recoverable by summary process. I propose that there should be an appeal in cases where the amount of compensation is £100 or over; but that there should be no appeal where the sum awarded is less than £100. One must fix some limit, or otherwise there would be vexatious claims which would put the parties to considerable inconvenience. You want to give the tenant security for the compensation to which he is entitled. I propose, therefore, that a landlord, on paying compensation to a tenant, may apply to the County Court for a charge on the holding in respect of the amount so paid.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX: To what tribunal is the appeal, where an appeal is given?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: To the County Court Judge. If the owner is an absolute owner, of course he can charge the property for any time he pleases; but in case of limited owners, where the Court is satisfied that compensation has been properly paid in respect of something that will add to the letting value of the farm, I propose that he may make the amount so paid a charge on the estate for 20, seven, or two years from the time the improvement was executed, according to the class of the improvement. These terms are proposed, because in the case of improvements of the first class, the claim for compensation must be made within 20 years from the time of the execution of the improvement; in the case of the second class, it must be made within seven years; and in the case of the third class within two years; or, in other words, the improvements, according to their respective classes, must have been made within those limits of years previously to the termination of the tenancy. The instalments payable out of the estate in discharge of the compensation shall be charged in favour of the landlord, his executors, administrators, and assigns; and, my Lords, for the purposes of this Bill, the title "landlords" is to mean the person entitled to possession of land subject to a contract of tenancy, or entitled to receipt of rent reserved by a contract of tenancy. It follows, therefore, that the limited owner is brought within the four corners of this Bill, and that any compensation which he shall have to pay the tenant will be legally chargeable on the land. With regard to leasing power to limited owners, that, as I have already intimated to your Lordships, will form the subject of another Bill. As to notices to quit, under the present system, in the case of yearly tenancies, the notice is half-a-year. I propose that in future that the notice shall be increased by half-a-year—that is, that there shall be a year's notice to quit in the case of a farm. The Bill contains a provision with respect to the taking of land for cottages and gardens; but with the details of this I need not trouble your Lordships. Existing leases are excluded from the operation of the Bill; but as it is perfectly clear that some machinery is necessary in order to bring it into operation as regards yearly tenancies—for otherwise that provision would be a dead letter—I propose that the Act should come into operation within three months from January, 1876; and unless within two months of that time either party—the landlord or the tenant—intimates that he does not intend to come under the Act, it will come in force as regards all yearly holdings. There is one other point. We do not propose to interfere with freedom of contract. I think your Lordships will see the force of this. If the Bill is wanted at all, it certainly is not wanted for small men, because they have no capital wherewith to make improvements on the land—they have nothing to put in the soil. But we are told that there are men of means and intelligence who desire to put capital in the soil for the purpose of increasing its productive powers, and my knowledge of that class of farmers certainly leads me to believe that, as a rule, they are perfectly competent to enter into agreements with their landlords if they are assured compensation for unexhausted improvements. For that reason I should be one of the last to interfere with freedom of contract. On the contrary, I think it should be maintained; and hence it will not be affected by this Bill. My Lords, I am not vain enough to think that this Bill will satisfy every one; but I think it ought to satisfy every moderate and reasonable man; for while, on the one hand, it gives to the tenant that protection to which he is entitled, on the other hand it does not invade those rights of the landlord which in this country have always been held sacred. My Lords, I beg to move that the Bill be read a first time.

EARL GRANVILLE: When does the noble Duke propose to take the second reading?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: As to that, I am quite in the hands of your Lordships. My object is not to press the Bill on unduly, and of course I should not think of moving the second reading till after Easter.

LORD REDESDALE: As to the power of appeal, why should you limit it to cases in which the compensation will be £100 or over, and in which the tenant holds, perhaps, 500 acres? Why should not the tenant with 20 acres have an appeal?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: Because the man with 20 acres would never lay out a shilling that would entitle him to compensation.

LORD REDESDALE: But he might; and suppose he did? I think the noble Duke ought to reconsider that point.

LUNATIC PAUPERS (ENGLAND)— GRANTS IN AID.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN MILNE HOME asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he contemplates extending to England the same relief granted for the maintenance of lunatic paupers in lunatic wards of workhouses, as has been recently promised for similar cases in Scotland?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that it was not quite correct to speak of a provision having been "promised for similar cases in Scotland." There was no similarity between the cases in the two countries. In Scotland the cases were under the direct control of the Commissioners of Lunacy, which was not the case in England. He could not, therefore, undertake to extend the same regulations to the two countries.

EARLY CLOSING ACT, 1864— TEMPERANCE HOTELS.

QUESTION.

MR. WILSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of George Calvert, Temperance Hotel, Gainsborough, who was recently fined £2 and costs for keeping his house open for the sale of coffee after public-houses were closed; and, whether, if such a fine be legal, any alteration will be proposed in the Law?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the case referred to. The house was one which, if it had been in London, under the old Early Closing Act of 1864, would have been compelled to close at 1 o'clock, and it therefore now came under the general law of the country in reference to houses in which drink might be consumed, though not sold. He had no present intention to alter the law, which had on the whole worked beneficially.

CRIMINAL LAW—PICKING STICKS.

QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to a decision alleged to have been given at St. Martin's, Stamford, Petty Sessions, by which a number of indigent women were sentenced to a fine of 30s. each, with the alternative of a month's imprisonment, with hard labour, for gathering sticks in Cliffe Forest, the damage amounting to 6d.; and, if he has seen cause for interference to prevent the carrying out of the sentence?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that his attention had been called to the matter by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Rodwell), and upon making inquiries he found that nine women, some of them old offenders, were not taken up for gathering sticks, but practically for breaking down the underwood and selling it. He considered that the justices were quite right in the principle of their decision, for it was quite necessary to put a stop to such a practice; but, at the same time, in his opinion, the punishment inflicted was decidedly too severe, and therefore he had ordered the greater portion of the penalty to be remitted, and the persons to be discharged from custody.

NAVY—PAY OF ENGINEER OFFICERS

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the condition of the Engineer Officers of the Royal Navy, particularly as regards pay, promotion, and retirement, has been considered by the Admiralty; and, whether any and what measures it is proposed to adopt for improving their condition?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, the condition of the engineer officers of the Royal Navy was under consideration; but he was unable at present to say what determination would be arrived at.

ARMY—DIPHTHERIA AT WOOLWICH.

QUESTION.

MR. SHERRIFF asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been directed to an article in "The Daily News" of the 11th instant, entitled "The Diphtheria Hospital on Woolwich Common;" and, whether the allegations made in such article are substantially correct; and, if so, what action is intended to be taken in the matter?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Mr. Speaker, the Question which the hon. Member has put to me would be repeated, I see, on Monday, with some more particulars, I think, and I have therefore endeavoured to obtain the information sought by the hon. Member, and also by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) at the earliest possible opportunity. The first outbreak of diphtheria at Woolwich began in November, and it was not apparently confined merely to those cottages, but existed even in others in quite another part of the town in a very bad form. I think there were some 8 or 10 cases in Woolwich town itself, nearly all of which were fatal; in those cottages there were, I think, 35 cases, of which only 15 were fatal, so that the proportion was larger in the town than in the country. In the Cambridge cottages there was only one case; but they are very much improved buildings, not on the same common, and some considerable distance from those now in question. These cottages appear to have been built about the beginning of the century, without any due regard to the drainage or to the effect of the proper construction of such buildings. When the first outbreak took place, I directed the Army Sanitary Commission to make inquiries about these cottages, and they recommended a certain number of remedial alterations, such as throwing two rooms into one, draining, cementing the walls, and other things of that sort. Those operations do not appear to have been sufficient to stop the progress of this very severe disease. In consequence of diphtheria having recently broken out again within the last few days, and there being several cases, and in consequence also of my attention having been called to the article in question, I made further inquiries, and directed that the Sanitary Commissioners should again go to Woolwich and personally examine these cottages. They have been there this morning, and their Report is certainly not at all favourable. One of the Commissioners, whom I have seen, says that the article is, to a certain extent, exaggerated in the description, but that these cottages are, no doubt, most unsatisfactory; and, on the whole, they do not recommend that any further progress should be made with those remedial works at first proposed. I intend, therefore, as early as possible—certainly within a week—to remove the brigade depôts of the 49th and 50th from Woolwich to Warley. These latter barracks were meant for the training of the Militia; but in a pressure of this kind, it is better to find room in them for these unfortunate families which have suffered so much distress. I propose, therefore, to remove them to Warley till the barracks are built at Hounslow, and we shall so get accommodation for the whole of these families. Part of these barracks is already occupied by soldiers. I believe the construction of them is very good, and apartments will be at once properly prepared for these families. It will probably be done within a week, and it shall certainly be done as quickly as possible, because the time has come when some very strong measures should be taken to remove these poor people. I may add that they would have been removed to Woolwich, but the disease existed in the town itself, and the dread of it made it impossible to obtain lodgings to which they could be removed with any advantage to themselves.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL—THE LIABILITY CLAUSE.

QUESTION.

LORD ESLINGTON asked the President of the Board of Trade, now that the Easter Recess will intervene before the Second Reading of the Merchant Shipping Bill, if he will inform the House whether the Government have any intention of modifying Clause 41 (the Liability Clause) of that Bill?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, the Government intend to modify Clause 41 of the Merchant Shipping Bill referred to by the noble Lord as the Liability Clause. They propose to substitute for the provision extending the unlimited liability of a shipowner, a provision preventing a shipowner from contracting himself out of his existing liability for damage caused by unseaworthiness.

ARMY—MILITIA ADJUTANTS.

QUESTION.

MR. MUNTZ asked the Secretary of State for War, supposing the Adjutants of Militia did not take the retiring allowance before the 1st July. What retiring allowance, if any, will be granted to them?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that the time which was proposed, and which was to be limited, was to give an opportunity for adjutants of Militia to choose whether they would accept the retiring allowance offered them, and go or remain, subject to the retiring allowances that existed at present, and subject also to the new conditions to be imposed on them under the new Brigade Dépôt system.

FREE LIBRARIES.—QUESTION.

MR. WHEELHOUSE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he can and will make arrangements to have the Public Free Library at Leeds included in the list, if any, of institutions to which the following, or any similar works, are sent gratuitously; the Books and Papers periodically issued by or in connection with the Trigonometrical Survey of Great Britain and Ireland; Commercial Reports from Secretaries of Embassies Abroad; Reports and Tables issued by the Board of Trade; the Census Returns for 1871; and, any Blue Books or Minutes of Evidence issued by Parliament, of which there may be spare copies, otherwise useless?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, there were no free libraries or other institutions to which Parliamentary publications were forwarded gratuitously, nor was he prepared to recommend the adoption of such a system. Those documents were published at a price which little more than covered the cost of the paper on which they were printed, and it was perfectly open to any gentleman who took an interest in institutions similar to the Free Library at Leeds, referred to by the hon. Member for the borough, to select and forward to them such Parliamentary Papers as he thought they needed.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE — THE PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I wish to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury with respect to a statement which he made last night relative to some important Public Business, and as to which some misapprehension seems to exist. I wish to ask, Whether, in the event—possibly not very probable—of the Second Reading of the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill being taken on Monday week, it is his intention to propose that the House should meet on the following Thursday; and, if so, what business will be taken on that day?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I understand the noble Lord to assume that the second reading of the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill may take place on Monday, and in that case he wishes to know what business we contemplate taking on Thursday.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Yes.

MR. DISRAELI: Then we may have the Friendly Societies Bill.

CONSOLIDATION OF THE STATUTES.

RESOLUTIONS.

MR. RATHBONE, in rising to call the attention of the House to the inconvenience resulting from the existence, in many cases, of numerous and undigested Acts relating to the same subjects, and to the expediency of making better provision for the consolidation from time to time of such Acts, and to move the following Resolutions:—

"(1) That it is expedient that when any new Act is passed amending or incorporating any former Acts (other than General Clauses Acts) the new Act and the former Acts should be printed for the House so soon as may be, in such form as to show what parts of the said Acts respectively are in force: (2.) That it is expedient that when any new Act is passed materially amending any former Acts relating wholly or partly to the same subject-matter, a Bill should be introduced by Her Majesty's Government in the next Session of Parliament, or so soon after as conveniently may be, for consolidating into one Act so much of the said several Acts respectively as relates to the same subject-matter: (3.) That it is expedient that when a Consolidation Bill is introduced into this House it should be referred to a Select Committee, who shall report how far the Bill differs in effect from the Acts or parts of Acts proposed to be consolidated, and that no amendment should be allowed to be offered upon any part of the Bill which, according to the report of the Select Committee, does not differ as aforesaid, except such amend-

said, although it was true that a Committee had been appointed that week to consider the subject, they had so often been disappointed by the results of Committees instructed to consider schemes for the improvement of the mode of conducting the Business of the House, which had now largely outgrown its forms, that he had felt it his duty to submit the Resolutions of which he had given Notice, and by which he hoped a remedy might be supplied for at least some of the inconvenience at present experienced. The present was a time peculiarly fitted for the business of consolidation, inasmuch as there was no great public measure to which the House was obliged to devote a large portion of its time. Persons who wanted to know their rights and duties as defined by the most recent legislation had the utmost difficulty in doing so, inasmuch as that legislation was to be taken in conjunction with former Acts. Indeed, he might say that few laymen, and sometimes not even a lawyer, could understand referential legislation—that was to say, Acts of Parliament which incorporated, by mere reference to them, other Acts or parts of them, and some of which were obsolete and others actually repealed. What he proposed was a work in the character of an editing or publishing of the Acts; and no men of business or lawyers would doubt its great practicability and usefulness. The Local Government Board Act, for instance, enumerated no fewer than 30 Acts, and the Factory and Workshops Act 16. As to the Poor Law Act, it would be dangerous to say how many Acts were not included. Chitty specified 100 Acts dating from the time of Elizabeth down to 1874, and then there were the Licensing Acts and other Acts that were in the same unsatisfactory state. He would also mention the Master and Servant Act, which dealt with a subject on which it was essential to the interests of employers and those whom they employed that the law should be a model of clearness. Digests of the statute law had been attempted, but accurate digests would be impossible until they had so far modified the law as to remove its inconsistencies. He thought it ought to be within the capacity of that House to work his Resolutions, and to publish from time to time revised and corrected editions of the Statute Book. What he practically wished to propose was, that a standing Committee of the most experienced Members of that House should be appointed, to whom all Consolidation Bills should be referred; and as it would be necessary for such a Committee to have the best legal advice, it would be most wasteful and unwise economy to hesitate to secure as the adviser of such Committee one of the very first lawyers who could be found not already on the Bench. This arrangement would give far more time for the consideration of the new matter submitted. The Committee would report how far the Bill differed in effect from the Acts proposed to be consolidated, and his suggestion was, that no amendment should be allowed which according to the Report of the Select Committee did not so differ, except such amendments as might be consequential upon alterations made in other parts of the Bill. It had been almost invariably found that when they attempted to consolidate any great mass of law there were Courts which were inconsistent with other Courts, and many things, especially in the old laws, were altogether obsolete; and, therefore, it was hardly possible to bring in a Consolidation Bill which had not in it some small portion of new matter. His proposal would not interfere with the right of Members of that House to introduce fresh legislation, but would only rule that the opportunity of so doing should not be taken on the introduction of a Consolidation Law, and that it should be done in a separate Bill. Hon. Members would lose little by such an arrangement, because until some such scheme was adopted by the House there would be rare opportunities of introducing Consolidation Bills at all. He thought that the Resolutions, if adopted, would provide a simple remedy for a great and increasing evil; would remove many contradictions, inconsistencies, and incoherences in our legislation, diminish the bulk of that legislation, and make it more clear and understandable, and thus allay the discontent that prevailed, not only among the public, but also among the legal profession, as to the unsatisfactory state of our Statute Book. In conclusion, the hon. Member moved the first of the Resolutions of which he had given Notice.

Mr. Rathbone

Mr. ARTHUR MILLS, in seconding the Motion, said, he believed that the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone) asked the attention of the House to a subject which was well worthy of its consideration. The matter had been thoroughly thrashed out for the last 20 years; first by the Royal Commission on Statute Law Revision which was appointed in 1856, and then by a Select Committee which sat in 1868. The Commission and the Committee had both reported, Departmental memoranda had been issued, and the House had also been enlightened on this subject by the opinion of Parliamentary draftsmen and other distinguished officers who had given their time and thought to it. In an article in The Quarterly Review, attributed to the Parliamentary draftsman, it was truly said that—

“Parliament will not consent to the passing, without complete discussion and investigation, of Consolidating Bills containing new and disputable matter mixed up with old law.”

It was, therefore, of the highest importance to devise some tribunal, Parliamentary or ex-Parliamentary, which should have the power of eliminating from Consolidation Bills all matters which were in dispute, for thus the cause which at present prevented the introduction of such Bills might be mitigated, if not altogether removed. Hon. Members now avoided Consolidation Bills, because they knew that questions which had already been thoroughly “thrashed out” might again give rise to protracted discussions. He did not say that the proposal of the hon. Member for Liverpool was one which the House was bound to adopt, although it involved the principle of the very tribunal he referred to, as being required to correct an evil, to which the Judges had over and over again called attention, as the had also done to the mischief which resulted from the confused way in which the law was now consolidated. He admitted that the blame with regard to the language of our legislation was not to be thrown altogether upon the Parliamentary draftsman, and that it rested to some extent with Parliament itself for not taking measures with the view of remedying the existing state of things. He trusted that if the Government should not see fit to agree to the Resolutions which had been submitted to the House, they would take care that the matter formed part of the reference to the Select Committee which the Attorney General had given Notice of his intention to bring forward.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “it is expedient that when any new Act is passed amending or incorporating any former Acts (other than General Clauses Acts) the new Act and the former Acts should be reprinted for the House so soon as may be, in such form as to show what parts of the said Acts respectively are in force,”—(Mr. Rathbone),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL remarked that on Friday last the House resolved to consider whether any means could be adopted to improve the manner and language of Acts of Parliament, and it would be his duty on Monday next to move the appointment of the Members of the Committee on that subject. The name of his hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone) would be on that Committee. This was a subject which could not with advantage be discussed in detail in a full House—at any rate, not until it had undergone a greater amount of investigation than it had at present received, either by the Royal Commission of 1856 or the Select Committee of 1868. The Resolutions pointed to two things—one, the Amending Bill, and the other the Consolidation Bill. With regard to the last, the consolidation of Acts of Parliament had been under the serious consideration of the Government for some time past. A correspondence upon it had passed between the Lord Chancellor and the Committee for the Revision of the Statutes, and within a short time Papers upon the subject would be placed upon the Table of the House. Under those circumstances, he hoped the hon. Member for Liverpool would feel content for the present with having called attention to the matter, and that as it would shortly come before the Committee, he would withdraw the Resolutions.

MR. RATHBONE said, that after the explanation of the hon. and learned

Attorney General he would withdraw his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

IRELAND—INCIDENCE OF IMPERIAL TAXATION.—RESOLUTION.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA, in rising to call the attention of the House to the unequal incidence of Imperial taxation upon Ireland, and to move—

"That the complaints which have been made that the Imperial Taxation of the United Kingdom presses more severely on Ireland than on Great Britain, and extracts a greater revenue from Ireland in proportion to her actual means, are worthy of the early consideration of Her Majesty's Government, with a view to the adoption of measures for the equitable distribution of the pressure of taxation, so that each of the Countries constituting the United Kingdom shall contribute to the Imperial revenue in proportion to its actual means," said, he would ask the indulgence of the House, whilst he explained the grounds on which he ventured to submit for their adoption, the Resolution of which he had given Notice. He was quite aware that there was very little beyond forbearance to be expected by a non-official Member of the House, who brought financial subjects under its notice, unless he made it quite clear that the case he had to submit at least required investigation. He ventured to say no hon. Member was less disposed than himself to discuss crude theories of finance in that House or elsewhere, nor was there anyone who would more scrupulously avoid their introduction. He, therefore, pledged himself from the first, that he would not adduce any argument which he had not seriously considered, nor refer to any statistical Returns which he had not weighed and analyzed. Hon. Members for Irish constituencies, who sat on the benches near him, were reproached, not unfrequently, that they did not submit in some tangible shape to Parliament, such measures as their country required. The Home Rule Members were also twitted, because they did not explain in what respect, apart from what was assumed to be a sentimental grievance, Ireland was worse off than England; and because they did not point out adequate remedies other than Home Rule for Irish discontent, it was assumed in that House and in the Press that there was in reality no solid grievance which Ireland had to complain of or to redress. There was a certain influence, ingenious and active, which conduced very much to that temper of the public mind, if he might so term it. It arose from a certain propagation, which had gone on for years under the auspices of Dublin Castle—a certain dissemination, perhaps, he had better term it, of plausible but illusory evidences of Irish prosperity and progress. He did not for a moment assert or suggest that the authorities at Dublin Castle, under the present or under the late Government, disseminated false information. He was quite sure they did nothing of the kind; but what he asserted amounted to this—that it had been the system to adduce and group certain statistics as evidences of the prosperity of Ireland, whilst certain other statistical items to which he would refer before he sat down, were kept out of view and utterly lost sight of, although these other items were absolutely necessary to be taken into account in any true estimate of the condition of Ireland or of its actual or relative progress in our times. He would illustrate that in a single instance. One item of Irish statistics which had been prominently adduced on some grave and several festive occasions as incontestable evidence of actual progress was, the increase which had taken place since 1841 in the deposits in Irish joint-stock banks. These deposits increased from £6,000,000 in 1841 to £26,000,000 in 1871, and he agreed that such an increase might fairly be taken into account in any estimate of the condition of Ireland in 1871, as compared to that of 1841. But he had to observe, that to the extent to which these deposits might be made up of capital shifted from other investments, whether financial investments or agricultural enterprise, or produce of any kind, or farm stock, they did not represent any addition whatever to the actual wealth of the community; and as they were largely represented by debts due to these banks from individuals and classes in Ireland who were not indebted in 1848, it was to be presumed that the debtors, for the most part, held visible property against their indebtedness, and, therefore, this property was viewed under other heads. He did not assert, however, that actual progress had not been made in the accumulation of capital; and for the purposes of his argument on that occasion, he was willing that the increase of capital should be accounted as £50,000,000 in the money values of all items of Irish property. But here again he should observe that the increase of the money, values of stock in hand, or floating capital, did not denote of necessity an increase of actual annual profit to the community in which it occurred. The herd of cattle which one year fetched £20 per head, was not a more valuable item to the community as a whole than a similar herd in another year, which might only command a market price of £15. He would, however, pass quickly over all that, he would pass from arguments, which abounded in conjecture and were subject to a multiplicity of conditions and provisos, to the analysis of Returns which dealt with ascertained results. He had referred to what he might term the Dublin Castle Statistics, merely that he might assure the House that he had fully considered them. They were not in any moral sense false, but they were insufficient data, and were consequently calculated to mislead, and did mislead, the public, and to some extent the official mind, when they were adduced to justify or to mystify the enormous increase in the amount of Imperial taxation levied off Ireland. For the purpose of his argument, justifying the Resolution he had to move, he was saved from all necessity of disputing the fact of some increase, or of disputing the degree of increase to the wealth of certain classes in Ireland. He did not indulge in sensational rhetoric. He had no interest in disputing, and did not dispute, that in some respects Ireland had progressed in material resources since 1841; but whilst he made that admission with pleasure, he did not apprehend that any hon. Gentleman would contend that Ireland had progressed since 1841 in material resources and in the consequent ability to bear taxation in a greater ratio than Great Britain had progressed within the same period; and if no such contention could be set up, there remained, as he would shortly show to the House, no possible logical ground on which the financial policy which had been applied to Ireland since 1841, could be defended. He did not need to enter upon the wearying task of reading to the House the statistics of Great Britain or of Ireland for the last 30 years. There were ready means at hand to supply information as to the actual and relative conditions of both countries, and their present actual and relative abilities to pay taxes. He would now refer to the Income Tax Returns for the year ended 5th April, 1872, which hon. Members would find very conveniently set forth for Great Britain and Ireland at Page 739 of Thom's Irish Almanac for 1875. By those Returns it was shown that the incomes under all heads, subject to income tax, amounted for Great Britain to £455,765,610, and for Ireland to £26,572,707. Hon. Members could easily test those figures; and if they did so, they would find that he was taking up no uncertain ground, when he said that it was fully proved by those Returns that the incomes of Great Britain exceeded those of Ireland seventeenfold; and it was no rash deduction from that fact to say, that the tax-paying abilities of the inhabitants of Great Britain exceeded those of the inhabitants of Ireland in the ratio of 17 to 1. Now in view of those facts, concerning which, he ventured to say, there could be no dispute, he would call the attention of that House to the further fact that the contribution of Ireland to the Imperial Revenue in place of being equal to a seventeenth only of the contribution of Great Britain was nearly to a fraction equal to one-eighth. He held in his hand a Return to an Order of the House, granted on his (Sir Joseph M'Kenna's) Motion of 1st May last, which set forth—

“The gross revenue of Ireland derived from taxation, and excluding casual and miscellaneous receipts, post office and telegraph receipts, Crown Lands, and fees in Courts of Justice taken in stamps, for the years 1841, 1851, 1861, and 1871, and of the population of Ireland in those years, and a computation of the amount of such revenue in respect to each head of the population;”

and a like Return in respect to the revenue and population of Great Britain for the same years. He ventured to say that those Returns disclosed on their face and as a whole, a system of constant and progressive financial injustice to Ireland such as no people who understood the subject could submit to with patience, and such as no country could suffer without injury. Those Returns showed that whilst the taxation per head on the population of Great Britain had been reduced from £2 9s. 9d. in 1841 to £2 4s. 1d. in 1871, the taxation per head on the much poorer population of Ireland had been raised from 9s. 6d. per head in 1841 to £1 6s. 2d. per head in 1871—that was to say—side by side with an actual reduction of 10 per cent per head in Great Britain the taxation per head in Ireland had been nearly trebled. But how had all that come to pass? What were the imposts that had squeezed all that money out of so poor a population? To which of them did he (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) take exception? He objected to the excessive total which was raised off Ireland—augmented he was bound to admit by taxes which were chiefly imposed at the instance of so-called Liberal Governments; but it certainly was not their financial policy towards Ireland which had entitled them to that honourable designation. If he was asked to specify any tax or class of taxes which pressed most unfairly on Ireland, he would specify the taxes on alcoholic liquors of all kinds. He hoped hon. Gentlemen would not misunderstand him. He did not complain of there being a tax, nor even a high tax, on alcoholic liquors; but he objected to the inequality of the scale which had been enacted of late years. He objected to the increase of the duty on Irish spirits from 2s. 10d. the gallon in 1841, to 10s. in 1871, whilst the duties on malt, and on all the alcoholic liquors which were most in use in England had been enormously reduced within the same period. He ventured to say that there was no instance on the face of the earth, nor in history, of any such overwhelming increase of a single tax on any people as the increase of the amount levied for spirit duties off the unfortunate Irish people between 1841 and 1871. The Return of 7th of August last, which he held in his hand, showed that the tax levied off Ireland under that head alone had been raised from £964,091 in 1841, to £3,469,031 in 1871—an increase of £2,500,000 a-year in that single impost. It was scarcely a figure of speech to say that since 1841—or he would take a later date to mark the epoch and say since the Famine of 1846—the British Finance Minister had caught the unhappy Irish people by the throat, and wrung from them sums which, were they not vouched by the Returns to that House, would seem to all men as incredible as to him they appeared exorbitant and unjust. He did not wish to mix up in this discussion the consideration of questions of finance and the subject of temperance; but he could not wholly avoid anticipating those who would reply that grievous as the tax might seem, it was not so great an evil as intemperance, and who would add that any law which prevented or even obstructed the consumption of alcohol, should be defended; but to those philanthropists he answered that those Returns showed that the enormous duty had neither prevented nor diminished the consumption. Any hon. Member who would take the trouble of examining the Returns to the House would find that the consumption per head had increased, not diminished, since 1841. The effect of the law had been to render the poor poorer than they would otherwise have been. It was, he ventured to think, because the Irish were worse fed and worse clad than the people of England quite as much owing to the humidity of the climate, that the Irish preferred spirits to beer or porter or strong ale. He was not defending their taste when he testified to the injustice of the tax, and the irregularity and unfairness of its pressure as against the poorer people. The consumption of spirits in England was no doubt considerable; but ale and every species of brewed liquors and wines of all kinds were nevertheless her chief alcoholic drinks. He would now call the attention of the House to the scale of taxation applied to these liquors having reference to their alcoholic strength. Spanish and Portuguese wines paid a duty which was equivalent on every gallon of proof spirits they contained to 6s. a gallon. French wines paid a duty equivalent to a spirit duty of 4s. a gallon, and the consumers of ale, porter, and beer paid a duty equivalent to 2s. a gallon. He anticipated the trite answer, which was no argument however, that the English paid the same duty on whiskey, and the other spirits which they consumed as the Irish, and that the Irish might consume wine or beer which paid a lower duty than whiskey if they chose to do so; but choice was not wholly under the control of the will; they preferred the whiskey—their dietary and their climate rendered whiskey more suitable to them, or at any rate more acceptable, and that almost universal preference had rendered the injustice an easy one to execute. Short and simple as were the Returns

in his hands, they exhibited what he ventured to describe as a positively shocking state of things. They showed that the gross taxation of Ireland had been increased 75 per cent since 1841, in face of a diminution of the population; whilst the gross taxation of Great Britain had been increased 22 per cent only. And those two conditions of increased taxation and diminished population had worked out an actual increase of nearly 200 per cent in the taxation borne by each head of the population of Ireland; whilst the increase of population in Great Britain had not only counterbalanced the increased amount of taxation, but had worked out, as those Returns would show, a positive reduction of 10 per cent in the taxation per head on the population of Great Britain. Hon. Gentlemen were, probably, surprised that Ireland was not content with the blessings of the British Constitution, her discontent, they said, took an irrational turn, she called out for Home Rule, she did not, they assumed, know what was the matter with her—her griefs were imaginary. Well, she might not fully understand it; but he (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) was under no delusion upon the subject. The cry for Home Rule was the call of a people for a just and paternal government. At present, the resources of Ireland—perhaps he would more accurately express it, her annual yield of profit, was disproportionately, inordinately, and, he submitted, unjustly carried off by the Imperial tax-gatherer. Ireland suffered from fiscal injustice, as who would gainsay who reflected that with a population reduced since 1841 from 8,000,000 to 5,000,000, she had to pay £3,000,000 a-year of additional taxation. That sum represented an additional annual burden on Ireland heavier relatively than the annual charge on France consequent on the Prussian War Indemnity—for France had not been mulcted so as to make up an annual charge of five times £3,000,000, and France was seven times more populous than Ireland, and 30 times as rich. However statesmen or political doctors might differ as to the remedy for her complaint, the diagnosis to his mind was clear enough. A country which had to pay in a single tax an annual sum [more than equal to a fourth of her valuation rental—and almost equal to the sum total of all the other taxes raised from her on the high

scale of British taxation—and which received no return of any kind for the impost, except permission to consume the produce of her own soil, could never be otherwise than discontented and disaffected. What would have been said to any British Minister in England who, since 1841, had endeavoured to impose an income tax, or any other tax equivalent to an income tax, of 2s. in the pound on the entire income of Great Britain, under all the Schedules? But let him tell hon. Gentlemen that Parliament, under the sanction chiefly, he would admit, of Liberal Governments, had, since 1841, imposed additional Imperial taxes on Ireland to a greater amount than what a charge of 2s. in the pound on her total income, under all the Schedules, would produce. Let him also tell hon. Gentlemen, who would try to meet the case he put to them by leading forth columns of statistics, brigaded by Dr. Neilson Hancock, of Dublin; that Dr. Hancock's statistics were utterly irrelevant to the issues which he (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) now raised. The fair and common measure of the tax-paying power of both countries, under equal pressure, would be found in the amounts of their respective incomes under all the Schedules. The respective totals of the incomes of £100 and upwards for each island might be fairly taken as the measures of the respective abilities of Great Britain and Ireland to pay taxes. These proportions were £455,750,000 for Great Britain, and £26,500,000 for Ireland; but on examination of the proportion of taxes raised, it was found that Great Britain was made to yield £57,000,000 and Ireland to yield £7,000,000; and on examination of the proportion of taxation to income for Great Britain it was found to amount to 2s. 6d. in the pound and no more, whilst the proportion of Imperial taxation paid by Ireland was equal to 5s. 3d. in the pound. These figures carried to his mind, and impressed him with a sense of injustice more forcibly than any language at his command could convey to others. He confidently maintained that it would be impossible to find an instance of any country in the world, other than Ireland, made to pay by a single tax, an annual sum more than equal to a fourth of the annual value of all the houses and lands in the country—but that was the case with Ireland. He also confidently asserted, that there was no country in Europe, where so large a proportion of the total income of the country was taken up in taxes irrespective of those spirit duties as in Ireland. He had now but few words more to say, and these he offered to the House in loyalty and good faith. If the British Parliament desired that the power, which the Act of Union conferred upon Great Britain, of levying taxes off Ireland, should not be used for the wrong and oppression of that country—and he did believe that Parliament so desired—that House would apply itself, and Her Majesty's Ministers would apply themselves, as early as possible, to the adjustment of the pressure of taxation, so that Ireland should contribute her fair quota—and no more—to the Imperial Exchequer. He would thank the House for the great indulgence and consideration it had shown him whilst dealing with a subject by no means attractive, and would conclude by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. BUTT seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the complaints which have been made that the Imperial Taxation of the United Kingdom presses more severely on Ireland than on Great Britain, and extracts a greater revenue from Ireland in proportion to her actual means, are worthy of the early consideration of Her Majesty's Government, with a view to the adoption of measures for the equitable distribution of the pressure of taxation, so that each of the Countries constituting the United Kingdom shall contribute to the Imperial Revenue in proportion to its actual means,"—(Sir Joseph M'Kenna),

—instead thereof.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there were no kind of complaints which more frequently reached the ears of the Chancellor of the Exchequer than those relating to the inequality of the incidence of taxation. Since he had the honour of holding his present office, it had fallen to his lot to have a great many representations made to him on the part of different classes and interests to the effect that they were unequally taxed. Such representations had been made to him on the part of different professions and trades, of the landed interest, the possessors of life incomes, and so forth; while he had also been in the habit of hearing it said that the consumers of taxable articles paid an undue share of the public burdens. He was not, under those circumstances, surprised that complaints of the same kind should come from one particular portion of the United Kingdom; and he might say that the example set by the hon. Member for Youghal had been followed, indeed, he might say preceded by Representatives of other portions of Great Britain. There would, indeed, in his opinion, be very little difficulty in making out a case with respect to many portions of England itself, if the House were to adopt the principle laid down by the hon. Gentleman, that the true test of the burden of taxation was the ratio which the income of one part of the country bore to another. But it was impossible to enter into a question of that kind on the present occasion. He was not going to argue the question on what the hon. Gentleman called "Dublin Castle Statistics," and of which he said that they might, in a certain sense, be true, but that they were irrelevant. That was a remark which he thought was true; but it equally applied to the great mass of statistics which the hon. Gentleman had laid before the House. He was not about to go minutely into those statistics, or to endeavour to find out where they might fairly be challenged; but he maintained that they were to a great extent wide of the point, and that the question must be looked at in a different way if the House desired to get at the truth. The subject to which the hon. Gentleman had called attention was, no doubt, one which was worthy of the consideration of the Government, for it was desirable that they should at all times be prepared to review the taxation of the country in order to ascertain, as far as possible, whether taxation did or did not press unfairly on any one class in the country. The subject was one which, however, had not escaped the attention of the Government. Some 10 years ago a Committee had been appointed by the House, which sat two Sessions, and which went very minutely into the circumstances of the taxation of Great Britain and Ireland. On that Committee, which was presided over by his right hon. and gallant Friend General Dunne, who at that time was a Member of the House, he had the honour to serve. He knew, he might add, no man who was more anxious than the case should be fairly considered than his right hon. and gallant Friend; nor did the Committee spare any pains or labour to get at the truth. Well, if the state of Ireland at that time was compared with its present condition, it would be found, he thought, that she had not been going back, but that, on the contrary, she had greatly improved. How was that improvement to be accounted for? and how was it consistent with the great oppression which as it was asserted had been practised towards Ireland in the matter of taxation? The hon. Gentleman said—"Look what enormous burdens you are laying upon her; I can only compare them with the burdens imposed on France by Prussia." That was, however, a comparison which he did not think the hon. Gentleman would persevere in on reflection. What was that taxation which was a burden imposed on France? It was a burden laid upon her not at all for her own benefit, but for the benefit of a foreign country, and it represented money extracted from France and sent to Germany. But did the hon. Gentleman mean to compare the money raised by the Imperial taxation, which fell both on Ireland and England, with taxation levied for the purpose of sending money to a foreign country? ["Hear, hear!"] Did hon. Gentlemen who cheered that statement think the case was parallel with that of Ireland? He was not altogether unprepared for that view of the case; but if they wished to look at the matter fairly, they must consider whether Ireland did not receive her share of benefit from the money which was taken from her in the shape of Imperial taxation. [Mr. JOHN MARTIN: No, no!] What, then, he should like to know, became of the money? It was spent for Imperial purposes, and it remained for the hon. Gentleman to show that those were purposes in which Ireland had no concern. If the money was spent for purposes which were exclusively advantageous to England, there might be something said for the comparison drawn by the hon. Gentleman, but such was not the case; for if the matter was looked fairly in the face, it would be found that Ireland got not only her share of Imperial, but also a large amount in the shape of subvention to her local expenditure. Without going minutely into the matter, he might mention that whereas the taxation of Ireland had in proportion to that of England might be put at 12 to 100, the proportion of the subventions to the local expenditure of the former as compared with those to local expenditure of England was as 100 to 80. That was a fact which the hon. Gentleman must bear in mind, and which made a very material difference, if he wished to establish a comparison between the taxation of France for the benefit of Germany and that of Ireland for the benefit of the British Empire. But the hon. Gentleman went on to devote a great portion of his speech to the discussion of the question of the spirit duties, and he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was not altogether disposed to deny the force of some of his remarks on that subject. He should like, however, to ask whether the whole of the money set down in the Returns before him as derived from Ireland as a tax on spirits was really paid in that country? Did the hon. Gentleman mean to contend that the whole of the home-made spirits in Ireland was consumed there, or did he make no allowance for the quantity which was consumed in the United Kingdom? If Ireland paid so large a sum as was said in the shape of duty, he would merely observe that the Irish people were not compelled to drink spirits, and that they drank them because they liked them. Therefore, the fact that a much larger proportion of Revenue came from that source was a proof that the circumstances of the Irish people were improving, and that they were better able to indulge themselves in those and similar luxuries. When, at the end of the year, the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated what the Revenue of the country had been, and that the proportion derived from the Excise and the Customs was so and so, and had largely increased, the inference generally drawn—and he thought correctly drawn—from that fact was, that the people must be in a prosperous condition, because they were able to contribute so largely to the Revenue. Well, that argument might be applied to Ireland. He did not say that it held equally good when the increase merely came from raising the duty; but when the duty had been raised, and the consumption still went on increasing, and a greater Revenue was thus produced, that fact, undoubtedly, as far as it went, strengthened the inference that the prosperity of the country was also increasing. When the hon. Gentleman said that the true test of the proper proportion of taxation between the two countries was the ratio between the aggregate income of the one to the other, was he not considering a very different system of taxation from that which existed in this country? [Sir JOSEPH M'KENNA: I think not.] If they had such a state of things now as they had immediately after the Union, when the Exchequers of the two countries were kept separate, and they attempted to regulate the proportions which each should pay to the joint expenditure, then, no doubt, they must have had recourse to such means as were at their command for ascertaining what amount they should assess on the one country and what amount on the other. If they came forward every year and said they wanted to raise £70,000,000 of taxation, and told England to provide so much, Ireland so much, and Scotland so much, then they would have to take into account those questions which the hon. Gentleman raised as to the aggregate income of those countries respectively. But that was not the system they went upon, or intended to go upon. What they said was—"Here are the taxes which, with some exceptions, are laid on the whole of the Empire, and when they are borne in a different ratio by each part of the country it is not by any arbitrary rule laid down by Parliament or by the Government, but by the self-acting rule of the state of the different parts of the country and their means of paying them." They might roughly divide the taxation of the United Kingdom into two classes—first, there was the taxation which fell on property and income, and where the property or income was large, the revenue derived from it would of course be large in proportion. Second, there were the taxes on articles of consumption; and they would be productive or otherwise according to the means of the consumer to consume those articles. Now, if they were to lay on one portion of the United Kingdom a different rate of income tax from that laid on other portions, undoubtedly they would be placing a burden on that particular portion of the country. If they said that where the one was to pay 2*d.* in the pound the other should pay 3*d.*; or where the one was to pay 2*d.* the other should not pay anything at all, no doubt that distinction would be an arbitrary one. But if they said that the whole country should pay a 2*d.* income tax, it could not be said that one part of the country was taxed more heavily than another, if the system of assessment was the same. Well, as between Great Britain and Ireland the system of assessment, if it differed at all, was all in favour of Ireland. He did not make much of that point, because he might be challenged as to what the amount of that difference was; but he might say that if the question was to be settled by Dublin Castle statistics, the amount would be very large. He should say, generally, that, in regard to landed property in Ireland, the principle of levying on the rateable value, instead of on the gross, was a great advantage, while, again, a double advantage was given to the tenant from the mode in which he was assessed under Schedule B. Therefore, the distinction that was made was in favour of Ireland. Then, with regard to other taxes, it was true there was some distinction between different parts of the Kingdom, but it was also in favour of Ireland. Certainly, of late years that distinction had been done away with to a great extent, and Ireland, in consequence, was brought to contribute more equally with the rest of the United Kingdom. It was by a self-acting test that they found what one part of the country and what another part should pay as regarded the great bulk of the Revenue. There were, however, still considerable items of taxation which applied to England and not to Ireland. Among these were the inhabited house duty, the establishment taxes, the railway duty, and he thought some other duties, which were still imposed on England and Scotland, but not on Ireland. Therefore, they were not treating Ireland with rigour. On the contrary, in adopting the system that was thought best for the whole of the Empire—a system which was, to a certain extent, and which was intended as nearly as possible to be self-acting, they had given relaxations to Ireland in consideration of matters which it was not now necessary to enter into. If it were true that since 1841 the taxation of Ireland had been more and more increasing in proportion to that of England, that was due to the fact that before that time Ireland was exempted to a much larger degree than at present she was from taxes which were paid in Great Britain; and the only question was, whether, she having had the benefit of that exemption so very long, they were not to come to the time when they should call on Ireland to bear her fair share of the burdens of the Empire, as was always contemplated at the time of the Union. ["No, no!"] He said it was always contemplated at the time of the Union that the period would probably arrive when it would be possible to lay a general system of taxation on the whole of the United Kingdom. But he admitted that the terms of the Union contemplated relaxations to meet the peculiar wants and circumstances of Ireland. Those relaxations had been made, and made most abundantly, and those parts of the country had severally had the benefit of them, and the case of the Government was, that the time had at last come when Ireland had arrived at that point of prosperity at which she was quite able to bear, at all events, the share which she was now called on to pay towards the expenses of the Empire. He would only say, then, in conclusion, that they rested their case on this: That there was no tax imposed on Ireland that was not also imposed on the rest of the United Kingdom; that there were taxes imposed on other portions of the United Kingdom which were not imposed on Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] As to the relative productiveness of taxes in different parts of the United Kingdom, that was a matter which they could not regulate, because it was, in fact, self-regulating and self-acting. If it was said that in consequence of their raising so much of their revenue by taxation on articles of consumption, they bore heavily on the consumers of those articles—he meant in proportion to the charges on property—that was an argument which applied not to Ireland alone, but to the whole United Kingdom, and which must be considered on its own grounds. And lastly, when they considered that of Imperial taxation as now raised, Ireland got her full share and somewhat more, he thought the House could hardly be expected to entertain the Motion of the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member asked them to inquire into the incidence of taxation with a view to its equitable distribution, so that each of the countries constituting the United Kingdom should contribute to the Imperial Revenue in proportion to its actual means. He said, that if they were to make such an inquiry, and they were in that inquiry to take into account, as they would be bound to do, the mode in which local taxation was levied in comparison with that of the other parts of the Empire, and also the special distinctions still existing as between one part of the Empire and another, they must come to the conclusion that Ireland, instead of being a gainer, would be much more likely to be a loser by the adoption of the principle for which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Youghal contended.

MR. SULLIVAN said, the House had probably for 20 years not listened to a more important speech on the condition of Ireland than that which had been made that evening by the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna). It was much to be regretted that during the delivery of that speech, in which it was essential that the hon. Gentleman should have dealt with the acts of a previous and recent Administration, the front Opposition bench had been conspicuous by its emptiness. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had laid great stress on the statement naturally and frankly made by the hon. Member for Youghal, that Ireland had made some advance in material progress; and the right hon. Gentleman sought to make capital out of that fair and truthful assertion, and asked how Ireland could be oppressed when even a Home Rule Member admitted that she had grown to some extent? He could only say of that threadbare and well-worn argument, that it reminded him of that which was used by the baby-farmers, who referred to the fact of a child's growing, in proof of the excellent treatment it received. A child might increase a pound and a-half in weight in two years, and that small increase might itself be the result of cruel treatment. The question, however, was not whether Ireland had grown in the lapse of years, but whether her growth had been the normal and average growth she would display if she were well managed and well governed. The right hon. Gentleman evaded that point, he had shut his eyes to the striking contrast between the growth of England and that of Ireland, and unable to grapple with the very serious statements which had been made, had dexterously sought to evade them altogether. Of all men in the House, however, the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to be the man to be able to give them a "Yea" on the question, if he could not give them a "Nay." What were the broad facts of the question? Was it not proved by the solemn evidence of a Parliamentary Return, that, whereas in England between 1841 and 1871, the pressure of taxation upon the English people per head had decreased 10 per cent, in the case of the Irish people it had increased from 9s. 6d. to 26s. 2d.? No attempt had been made by the right hon. Gentleman to controvert that statement. There was, moreover, a Return which showed that the pressure of taxation in England upon the income of the community was exactly 2s. 6d. in the pound, while in Ireland it was no less than 5s. 3d. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had informed them, and English Members had cheered him as if their consciences were greatly relieved by the argument—"We pay taxes in England that are unknown in Ireland." ["Hear, hear!"] Would the hon. Member who cried "Hear, hear," say whether those taxes were not included in the 2s. 6d. in the pound which was paid in England, while the Irish taxes came to 5s. 3d.? When that test was applied, what became of the argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer? The right hon. Gentleman had said—"In these matters we can take no special note of any particular portion of the Kingdom. We lay down a system of taxation which is self-acting, and if it bears unequally on any portion of the Kingdom, that is the misfortune of that portion, not our fault." Surely, that was a powerful argument in favour of Home Rule. What Henry Grattan and the Plunkets had foretold in the Irish Parliament was now fulfilled. They had shown that an incorporation with England would attract the wealth of Ireland to the greater wealth of England, and deplete the former country instead of causing her to prosper. They had foretold that whereas under her own Parliament Ireland had had a comparatively light taxation, if she joined in one system with England she, the poorer country, would stagger under a weight which was as a feather on the shoulders of the wealthier people. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had now shown that that was the case, but he had said in excuse—"Ireland is so many shires in the United Kingdom, and we can take no more special note of it than we can take of Lancashire or Yorkshire." Upon that confession, what had Ireland gained by union with England? It would go forth to the Irish people, on the authority of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that because of the union they had to pay 5s. 3d. in the pound, instead of 2s., as in earlier days. Some English Member would perhaps argue—"It is all quite fair, for we don't levy upon you any tax which we do not ourselves bear." But that was a sophism. Taxes might be levied over a wide area of Empire which would have a specific effect upon one country and in no way touch another. If, for example, a law was passed prohibiting the growth of peat turf throughout the Empire, theoretically it would apply in the same way to England and Ireland, but practically it would affect the latter only. It was inevitable that a country should look upon this question as a whole and endeavour to strike a balance, in order to find out the net profit or the net loss. Doing that, Ireland found that about £150,000,000 had been wrung from her in taxation within the last 50 or 60 years which she would not have had to pay but for the union with England. Dr. Johnson once spoke of it as the "union of the shark with its prey." [An hon. MEMBER: It was Byron.] Yes, it was Byron. Dr. Johnson, however, said something still more severe. "Don't unite with us," said he, "or we shall rob you as we robbed the Scotch." But when Ireland was concerned, no matter whether it was financial, political, municipal, or the county franchise question, they were always taunted with the one argument—"Oh, that is nothing; why do you not select something practical?" He contended that nothing could be more practical than this question. Why the question of the sovereign was more practical than the almighty dollar. The taunt reminded him of the man who exclaimed, as he applied the lash to the back of a restless victim—"Whether I cut high or cut low, you are always complaining." Before the English community at the tribunal of public opinion, he would say that if there was any feature in the Irish case that could awaken English public opinion to the solid foundation there was for the Irish impeachment of the Union, it was to be found in the speech of the hon. Member for Youghal and in the answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which afforded ample proof of the justice of the tremendous series of startling forebodings uttered by Grattan, Curran, Plunket, Bushe, and Flood, in which they warned Ireland against incorporation with England as an act which would bring upon the former country all the burdens of the wealth of the latter without its sharing in the advantages which that wealth ought to confer.

MR. ORR-EWING said, he had listened to the speech of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Sullivan) with much satisfaction, because, as a Scotchman, he sympathized with the complaint of the Irishmen that their whiskey, which was their national beverage, was too heavily taxed, and he only regretted that the claims of Scotland upon the point had not also been brought before the House at the same time. It was a pity that the hon. Member had not stated distinctly how he proposed that the injustice should be remedied, because if he proposed to meet the case by lowering the duty upon the alcohol in Irish whiskey to the scale of that which was imposed upon alcohol in wine and beer in this country, he could assure the hon. Member that he would not have the support of Englishmen or Scotchmen, or even of his own countrymen. No one wished that the duty upon alcohol in whiskey should be lowered—all they desired was that justice might be done, and that the national beverages of England should be taxed at the same rate as those of Scotland and of Ireland were—according to the amount of alcohol these beverages contained. In his opinion, both Scotland and Ireland suffered great injustice from the manner in which beer was taxed, as the following figures would show. The annual consumption of proof spirits per head by the population in England was $6\frac{1}{2}$ gallons, in Scotland $4\frac{1}{2}$ gallons, and in Ireland 3 gallons. In 1863 the quantity of proof spirits consumed in England was 5 gallons per head of the population, in Scotland 3 gallons, and in Ireland $1\frac{1}{2}$ gallon; and the increase between that date and 1873 was in England 27 per cent, in Scotland 50 per cent, and in Ireland 59 per cent. The amount of duty on alcohol in beer, wine, and spirits paid annually by the English population per head was 17s. 5d.; by the Scotch, 26s. 6d.; and by the Irish, 17s. 10d.; whereas, if the English, Scotch, and Irish were made to pay duty on the alcohol they consumed in wine and beer at the same rate as the alcohol in whiskey was taxed, the English would have to pay 66s. 11d. per head, the Scotch 45s. 9d. per head, and the Irish 29s. 1d. per head. Under the present system, the Scotch and Irish people were told that they must not consult their own taste in the beverage they drank, and that they were not to take that which they believed to be best for their own health, unless they chose to pay a far higher duty upon it than the people of England had to pay on their national beverage. He heartily approved the object the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) had in view in inviting the attention of Parliament to the heavy taxation of Scotland and Ireland as regarded their national beverages, with a view to future legislation; but, at the same time, if the hon. Member would not consent to withdraw his Resolution, he should be obliged to vote against it, because he was sure that the people of England, Ireland, and Scotland would never be parties to lowering the duty upon alcohol in any form.

THE O'CONOR DON said, that as he was the only Representative from an Irish constituency now in Parliament who had sat on the Committee whose Report the Chancellor of the Exchequer had referred to, he desired to say a few words on this subject. He quite agreed with the line of argument that had been adopted by the last speaker. Although there was nominally equality of taxation as between Ireland and England on the two great articles of beer and whiskey, yet in reality there was no such equality, because the taxation on the alcohol in the two beverages was very different. He agreed with the hon. Member who had spoken last, that very few Irish Members would vote for a reduction of the tax upon whiskey, because they believed that that would lead to far greater evils than the tax itself; but what they were entitled to claim was that a similar amount of taxation should be placed upon the national beverages in England which corresponded to whiskey in Ireland, and if that were done, he believed that an enormous increase would come into the purse of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. At the same time, looking at the result of the last General Election, he feared it was very unlikely that a proposal of that sort would meet with the approval of a majority of the House, because one of the most powerful interests of the country would be opposed to it, although if it were left to Irish Representatives, he believed it would soon become law. The hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) seemed in doubt whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted the fact that taxation in its existing form pressed more heavily upon Ireland than it did upon England, the respective resources of the two countries being taken into consideration. He would, therefore, refer to one of the draft Reports presented to the Committee, which had been mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman opposite—

"It is not surprising," the Report stated, "that the large increase in the general taxation of the country should have given rise to complaints, and that louder complaints should have been made by Ireland than by other parts of the United Kingdom. . . . The pressure of taxation will be felt most by the weakest part of the community, and as the average wealth of the Irish taxpayer is less than the average wealth of the English taxpayer, the ability of Ireland to pay taxation is evidently less than that of England. Mr. Senior remarks that the taxation of England is both the heaviest and lightest in Europe—the heaviest as regards the amount raised, the lightest as regards the ability to bear that amount, and that in the case of Ireland it is heavy both as regards the amount and the ability of the contributor, and he adds that England is the most lightly taxed, and Ireland the most heavily taxed country in Europe, although both are nominally liable to equal taxation."

That draft Report was not his Report, but was proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Will the hon. Gentleman read the following paragraph?

THE O'CONOR DON said, the next paragraph stated that complaints had been made by the several witnesses examined, to the effect that Ireland had been suffering, especially during the last four or five years, from a diminution of capital, or from emigration.

The O'Conor Don

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: What I meant to call attention to was the paragraph immediately following that, showing that the same argument applied to the poorer parts of England.

THE O'CONOR DON could assure the right hon. Gentleman he did not intend in any degree to misrepresent him. In the paragraph to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, he stated that it was clear, from what Mr. Senior had said, that that which applied to Ireland applied to the poor parts of Great Britain also; that no system of taxation had ever been devised which pressed equally upon all persons; and that if it were recognized as a sound principle that we should attempt to graduate a tax which pressed upon one part of the United Kingdom, so as to relieve it of some burdens on the ground of poverty, it was impossible to resist the conclusion that we should carry the graduation further, for the purpose of relieving individual taxpayers all over the United Kingdom. He had merely referred to the Report, to show that the right hon. Gentleman had admitted the fact that the present system of Imperial taxation fell more heavily upon Ireland, than upon other parts of the United Kingdom. The simple mode of restoring the balance was that suggested by the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr Ewing). While he joined in the wish expressed by the hon. Gentleman opposite that the Motion would not be pressed to a division, he could not but think that the debate would be attended with beneficial results. It would show hon. Members who were fond of taunting Irish Representatives when asking for aid for works of utility in Ireland, that they did not come as beggars to apply for that to which they were not entitled, and that the right hon. Gentleman who now presided over the finances of the country, having examined the subject carefully in Committee upstairs for two years, had come to the same conclusion as that which was the mainspring of the Motion of the hon. Member for Youghal—namely, that from whatever cause it arose, the existing system of Imperial taxation pressed more heavily on the resources of Ireland than it did on those of Great Britain.

MR. LOWE said, he wished to point out that which appeared to him to be evident, as one of the Members of the Committee referred to—namely, that the arguments which they had just heard rested on a very obvious and gross fallacy. Hon. Gentlemen spoke of the taxation Ireland paid, and England paid, and Scotland paid; but they did not seem to observe that in using those terms, they were using expressions which were merely abstract and metaphorical. Ireland, in fact, paid no taxation, and England paid no taxation. Taxation was not paid by geographical districts, it was paid by individuals. Hon. Gentlemen took the amount paid by the population of a country, and showed the average paid per head. That, however, was not the way to ascertain whether a country was heavily or lightly taxed. The thing they had got to show was, that individuals of one country were more heavily taxed than individuals of like means were in another country. They should compare the individual Irishman and the individual Englishman in similar circumstances, and show that the Irishman was more heavily taxed than the Englishman. That was what they had not done, and that was what he challenged them to do. He would begin with the Irish Duke, and, if necessary, he could go down to the Irish peasant, and ask them to show him any Irishman more heavily taxed than any Englishman of a corresponding class. The Irish Duke paid nothing for keeping his carriages, he paid no duty for his servants, he paid no assessed taxes. The English Duke of similar income was subject to those taxes. Again, Irish railways paid no taxes. He could, in fact, point out numbers of instances in which individual Irishmen and corporations were much less heavily taxed than were English individuals and corporations of like standing. He could show no case in which the Englishman was relieved of a tax which was levied upon the Irishman. They were, therefore, merely deluding themselves with words when they talked about the taxation of Ireland and the taxation of England. Let them go to individuals and show some case in which Irishmen groaned under the burden of taxation which Englishmen of exactly similar means escaped. The case failed entirely through the use of abstract and metaphorical language, as if a country, and not the individuals of the country, paid taxation.

Mr. JOHN MARTIN hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) would not withdraw his Motion, but would ask the House whether it referred to a subject sufficiently important to be considered with a view to a solemn opinion being expressed upon it. He (Mr. John Martin) had seen some things in the course of the debate which, as a friend of England—although he ought not to be a friend of England; he should only be a servant of his own country and indicate as far as he could the rights of his country, trying to convince the people of England through the House of Commons that the Irish, his countrymen, would never consent to remain the subjects of this country; but, as a friend of England, he had witnessed some things in the course of the debate which were of a hopeful kind. He had perceived that the consciences of some Englishmen were beginning to be touched. He had watched how eagerly they hung upon the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, seeking for some apology, some excuse, some explanation—anything that would satisfy them that it might be just to tax the people of one country 5*s.* 3*d.* in the pound, and of their own country 2*s.* 6*d.* only. There was another reason why the inquiry asked for should be granted, and it was this—that the right hon Gentleman had said—and a former Chancellor of the Exchequer had echoed his words—that, in fact, Ireland, in the matter of taxation, was unduly favoured. Now, as an Irishman, he said he did not want to be unduly favoured. His countrymen would scorn to be unduly favoured. They wanted to pay their fair and just share, and they called on the ex-Chancellor and the actual Chancellor of the Exchequer to make good their case. He hoped that the two Reports of the Committee to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred—that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the minority Report of General Dunne—would be studied by hon Gentlemen at both sides of the House. In the proceedings of that Committee he took a deep interest, for its leading spirit had been an old and dear Friend of his, the late John Dillon. He recollected well how when that Committee was appointed, care was taken to pack it with English and pro-English

Members, so as to secure a Report in favour of England.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he was satisfied with the discussion, and would, with the permission of the House, withdraw his Motion [Cries of "No, no!"]

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MARINE INSURANCE.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. T. BRASSEY, in rising to call attention to the evidence relating to Marine Insurance taken by the Royal Commission on Unseaworthy Ships; and to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that She will be pleased to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the state of the Law, to report thereon, and to make recommendations with the view to establish the Law and practice of Insurance on the principle of indemnity for losses actually sustained," said, it was a somewhat hazardous enterprise for a layman to bring to the consideration of the House a subject of so much difficulty as the law relating to Marine Insurance. A knowledge of the law was not required in order to be convinced that where great facilities existed for insuring property in ships or goods at full, and in some cases at exaggerated value, such facilities had a tendency to produce carelessness in the management of shipping, with all the attendant evils which sometimes occurred of deplorable loss of life at sea. If he could show that there was a concurrence of opinion among competent authorities in favour of considerable amendment and alteration in the law of Marine Insurance, he thought he should have done enough to justify the Motion which he proposed to make for the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the subject.

MR. SPEAKER said, he wished to remind the hon. Member that he might call attention to the matter, but could not make a Motion, the House having already affirmed the Motion for going into Committee of Supply.

MR. T. BRASSEY said that he could at all events show that the facility for insuring at the full, and sometimes at an exaggerated, value was a primary cause of carelessness and recklessness. For that purpose, he would quote some remarks made by Mr. Harper, the Secretary of Lloyd's Salvage Association, in his evidence before the Royal Commission on Unseaworthy Ships. Mr. Harper pointed out that the care of a ship was divided into a hundred particulars—care in the selection of a master, care in the selection of a crew, care in securing that the ship should be in a proper state of repair before leaving port; and that watchfulness was likely to be relaxed when the shipowner knew that if his vessel were lost, he would recover all the money he had invested in the ship, with, in some cases, a large profit in addition. In order to show the extent to which, under the various decisions which had been given in our Courts of Law, Marine Insurance had been allowed to exceed that strict indemnity for loss which it was originally intended to secure, it would be more convenient that he should refer to a case that had actually occurred, and which illustrated the working of the law of Marine Insurance. The case was that of the Sir William Eyre, which was brought under the notice of the Royal Commission by Mr. Cowen. That vessel sailed in 1863 from Glasgow to New Zealand. She was intended to discharge her cargo at Otago, then to proceed in ballast to Calcutta, and there to take in cargo for which a freight amounting to £4,000 was to be paid. The ship was stranded before she reached Otago, but she was temporarily repaired at the cost of the underwriters on the outward freight, and proceeded in ballast to Calcutta, where a further survey was made, and it was discovered that the ship was not worth repairing. She was lost shortly afterwards in the Cyclone of October, 1864. The damage which the vessel was found at Calcutta to have sustained having been caused before she reached Otago, the underwriters on the policy to Otago were held liable to pay £6,000. The shipowner had insured in the sum of £4,000 the chartered freight homewards from Calcutta; and as the ship had become a constructive total loss, the House of Lords held that the underwriters were bound to pay the £4,000. Finally, the shipowner, before he knew that his vessel had been seriously injured, had insured her in the sum of

£8,000 by a time policy for three months after her arrival at Calcutta, and, although the ship, when insured, was a total loss, he recovered his insurance. The total sum thus recovered amounted to £18,000 on a ship valued at only £8,000 by the owners themselves. No doubt, that was an extreme case; but other cases in which underwriters were called upon to pay the shipowners a sum considerably in excess of that which was necessary to provide an indemnity were of frequent occurrence. He would now refer briefly to the various descriptions of marine policies, and point out the anomalies which arose under them. The first was the valued policy, in which the value of a ship or goods was stated on the face of the policy. It might be reasonably supposed that where the value stated was considerably in excess of the real value of the ship or goods, the Courts would refuse to sanction such over-valuation; but that was not the doctrine held in our Courts of Law. Underwriters were not allowed to set aside the value, as stated in the valued policy, except upon plea and proof of fraud. When they turned from the commercial aspect of the question to those larger considerations which had reference to the safety of life at sea, he thought hon. Members would be disposed to agree with the opinion of Mr. Justice Willes, in an able Memorandum which he had written upon the subject of Marine Insurance, in which he said—

“The system of valued policies, whatever its convenience, and it is great, does encourage fraudulently disposed people to put a high value on comparatively worthless vessels, and gives them an interest in the loss of their property.”

Mr. Justice Willes had suggested a remedy for this state of things, and it was approved by the late Mr. Lamport, Mr. Stephenson, some time secretary to Lloyd's, by Mr. Squarey, Mr. Farrer, and other authorities of equal eminence. These gentlemen agreed to adopt this recommendation—namely, that where an underwriter had reason to believe that the value in the policy was excessive, he should be allowed to plead such over-valuation as a defence to an action on the policy; and the late Mr. Lamport, a practical shipowner, gave it as his opinion that the change proposed would not lead to unnecessary litigation, and that in 99 cases out of 100 no dispute would arise; but that, on the other hand, shipowners when they knew that excessive valuations could not be recovered in the Courts of Law, would not be disposed to pay the premiums for insuring their vessels to excessive amounts. The next description of policy was the open policy, in which the value of the ship or goods was not stated on the face of the policy. The principal anomaly in this case arose in connection with the insurance on freight. The doctrine of our law was, that where a loss occurred the amount recoverable from the underwriter should be the gross freight payable by the shipper or merchant to the shipowner. To show how this worked in practice he would take a case put before the Commission by Mr. Farrer. A steamer of 1,200 tons bound for Calcutta and back through the Suez Canal, with a chartered freight on the outward and homeward voyage of £12,000, was insured in an open policy at the full value. Suppose the ship to be lost on the outward voyage, in the Bay of Biscay, the shipowner was entitled to recover the gross freight of £12,000, although by the loss of his ship at the commencement of her voyage he had avoided paying for Suez Canal dues both ways £1,200, for coals at Calcutta £1,600, as well as the expenses for provisions at Calcutta, wages to the crew, and port charges at Calcutta and London. The total saving by the loss of the vessel at the commencement of the voyage would thus amount to £4,500. Now, he asked whether a law could be considered satisfactory which permitted the shipowner to derive such an immense advantage, if his ship were lost almost immediately after leaving port, instead of completing the voyage for which she had been insured. The remedy suggested for removing this anomaly was this—that where a loss occurred, the underwriter should be entitled to deduct from the amount payable to the shipowner those expenses which he had actually saved by the loss of his vessel. He knew that this rule might be defeated, if shipowners were to insist on the freight being paid by merchants in advance; for it was a rule of our law that if a ship were lost the merchant could not recover the freight he had paid in advance. But that was a doctrine peculiar to our law, and it had recently been disapproved of by the Lord Chief Justice and other Judges. It could not, however, be reversed in an inferior Court, until it was reversed by the House of Lords. The next class of policy was the voyage policy, in which the implied warranty of seaworthiness only existed at the commencement of the voyage. There was, therefore, in so far as the law of Marine Insurance was concerned, no motive acting upon the shipowners or the master to keep the ship in a seaworthy condition; and this anomaly seemed to him to be the more remarkable, because the voyage outward and homeward was treated as one voyage. Mr. Harper, in his evidence, stated that it had happened within his knowledge that a ship from London to Shanghai had received considerable damage on the outward voyage, had discharged her cargo at Shanghai, had not been repaired, had taken in cargo for the homeward voyage, and had set forth in such a condition that there was great risk of her foundering. She had foundered, and because there was no implied seaworthiness on the departure of the vessel from Shanghai, the underwriters had been held liable to pay the insurance to the shipowner. This anomaly of the law might be removed if there was, as he believed there was in the American law, a continued implied warranty of seaworthiness throughout the voyage. He came now to the last form of policy—a time policy. Upon that there was no implied warranty of seaworthiness. The hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood), in his evidence, explained that it might frequently happen that when a shipowner was effecting an insurance on his ship he might not have obtained tidings of her for a considerable period, and, therefore, it would be unreasonable to ask him to give a warranty of seaworthiness. Mr. Butt, another of the witnesses who appeared before the Commission, suggested that the warranty of seaworthiness should commence at the time of the departure of the ship insured from the first port visited after the insurance was effected, where means existed for making repairs, should repairs be necessary. He would now point out the anomalous position the shipowners and the proprietors of goods respectively occupied under the operations of the rules of law relating to voyage policies and time policies. There being no implied warranty for seaworthiness under a time policy, the shipowner could recover even if the ship was not seaworthy. On the other hand, the proprietor of goods could only insure under a voyage policy, and therefore, although the vessel in which his goods were shipped might be unseaworthy, he could not recover. There was obvious inconsistency in this state of things. The shipowner, who had the real control over his ship, and was responsible for her equipment, could recover his insurance, even though he had neglected his duty: whereas the proprietor of goods, who was an innocent sufferer, could not recover, although he had no responsibility for the seaworthiness of the ship. The merchant had a remedy against the shipowners, but the bills of lading were so artfully contrived that the shipowner was enabled to contract himself entirely out of the obligation which would otherwise rest upon him to keep his ship in a seaworthy condition. It had been suggested, and it was well worthy of consideration, that no words introduced into the bill of lading should exonerate the shipowner from the obligation to keep his vessel in safe condition; and that the underwriter should not be held liable for loss, whether under the time or voyage policy, unless it were proved that the shipowner and shipmaster had used all reasonable efforts to make and keep the ship seaworthy. He hoped he had said enough to establish a case for inquiry, with a view to the amendment of the law. Underwriters and Insurance Companies who had the largest and most important business, conducted their affairs not so much in reliance upon the protection afforded by the law, as upon the character of those with whom they did business; and, on the other hand, underwriters in less fortunate positions were exposed to all the evil influences of excessive competition. Many of them, perhaps, were scarcely in a position to refuse to take a risk if a sufficiently tempting premium were offered. No partial measures would suffice to deal with this great question. Juries, as a rule, had been too partial to shipowners. The Royal Commission had recommended that a Judge and two Assessors should be substituted for the present tribunal for the trial of matters of this description; but what he wanted was a revision of the law by a small Commission composed of men eminent for their legal attainments, with whom should be associated persons conversant with the practice of Marine Insurance. The Commission also recommended a complete revision of the whole system of Insurance Law, and, in his opinion, if an international agreement could be arrived at on the subject, it would be for the advantage of the mercantile community. The law of Marine Insurance was composed of materials drawn from the custom of merchants, the Statutes of the Realm, and the decisions of able and impartial Judges, and should not be altered without the most careful consideration of the probable effect of the changes proposed in relation to the seaworthiness of our shipping. Because abuses had grown up in the law, Marine Insurance must not, on that account, be condemned. The Commissioners would have before them a task of great importance, difficulty, and delicacy. He did not urge any hasty action in this matter. He was well aware that a full inquiry was an essential preliminary to legislation, and he ventured to hope that the inquiry might be extended to other countries. He knew how unjust it was to draw up a severe indictment against shipowners as a class. Sometimes they were condemned as men who conducted their business on the most selfish principles. Shipowners, as a rule, made moderate profits, and they had passed through many dark periods of depression. In shipping, as in every profession and every industry in this country, the pressure of competition was keenly felt, and where unjustifiable risks were run, in most cases it would be found that the owners were struggling to make both ends meet. It would ill become the successor of a fortunate man of business to pass a harsh or ungenerous judgment on the conduct of men whose errors were chiefly due to an insufficiency of means. He understood the Government had in contemplation a Committee to prosecute an inquiry into the subject. But no mere Departmental Committee would have the authority which would attach to a Royal Commission, working under the presidency of an eminent Judge. If they could not succeed in compelling every shipowner to be to a certain extent his own insurer; or, if they could prevent excessive valuation, all other legislation with a view to the safety of life at sea would become superfluous.

Those who were opposed to load-lines and surveys said truly that the commercial instinct of the shipowner, and the experience of the shipmaster, were the most reliable guarantee for the seaworthiness of shipping, and that Government surveyors could not have the same practical knowledge as persons actually engaged in the trade. But that commercial instinct must be less keen and less acute, when, by the over-valuation of the ship and freight, the owner stood to win and not to lose by the loss of his ship. The aim of future legislation must therefore be to confine Marine Insurance to a single contract of indemnity. Thus limited, it might justly be regarded — to use the language of Jeremy Bentham — as—

“One of the most beneficial inventions of civilized society. No one will neglect his actual possessions, a good certain and present, with the hope of recovering in case of loss only an equivalent for the thing lost, and even, at the most, an equivalent. To this, let it be added, that the recovery cannot be obtained without care and expense, and that there must be a transient privation.”

In conclusion, he would refer to some personal experience of his own. At the close of last year he spent a month afloat on the Bosphorus, watching day by day busy the traffic in those pleasant waters. The pride an Englishman must feel at seeing the flag of his own country displayed by so many ships; but that feeling was tempered by regret that, amid that fleet, on the whole so admirably adapted to its purpose, there were some vessels of a very different character, bad in design, or more often grossly overlaid. When he compared the buoyant trim which he thought necessary in his little vessel, with the heavily-laden steamers in which he saw so many poor fellows starting for their homes, homes which, alas! they were destined never to reach, he made a vow that he would do his best to secure for the British seaman that care and protection which would never be secured until the law of Marine Insurance was reformed.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, he was sure that every one would admit the great importance of the question before the House. It was a melancholy subject to reflect upon, for the Report of the recent Commission on Unseaworthy Ships showed that in three years 3,300 vessels, representing 1,000,000 tons of shipping, and involving a very large loss of life, had been wrecked. Even, however, as far as the mere destruction of property was concerned, it would be a great mistake to look upon this as essentially either an underwriter's or a shipowner's question. The underwriter covered himself by increase of premium, the shipowner covered himself by raising freights, and the real loss fell upon the consumer, who had to pay more for the goods he required. That this immense loss was to a certain extent due to preventable causes was generally admitted, and Her Majesty's Government had brought in a Bill upon the subject, which he hoped might do good; but which, after all, did not go to the root of the question. He had not much confidence in Government inspection, as he feared that it would tend to become a form which would give little security to the public, and would tend to relieve the shipowners from responsibility, while inflicting on them unnecessary annoyance and vexatious interference. The only real mode of checking the evil was, in his opinion, to act upon the motives of the shipowner. The House knew what had been done by shipowning companies which took the sole care of their own vessels. One great company had, indeed, landed more passengers than they took on board. They also knew how seldom vessels from Australia with gold cargoes went to the bottom and took the gold with them. It was very far from his wish, however, to make any attack on shipowners. On the contrary, it was certainly their interest that the law should not only be clear and consistent, but such as to offer all possible encouragement to care and prudence. In the present state of the law, however, it was actually in some cases better for the shipowner, in a pecuniary point of view, that his ship should be lost. Surely, such a state of things was entirely contrary to public policy, and the true principles of insurance. Insurance ought to be a contract of indemnity. The present state of the law, however, in regard to it was most inconsistent. A person could not over-insure against fire, and it was contrary to law to insure a life in which the insurer had no pecuniary interest. The compensation awarded to sufferers by railway accidents had a tendency to render the companies more careful. Supposing, however, that a railway company could actually make a profit out of a bad accident, would the public stand such a state of the law, which would be most injurious to the public interest? Even this, however, was hardly a parallel case, but suppose the stationmaster and pointsmen could make a large profit out of a fatal accident, was it not obvious that this would add one more to the terrors of railway travelling, and would certainly not conduce to the safety of passengers? There seemed to be three points which specially required attention — namely over-insurance, insurance of gross freight, and the law as regarded seaworthiness on time policies—that it, when a ship is insured for, say, six months or a year. As regarded the first, Mr. Harper called the attention of the Commission to a case in which a shipowner had insured his vessel for £36,000. She was abandoned by her crew, but subsequently picked up and brought into port. It was found that it would take £16,000 to repair her thoroughly. On that, the shipowner claimed for a constructive total loss, swearing that the ship, though insured for £36,000, was really only worth £15,000. He proved, in fact, that this was the case, and the underwriters actually had to pay £36,000, on the express ground that the vessel was really only worth £15,000. In the case of "Barker v. Janson" a vessel was insured for £8,000, she being at that time, though unknown to the owners, a mere wreck and, in fact, valueless. Yet the Court held that, under the existing state of the law, the insurers were bound to pay. Mr. Stevenson, then Secretary to Lloyd's, truly pointed out that if a vessel worth £20,000 is insured for £30,000, the shipowner virtually insures for £20,000, and then bets £10,000 that she will go to the bottom. Again, in the case of freight, the over-insurance of freight was surely very objectionable. Last year, for instance, a vessel sailed from Quebec for Liverpool. The freight, as per charter party, amounted to £3,500, but was insured and valued for £6,000. The ship was lost in the River St. Lawrence. Now, if she had completed her voyage prosperously, the owner would have earned £3,500, less, at least, £1,000 for wages, &c., so that his net receipt would not have exceeded £2,500, while because the voyage was not successful, because the ship was wrecked, he got £6,000. Another markable anomaly in the present state of the law was, that while the question of seaworthiness could be raised in the case of a policy on goods, or on a ship if insured for a voyage, it could not be opened on an insurance for time. As regarded the sailors, the law only allowed them their wages up to the time a vessel was lost, and had always held that a seaman could not insure his wages, for it was obvious that if he could, you would weaken his motives for bringing the voyage to a successful termination. It was stated in evidence that all the mutual insurance clubs forbade over-insurance. Surely that was a very remarkable fact? The present state of the law was condemned by the highest authorities. Benecke, in his great work on Insurance, said—

“The consequences of over valuation are so dangerous that they deserve the attention not only of underwriters, but even of the Legislature.”

Arnould, another standard authority, truly said that—

“The very essence of the contract of Marine Insurance is that it is a contract of indemnity And its whole spirit is violated if the insurer can make the occurrence of such casualties a means of gain, for this would give him an interest in procuring sea losses, which would be opposed to every principle of commercial policy.”

The Committee of Lloyd's also unanimously passed a resolution, calling the attention of the Commission to the anomalous state of the law in reference to unseaworthiness of ships as applicable to policies of insurance for time, compared with policies of insurance on voyages. Chief Justice Best said, in the case of “Murphy v. Bell,” the temptation to fraudulent insurances thus given was very great. Chief Justice Cockburn, in the case of “Byrne v. Schiller” said our Marine Insurance law was founded on principles which were erroneous and directly opposite to those on which the laws of America and of every country in Europe but England was founded. Mr. Cohen, one of our highest legal authorities, and Mr. Justice Keating entertained the same view. From this it appeared that the unsatisfactory state of the existing law on the subject had been pointed out over and over again by the Judges in our Courts; and the Duke of Somerset, as Chairman of the Commission on Unseaworthy Ships, had summed up the matter by saying that, in the opinion of the Judges, not only did our law differ from that of every other country, but that the law of other countries was right, and ours was wrong. It was true that the Commission did not feel itself able to recommend any particular changes in the law; but they expressed themselves strongly in favour of extended examination, such as was recommended by the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. T. Brassey). Of course, he (Sir John Lubbock) did not deny that in some respects the present state of the law had its advantages. For instance, it was convenient to settle the value beforehand in the case of freights; but if the insurance were to be on the real value, he believed there would be no practical difficulty in arriving at the amount, and it must be remembered that the Admiralty Court constantly had to do so in cases where one ship had been run down by another. It was alleged that such a change would increase litigation, but both Mr. Hollams and Mr. Walton, the two solicitors selected by the Commission to give evidence on that part of the subject, believed that, on the contrary, it would actually have a tendency to diminish law suits. In fire insurance there was very seldom any litigation about the value of the property insured. Moreover, in Marine Insurances, the value had to be considered in all cases of average—that was of damage—but, practically, that rarely led to litigation. Moreover, though it would of course be very undesirable to do anything which would tend to increase litigation, still they must remember that they were here dealing with a case involving not only property, but life; and a state of the law which tended to diminish the motives for prudence on the part of shipowners, which made carelessness in some cases advantageous, and wrecks profitable, could not conduce to safety at sea, or to the public advantage. That was really not an underwriters' question. It was a question not only for honest shipowners, who suffered from the law as it now stood, because they had to pay higher premiums than would otherwise be necessary; but also for the public, on whom, in reality, these losses ultimately fell in the shape of increased prices. When there had been so decided an expression of opinion on the subject from those best qualified to judge, he could not help thinking that there was a strong case at any rate for inquiry.

The question was, no doubt, one of much difficulty. But he thought there were strong grounds for considering that the law with regard to ships should be assimilated to the law with regard to fire and life; as anything which enabled persons to make a profit out of the losses of others, though it might not lead to conscious fraud, tended to weaken the incentives to care and caution, on which safety at sea so much depended.

Mr. J. W. BARCLAY, who had given Notice of an Amendment to the Motion to leave out all the words after the word "law," and insert—

"And to consider and report whether Marine Insurance on ships and freights should be established on the principle of indemnity for loss, or whether the amount covered should not be limited, so that the shipowner should have in every case to bear some portion of the loss arising from any disaster to his vessel,"

said, : I think I ought to explain to the House that, as member for some years of a Local Marine Board, and engaged to a limited extent in underwriting and shipowning, I have had some experience on the subject now before the House. I may add that I have devoted some consideration and inquiry to the question. In giving Notice of the Amendment, I did so in no spirit of hostility to the Motion of the hon. Member, but because I thought that the Committee which he intended to move for should embrace a somewhat wider scope, and, instead of confining itself to the question of indemnity, should inquire whether it would not be advantageous and also practicable to establish Marine Insurance on such a basis that the shipowner would in every case have a pecuniary interest in the safety of his vessel. So far as Marine Insurance concerns underwriters and shipowners, the principle on which it is based may be that of indemnity for loss; but as between the shipowner and the public, a broad question of public policy is involved. The shipowner is engaged in a hazardous business, in which not only his property is concerned, but also the property, and, above all, the lives of others. He undertakes to convey the lives and property of others safely through the perils and dangers of a voyage, except only such as cannot be avoided or overcome by human ingenuity, forethought, and care. The public are entitled to assume that a shipowner exercises all possible precaution and forethought to accomplish the contract which he has undertaken—that is, to carry, so far as humanly possible, the lives and property entrusted to him safely to their destination. But, Sir, shipowners, it is admitted, do not exercise all the diligence and care which the public have a right to expect. It is unnecessary for me to argue in support of this, because all our legislation referring to the Mercantile Marine is based upon that assumption, and the question now really before us is—How can we best ensure that the shipowner shall take all the forethought and all the diligence which the public are entitled to expect of him? Parliament has attempted to accomplish this hitherto by legislation; but it is admitted that the legislation, while very harassing to the business of the shipowners, has failed in its objects. Casualties on our coasts seem to be rather fewer than they were some years ago, but those in the over-sea trade are considerably more numerous. It is unnecessary for me to refer to the enormous loss of life which from year to year takes place, because that has been very ably and persistently brought before the public by the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll). But, in a national point of view, these losses are a subject for grave consideration. During the last two years the value of the ships and property lost at sea has probably been considerably over £10,000,000; and although, in the first instance, this loss is a question between the shipowners and the underwriters, the £10,000,000 are nevertheless so much loss to the wealth of the nation. Now, Sir, our legislation being admitted to have been so far unsuccessful, it is to be considered whether some other means cannot be devised to ensure that the shipowners shall exercise all the care and attention humanly possible to prevent this great loss of life and property. It will be generally admitted that the most certain way of ensuring the discharge of duty is to make it the interest of the individual that the duty be well and faithfully performed. Now, the Amendment of which I gave Notice indicates how this interest is to be secured. If the shipowner in every case had to bear a certain proportion of the loss arising from any casualty to his vessel, and that proportion were of such an adequate amount that it would be greater than any saving he could make by improperly conducting his business, it would ensure the shipowners' necessary care and attention to do his best in securing the safety of his vessel, and to carry on his business in as efficient and proper a manner as the public can expect. But what is the present state of matters? The shipowner may not only insure his ship to the full value, but even over that amount. He may insure not only the freight which is in the ship's bottom, but also the amount of all the prospective freight which he is to earn for the coming 12 months; and, beyond that, he may insure outfits. The consequence is, that under the existing law there is the anomaly that everyone interested in the adventure may have a risk except the shipowner himself. Now, can a shipowner who has already perfectly secured himself of the success of the adventure, whether his vessel accomplish her voyage in safety or not, be expected to take the same care to make the adventure successful as if he had money at stake on the issue? So long as such a state of matters is allowed to exist, can other results be expected than what have actually taken place? I do not think that many vessels are wilfully lost. Such cases are rare; but I do think that many losses occur which increased care on the part of the shipbuilder, the shipowner, the captain, or the crew might have prevented, and what we want is some mainspring or motive which will exert a wholesome influence, either directly or indirectly, on all engaged in the construction, management, or navigation of a vessel. In support of these views, I shall refer only to one paragraph of the Report of the Royal Commission, though the same view was supported by many witnesses. The Commissioners say—

"The system of Marine Insurance, while it protects the shipowners against losses which would otherwise be ruinous, tends to render them less careful in the management of their ships."

But, Sir, I have made certain inquiries in order to satisfy myself how far it might be practicable to carry out the view indicated, and what results might be expected. As I had the opportunity of making myself best acquainted with matters in Aberdeen, I investigated the state of the shipping at that port in regard to insurance. The tonnage belonging to the port consists of about 195 ships, of together over 100,000 tons. Now, 38 of these ships, altogether 37,000 tons, more than two-thirds of the whole belong to three firms, and are practically uninsured. Well, the result of their experience of maritime casualties, extending over a period of 10 years, and in some cases very much longer, has been that the loss arising from casualties to their vessels did not exceed one-third or one-fourth of the premium which would have been charged for insuring these vessels in the open market. I might refer also to cases of a similar character which are well known in Glasgow, Leith, Liverpool, and London. One of the witnesses told the Commission that he had only lost 2 out of 21 vessels in 20 years, and that was by collision. The case of one firm largely engaged in shipping in the East has been specially brought to my notice. This firm own vessels to the value of nearly £250,000, trading in the India and China seas. These vessels are only partially insured. The premium for what is insured is about £7 7s., but the portion uninsured has cost the company only about 1½ per cent. In this case I am informed the captains are highly paid, that they never leave the service, and that they are unrestricted as to the number and quality of their crew. To this last more particularly the owners ascribe their freedom from casualty. Two years ago they sold one of their steamers, and that vessel has since been once ashore, once put into port in distress, and has since been abandoned. Other two steamers which they sold were lost shortly afterwards. Now, these cases indicate that more than three-fourths of the casualties for which underwriters are called upon to pay are casualties which it is possible to avoid. I do not see that there are exceptional circumstances in the cases to which I have referred beyond due care and diligence which could have reduced the loss so much. But, assuming that only one-half of the casualties could be avoided, we see to how great an extent the loss of life and property would be avoided if the same care and diligence were exercised by all as are exercised in the cases of which I have spoken. I think that the probability of accomplishing so great a result fully justifies the appointment of a Royal Commission, as it is proposed by the intended Motion of my hon. Friend. Sir, it will doubtless be admitted by many that the principle which is recommended would have the effect which I anticipate, provided it could be carried out; and I may be expected to indicate how the plan may be put in operation. I propose that insurance both of ships and freight should be so limited as to bring on the owner himself what may be considered an adequate portion of the risk. As regards freight, there does not appear to be much difficulty. There is always the evidence of the charter-parties and the bills of lading of the vessels; but as regards the value of the ship, there is doubtless considerable difficulty. If it was necessary to determine the value of the vessel as closely as if she were passing from one owner to another, I think the proposal would be impracticable; but it is to be observed that any error in the value of the vessel by estimating her too high or too low merely makes a difference in the amount which the owner will have to risk. I think the value of the vessel may be ascertained with sufficient approximation for this purpose. I do not think it would be practicable to carry on the business of underwriting under policies which could be opened, and therefore the value of a vessel ought to be determined at the time or before the insurance is effected. In order to carry out this view, as well as to exercise such control over the shipping as may be found necessary, our Local Marine Boards ought to be reconstructed on a wider basis. If at the various ports where such Boards are necessary they were of a representative character, representing all the interests concerned—the public, the ship-builder, shipowner, and the crew—if these Boards were authorized to employ a surveyor and legal assessor, and if their meetings were open to the public, I should expect to see them exercise in the best manner possible what supervision may be necessary and advisable for our Mercantile Marine. When a shipowner desired to insure his ship he would apply to the Local Marine Board to value her. That valuation would go before a committee of the Board, at which the shipowner should be allowed to express his views, and so the value of the ship would be ascertained with sufficient closeness for the purpose required. When a casualty occurred to the vessel the surveyor of the Local Marine Board would give a certificate of her value and of the ownership, which would be presented along with the average statement to the underwriters, and they would mark on the certificate the amount which they had respectively paid to the various owners. It may be objected that this system would be evaded by what is known as honour policies; but I think a simple provision might obviate this difficulty. In the first place I think, if the amount of risk which the owner would have to bear was a reasonable and fair amount, the underwriters and others interested would support the laws, and not insure beyond the legal proportion; but if honour policies were still attempted, they should be made illegal, and provision made that the ordinary policies should have the benefit of any amount which was covered by honour policies. For instance, if £5,000 were the proper amount to insure upon a vessel, and the shipowner endeavoured to cover £6,000—£5,000 by an ordinary policy and £1,000 by an honour policy—the lawful underwriters could be called on to pay only £4,000, leaving the honour policy underwriter and the shipowner to settle the remaining £1,000 as they pleased outside the law. I may say in passing that I would not interfere with these associations which at present exist for covering risks outside those covered by ordinary policies, because I should consider it sufficient to have the certain definite risk I propose. The principle I recommend is not altogether exceptional. According to the law, the sailor cannot insure his wages for the voyage, on the ground that he would have no interest in doing his duty and completing the voyage. But I do not see any material difference in principle between the position of the sailor and that of the shipowner. I shall only notice some of the objections which may be urged to this proposal, because I consider it unnecessary to establish the whole case, but simply to bring forward sufficient evidence to justify inquiry by a Royal Commission. It is unnecessary to reply to the argument that it is an interference with freedom of contract, because the same argument applies to all our shipping legislation. This proposal is recommended on the ground that under it a great deal of legislative interference at present existing might be dispensed with. I shall doubtless be told that it will seriously affect the small shipowners. That was the view which occurred to myself at the first aspect of the proposal, and in order to satisfy myself as to this, I made inquiry as to the insurance effected by the small shipowners in Aberdeen. There are belonging to Aberdeen 37 vessels under 200 tons register, and I made special inquiry of the managing owners as to the proportion of insurance upon each vessel. The result of the inquiry was, that 9 were totally uninsured, 19 insured not exceeding half their value, 8 insured to a higher amount, and 1 fully insured. This last belonged to a wealthy company. It may also be objected that this proposal would drive some shipowners out of the business; but, Sir, I do not consider that any objection. It will be admitted, I think, that if the class of shipowners who do cause the enormous losses of which I speak were excluded from the business, it would be a great benefit not only to the Mercantile Marine, but also to the nation. The advantages which I should expect to arise to the shipowner apart from those to the nation are that he would be relieved of much vexatious and harassing legislation which presently exists, for we might very safely trust to the self-interest of individuals if that self-interest could be fully secured. In addition to that advantage the portion of the vessel which is insured would be insured at a cheaper rate. At present I am informed that underwriters will take vessels at 1 or 2 per cent less if they know the shipowner runs part of the risk. The great recommendation to the proposal which I have submitted is, that it would influence the conduct of the shipowner from the beginning to the end of his business. If the owner knew that he could not cover all his risk in the vessel he would be more careful to see that the framing of the ship was sufficiently strong, that she was well built, well manned, and fully equipped for the voyage on which she was entering. Were this motive acted on from first to last it would do more to insure the safety of our Mercantile Marine than all the legislation which it is possible to devise.

LORD ESLINGTON said, he was aware that they could not come to any decision that night on that most difficult and delicate subject, and the only result of the conversation would be some suggestions, which he hoped the Government would take into their careful consideration. He must begin by explaining that the gentleman to whom reference had been made (Mr. Cohen) was a Royal Commissioner, and not a witness, and the evidence which had been attributed to him, was elicited in answer to questions put by him to witnesses. The first suggestion he would offer to the House was the necessity of the greatest possible caution in dealing with or legislating upon this subject. The Royal Commissioners themselves had proceeded with very great caution. They felt that Insurance was the basis of the vast mercantile fabric which had been built upon it in this country, and there was danger in touching any of its great foundation stones. He therefore hoped the House would also show, not timidity, but reserve in forcing on the Government any specific propositions. The Commission felt that before that difficult question could be solved, a further investigation was absolutely necessary, and that it should be conducted by one or more Judges and by the ablest lawyers in London, assisted by a person practically conversant with Insurance. He was not there to say that what was the theory should not be the practice of Insurance—namely, that it should be an indemnity only against loss; but the question what was the value of a ship was more easily asked than answered. There were peculiar circumstances of time and locality attending the sending to sea of every ship known, only to the owner at the particular time, and which when taken fully into consideration, made a material difference, and put a special value on a ship. If they limited the insurance to three-fourths of the value, what was to prevent the owner from making a contract to protect him in respect of the margin uninsured? Many ships had undoubtedly been over-valued; but he had come to the conclusion that over-valuation was the small exception to the general rule. The reckless and improvident shipowner undoubtedly gained from over-valuation by the loss of the ship; but the prudent shipowner gained in the lower premium he had to pay by under-valuation; and in his case the amount of premium was a consideration as to whether he should insure his vessel or not. He entirely agreed in the opinion expressed by the late Mr. Justice Willes, that any change in the law would be abortive, unless underwriters were seriously disposed to aid in giving it effect. If serious obstacles were imposed on Insurance, the business would inevitably be driven out of the country into the hands of foreigners. One of the greatest dangers to be apprehended was over-competition. Competition tended to relax surveys, and the rules of construction as to the strength of the vessels. Before he sat down, he should like to make one observation. He did not know whether "coming events cast their shadows before" in the announcement made by an hon. Member opposite of an intention on the part of the Government to appoint a Departmental Commission to inquire into this question, but he trusted the Government had not formed such a determination. As representing a mercantile community, he said such a Commission would not give satisfaction. The subject was full of difficulties which the greatest lawyers might hesitate to confront, and if a Departmental Commission were appointed, it would be known perfectly well that the persons forming it went into the inquiry with biased minds and a foregone conclusion. He wished the field to be perfectly clear, and the inquiry to be conducted by the ablest and most experienced men in the country, because they would have to perform a difficult and delicate task, on the execution of which would depend the attainment of a just and equitable solution, uninfluenced by sentimental considerations. He hoped the Government, if they had formed any such conclusion, would re-consider it, because a Departmental Commission could not carry on the inquiry satisfactorily to the country.

MR. A. W. PEEL said, he was well aware of the great difficulties of the question, and that it was possible for underwriters and insurers to evade any legislation, unless it met with their approval; and unless Parliament gained the assent of the underwriters to legislation, it was liable to become waste legislation. The subject was so full of intricacies and delicacies that it was extremely difficult for an Act of Parliament to follow them through all their labyrinthine windings. In his evidence before the Commission, Mr. Harper spoke strongly on the question, for he said that if insurance were done away with, the business of the country would be at an end. That might be an exaggerated way of putting it; but, at all events, it showed the feelings which actuated him. The Motion asked the House to assert the principle of "indemnity" as the principle of the contract of insurance, and the hon. Mover of the Amendment suggested a limitation insurance to two-thirds of the value; but that only shifted the difficulty, for the same conditions applied to the two-thirds as to the full value. While he would urge the granting of a Commission, he would say it would not be wise to limit it or shackle it in any way by assuming any principle, for the Commission ought to go into the whole question fully determined to see how it bore on all points. Indemnity might be an excellent principle to arrive at; but, judging from the Report of the Royal Commission, they were not yet in a position to say that indemnity and nothing more nor less, should be the principle of our legislation. Several witnesses before the Royal Commissioners were emphatic on this question. Mr. Stephenson, late secretary to Lloyd's, was asked by Mr. Cohen whether he would allow over-valuation—whether, if a policy were filled up at five times the real value of the ship, he would allow it to hold good—and he said—

"No, certainly not; if £20,000, for instance, is the absolute settled value of the ship, and if she is insured for £30,000, what practically happens is that you make two contracts; one is to pay £20,000 if the ship is lost, and the other is a bet of £10,000 she will not get home."

Mr. Stephenson, therefore, argued that no over-valuation should be allowed. Then a difficulty arose as to what over-valuation was, for what was over-valuation to one man was not over-valuation to another. The man who had embarked his whole on one vessel was entitled to say she was worth more to him than was a vessel of the same intrinsic value to a firm who had a line of vessels employed in an established trade, because the loss of one of those vessels would be a far less serious matter to the firm than would the loss of one vessel to the single owner, who would suffer incalculable injury as compared with his more wealthy rivals. Therefore such a man was entitled to say that the vessel was worth to him more than the market price, and that, if he could effect an over-valuation on that account, he did not see why anybody should interfere with him so long as he paid the premium. It must not be supposed he was arguing that any amount of over-valuation should be allowed as between insurer and insured. Under the French law, while valuation was allowed, valuation was presumptive evidence of the value of a ship, which was liable to be rebutted by extrinsic evidence. So, under our law, everything might be vitiated by fraud. He would give the underwriter, if he supposed an excessive value was put on a ship, the opportunity to try the question in a Court of Law. Another reason why he would ask that the scope of the proposed Commission might be enlarged was, that other matters were involved; there were absurdities existing in our laws which it would be well worth the while of a Commission to inquire into if they bore on this question of indemnity. One of these related to the differences between time and voyage policies. In the case of a voyage policy seaworthiness was implied at the commencement of the voyage; but if the vessel, two days after sailing, put into another port and there became unseaworthy, she might leave that port without any obligation or responsibility attaching to the owner, although the unseaworthiness of the vessel might be notorious. In time policies there was no warranty of seaworthiness at all, and the reason of the law was, that on insuring a vessel in a distant part of the world it would not be right to the owner to make him responsible for that which he could not know. Could not these things be put on a proper footing, and seaworthiness implied both in time and voyage policies? Following the lead of the Royal Commission, he had sketched out clauses which he thought might be considered, providing—

“(1) That whether in a time policy or in a voyage policy there shall be an implied warranty on the part of the shipowners that the ship be and continue seaworthy; and (2) that in the case of any valued policy it shall be competent to the underwriter to plead that the sum claimed is in excess of the loss suffered, and that in open policies there shall be deducted from the value of freight claimed to be earned at the due termination of the voyage, such expenses as by reason of the loss of the ship have not been incurred.”

These points might be discussed in Committee. He hoped it was not true that the Government would be satisfied with a Departmental inquiry. The subject was beyond the capacity of the Department to master, and required the services of practical men and of lawyers able to take a survey of the whole legal bearings of the question. Last year he opposed the Bill introduced by the hon. Member (Mr. Plimsoll), on the ground that the Royal Commission had not yet reported, and that it was unfair to prejudge the question. Although the question stood now in a different position, he was still strongly of opinion that it was not by a universal survey, or by legislation of the nature indicated by the hon. Member, that you would touch the acknowledged evil of the unseaworthy ships. He looked to other causes for the correction of this evil, and if the question of Insurance could only be probed to the bottom, he believed that more would be done to put our Mercantile Marine on a sound footing than by any other remedy that could be applied. If a Commission were appointed, he believed that evils would be exposed which would show we were at last on the right track in dealing with this question; but it must not be a Departmental inquiry.

MR. MACIVER said, he differed from the conclusions which had been arrived at by the noble Lord below him the Member for South Northumberland (Lord Easington). The Royal Commissioners had issued two Reports, the conclusions of which were timid and diffident—the first gave no opinion whatever on the subject, and the second merely re-echoed the evidence of the officers of the Board of Trade. These officers were most able men, but the duties thrown upon the Department had increased so much that they could no longer be satisfactorily discharged. The question before the House was not, however, in reference to that Board. It was one of insurance. Several hon. Members had referred to the disasters which took place at sea, and he considered that they had in no degree exaggerated the evils arising from over-facilities in regard to marine insurance. There was no doubt that preventible disasters existed to a very considerable extent; and if the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) had made some mistakes, and exhibited indiscretion in making charges he could not substantiate, yet the general scope of his allegations was perfectly true. He (Mr. MacIver) was no advocate for relieving shipowners of proper responsibility; but he thought that the responsibilities recommended by the Board of Trade and by the Royal Commissioners were a mere shadow that never had been, or could be, enforced. Under Clause 11 of the existing Act, it was already a misdemeanour intentionally to send unseaworthy ships to sea, and he (Mr. MacIver) asked the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade how many prosecutions had taken place under the Act? The man who sent ships to sea intending to lose them, deserved to be hung; but, in truth, legislation failed because it aimed to remedy that which was not the disease. Ships were not, unless in the rarest instances, lost intentionally, or from anything that could constitute misdemeanour; but rather because it was nobody's interest in particular to make sure that they would go safely. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had told the House that there had been four or five prosecutions, but with what result? Substantially none, and why? Not merely for the reasons stated, but because such legislation must nearly always necessarily fail. Dead men told no tales, and when ships went to the bottom, nothing could be proved. The only case he knew in which any real result had come of such a prosecution was one instituted against a Belfast firm, which despatched a miserable little coaster called the Nimrod from Belfast to the Clyde. If the Nimrod had foundered, the firm would have got free; but the vessel reached a port where the Board of Trade managed to stop her under their survey clauses, and the owners were now in gaol. The law, however, could be evaded, if owners took good care not to know that their ships were unseaworthy; and so it was not of the slightest use. The best passenger vessels in the country sailed under a very stringent survey, and that survey, though not as good as it might be, was a great source of safety to travellers. The question before the House, as he had said, was one of insurance. If it could be arranged that disasters at sea should be made unprofitable, a large class of preventable losses would practically cease. He could tell the House that over insurance at Liverpool was exceedingly rare; indeed, so far as the great towns on the banks of the Mersey were concerned, it was utterly unknown, and underwriters there would look very coldly upon any owner who wanted deliberately to insure vessels for more than they were worth. There was certainly nothing in the nature of habitual or intentional over-insurance amongst shipowners in his part of the country; but there might sometimes be reasonable difference of opinion in regard to the value of a vessel, and even, in his own experience, he had seen builders of equal reputation tendering to build at figures varying as much as £10,000 or £12,000 from each other for the same article. He referred to passenger steamers; but even in regard to sailing vessels the varying value was in a different way almost equally marked. Vessels which were worth £7 per ton some years ago had since become worth £17, and at present were valued at £14 per ton. It would be seen, therefore, that it was very difficult to fix any definite and exact proportion in regard to value. There was, however, no such difficulty in the case of cargo; and over-insurance in regard to cargo happened to be the rule rather than the exception. The custom of trade, and especially in regard to bulk cargoes such as grain, coals, or iron, was for owners of cargo to insure a 10 per cent profit. Vessels so laden were those which most frequently went to the bottom. The merchant, broker, or charterer, were all insured, and their profits in each case were safe to them, provided only the vessel was lost: and it was not a question of only one, but frequently even of two profits, because if one cargo was lost there was another to replace it. The shipowner was, no doubt, also insured. Nobody meant the vessel to be lost; but, practically, it was not the interest of those persons to see that the vessel was not overlaiden. It would certainly occur to them to do so, if the loss of the vessel meant a loss of money to them. Something might be done in the way of remedying the evil in the direction of controlling insurances; but he did not think the appointment of another Royal Commission was the right way to set about it. Whilst giving all credit to the recent Commission for their honesty of purpose, he thought that the results of their enquiry offered little encouragement in regard to the appointment of a second Royal Commission upon what was practically a branch of the same subject; but in justification of the eminent men who composed the late Royal Commission, he would point out that they had many formidable difficulties to contend with. How could they get at the truth? Was it reasonable that the owners or builders of unseaworthy vessels, or any other interested persons, would voluntarily come before the Commissioners and give them information, or that the men who were obliged to make their living by going to sea in such vessels would tell them what they knew? The Commissioners sat in London; they had no power, so far as he was aware, to compel the attendance of witnesses, and there was no cross-examination of witnesses before them by counsel. No doubt, many valuable witnesses, who were anxious to tell the truth, appeared before the Commissioners; but others, he believed, attended for no other purpose than to throw dust in their eyes. On the second reading of the Merchant Shipping Bill, he hoped to give his reasons why the House should heartily support the President of the Board of Trade in his honest endeavour to bring about a better state of things, which, however, could only be done by referring the Government measure to a Committee of earnest men possessing such technical knowledge as would enable them to make its clauses effectual for the purposes intended.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY thought the hon. Gentleman who spoke last had somewhat wandered from the question before them, and had accused the Board of Trade of not prosecuting in cases in which, unfortunately, there was no evidence available to enable them to do so. He (Sir Charles Adderley) thought the question a very narrow one. It was not so much whether the House was satisfied with the existing state of the law, as of the mode in which reform should be made. He took a deep interest in the subject of Marine Insurance, because he believed it lay at the foundation of the amendment of the law which he had in hand at that moment, relating to the safety of our merchant ships, and the prevention of recklessness in our Mercantile Marine. The House could come, on the present occasion, to no issue upon the Motion; but he was very glad that it had been raised by the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. T. Brassey), who was in every way most qualified to bring the subject before the House, not merely by reason of his own practical acquaintance with it, or the weight he had in that House, but also because he was a Member of the Royal Commission on Unseaworthy Ships which had lately reported. Every one would agree that the state of the law of Marine Insurance was not satisfactory, and that preparation should be made to deal with such an unsatisfactory state of the law. It could hardly be satisfactory that a law of any kind should be absolutely conflicting with its own avowed principle; and yet that was the case here, because the principle of Marine Insurance, as laid down by all recognized authorities, was the principle of indemnity for loss, and yet the decisions of the Judges had from time to time widely departed from that principle to meet the case of contracts voluntarily entered into. The practice of the law was such as to make it in many instances a gain to the shipowner to lose his ships; there were cases of actual intentional over-insurance; and he maintained that over-insurance differed only in name from a wagering policy, which was distinctly illegal under the Act of George II. Not only might shipowners gain by the loss of their ships, but others might recover less than they ought to do under the principle of indemnity for actual loss, for there were cases in which the underwriter was discharged from his liability owing to some latent defect for which the shipowner was not responsible, and of which he knew nothing. In every way, therefore, the law in practice contradicted its theory. Against a revision of the law it had been argued, in the first place, that it was dangerous to disturb the commercial usages of a country like this. But the marine laws of the country must, of necessity, be in perpetual change more or less to meet the many changing requirements of the times; and when he considered that what was under consideration was not a change, but simply a restoration of the principle of the law, he could not admit the objection to be valid. Another objection was, that the market value of a ship might not be the virtual value to its owner. It was perfectly true that its value might be greater to one man than to another, or greater at one time than at another, but no principle of law could meet such accidental circumstances. There must be some definite and fixed principle. There could be no insurance of fancy value, no insurance of adventitious advantages or of an indefinite or accidental proprietary stake. If there was to be a clear principle of insurance, there must be a definite test of value. It had been argued, further, that Parliament had nothing to do with the matter—that it was a question between the underwriters and the shipowners. But surely the fact that the public safety was concerned gave Parliament a right and obligation to interfere. As long as a total loss might be more lucrative than a partial loss, or than actual safety, it was not in human nature for the shipowner to take as much care in the selection of master and crew and in attending to the general condition of his ship as he would do if he felt that he incurred a risk by any casualty. In the interest of the public safety, therefore, Parliament had not only a right, but was under a duty to interfere. It was not to be expected, considering the keen competition that existed between insurance offices, that the underwriters would take it upon themselves to keep down policies to strict indemnity, and there was a diversity of interest among the shipowners also, which made it unlikely that the needed reform would come from them. The Royal Commission to whose Report so much reference had been made entered very fully into this question of Marine Insurance. They regarded it as of great importance in connection with the subject they had in hand. They declared that it ought to be dealt with, and that it called for careful consideration. He deferred very much to that Report, and the only point on which he differed from the hon. Member for Hastings was as to the mode of dealing with the subject. Unless it was desired to postpone a settlement of the matter, there was no need for another Royal Commission. The evidence of the men best acquainted with the subject in this country had been obtained. It was no longer a question of facts, but a question of policy; and, that being the case, he thought the Government ought to take it up themselves. He did not mean to say that the Government was ready to propose a measure at once. Had he when introducing the Merchant Shipping Bill brought in a measure with it on Marine Insurance he should have been precipitate. Consultation, and important information from men eminent in the law and others, as well at home as from foreign countries, was essential to sound and durable legislation on the subject. He did not propose, however, to wait for an international measure, although it would be advantageous to get other maritime nations to agree with us. In passing, he would say that he did not fear legislating separately for this country as likely to drive men to foreign insurance—he did not think English shipowners were likely to show an excessive desire to insure abroad. The fear that they would was only a bugbear in the discussion, for Englishmen knew their advantages in insuring here, and how difficult it was in some cases to recover foreign insurances. What he wanted was, to ascertain the experience of other maritime countries as to the different systems prevailing among them; and with that object he had ventured, in conjunction with the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office, to circulate a list of questions which would serve to elicit the desired information. These questions had been forwarded to the Governments of maritime countries some weeks ago, and he would place a copy of them forthwith on the Table of the House. He hoped the House would share the views he had expressed, and be of opinion that no second Commission was required; but that the Government should take the subject into their own hands, and collect such further information as they thought necessary to enable them to deal with it. In that way, he believed the views put forward by the hon. Member for Hastings would be more effectually met than by the adoption of any Resolution such as the one which had been placed upon the Paper.

MR. T. E. SMITH said, the subject had been too often treated as a shipowners' question, whereas not one-tenth part of the insurances applied to ships. The great bulk of the insurance business was done on cargoes, and thus it materially affected the whole trade of the country. He must assert, in opposition to a remark of the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, that a very large proportion of the insurance of this country was at this moment done with foreign insurance companies. He was inclined to think that there ought to be some limitation placed upon the amount the shipowner should receive in the event of the loss of his ship, which would prevent him receiving more than the actual amount of damage he had sustained. Shipping property was very different from other kinds of property. Its market value was subject to fluctuations of various kinds. It was not bought for the purpose of sale; it resembled real property. A ship contracted for when the average cost of iron was £9 a-ton would increase in value when the average cost of iron was £16 or £17 a-ton, while the original cost of insurance would remain the same. The value of a ship at the time of her sale might greatly differ from what it was at the time of her construction; and care must, therefore, be taken that in regulating the insurance of vessels a premium was not offered upon cheap and bad ships to the discouragement of good and honestly built vessels. He trusted, therefore, that this subject would not be legislated upon in a hasty manner without taking the advice of practical and experienced men.

MR. PLIMSOLL said, he wished to point out that a distinction ought to be drawn between insurance proper and underwriting. He should have no objection to the shipowner insuring his vessel for any amount he could procure, provided the person who took the responsibility retained it in all its integrity; but he did object to large policies being underwritten for small amounts, which did not give the parties sufficient interest to make the necessary preliminary inquiries. Such a course would not induce them to prosecute in the event of manifest fraud having been committed.

MR. MACGREGOR said, the port he had the honour to represent contained a large number of seamen and of boys who went to sea, and he felt persuaded that the House was moving in the wrong direction on the present occasion. The hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) had spoken of the evil effects of having a large number of underwriters for small amounts. As a shipowner, he might inform the House that he had had no trouble whatever with the large companies, but he had had a great deal of trouble with the small underwriters. He appealed to the shipowners throughout the country to say whether this was not their experience, and whether they would not pay more to the large companies to avoid them. Take, as an illustration, a vessel built in 1872, when iron and wages were very moderate. The vessel would be insured for 12 months at 8 per cent, and underwritten at 4 per cent, that would be a sum of £4,000. By 1873, through the advance of wages and material, the vessel could not have been replaced for £20,000. If insured again at the expiration of 12 months at a cost of 8 per cent, it would amount to a sum of £5,600; but during the currency of that policy the price of labour and material went down again, and if lost, the underwriters would only have to pay the original sum for which the vessel was built. He was perfectly sure that any disinterested Commission or Committee which sat upon the question would come to the conclusion that the proper time to value a ship was not after the vessel had become a loss, and could not be seen by anybody, as in the case of an insurance of a man's life, they might just as well hold an inquest after he was dead to ascertain whether he had ever been worth that money to anybody. He hoped great care would be taken in regard to this matter. He did not shrink from the fullest inquiry, and if it was to be held, he hoped it would be with a full determination to do right and justice to everybody, and that nothing would be done to injure the great Mercantile Marine of this country.

MR. MACDONALD said, if he understood the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. T. Brassey) rightly, he had brought the matter forward not so much in regard to the value of the ship, as with a view to promote the safety of human life. That being the case, the House ought to view the question not so much as one between underwriter and owner, as one affecting a large portion, and perhaps the least cared for portion, of the community—namely, the seamen of the Mercantile Marine. The time for legislation had undoubtedly arrived, and the Government was the proper party to deal with it. He was glad, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman had spoken out in the manner he had done to-night. They had had the red rag of foreign binding on the conscience of an honourable man. He remembered that in 1848 Mr. Smith O'Brien took the oath of allegiance at the Table of the House; but though he subsequently broke that vow he was, three years after conviction, pardoned by the Crown and allowed to return to Ireland. Why, then, should not similar clemency be extended to the soldier M'Carthy? There were many such cases, and he did not see, therefore, why these military prisoners should be treated with so much and such continued rigour. Did not Marshal Serrano and the officers who acted with him in overthrowing Queen Isabella of Spain break their oaths, and yet had not our Government recognized the Administration of which he had been the head? It might be said that the condition of Ireland at the present day did not permit of that; but he wished the House, in considering the question, to agree with him that the motives for insubordination were of no ordinary character, and that the whole circumstances of the case were political in their character. Without doubt the military authorities would regard Colour-Sergeant M'Carthy, who was now under penal servitude for life on account of his connection with the Fenian conspiracy, as one of the worst of offenders. Yet of that man there were proofs that in him were united some of the highest traits of character, and that on several occasions he had risked his life in the service of the Queen—not only that, but it stood on record on the authority of the hon. Member for Donegal, who knew the man, that he was one of the most upright and brave of soldiers, and that he was certainly not one of those who had joined the Fenian conspiracy from sordid motives. In England there existed a settled Government and Constitution under which the nation had grown rich, powerful, and contented. The English people had a holy horror of rebellion or of anything that could disturb the existing order of things. He must candidly admit that that was not the case in Ireland. Ever since the Union, the history of Ireland had been a history of Government repression and popular resistance. And it was a fact to be remembered that the Irish rebel, holding in his hand the declarations of Plunket who was made Lord Chancellor, Bushe who was made Chief Justice, Saurin who was made Attorney General, and Grattan whose remains were honoured by interment in Westminster Abbey, could establish before the world his constitutional right to resist unconstitutional laws. That the Irish State prisoners were not regarded as ordinary criminals was proved by the fact that Boards of Guardians and mass meetings had expressed sympathy with them, and that last year some 70 Members of Parliament urged upon the Chief Minister of the Crown the propriety of giving them their liberty. If, then, the incarcerated men were political offenders, their continued imprisonment was a stain on the character of the British Government. The Canadian House of Representatives had recently passed a resolution in favour of an amnesty being extended to political prisoners, and was it to be said that the Parliament of the United Kingdom was afraid to do likewise? The British Government had been accused of cringing to Russia and America, and if they wished to retain any shreds of reputation he called upon them to set the Irish State prisoners free.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he must remind the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) that he was entirely mistaken in his reading of the history of the first Duke of Marlborough. The hon. Member had stated that Churchill was rewarded for his treachery by having the Dukedom of Marlborough conferred upon him by the Prince of Orange. Now, as a matter of fact, the so-called treachery of Churchill was one of the most disputed historical questions, whereas the treachery of these soldiers was not disputed. The Dukedom was not conferred as the reward of treachery, nor was it conferred by King William, but by Queen Anne, as a reward for his services at the victory of Blenheim. He took that opportunity of advising the hon. Member for Mayo to inform himself of the commonest facts of history before again aspersing the character of heroes whom the country revered.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he felt assured that in the observations made by the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), regarding the Duke of Marlborough, he in no way meant to detract from the honour and glory of his illustrious name, whose victories on many a field so justly endeared his memory to the English people. He only, for the purposes of his argument, stated a fact historically true that the Duke of Marlborough, having been in the service of James II., within 24 hours was in the camp of William III. After the able and eloquent speech which they had just heard, he should not have risen were it not that he intended to present some considerations in favour of the Motion different from those they had heard from the hon. Member for Mayo. Apart from the principle of Fenianism, he had always thought that it would end in disaster, and that the many honest, unthinking, and enthusiastic men who joined in the movement would find so to their cost. But how different was the situation in 1864 from the present. Then America had just been terminating a fierce contest, and American politicians, anxious to catch the Irish vote, would be ready to grant the Irish anything. Now, were aid required from them—the pure Americans—they would snap their fingers at the Irish, conscious that within 10 years the German emigration would create a great preponderance in that country. Again, in 1864, in Ireland, he knew that among large numbers of the people an undefined idea of obtaining French assistance prevailed. The late Franco-Prussian War had rudely dispelled that idea. In short, nobody could dream now of creating an insurrection in Ireland. Then, was not that the time for clemency? Not one word had been, or could be said against the moral character of these men. When hon. Gentlemen discussed the actions of men in former times, who were influenced by similar motives, much as they might differ with their principles, they were often objects of their admiration. Well, God knew, these men had suffered enough. Nine years' incarceration with common felons, the scum of English society! At another time it might be urged the Government could be said to be thought afraid; but that could not be imputed to them were they to exercise clemency. The hon. Member for Mayo had alluded to Marshal Serrano being admitted to the Government of Spain; but the case of the Hungarian Army which fought against the Kaiser at Comorn, was even stronger, for they were now received into the special favour of that very Emperor against whom they had rebelled. He believed there were but few in that House who did not feel for these unhappy political prisoners, and he hoped, if not on that occasion, in obedience to the hon. Member's Motion, that very shortly they would be liberated.

MR. STACPOOLE said, he would also ask the Government to accede to the Motion. He cordially concurred in the observations which had been made by his hon. Friend the Member for King's County (Sir Patrick O'Brien), and thought the time had come when by-gones might fairly be considered by-gones, and that great sore might be removed in accordance with the wishes of the people of Ireland. That step on the part of the Government would give the greatest satisfaction.

MR. WHALLEY said, that he could not support the spirit of the Motion of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power). Whilst he felt much sympathy on behalf of these unfortunate men, he felt more sympathy for the right hon. Gentleman opposite who had to answer this charge. There was an old saying—

"Oh! what a tangled web we weave When first we practise to deceive," and that was the case with the present Government and their Predecessors with regard to the question. The Government, influenced, he believed, by what could not be better expressed than by the term cowardice, had refrained from tracing Fenianism to its source and to grapple with it. They had not dared to do that, but had seized the men who murdered Sergeant Brett at Manchester and had punished them. And what for? No doubt, it was a political offence. No doubt, these men were actuated by what they believed to be the interests of their country. But who taught them that? Who were the originators of Fenianism? Who was it held up before these men not merely all the ordinary influence of leaders, but also the high sanction of religion in chapel, in school, and in every form and shape the treason of which these unhappy men were the victims? It was permissively taught and supported by public money in the schools of Ireland, and yet the Government had not dared to grapple with the evil at its source. How long were we to act the part of national Jesuits, pretending to be a Protestant nation, and yet for our own petty convenience ignoring the fact that this treason was organized systematically? Fenianism was undoubtedly nothing more nor less than one of the manifold chameleon-like developments of that organized conspiracy which priests—he had almost said parsons, too,—were ready, to the extent of their power, to bring against society and against the welfare and happiness of the people amongst whom they lived. The contest between the priestly and civil power of the State was unequal, and would have to be fought out now, or at some future day it would have to be fought out under greater disadvantages. He appealed to the Government on behalf of these unhappy Fenians, who were energetic and patriotic, and entitled to sympathy, and asked them to trace the evil to its true source. He had over and over again implored the Government to afford facilities for investigation, and of bringing before the House by means of a Committee the evidence which he had from time to time been able to produce to show that Fenianism was in its origin sustained by the devices of the priesthood of Rome. Let them seek out the imperium in imperio, the fountain-head of the organized system of treason and opposition to the civil government. They knew what was passing in Germany just now, and he would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman who now so worthily presided over the Government of this country to place England on an equality with other States and enable us to do our duty. He thought that the hon. Members who talked about the sufferings and wrongs of their country could not really believe anything of the kind—

MR. SPEAKER intimated that such an observation was not in accordance with the usages of the House.

MR. WHALLEY said, he had not finished the sentence—they did not believe anything of the kind in the sense which their words conveyed to the House. There was no desire on the part of Parliament to oppress Ireland, which was more highly favoured in many respects than other parts of the Kingdom. He had some claim to speak on the subject; for years ago, he did as much as any Englishman could do amongst the Irish people in mitigating the evils of the Famine, and then it was he learnt the lesson that the people themselves felt the crushing influence of the tyranny of the priesthood. Therefore it was that he pleaded on behalf of the people for protection against their priesthood, against the tyranny under which individuals and the interests of their country were ground down. He trusted the Government would even at this late hour investigate the origin and nature of Fenianism, and trace it to its source; and if they did, they would find that that same malignant power which was imperilling and destroying, and had destroyed for generations, every true interest in Ireland, was still imperilling the interests and the safety of the land.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he gave every credit to the hon. Member for Mayo for his motives and feelings in introducing the subject which he had so very ably brought before the House. He could assure the hon. Member that there was not the slightest wish or desire on the part of the Government to throw either disgrace or dishonour upon any Irishman from one end of the country to the other. In considering this matter, however, he must remind the hon. Gentleman that there was one point connected with the Fenian conspiracy which had not been named by him—namely, that the Government of the day, when they thought they could safely do so, drew a broad line of distinction between the several classes of prisoners convicted during the Fenian outrages, and gave a large amnesty to those who were simply convicted of political offences. There was, however, a class of prisoners—and he regretted to say they were a large class—imprisoned for crimes and offences committed about that time which, in the opinion of the Government, were not political offences. The first two prisoners in the list were those connected, he was sorry to say, with what he had before, and what he must still call, the Manchester murder. Whatever might be the political feeling of those persons who attempted the rescue, and who really caused the death of the policeman, they were living at that time under the protection of the laws of this country, and they attacked the van with such violence that they deliberately killed the constable; by the law of England they were convicted of the crime of murder, and for that crime three of those persons, in his opinion, most justly suffered the punishment of death. It was in connection with that crime that two of the first persons on the list were still kept in prison. Of the next two persons on the list one took an office at Birmingham for the express purpose of buying arms and of providing with arms those who were contending at the time against the English Government, and the other man was a gunmaker, who was employed to make up the arms. They were living at Birmingham at the time. They were convicted for acting in contravention of the laws of the country, and not for committing political offences. The next class were the soldiers. Now, the hon. Member had said that everybody owed allegiance to the Crown. That was true, but a soldier entered upon a special duty; he owed a separate allegiance, and a breach of that separate allegiance by a soldier was a special danger to the country which must be avoided. It would be perfectly intolerable that a person who had taken the oath of allegiance and joined the British Army should when any danger pressed upon the country go over to the enemy and then be held irresponsible for that act. He (Mr. Cross) was bound before he sat down shortly to remind the House that this matter was brought before the House when the late Prime Minister was sitting on the Ministerial Bench in 1873, and the words which he then used seemed so entirely to apply to the present case that, with the permission of the House, he would read one extract from them—

"I am sorry to say, Sir, that there is a strong and most conclusive reason, one which overrides every other reason, for not extending this amnesty to the men referred to, and for leading us to conclude that these men are not political prisoners at all in the sense in which indulgence might be extended to prisoners of that character. It is a sound principle of modern administration, that when there has been a convulsion in a country and the contagion of strong feelings has led men to join it—when it is put down by the arm of the law, the individuals who were parties to it should be dealt with very leniently. But, Sir, I know no reason why single individuals, who, without the apology of contagion, have endeavoured to bring about bloodshed, should be so treated."—[3 Hansard, ccxvii. 997-8.]

Therefore, it was not from any feeling of terror, but with the deepest regret, that he (Mr. Cross) had still to announce that it was the firm intention of Her Majesty's Government not to release the prisoners referred to.

EAST INDIA HOME GOVERNMENT (PENSIONS) BILL.

(Lord George Hamilton, Mr. William Henry Smith.)

[BILL 74.] COMMITTEE.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in moving that the House go into Committee on the Bill, explained that its object was to place servants who were in the employ of the Home Government of India under the Superannuation Act of 1869. The Bill would apply to two classes of persons—first, the Auditors of the establishment, and, secondly, certain Members of the Council. The Act constituting the India Council provided that all who were appointed Members of that Council should be appointed for life, and it enabled them to retire after 10 years' service with a pension of £500 per annum. In 1869 the Duke of Argyll brought in a Bill by which their tenure of office was reduced to 10 years, but the Secretary of State had power to grant them, if he thought fit, a further term of office—namely, for five years, but under that measure they were not entitled to any pension. The present Secretary of State thought it was advisable, in order to get men of the highest calibre to serve, that power should be given him to grant them pensions if he thought it right to do so. The object of this Bill was to place them under the Superannuation Act of 1869. If the Secretary of State gave them pensions, he would be bound to lay before Parliament the Warrant or Minute by which he granted such pensions, and, therefore, if any abuse were committed in that respect, the House would have ample opportunity of discussing the matter.

Bill considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time upon Monday next.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS BILL.

(Mr. Dodds, Mr. Gourley, Mr. Callender, Mr. Rathbone.)

[BILL 63.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. DODDS, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that it was substantially the same measure as that which had been considered by a Select Committee, and that its provisions had received the sanction of the Association of municipal corporations. It proposed to give an increased time for making the needful provisions for a contested municipal election, and also to assimilate the law relating to municipal elections with respect to nominations with the law relating to Parliamentary Elections, and thus to prevent the nomination of bogus candidates. Besides these two main provisions, there were a number of smaller details, the substantial effect of which would be to assimilate the laws governing municipal and Parliamentary elections.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Dodds.)

MR. WHEELHOUSE, in moving, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, that whilst admitting that it was high time to put a stop to what were commonly known as bogus nominations, he considered that the Bill interfered much too largely with the present provisions of municipal elections. He should be quite willing to read the Bill a second time if it were understood that it would be open to him or any other hon. Member to object to going into Committee upon it.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Wheelhouse.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS hoped the hon. Member who had charge of the Bill would agree to that arrangement. So far as he could see there was no principle whatever in the Bill, partaking as it did rather of the character of an omnibus measure, and he objected to certain clauses.

MR. DODDS said, he would agree to the suggestion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday, 14th April.

BISHOPRIC OF ST. ALBANS BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Acts relating to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and enable them to carry into effect a certain proposal for the re-arrangement of the Dioceses of London, Winchester, and Rochester, and the erection of a new Bishopric of Saint Albans, said, that as the matter was of some public interest, he should state very shortly what the proposition was which the Government had to make upon the matter, and how they had been enabled to make it. Hon. Members were quite aware that the dioceses of London, Winchester, and Rochester had, in the opinion of all men who had thought about the matter, and who were competent to judge, largely outgrown the dimensions of such a diocese as one Bishop could practically do the duty of. But in all these matters, the first great difficulty, however much it might be wished to sub-divide a diocese, was the question of funds. In considering the question, the Government had come to the conclusion, first of all, that it must not be held to be a necessity in the Church of England that every Bishop who might be created in future should have an income of £5,000 a-year; and, in the next place, they took it as a maxim, that in the formation of any new dioceses no money was to be taken from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Having stated that, he would now explain that the reason which had induced the Government to introduce this Bill was the very generous offer made by one of the Bishops concerned. The Bishop of Winchester had an extremely large diocese, extending up into a very crowded part of London; his episcopal residence was at Farnham, and up to the present moment he had also one of the largest houses in St. James's Square, Winchester House. It struck that Bishop that that House was hardly wanted by the Bishop of the diocese. It was an extremely large and valuable property, and the rent would no doubt be very great. The Bishop conscientiously felt that his residence in London was not so long as to require such a residence, and the rent, he thought, could be put to a much better purpose. He therefore came to the Government through him (Mr. Cross) with what he might call a most generous and noble offer, placing that house entirely at the disposal of the Government on only one condition—that whatever money could be obtained by its sale should be devoted to the foundation of the new See. He must tender his thanks publicly to the Bishop for that generous offer on behalf of the Church. When the matter came to be considered, several proposals were brought before them. Eventually, the Bishops of London, Rochester, and Winchester, and the Archbishop, together with some other person, were formed into a Committee, and a scheme was the result, which had been modified, but eventually assumed the form he was now about to state to the House. He would state the limits of the diocese of St. Albans, and the territorial re-arrangement of Winchester, Rochester, and London consequent on its formation. The new See would take Essex and Hertford from the diocese of Rochester; Rochester, therefore, would have considerable relief, and would take from Winchester East and Mid Surrey, and from the Bishopric of London St. Mary, Newington. There would be ample work for St. Albans, and they would also by this means be able to provide for the spiritual wants of a great part of the south of London—he believed to the satisfaction of every one concerned. The next question was how the funds should be provided for the new See. Whatever might be the produce of the sale of Winchester House, it would be entirely devoted to the endowment of the See of St. Albans. He would now state the income of the three different Sees, as they would be on the first avoidance of the present Bishops. The arrangement after the avoidance of the Sees of Winchester and Rochester would be this—Winchester would have £6,500 instead of £7,000; Rochester would have £4,500 instead of £5,000, and the £500 to be taken from Winchester and the £500 from Rochester, would be added to the sum to be gained by the sale of Winchester House, to form an endowment for the See of St. Albans. That sum would be augmented most probably by certain funds not legally attainable at present, but which eventually would be appropriated to this purpose. They were of opinion that they could now present this Bill to the House, and request its sanction to the formation of this new See, with a complete scheme to enable the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to sell Winchester House, and to devote the sum realized to the foundation of the See of St. Alban's. As soon as a sum was obtained which would produce £2,000 a-year, the Bishopric would be founded. The Bishop would be in possession of the See, and on the avoidance of Winchester and Rochester, he would have £500 from each added to his income. The probable result of the arrangements would be to secure for the new Bishopric an income of between £3,000 and £4,000. As to the other arrangements, of course everything must be done with the consent of the Bishops of London, Rochester, and Winchester, and the consent of all had already been amply obtained. In the most generous way all the Bishops had given up all their patronage in the parts of their dioceses, which they were consenting to give up. The Bishop of Rochester would during his lifetime continue to receive the same income as at present; but he had come forward to say he gave his consent to the sale in his lifetime of Danbury, and the devotion of the proceeds to the erection of two residences, one for the See of St. Albans, and the other for the See of Rochester. The Bill was simply a Bill for the re-arrangement of the three dioceses of Winchester, Rochester, and London, and he presented it to the House without asking for a farthing of money from any one, only desiring that they would authorize the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to carry the scheme into effect. He presented it really as a gift offered to the Church by the Bishops concerned; and he tendered them thanks for the sincere and earnest liberality with which they had come forward to make the offer. It could not be made in any way with a view to their own advantage, and it was dictated solely by the wish to devote their means, as far as they could consistently with their duty, to the sole good of the Church. [Mr. WHITWELL: Will the new Bishop have a seat in Parliament?] With regard to that, the precedent of Manchester would be followed exactly. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to introduce the Bill.

Mr. BERESFORD HOPE said, there was no doubt that the Episcopate ought to increase with the growth of the population, and he therefore had great pleasure in thanking the Government for the introduction of the measure, for no one could have heard the statement that had been made without the greatest gratification. While desirous of expressing his sense of the great generosity which the Bishops of these dioceses had shown, he trusted it was not intended by this Bill to shut the door to a larger measure, whatever form it might take. For his own part, he could see no incompatibility between a general measure and a specific one like the present. He must also state that at St. Albans there was a magnificent Cathedral, but a Bishop without a Chapter was like a military commander without a staff, and he therefore trusted that a Chapter would be provided for this Bishopric. He would also like to know what was going to be done with the parishes of Addington and Croydon?

Report—Land Titles and Transfer (27-40).

LAND TITLES AND TRANSFER BILL.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

(NOS. 27-40.) REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Amendments reported (according to Order.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had given Notice of some Amendments on this stage of the Bill; but of these some were merely verbal, and in others changes intended to give effect to Amendments of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Selborne), which he was ready to accede to. He believed the only Amendment on which any discussion would arise was that of which his noble and learned Friend had given Notice, and which, if adopted, would follow Clause 10.

Amendments made.

LORD SELBORNE, in moving to insert the Clause of which he had given Notice, and which provided that when, after three years from the passing of the Act, there was a sale of land in fee simple, registration should be compulsory, said, that he might have contented himself with the protest he made on the second reading against the omission from the Bill of a compulsory clause, if his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack had not been so good as to say, that he would willingly hear the reasons for and against compulsion stated, and to encourage him to take this opportunity of raising the question by a distinct proposition. In approaching the question he wished to point out that compulsion in this case differed very much from compulsion in any case where conscience was concerned, or in which non-compliance was punished with any personal penalty. There was no man in their Lordships' House who had a stronger leaning in favour of liberty or against compulsion in those spheres of human action which were proper subjects for free choice than himself. But this was not a question of personal liberty, whether public or private. The subject with which their Lordships were asked to deal was one in respect of which the law prescribed an effect which was to arise from certain things, done or omitted to be done. Therefore there could be no interference with personal liberty in making the registration required by this Bill compulsory. All he proposed to say to the landowner was this—"If you put your property on the register, you will get a legal title with certain rights and incidents. If you do not put it on the register you will not get a legal title, but you will have an equitable title with other rights and incidents." In all the existing modes of conveyance and assurance, certain legal solemnities were required to be used for the purpose of producing certain effects: the entire system being technical, and the creature of positive law. That was just the same sort of compulsion which would be applied, rendering necessary, instead of those solemnities, others of a simpler and more convenient kind, if his Amendment were adopted. Well then, if their Lordships were satisfied that their legislation was proceeding in a right direction and on sound and accurate lines, the presumption was that the legislation ought to be compulsory rather than otherwise. The object was, as far as possible and as soon as possible, to substitute a better system for our present complicated system of land titles and land transfer; and if the plan by which it was proposed to do this was a good one, manifestly public policy pointed to the importance of having it made as general as possible. They ought to leave themselves as little as possible at the mercy of the prejudices and interests generated by the system they intended to supersede, in order to give the best chance possible to the measure which they wished to succeed. That being the general principle on which he desired to proceed, he had next to consider whether in a case of that kind such experience as we had was in favour of a general and compulsory or of an optional and voluntary system of registration. The answer was, that all our practical experience in similar or analogous cases was in favour of compulsion. What had the advocates for reform in the transfer of land been constantly placing before their Lordships as practical arguments in its favour? Why, they had always brought forward the examples of systems in which compulsory registration had already received the sanction of the Legislature, and always with the best results. Take the case of the transfer of stocks, and of shares in ships—was registration in these transactions optional or compulsory? It was compulsory. Registration was compulsory in respect of deeds in Middlesex, in the several Ridings of Yorkshire, in the Bedford Level, and in Ireland; and the Legislature had given its sanction to compulsion in these cases with the express object of avoiding a part only of the evils of our system of conveyancing. There was also the case of dealings in shares in Joint Stock operations. And in our Australian colonies, and in various foreign countries, in which the title to land was evidenced by public registers, registration was compulsory; and the system worked easily, and with satisfactory results. All these examples showed that there was nothing new in the principle of compulsory registration, and that in every case in which it was enforced it had been found effectual. If, by the present measure, their Lordships and the other House of Parliament did not make the registration of title compulsory, he feared there was serious danger of the new system being warped and embarrassed by those habits and those interests which were opposed to it. When he spoke of interests, he did so in no invidious sense; because he believed that in very many instances at least those interests would be brought to bear unconsciously. Their Lordships were aware that in 1869 a Royal Commission was appointed to consider the working of the system of land registry under Lord Westbury's Act. Some of the evidence taken by that Commission was very instructive. He found that a member of a very eminent firm of London solicitors, when being examined by the Commission, stated that as to the neglect of registration he did not believe hostile feeling had much to do with it—he thought it was to be attributed to an indisposition to change and a dread of the unknown. He might cite to their Lordships the testimony of a number of witnesses to the effect that, in their opinion, nothing but compulsion could overcome the dislike to registration. According to his own observation, that opinion was a well-founded one—he believed there would be a vast amount of vis inertia opposed to the working of the Bill now before their Lordships. When that was seconded by those interests to which he had before referred—for it was a matter which, after all, was very much in the hands of the lawyers—it was difficult to feel at all sanguine of success if the system was to be an entirely voluntary one, both now and in the future. He would now call their Lordships' attention to one or two things which ought to be borne in mind when the question of compulsion was considered. The present Bill, as well as the two previous Bills, differed in an important respect from the Act of Lord Westbury. The difference was this. In accordance with the recommendation of the Royal Commission of 1869, it was proposed in this, as it had been in the Bill of last year and the Bill which preceded it, to enable persons to register, not only absolute titles—titles that had been examined and certified by the Registrar—but possessory titles also. That was to say, every man in possession of land might, under the Bill as it stood, register the title which he claimed to that land; and if the Bill were amended by the clause he proposed, he would be compelled to do so, after the expiration of three years from the passing of the Act, in the event, and upon the occasion, of its being brought into the market for sale. The difference between this Bill and Lord Westbury's Act in that respect was, no doubt, very important. It would have been impossible to make registration compulsory under Lord Westbury's Act; because under it, the only titles which could be registered were those which were made out as absolute. What was known as a Parliamentary title was to be made out when a title was put on the register under that Act. Now there were not many estates with such a title in this Kingdom; and the reason was this—It had been customary to sell land with special conditions, and the consequence was that the greater part of the land which had passed through the market was held on titles qualified by those special conditions. But to clear those special conditions off would require a considerable time; and until they were cleared off, the title of land to which they attached could not be registered under Lord Westbury's Act. Again, even where special conditions did not interpose as a difficulty, the expense of making out an absolute title would be, in many cases, an expense which could not be thrown on owners of moderate means. Well, most wisely, this Bill, like its two predecessors, was so framed that it would enable persons, who would not go to an expense which they might not be able to afford, to place their titles such as they were, with all their imperfections, on the register. This provision at once removed a hardship which would otherwise exist if owners were compelled to register whenever their land was brought into the market. The Commissioners of 1869 pointed out that the titles would increase in validity by progress of time from the period at which they were put on the register. They pointed out that recency of date was no objection; because if the purchaser was not satisfied with the title registered, he would require proof of title in the same way as though there had been no registration; after the title had been on the register for five years, they thought it probable that the purchaser might frequently require less proof, and so on; and that, after 30 years, none, or very few, would go beyond the register—while, in respect of the period which had elapsed after the title had been on the register, no one could go beyond the register at all. The lapse of time made the title stronger and more marketable every year; and they said we ought thus to lay the foundation of a system which would become, year by year, more beneficial than the systems it would gradually supersede, and would ultimately substitute a good one for a bad one. The Commissioners compared the process, by which all titles put on the register would be cleared, to that which water underwent in a filter. As the water descended the purer portion was constantly increasing in volume, though that which was yet above remained mixed with mud or other impurity; but when all the water got down below a certain mark, it was all pure. So it was with titles placed on the register. In process of time they were completely cleared. That would, he thought, be an object of high public policy, even if there were no advantage from the very date at which the registration commenced. He admitted it was a drawback that the present generation would not live to see all properties pass through the registration filter; but he was not one of those who thought that the Legislature should have no care for posterity; and a not remote posterity would enjoy the full advantage of the system. Some, however, of its good effects—and those of no trifling value—would be immediate. The expense of the change ought not to be great—for if the title was put upon the register without being completely made out and certified, the cost could not be serious—and, from the very moment of registration, so far as related to the mere operations of charges and transfers, as distinguished from trusts and settlements, all future expense of conveyancing would be got rid of. In our Australian colonies, where the system had been adopted, as far as transfer was concerned, it seemed to be carried out with extreme simplicity and inexpensiveness. Such success as the system had met with in the colonies—and it was generally spoken of as a great success on the whole, though, perhaps, there were some points on which some of the Colonial Acts might be improved—had not resulted from its being optional, but from its being compulsory. If his memory served him rightly, there was some difference among the Commissioners of 1859 on that point—as to the extent to which compulsion should be carried—but the question had been considered by them with respect to a scheme very different from that before their Lordships. Compulsion had, since that time, been applied in the colonies, and had been attended with success. We had also had considerable experience of the working of Lord Westbury's Act, and of what had been done in Ireland under the Incumbered Estates and the Landed Estates Acts, and he thought their Lordships were now in a position to decide as between a voluntary and a compulsory system. Their Lordships had heard from his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack what were the reasons which had led him to withdraw the compulsory provision contained in his Bill of last year, and to make his present measure one for voluntary registration only. The practical objections relied on by his noble and learned Friend appeared to him to resolve themselves into two—one, the difficulty as to expense in the case of small properties, and the other the difficulty arising from the number of local registries which would be required if registration were made compulsory. As to the first of these, he might refer to a printed document which had been placed in his hands, and, no doubt, also in the hands of his noble and learned Friend, and the contents of which were similar to those in a Petition presented last Session to the other House of Parliament. It was drawn up by a numerous and highly respectable body of gentlemen who were solicitors practising in Lincolnshire. It would appear from the document that the county of Lincoln abounded in small freeholds, which were made the subject of transfers, and that these transfers were carried out with much expedition, simplicity, and economy, under the present system. He was very glad to hear that in Lincolnshire there was such a large number of those small freeholds, and he hoped that Lincolnshire was not the only county in England thus favourably circumstanced. If it were demonstrated that a system of registry would not benefit those small freeholders, and would not tend to facilitate the transfer of that class of property, he confessed he should have a much less strong opinion than that which he now entertained as to the advantages to be derived from any Bill of this kind. If such a Bill were only good for the rich, it would be of much less value than he took it to be. But let their Lordships see the conditions which, according to the authors of the document to which he had been referring, made those transactions so simple, cheap, and expeditious; and let them further see whether those conditions would not equally tend to make registration practicable, without any additional cost in those cases. The gentlemen who drew up the document stated that in their part of the country the solicitors and the clients were known to each other, and were acquainted with the land. If that were so, it would much facilitate registration. Then they said that the same solicitor often acted for both vendor and purchaser. That circumstance would be quite as advantageous in the case of registration as it could be in the case of a transfer without registration. Again, they stated that in some instances the purchase money was to be secured, wholly or in part by mortgage on the property, and the same solicitor acted for mortgagor and mortgagee. This, again, would be a saving of money in the preparation of deeds: the transfer and the charge could be simultaneously made upon the register. They urged, further, that in those small cases there were no complications arising out of settlements:—that the titles were simple and well-known, that the assistance of counsel was rarely required, and that the contract was made and the whole transaction completed within a very short time. Every one of these advantages would operate exactly in the same manner, and have exactly the same value, under a system of compulsory registration. The petitioners relied much on the cheapness of the present system; and to illustrate their experience in that way they gave a summary of the costs in 127 cases. Of these 5 were under £50, 17 under £100, 33 under £200, and 14 under £300. He would not go further than £300, because that was the limit in the Bill of last year. The lowest charge for conveyance, including stamp and payments, was £2 8s. upon a £40 transaction; and the highest was £20 upon a £1,000 purchase. The average cost for a conveyance for under £50 was £2 9s. 2d; for a conveyance under £100 it was £2 18s., and for a conveyance under £200 it was £4 3s. 2d. The charges upon the whole 137 cases gave an average of £6 9s. 4d. in each case. Now, what reason was there for believing that the charges under a system of registration would not be equally small? Excluding the stamp duty, the average charge for conveyancing in the cases to which he had referred to was for transactions under £50, £2 9s. 2d.; under £100, £2 18s.; and under £200, £4 8s. 3d. Everything higher cost proportionately more, which, for the mere operation of registration, need not be the case. It would not require more than 5s. for registration, and 5s. for the affidavit, of which the sole object would be to prove possession, and which might, and would be, in a short and simple printed form. The margin for the solicitor's travelling expenses, and fair profit, would be at least as great as now, without any additional charge; and it must be borne in mind that after registration all future transfers would cost comparatively nothing. He thought, therefore, that by fixing the fees at a low rate, as they ought to be fixed, it would be quite practicable to adopt the system of compulsory registration without increasing in the case of the first transfer the cost of those small transactions, and with a great diminution of expense in all subsequent transfers. He observed that the Birmingham Law Society said—"We observe with great satisfaction the omission of all compulsory clauses from the present Bill." The only thing he gathered from the report of those gentlemen from Birmingham was that they were willing to contemplate with complaisance the possibility of a system of registration coming into operation some 20 years hence. It was quite true, as stated by one or more of the witnesses examined before the Commission of 1869, that the system of registration under Lord Westbury's Act was expensive, but the one he now proposed was totally different in its operation. Writing to him on this subject, a gentleman of great local experience, as a solicitor and conveyancer, in the county of Essex had stated his conviction that if registration was not made compulsory, instead of being a benefit, the Bill would be an injury, because it would render it necessary in all cases that country solicitors should employ their London agents to search whether the property was registered or not, and he was of opinion that the views which he (Lord Selborne) had advocated were sound and practical. If they combined an optional system of registration with an optional system of ordinary conveyance, they would add in all cases of optional conveyance an additional expense for searching to see whether the land was registered or not. In Middlesex and Yorkshire and Ireland they had long had experience of registration of a very different, less useful, and far more costly kind; and even such registration, though it might cause some expense, did not check small transactions in land. This brought him to the second question, as to district registries, which he would assume to be necessary; not, indeed, for the examination or verification of title, but for the registry of—at all events—possessory titles by those to whom it might be more convenient to transact that business in the country than in London. This was the opinion of the Commissioners of 1869, who thought that the expense of registering the titles to small properties might be much diminished by having local registries. It was a point, however, on which opinions were divided. Sir Robert Torrens said that in Australia the system of one central registry worked with great facility, and Mr. Smee, of the Bank of England, advocated the same theory. Now, they had already district registries for the County Courts, for the Probate Court, and also local Admiralty registration; and one or other of these systems might be employed to register possessory titles. He would go further, and say that this district registration might be done by any respectable practising attorney. He ventured to think that they would be sufficiently remunerated for this service, whether the business were much or little, by the fees, which might be fixed. If it were much, those fees, though small, would be a substantial remuneration; and, if it were little, there would be no occasion for more than a small remuneration for little work. The whole of this part of the question was matter of detail, and need not involve any practical difficulty or expense which ought for a moment to be put in competition with the great objects they had in view. The noble and learned Lord concluded by moving, after Clause 10, to insert the following clause—

“When, after the expiration of three years from the commencement of this Act, there is a sale of land in fee simple in possession, or subject to any prior estate for life or for years, and whether subject or not to any incumbrance (there not being already a registered proprietor), and the purchaser might apply for registration under this Act, some person shall be registered under this Act as proprietor thereof, either with a possessory title only or with an absolute or qualified title; and any deed or instrument of conveyance of the land shall operate in equity only and not be effectual at law to pass the legal estate in the land.

“The application for registration may be made either by the purchaser (with the consent of the vendor) before the execution of any deed or instrument of conveyance, or, after the execution of any such deed or instrument, by some person interested, beneficially or otherwise, under the same; and if in such deed or instrument any person or persons is or are specified as the person or persons to be registered as proprietor or proprietors of such land, the registrar shall register such person or persons accordingly thereto. If no person shall be so specified the person or persons to be registered as proprietor or proprietors shall be the purchaser, or some person or persons to be nominated by him in that behalf, when the application is made before or without the execution of any deed or instrument of conveyance; and when any such deed or instrument of conveyance has been executed then such person or persons entitled under such deed or instrument as herein-after mentioned; (that is to say,)

“(a.) The person (if any) entitled beneficially in possession to the fee simple of such land:

“(b.) In case of there being persons beneficially entitled under such deed or instrument for successive estates, the person or persons (if any) in whom, if registration were not required, the land would be by such deed or instrument vested in fee, as trustee or trustees; and if there be no such person, the person or persons having the first beneficial freehold estate under the same; or (at his or their request), any person or persons having under such deed or instrument a power of sale over such land, whether with or without any consent, request, or direction.”—(The Lord Selborne.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he could not help rejoicing that, even at the expense of some encroachment on their Lordships' time, his noble and learned Friend had brought the present question fully under their consideration. It was important the House should know on what principles legislation with respect to it should proceed, and it was also desirable that there should be no misunderstanding on the subject out-of-doors. Having heard his noble and learned Friend, their Lordships might, he thought, congratulate themselves on having heard every possible argument in favour of compulsory registration submitted to them in the most forcible manner; but he (the Lord Chancellor) should, he believed, be able to show them that the noble and learned Lord had underrated some of the difficulties which stood in the way of the proposal which he advocated, while there were others which seemed not to have presented themselves at all to his mind which were absolutely insuperable—when he had done that their Lordships would have the opportunity of deciding on the question after having heard both sides. He might at the outset observe that nothing would be more satisfactory to the Government than to propose legislation on the subject which would not leave it to chance or even to the future to determine whether a measure such as that under discussion recommended itself to the good will of the country, but which would at once make it obligatory. He, as well as his noble and learned Friend, was fully alive to the vis inertiae which existed in relation to questions of the kind, and he would gladly overcome it by legislation if he could deem it expedient or practicable to do so. It was, however, because he believed it to be both inexpedient and impracticable in the present instance, that he must ask their Lordships not to give their assent to the proposal which had just been submitted to their notice. He would, in the first place, point out how the question of authority with respect to it stood. His noble and learned Friend had referred to two Commissions, one of which made its Report in 1857 and the other in 1869. Now, he thought it right to mention that the former had under their consideration only the system which involved the examination of titles, although they, in point of fact, clearly recommended that registration should not be compulsory. With regard to the Commission of 1869 the case was altogether different. It was appointed especially for the purpose of finding out why it was that Lord Westbury's Act had failed, and how that failure could be remedied. Before that Commission those witnesses were examined to whom his noble and learned Friend had referred, and there were only two or three of them who suggested anything about compulsion. That, however, was not all. The Commission had before them the project of the registration of mere possessory titles—they had it before them, for the Bill which he (the Lord Chancellor) had introduced in the House of Commons had been amended so as to include titles of every kind; and, on their own Report, they strongly recommended that any system of registration should be founded mainly on the registration of mere possessory titles, and yet declined to recommend a compulsory scheme. They recommended, indeed, that once a title was placed on the register, it should not be taken off; but beyond that they made no recommendation. So much for the weight of authority. He wished, in the next place, to touch on the question of principle. His noble and learned Friend had put forward illustrations as affording a parallel to the present case, which, in his opinion, simply tended to mislead. In advert- ing to that point, he wished their Lordships to bear in mind what the Bill did not propose to do. They were aware that in many countries of the Continent it was thought to be a matter of great public policy to have a registration which would reveal to the public and to the State, at all times, the names of the real owners of every piece of fixed property in the country. These nations made registration compulsory, because their public policy was to have a record of real owners, so that it might be known who owned every acre of land in the country, and unless registration was made compulsory that object could not be attained. Other countries had acted on the policy—we ourselves had done it with regard to Middlesex and Yorkshire, Ireland and Scotland—that the dealings of mankind required that every deed which was executed with regard to real property should be placed on an open register, so that the world might know what deeds were in existence charging incumbrances, or in any way affecting such property. Now, that was an intelligible policy, though he looked upon it as a policy of the worst possible kind—but it was a policy which required compulsion, because otherwise every deed placed upon the register would fail to secure the object in view. In those two instances, therefore, there was compulsion, for it was demanded by the nature of the case. The present, however, was a Bill, which even though it made registration compulsory did not profess to make it compulsory to place the real owner on the register—because the name on the register might be that of a person who had no beneficial interest in the property—neither was it a measure to provide for placing every deed on the register, because the object was that no deed should be put upon it. The two analogies which he had mentioned, therefore, entirely failed. His noble and learned Friend next took the analogy of ships, pointing out that it was sought to make the transfer of land as easy as the transfer of ships, and that the registration of ships was compulsory. Now, he (the Lord Chancellor) was anxious to make the registration of land as easy as that of ships; but it should be borne in mind that the reason why the registration of ships was made compulsory was not to facilitate transfers but because, as a matter of public policy, it was desirable to know that every ship that carried the British flag was in truth a British ship, as she had certain privileges under that title and certain obligations. Then as to stocks, registration was compulsory, for how could there be any transfer except by a change of the inscription on a public register from one person to another? Again, it was said that in Australia registration was compulsory. Now, he believed there was no registration at all in Australia till 1859, when it was found that the registration scheme which he had introduced into the House of Commons might be extremely well suited to that colony. That scheme was, therefore, taken up, if he was not mistaken, by Sir Robert Torrens, and passed in opposition to the Government of the day. He thought that that registration was, in the first instance, voluntary, and was afterwards made compulsory—but under what circumstances? The title of land in Australia depending entirely on Crown grants of certain rectangular squares of land marked out by parallels of latitude and longitude, and mapped out and recorded originally in Government offices, it was found that the system of registration adapted itself without trouble to a state of things of that kind. As it consequently recommended itself to the great body of the owners of land it was largely adopted—at first in a voluntary shape, and subsequent legislation made it compulsory. He should be glad when a system of that nature could be adopted in the same way in this country, and then it might be that a further step could be taken to render it compulsory. He asked their Lordships to consider what was the foundation of this measure. He agreed with his noble and learned Friend that there was a principle of public policy involved in a Bill like the present; but it was a principle of public policy which was to be attained through the medium of a boon offered in the first instance to the landowners of this country. What he understood such a measure to offer was this. At the present day, no doubt, on every transfer or mortgage of land a very large sum was spent on law costs, and that sum had to be spent over again at the next transfer or mortgage. If, for example, they were about to sell 1,000 acres of land, there might be a stamp duty of, say, £50 payable in effecting that sale, while the law expenses connected with the examination of the abstract of title and other difficulties might mount up the bill of costs both on the side of the seller and on that of the purchaser to £450—a sum which he thought in many instances was not an exaggeration. Thus they would have an expense of £500 on each transfer, which was just so much money taken from the seller; because it would otherwise go to the owner of the land that was being sold. It stood to reason that if that £500 had not to be paid by the purchaser, as was now the case, the purchaser would be able, and they might suppose also willing, to pay £500 more to the owner of the land. Therefore, if they could devise any scheme by which a large proportion of the expense now attending the transfer or sale of land might be saved, they would offer a boon to the owner of the land, and would arm him with the power of going into the market and obtaining a higher price for his property. If that were accomplished generally throughout the country, a great public advantage would be derived; but that public advantage was to be, and ought to be, derived in the first instance through the boon offered to the landowner. That being so, he asked on what principle they were to force on the owner of land by compulsion a boon of that kind? Assuming, for the moment, that their means of compulsion were efficacious, what right had the Government—unless it adopted the principle of being a paternal Government—to say to a man—“We offer you a boon of this character; you must accept it; we leave you no choice in the matter?” Did they do such a thing in other cases? No doubt, many of their Lordships thought a particular course of husbandry was the best mode of cultivating the land; but what would they say to legislation which, even with a consensus of the men most skilled and eminent in such matters, proposed to impose a particular course of husbandry on the cultivator, because, forsooth, they felt satisfied it would put money in his pocket and add to the productiveness of the land. He had listened with some interest to his noble and learned Friend to find whether he would supply any precedent for legislation of the kind he recommended, but he had heard none. They often had complaints made of the length of conveyances, and measures had been proposed and carried for shortening them; but he had never heard of any Act being passed to make those measures compulsory, even although a good deal of money might be saved by it. Therefore, even as a matter of principle, he said they had no example, and he believed they had no reason in the abstract by which they would be entitled to force a measure of that nature on those who did not wish to adopt it. Then how did his noble and learned Friend propose by his Amendment to apply the principle of compulsion? He proposed, in the first place, to apply it only in the case where there was to be a sale. Why was it not also to be applied to a mortgage, or, again, to a devise, where there was a will passing land? But, taking the case of a sale, supposing there were two farms separated by a hedge, what right had they to say because it happened that the one farm was about to be sold, that it must be put on the register, and that the other farm need not be, because it was not to be sold? It was suggested that it was desirable to give greater facilities for the passing of land from hand to hand, and to encourage more land being available for transfer than was now the case. Well, it was a singular way of attaining that end to fasten on the land which was going to be sold—which required no compulsion—which was about to pass from hand to hand—they singled out the very land which was already doing the work that they wanted to be done, and they placed that obligation against the will of the owner upon it—because he assumed that if the owner liked it he could take the advantage of that legislation without compulsion—while with the other land they did not interfere at all. He maintained that once they got the land on the register the effect would be that it would enable it to be passed from hand to hand at very much less expense than it was at present—the Bill would be an entire failure unless it secured that end. He believed it would be impossible to put land on the register in the first instance, whether with only a possessory title or with a higher title, without some additional expense for that purpose; and what they were doing by fastening on the first sale of land was to say that there must be a further expense than would otherwise be incurred in the transaction. It must not be supposed that the expense would only be a few shillings, and it must be distinctly understood that the Government were not prepared to recommend a grant of public money for the purpose of cheapening the transfer of land in this country:—the land registry must be self-supporting—for the work to be done, payment must be made sufficient to cover the cost of that work. That principle had been adopted in Ireland, and also in the case of the Middlesex and Yorkshire registries. That was the only principle which the House of Commons would be likely to sanction. Where work of that kind was to be done the fee charged for doing it must be commensurate with the work done. In this attempt to make registration compulsory, it was impossible to draw the line between large and small conveyances on any principle that could be satisfactorily maintained. His noble and learned Friend had admitted, with regard to small transactions, that unless some effective means of local registration could be secured throughout the country, it would be impossible to force registration upon the purchasers. To show what would happen in these cases he would take one instance—and one was as good as a thousand. He had received a communication, not from Lancashire or Birmingham, but from a cathedral city in the south of England. It was from a solicitor whose respectability he had inquired into, and it ran as follows:—

“I have for many years been solicitor for the . . . Benefit Building Society, and in that capacity have had to make numerous conveyances for the members of that society of small pieces of land. The fees in such cases are extremely small, and in one instance I prepared 115 conveyances at 20s. each, and 67 at 10s. each—not, of course, including stamps,—and have made many others for about the same price. The purchase money is, of course, small, ranging from £15 to £50, and a few exceeding that sum. In the course of my practice I have made a large number of conveyances, and do so from day to day, for sums varying from £1 10s. to £4, including stamps. I have to-day engaged to prepare one where the purchase-money is £140 for £3 10s., exclusive of stamps. In such cases the title is simple, and, of course, we take this fact into consideration in the cases especially of the working classes, who generally expect a solicitor to tell them beforehand how much the conveyances will cost. I am quite satisfied that the only effect of compulsory registration would be expense and delay in all small purchases, and they are much more numerous in the country than the larger ones, and thus, instead of the Act proving a benefit to the working classes, for whose advantage it is supposed to have been intended, it will prove very injurious to their interest, and will prevent instead of promoting the sale of land. I am about shortly to prepare 110 conveyances of small pieces of land for the artisan class to build dwelling-houses on. My fee will probably be £1 each, and what can the effect of registration be but a considerable increase of expense, and rendering the whole transaction more tedious and difficult?”

Well, how would those cases where the fee of the solicitor was at present £1 be affected by registration? His noble and learned Friend had referred to the Middlesex Registry. In that case the smallest office fee was 5s. This, however, was but a small part of the matter. It would be necessary when land was placed on the register for the first time, whether the title was merely possessory or not, that the register should be approached by a solicitor. What was to be set down as the charge under this head? In connection with the Middlesex Registry the ordinary charge appeared to be £2 2s. But let it be taken that that was too high, and that the fee in connection with these small transactions would be the lowest which it was the practice of solicitors to charge—namely, 6s. 8d. With 5s. as the office fee, that would make 11s. 8d. to be paid for registration in addition to the charge of £1 already incurred in connection with the conveyance.

LORD SELBORNE: But there need be no deed of conveyance.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR maintained that upon the first transfer—the transaction which was to lead to the title being put on the register—no man in his senses would dispense with a deed. Once get the property registered, and then, he was delighted to think, it might pass by a single change of name upon the register, without any deed. The registration expenses he had mentioned would, he contended, be a very serious additional cost in the small cases to which he had referred. In the larger cases also there would be the same objection. Compulsory registration of the kind proposed would simply be a tax on the transfer of land, and would be felt most heavily by those whom it was desired to encourage as much as possible to become owners of land. Next he came to the very important question as to where the registration was to be done. It was true that the Commission of 1869 had said that it would be desirable to have district Registrars; and in the most cheerful way possible they added that they did not think it necessary to enter into details on the point. There was no doubt that it would be impossible to require persons to come up to London from remote parts of the country—from Devonshire, Cornwall, or Northumberland—for the purpose of registering small purchases in a central office; but his noble and learned Friend said there would be no difficulty whatever in registering possessory titles in the country, and that existing Registrars—those of the County Courts, for example—might be employed for the purpose. This proposal seemed to him to be based on a mistaken view of the necessities of the case. If a district was taken away from the jurisdiction of the London office, it must be taken away wholly, and all the registration for that area must be carried on in the local office. Otherwise, it might commonly happen that land on one side of a hedge, in regard to which it was desired to register a possessory title only, would be registered at the local office, while land on the other side, which had a guaranteed or qualified title, would have to be registered in London. He certainly did not think such an arrangement could work. It would be practically impossible either at the London office or the local office to ascertain what charges there might be upon the land. It would not do for a man to be told at the London office—“You must wait till we have communicated with the local Registrar before getting the information you want.” It was scarcely necessary for him to point out to the noble and learned Lord that it would be impossible to have one kind of title registered by the County Court Registrar in the country and another kind registered by the Registrar at the head office in London; and to enact that one acre of land in Devonshire was to be registered by the Registrar of the County Court of Devon, and that another acre, perhaps adjoining it, was to be registered in London. If that were so, who was to conduct the registration of titles in the different localities? Their Lordships must remember that it required equal skill and legal knowledge to enable a Registrar to judge of a Devonshire title as of a Middlesex title; and it must not be supposed that because Devonshire was at a distance, that therefore the work would not require to be executed with as much exactness as would be necessary in London. But what would be the result of the adoption of the noble and learned Lord's proposition? Why, that in Devonshire, almost any person would be able to act as Registrar; but in London, the duties of the office must be discharged by a barrister of 15 years' standing, receiving a large salary. The noble and learned Lord had stated that he had received a communication from a solicitor in Essex in favour of the establishment of district registries; but, for his part, he (the Lord Chancellor) had received a score of letters every day on the subject from solicitors and others who were not only in favour of the establishment of district registries, but who were also willing to undertake the duties of those offices; they were not only anxious that there should be district registries, but they were anxious to be appointed district Registrars. He did not doubt that every one of those gentlemen, if appointed to discharge those offices, would do their best; but if they could discharge the duties efficiently, what necessity was there to have a head office in London merely to discharge similar duties? Speaking with all respect of the existing County Court Registrars, he did not think they possessed any special qualifications or training for investigating the titles to land. The County Court Registrars were chosen by the County Court Judges, and they were selected chiefly on account of their skill in the forensic litigation which usually came before a County Court, and they were just the very class of solicitors who would not have any special experience of conveyancing. His impression, indeed, was that the County Court Registrars did not require any qualification at all, and that they need not even be solicitors or barristers; all that they had to do being merely to receive wills, and to see that they were properly attested and to send copies of them to London. But he had not even yet exhausted the difficulties that would arise in the event of the noble and learned Lord's proposal being adopted. It was important to determine under what circumstances access to the register of titles should be admitted, and, in his opinion, the registers should not be open to any one who could not show a prima facie interest in the property the title of which he sought to inspect. But the noble and learned Lord now proposed to throw open the register of all the titles of a particular county to a particular solicitor practising in that county—because the County Court Registrars were not required to give up their private practice—who would thus have placed in his hands the key to all the titles to the property in his neighbourhood. Such a provision was not, in his opinion, likely to commend itself to their Lordships. But it might be asked, if all these difficulties to which he had referred were to be anticipated from the proposal of the noble and learned Lord, what was the boon that this Bill would confer upon the owners of small properties? Taking the case of a large estate purchased by a Benefit Society, with the view to its being cut up in order to sell it in small lots, numbering, perhaps, 800 or 1,000, for the erection of small houses, all that would be necessary to do under the Bill would be to register the property in the lump, and then to print some 800 or 1,000 tickets or pieces of parchment of limited size—with perhaps a little map at the corner—and to have written upon them the terms of the transfer of each lot at the office of the Registrar, which could be done at a very small expense. He confessed that he should rejoice to see such a proposal carried into effect, because he was certain that it would confer a great boon upon the holders of small properties. He was afraid that the proposition of the noble and learned Lord, that this Bill should be made compulsory could not be carried out, and he was sorry to inform their Lordships that, in his judgment, the compulsion proposed by the noble and learned Lord was absolutely no compulsion at all—or, at any rate, would not operate as such in nine cases out of every ten. The noble and learned Lord had said that he did not intend, in the event of non-registration, to make the purchase and sale of an estate void, but merely to enact that any instrument of conveyance of land should operate as a conveyance of the equitable estate only, and not of the legal estate, and that the title of a non-registered estate could, therefore, only be perfected by going to a Court of Equity. Such a proposal might have had terrors for an intending purchaser some years ago; but by recent legislation to which the noble and learned Lord had been a party—he referred to the Judicature Act of 1873—the whole of those terrors had been done away with, because by that Act every division of the new consolidated High Court of Justice was bound to take judicial notice of all equitable estates and rights, and to give them equal force with legal estates and rights. Therefore, for the future, under the provisions of that Act, equitable titles would be just as good in 99 cases out of every 100 as legal ones, and so the proposal of the noble and learned Lord would be no compulsion at all. If it were necessary in the hundredth case to get in the legal estate, the emergency would probably not arise until some 20 or 30 years afterwards, when the holder of the legal estate might be in Australia or in the backwoods of America, where nobody could find him, and, consequently, the legal estate could not be got in.

LORD PENZANCE desired to point out that the safer and more prudent and more reasonable course would be to leave the Bill in its present form. He was satisfied that if the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had found it possible to make the registration of titles compulsory, he would have been only too glad to have done so; but considering the various circumstances under which property was held, it was almost impossible to say what injustice might not be done, if the Bill were altered as proposed by the Amendment of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Selborne). The most prudent course would be to pass the Bill in its present shape, and try how it would work. If it were found in the course of a short time that it was desirable to have compulsion in the case of small holdings, it could easily be enacted.

LORD O'HAGAN wished to say a word as to the working of a measure, similar to the present Bill, which had been in operation for the last 10 years in Ireland. Since the year 1850 the Landed Estates Court had dealt with properties of the value of over £50,000,000 sterling, while under the Record of Titles Act, which was similar to that now under consideration, properties to the value in all of £2,000,000 sterling only had been dealt with. The Landed Estates Court gave to every purchaser an indefeasible title, the recording of which was free from any difficulty; and it was plainly the interest of every one who had such a title to put it on record. The want, however, of such a record, which was mainly owing to the absence of a compulsory clause in the Act, left things, in many respects, as they were before the Landed Estates Court was established. Every year created new complications, and made new and expensive searches unavoidable on every fresh transfer, which would have been wholly unnecessary if the machinery of the Record of Title Office had been put into action. He feared that if the clause proposed by his noble and learned Friend were not adopted, the same unfortunate result would arise in England, where the record would be more difficult, and the temptation to avoid it perhaps greater than in Ireland.

LORD SELBORNE, in replying, observed that in small transactions a deed of conveyance would not be necessary, as under the Act the entry on the register would operate as a transfer of the fee-simple. He altogether demurred to the notion that district registries, for all the purposes of the Act, would be indispensable, merely because they might be so for some, and these very simple purposes. The investigation of titles would go on in the central registry. There need only be local agencies connected with, and subordinate to, the central registry, the functions of which would be to receive and record simple transactions, within their local limits, which did not involve the investigation of title, and to transmit to the central registry, with as much promptitude as might be necessary for the purposes of search, duplicates of all the entries made in their books, just as was now done with respect to wills proved, and administrations taken out in the country by the District Registrars of the Probate Court. Then, with respect to the legal estate, the universal experience in transactions of sale and purchase showed that it was part of the solicitor's duty to obtain a conveyance of the legal estate to his client, and no prudent purchaser would be satisfied with less.

NAVY—H.M.S. "ALBATROSS."

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If it is true that Her Majesty's ship "Albatross," in the autumn of last year, was, shortly after her departure for foreign service, recalled to undergo extensive repairs; if he will state to the House the reason for and nature of those repairs, and the cost thereof; whether the state of the ship, which compelled her return, was due to bad workmanship in the dockyard, or to an original fault in construction; and, if the latter, who is responsible for that construction; whether it is usual in composite-built ships to use as an outer skin $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches of soft porous wood; and, if any more ships have been or are being built of similar construction?

MR. HUNT: Sir, it is the case that the Albatross was recalled from foreign service as described by the hon. Gentleman. The repairs were required on account of an offensive smell arising about the after part of the ship. On examination, it was found that the cause of the evil was attributable partly to bad workmanship in the driving of some of the bolts of the ship, and partly to the employment of some coarse grained and porous elm planking, and the parties responsible have been duly censured by the Admiralty. The cost of the repairs amounted to £1,500. It is usual in composite ships to employ elm planking for a few streaks near the keel. A large number of composite ships have been built with outer planking of elm to the same extent as the Albatross, and several of them have served more than one commission without complaint.

JOHN MITCHEL—ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.—QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether originals or copies of any of the documents referred to in the Motion of the honourable Member for Kildare on Friday the 5th March instant, relating to John Mitchel, are in the possession of the Government, or within their immediate reach; and, if any of them are, which are they, and is there any objection to lay them upon the Table of the House?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, the Motion of the hon. Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon), referred to in the Question of the hon. Member for Louth, was for the production of Papers relating to the case of John Mitchel, and was negatived on the 5th of March instant by a large majority after debate and at a time when upwards of 200 Members were present in the House. The hon. Member for Louth, in the Question which he has just put to me, in substance asks me whether I am willing to give him copies of the same Papers as were moved for by the hon. Member for Kildare, or of such of them as are within the reach of the Government; but it appears to me that were I to do so, I should be taking upon myself to act in direct opposition to the decision of the House as expressed on the Motion of the hon. Member for Kildare. I must, therefore, in reply to the Question of the hon. Member for Louth, state that I do not think it would be consistent with my duty to give copies of the Papers referred to in his Question.

MR. SULLIVAN: May I ask whether any of the Papers are in the possession of the Government?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: For the reason I have already given, I decline to answer that Question.

ARMY—THE MEDICAL SERVICE.

QUESTION.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that, on the last occasion, only eleven candidates offered to compete for the vacancies in the medical service of the British Army; how many vacancies there are to fill; and, whether it is true that the first of the eight successful candidates in the late competition had only 84 marks beyond the last of the twenty successful candidates in the competition for the Indian Medical Service?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that the first part of the Question was perfectly correct, as stated by the right hon. Gentleman. With regard to the second part, there were now no vacancies to fill, there being seven in excess of the numbers upon the establishment. It was also quite correct that the last successful competitor for the Indian service was only 84 marks behind the first in the competition for the British service; but he was instructed by the examiners to state that the gentlemen selected were all qualified for the posts they had to fill. Upon other examinations, the reverse had been the case. The last candidate in the competition for the British service in 1873 had 2,318 marks against 2,195 of the first in the Indian competition. The numbers varied at times; but he admitted that they were generally to the advantage of the Indian competitions.

PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS ACT—THE REGISTER OF ELECTORS.—QUESTION.

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked the President of the Local Government Board,

If he will take into consideration the means of rendering the nominal lists of those in receipt of public relief available for facilitating the removal, according to statute, from the Register of Electors of all persons disqualified by such relief, inasmuch as many now continue upon the register in consequence of the difficulty to ascertain, by the method at present in force, the fact of their disqualification?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, the nominal lists of those in receipt of public relief were, under the general order of accounts, made up half-yearly to Lady-day and Michaelmas. The qualifying year for electoral registration ended on the 31st July, so that there was no knowledge on the part of the overseers as to the number of paupers who might have gone on the list between Lady-day and that date. It might, he thought, be provided as a part of the duties of clerks of guardians, that they should furnish supplemental lists for that intervening period, upon the request of the overseers, and upon payment of a reasonable fee, such fee to be part of the expenses incidental to the preparation of the list. He was not aware of any objection to that course being taken; and if that were found upon inquiry to be the case, he would give directions accordingly.

MILITIA—EXAMINATIONS FOR COMMISSIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. AGG-GARDNER asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is the case that the privilege accorded by the Civil Service Commissioners to the unsuccessful candidates for direct Commissions, of ascertaining the marks obtained by them in the subjects in which they have been examined, is refused to candidates from the Militia; and, if so, whether there is any prospect of this apparent anomaly being redressed?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, it was not the practice of the Civil Service Commissioners to state the number of marks gained either by the successful or the unsuccessful candidates for the Militia. In the Army, the number of marks given to the successful candidates were announced, and the unsuccessful candidates could ascertain the numbers on application. The Civil Service Commissioners did not think it would be desirable to state the marks in the case of the Militia, because what they wanted was to ascertain the number which would show efficiency on the part of the candidate.

INDIA—AFGHANISTAN—THE OCCUPATION OF HERAT.—QUESTION.

SIR PERCY BURRELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether, having regard to the occupation of Herat by the Ameer of Afghanistan, Her Majesty's Government are prepared to take such action as will be calculated to ensure the security of our Indian frontier, more especially with reference to Merv?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, as the language of the Question does not very clearly describe the facts upon which the hon. Gentleman bases his Question, I may be permitted to point out to him that Herat and Merv are not, as the Question implies, in immediate proximity to our Indian frontier. Herat is about 750 miles and Merv about 950 miles distant from Peshawur; and, secondly, I must remind him that Herat has been for many years an integral part of the dominions of the Ameer of Afghanistan, and that the action which the Ameer has recently taken in reference to Herat has been to send troops upon whose fidelity he could more confidently rely to replace the garrison previously occupying that post. The Indian Government are fully aware of the strategic importance of Herat and Merv, and that one of their duties is to insure, to the best of their power, the security of their frontier. I think, therefore, the hon. Gentleman may rest assured that in the performance of that duty the Indian Government will give every consideration to any circumstances which may occur in the vicinity of Herat and Merv.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVATE BILL LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. RODWELL asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he has any objection to direct that when the Local Government Department make any Report upon any Private Bill to the Committee on such Bill, or to any officer of either House of Parliament, a copy of such Report shall at the same time be communicated to the agent or agents for the Bill?

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH: These Reports, Sir, as my hon. Friend is aware, are addressed, in pursuance of Standing Orders, to the Chairman of Committees and to the Chairman of Ways and Means, for their information, and for that of the Committees on the Bills. If the authorities of the two Houses see no objection, copies of the Reports may be furnished on application to the agents of the parties.

DESTRUCTION OF PEARL FISHING BOATS—H.M.S. "THETIS".—QUESTION.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, What was the result of the inquiry made into the destruction of a fleet of pearl fishing boats by Her Majesty's ship "Thetis" during her voyage from Suez to Aden in June 1873; whether compensation has been paid by Her Majesty's Government to the owners of the vessels which were destroyed; and, if so, what was its amount; and, whether it has appeared on the Estimates?

MR. HUNT: Sir, the whole of the Correspondence on this subject between the Foreign Office, Treasury, and Admiralty is printed at Page 25 of a Civil Service Parliamentary Estimate (Parliamentary Paper No. 77). The amount of compensation was £12,000, which was voted, after considerable discussion in this House, on the 5th of March.

THE CAPE COLONY—BOUNDARY AT DELAGOA BAY.—QUESTION.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he can inform the House when the decision of the President of the French Republic is likely to be given on the question of the disputed boundary at Delagoa Bay, which has been referred to him for arbitration by the Governments of England and Portugal?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, the question of the disputed boundary had been for some time before the arbitrator, but had not yet been decided. More evidence was required, and when the decision was given Her Majesty's Government would, without delay, communicate it to the House.

NAVY—SHIPS OF THE LATE CHIEF CONSTRUCTOR.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is a fact that besides the "Active," built upon the same plan as the "Volage," there are about thirty armoured and about the same number of unarmoured ships of war built according to the design furnished by the late Chief Constructor of the Navy; whether the sea-going qualities of the greater number, if not of all these sixty ships, have formed a serious ground of complaint by many of the most distinguished officers in Her Majesty's Service, besides that of Captain Fairfax, commanding Her Majesty's ship "Volage," just published; and, whether he will consent to the appointment of a Committee to inquire and report whether the ships designed by the late Chief Constructor of the Navy can be considered as safe and efficient sea-going men of war, worthy a place on the Navy List of Great Britain?

MR. HUNT: Sir, the subject of the hon. and gallant Member's Question, cannot, in my opinion, be properly dealt with by a simple categorical answer. It involves much controversial matter, and is in effect an attack upon the professional ability of an hon. Gentleman who for some years held a responsible post at the Admiralty, and now occupies a seat in this House. I would suggest to my hon. Friend, if he thinks that the matter requires the attention of the House, that he should bring it forward in a way that would allow of his giving the grounds for the opinions he appears to entertain, and that would afford the hon. Member for Pembroke an opportunity for taking part in the discussion.

CAPTAIN PIM said, he would, in that case, give Notice that he should to-morrow move for a Committee to inquire into the sea-going and other qualities of the vessels designed by the late Chief Constructor of the Navy, Mr. E. J. Reed, C.B.

IRELAND—THE LINEN TRADE—CIVIL BILL OFFICERS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, on the renewal of the Acts regulating the Linen Trade in Ireland, which are at present of a temporary character, he will be prepared in the interests of that trade to render them permanent?

The hon. Gentleman also asked, If it is his intention this Session to introduce a Bill to remedy the grievances of the Civil Bill Officers of Ireland?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, most persons who were interested in the linen trade in Ireland seemed to think that the Acts now regulating that trade ought to be made permanent, and, therefore, unless in the meantime he received some important opinion to the contrary effect, he should introduce a Bill to carry out that object. The grievances of the Civil Bill Officers of Ireland appeared to have reference mainly to the salaries they received; but as their whole time was not employed by their official duties, and as in many instances they were employed in other avocations, it was not his intention to propose an increase of their incomes.

POST OFFICE—MAILS BETWEEN LON-DON AND SALISBURY.—QUESTION.

MR. RYDER asked the Postmaster General, Whether, in order to avoid the carriage for 22 miles by Mail Carts of the Mails to and from London and Salisbury at night, and the damage not unfrequently resulting therefrom to articles sent by post, he will sanction the Mails being sent by Railway the whole distance, in the event of either of the Railway Companies establishing trains at suitable times for this purpose?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that the mails to and from Salisbury and London were sent by railway, except on Sundays, when there was no train. The mail carts could not, however, be dispensed with, as they were required for the intermediate country letters. There was no evidence to show that letters or articles posted were more liable to damage when sent by mail carts than they were when sent by train.

SPAIN—SEIZURE OF THE SLOOP
"LARK."—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any steps have been taken by Her Majesty's Government, and what progress has been made since the last Session respecting the settlement of the claims against the Spanish Government arising out of the seizure of the "Lark" by the Cuban authorities in 1869?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that in October last Her Majesty's Government had directed the Minister at Madrid to request the Spanish Government to obtain a report from their officers in Cuba with reference to the subject, and that morning a despatch had reached the Foreign Office from Mr. Layard, in which a very different version was given of the occurrence from that which had been previously received from the captain of the vessel in question. Under these circumstances, it would be necessary to consider very carefully what steps ought to be taken in the matter.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE EASTER RECESS.

QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, After what hour that night he will not take the Friendly Societies Bill, which was the second Order? He likewise desired to know, Whether it is still the intention of the Government to proceed with the consideration of that measure on the Thursday before Good Friday? That would be an unusual course to take, as the House had certainly not met on the day preceding Good Friday for more than twenty years.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not take the Friendly Societies Bill after 11 o'clock this evening. With regard to the other inquiry of the right hon. Gentleman, I believe that until comparatively modern times the House always sat, for some generations, in Passion Week, and that it always met on the Thursday before Good Friday. I do not know of any exception to that rule. At the same time, it is my wish and my duty to consider the convenience of the House as much as I can consistently with the due progress of Public Business; and if it is more convenient to the House that on Thursday, in case the discussion on the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill is concluded, we should not take the Friendly Societies Bill, I would propose that we should take the Army Estimates on that day.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)— WORKHOUSE SCHOOLS—NATIONAL TEACHERS.—QUESTION.

MR. O'CLERY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it is the intention of the Government to consider the claim of the national teachers engaged in Irish workhouse schools to payment by results fees, having regard to the fact that such teachers have been debarred this payment during the three years in which the result system has been in operation, though required to carry out all its details?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that before he submitted to the House the proposals he sketched out the other evening, the claims of the national teachers engaged in Irish workhouse schools to payment by results fees would be fully considered; but he might point out that these persons did not occupy exactly the same position as teachers in the ordinary schools.

(Mr. Secretary Hardy, Mr. Stanley.)

[BILL 3.] COMMITTEE.

[Progress 4th March.]

Bill considered in Committee.

On Motion, "That the Preamble be postponed,"

COLONEL NORTH, in explanation, said, that in his remarks the other evening, he had not the slightest intention, as had been represented, of imputing to the late Sir Henry Havelock that he had derived "pecuniary benefit" from the system of exchanges. What he had said was, that the system of exchanges had given Sir Henry Havelock the opportunity of remaining in India, which afterwards became the scene of his success and his glory. It was not his intention to use one word which would give pain to the hon. and gallant Member (Sir Henry Havelock) or cast a slur on the honoured name of his father.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he had no intention of saying anything which would tend to re-open the discussion on the main principle of the Bill. That principle he understood to be the legislative provision that the difference of value between one commission and another might properly be expressed by a money payment, and that there was no reason, military or moral, why officers should not make what arrangement or bargain they pleased in exchanging one commission for another. He need hardly say that he deeply regretted the decision of the House; but as the House had adopted the principle, after two nights of full discussion, by a very considerable majority, he did not think any useful object would now be served by re-opening the discussion. He rose wholly for the purpose of eliciting some further information as to the mode in which the Bill was to be carried out, and as to the views which the right hon. Gentleman held in respect to some of the claims for exchanging which some of the officers might make. It would be useful and important for the Committee to know whether the Secretary for War intended to sanction all exchanges which might be proposed to him by officers, if there was nothing extremely objectionable upon the face of the transaction; or whether, on the other hand, he intended by stringent regulations to provide that only such exchanges should be sanctioned as, either for reasons connected with the officers' health or for strong reasons of personal convenience, might appear necessary. Some information on these points had been given by the right hon. Gentleman, who had stated that he did not wish to discourage exchanges, but desired that they should be decided on their merits and from considerations of public convenience, leaving the money payments to be settled between the individuals. From that statement, the Committee might gather that it was only in rare cases and for strong reasons that the right hon. Gentleman meant to sanction exchanges. Further on, however, he used words tending to an opposite conclusion, for in another part of his speech he had said that a man might wish to exchange because he did not like his regiment; because his father had been in a regiment and he wished to get into the same; from reasons of nationality; or for other reasons of that kind. Now, he (the Marquess of Hartington) thought that if this was to be the principle on which the Bill was to be worked, these instances would open the door tolerably wide, for one or other of them would be certain to apply; and, as a consequence, we should soon see a very general system of exchanges and paying for exchanges. That was no mere theoretical opinion. The evidence given by Colonel Bray and Colonel Campbell before the Royal Commission showed that before the abolition of Purchase, when payments were allowed for exchanges and the sanction of the War Office and the Horse Guards was required, exchanges were constantly made, a certain market for them existed, and they were hardly ever refused. Now, without speaking of abuses, that was the system to which we were going to recur. But were not abuses extremely likely to spring up under such a system? The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. Disraeli) said the other night he had heard a great deal of abstract reasoning against the Bill, but very little practical argument. The right hon. Gentleman, however, could scarcely have attended to the speeches of his hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan), who showed how, under the system, it would be possible for an officer to purchase, not actual promotion, but the prospect of speedy promotion; while the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock) showed how it would encourage the revival of the bonus system, by officers making a purse and thus enabling an officer who stood in their way to exchange out of the regiment; and how an officer might, by watching his opportunity, purchase a majority in a regiment. We might be told that the veto of the Secretary of State for War and of the Commander-in-Chief would be sufficient to prevent abuses. But we know that abuses of a similar character had grown up under the old system, and it was very much to be doubted whether the Secretary of State for War and the Horse Guards, even with the best possible intentions, would have the means of checking those abuses. The parties wishing to exchange would have the best possible reasons for doing so; they had been suggested by the right hon. Gentleman, who by-and-by would find it difficult to discover what was the real motive for the exchange. In fact, the right hon. Gentleman was rather proud of knowing nothing whatever about the sum paid. But if he did, he might know something also about the ulterior motives; because if a very large sum was paid, it might suggest that some material consideration, which did not appear on the surface, had entered into the transaction. The right hon. Gentleman had said over and over again that he would know nothing about the money to be paid for the exchange; that would be left entirely to the officers exchanging. But in adopting that course the right hon. Gentleman would refuse the only means that would enable him to judge whether the motives for the proposed exchange were honest and good. Moreover, supposing the right hon. Gentleman had resolved that the veto of the authorities should be brought into exercise to prevent the possibility of abuse, what an unenviable task the Secretary of State for War would be about to undertake. The right hon. Gentleman had said the other day,—“An invidious duty is cast upon us which we ought not to be called upon to discharge—that of saying what amount of money might be necessary to cover the reasonable expenses of an exchange.” But any experienced clerk in the War Office would not have any difficulty in checking the amount that ought to be paid. The right hon. Gentleman truly said that would be an invidious duty; but what was the duty he was about to undertake under the Bill? Having sanctioned last week an exchange between Captain A and Captain B on what appeared to be good grounds, Captain C and Captain D would come the week after with an equally plausible story. But the right hon. Gentleman or the Commander-in-Chief might have heard something in the interval which led them to think that there was more in the matter than was apparent, and said,—“I can’t allow this, though you bring forward very good reasons for it.” Did the right hon. Gentleman think that Captain C and Captain D, who might be altogether guiltless, would think themselves fairly treated? In fact, it seemed to him that the right hon. Gentleman and the War Office would find themselves in this dilemma—either they must sanction exchanges generally, they must open the market to an unlimited extent; or they must restrict the power of exchange very much, and thus disappoint the expectations raised in the minds of officers, as well as the intentions of the Commissioners themselves, who had recommended payments for exchange in the interests of officers of slender means. How would officers of slender means be benefited, unless something like an open unrestricted market was allowed? Probably the Committee would be told that these abuses did not occur under the old system, and that there was no reason to think they would prevail under the new. But the answer to that was that things were entirely altered since the abolition of Purchase. When officers could buy promotion directly, there was no reason why they should buy it in a roundabout way. But when Parliament had closed the door against buying promotion in a straightforward way, it was very objectionable that they should be able to purchase it in a roundabout manner. Further, there was another reason why abuses should spring up under the new system which were not likely to arise under the old. That was the only outlet by which rich men would be able to turn their money to account, all the other outlets having been stopped up, and therefore it was far more likely that payment for exchanges would be made use of in an unlimited manner under the new system than when Purchase was allowed. There was one answer which would be likely to be given to his objections. When the Abolition of Purchase Bill was before the House, Lord Cardwell was repeatedly asked to lay on the Table the Regulations he intended to make with a view to ensure a proper flow of promotion, but he always refused. But the cases were not at all analogous. It was impossible for Lord Cardwell to draw up a scheme until he knew how far the flow of promotion would be retarded by the abolition of Purchase, if it would be retarded at all. Lord Cardwell promised that the flow of promotion should not be retarded, and that as soon as the necessity arose he would bring forward a scheme. But the evils of the exchange system, if evils there should be, would arise at once, and therefore the right hon. Gentleman must be prepared to meet them. The House, then, had a right to ask in what way he was prepared to do that. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman’s answer would at least show that he was alive to the existence of at least possible dangers of abuse, and also that he would point out the way in which he intended to deal with them. The right hon. Gentleman’s answer would very much facilitate the debates of the evening upon the clauses of the Bill and the Amendments. He could not pretend to say he expected that the answer would be completely satisfactory. The Committee could not help reflecting that regulations might fail. He was perfectly willing to give the right hon. Gentleman and the Commander-in-Chief every credit for their wish to do nothing to restore the system of Purchase; but the Committee could not feel any security that the right hon. Gentleman would always occupy his present position, and 'he might be succeeded by others who would not hold the same views. He trusted, in the few observations he had made, he had said nothing which could expose him to a charge of abstract reasoning. He had put forward some practical considerations which he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not think unworthy of a reply.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I am not certainly without some surprise at the course taken by the noble Lord when I remember the course taken by his Government on the subject of the Abolition of Purchase. When the Bill of Lord Cardwell was defeated in this House, he at once proceeded to carry out the proposals of that rejected Bill by Royal Warrant, without any intimation to this House whatever as to the mode in which he proposed to abolish Purchase or to regulate exchanges; and he took upon himself—that is to say, the Government took upon itself—to regulate everything, even to the minutest details, connected with one of the greatest changes of public policy ever known without any communication to this House at all; and the noble Lord now calls upon me to say exactly what I shall do when this Bill becomes law. I am not bound to follow the path indicated by the noble Lord; but as I have no desire for concealment or evasion, I will state on what I depend for security. How is it at the present moment? We are protected from Purchase by certain regulations. The noble Lord (Lord Cardwell) laid down the rule that the officer about to be promoted should make a declaration as to paying money. How, at the present moment, are we protected from the evils of undue payments in the case of exchanges? How have we any security that no money has passed beyond the actual expenses? Only the declaration of the officers themselves. When I see that that security contented the noble Lord, and that its efficacy has never been impugned, I feel that I may rely on the same declarations that he did. I am far from admitting that the evils shadowed forth so darkly by the noble Lord are likely to be the result of this Bill; yet there are some things which might occur, but which never did occur under the old system. The noble Lord opposite and his Friends have suggested modes by which, under this Bill, Purchase may be re-introduced into the Army. I do not believe that their suggestions will be followed. I think that danger may be guarded against as easily now, by the declarations of the officers concerned, as it is under the present system. An impression seemed to exist that some new law of exchange is about to be introduced. That is not the case. The Bill will not introduce any greater laxity into the system of exchanges than existed before. All that it will do will be to sanction by law what was sanctioned by custom, provided always that it be done under such conditions as shall prevent any one else being superseded, or in any way affected. What we want to do is to render the practice which so long existed conformable to law. My Predecessor at the War Office did not treat the question on the same high grounds as the noble Lord opposite. He simply put it upon the grounds of personal convenience to the officers, so long as nobody was superseded. When the Purchase system existed, as Mr. O'Dowd said, there were no doubt a great many exchanges made simply and solely with the view of effecting sales afterwards. But that has all been done away with. It is absurd to think those purses we have heard of will be made up by gentlemen who can have no reasonable ground for believing they will get an equivalent. It is very unlikely that the captain will purchase out his senior, when the major is to be promoted by selection, and he can have no hope of obtaining the next step. If you will simply take the trouble to estimate the small number of exchanges occurring at present between majors and lieutenant-colonels, and study that in connection with this Bill, you will, I think, acknowledge the unlikelihood of any great increase in such exchanges. All I wish to do is to facilitate exchanges in all reasonable cases; and I do not admit that a man has either the right or the privilege to exchange whenever he pleases, without reference whatever to the general service. Such an idea has never been recognized. As an illustration of this, I may mention that a case occurred the other day, where an officer whose regiment was going to India exchanged into another stationed at home. Well, a very short time afterwards, the regiment at home was also ordered to India, and he was obliged to accompany it. In former times exchanges have often been refused by the military authorities, and for various reasons, such as where a man had exchanged too often, or even once before. What I propose, and what, under the Bill will alone be permitted, is this—that although the officer exchanges from one regiment into another, he is subject in doing so to the military authorities, and will find himself, whenever the good of the service requires it, in the position of a man who pays no money at all. He will remain just as much at the beck of the military authorities as if he does not exchange at all. In case he is required to go to India the very next day, he will be sent without regard to the money paid for the exchange. I have thus shortly touched on the points mentioned by the noble Lord. I say the same means by which exchanges are controlled under the present system will still remain in force. Exchanges in the Artillery and Engineers are not under the Act of Parliament at all. That point was brought out by Sir George Grey in the Commission on Over-Regulation Prices. What is forbidden by the statute is, an exchange of commissions. There must be two regiments, or there is no change of commissions. Yet the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) wishes to put into the Bill the case of non-commissioned officers and privates—that is to prevent the exchanging commissions where there are no commissions at all. Then the noble Lord says this will be a roundabout way of buying promotion. Well, I have listened very attentively to the whole of the debates on the subject, and the only argument in that direction which I have heard is the making of a purse by the junior officers to purchase out one of their seniors. Now that, I think, can very easily be checked by the declarations to be made by the officer and the regulations of the service. When I reflect upon the former system of exchanges under the Purchase system, I cannot help arriving at the conclusion that our safety lay in the fact that there was no direct recognition by the State of the money that was paid by one officer to another. But what the noble Lord and his Friends wish to do is to fix and continue a regulation price. Well, all I can say is, that the dangers that were likely to arise under the old system were much greater than any which are likely to spring up under this Bill. In the American Army the consent of the two officers is sufficient for an exchange; no inquiry is made as to what money passes between them; and it is the same in France when the State is put to no expense. In conclusion, I wish to say that I simply desire to give a fair protection to officers in effecting exchanges; that when, on reasonable grounds, they demand such exchanges, unreasonable objections shall not be urged against them; and that exchanges shall be granted when proper and reasonable grounds are stated on their behalf, and, as I said before, provided the professional prospects of other officers in the regiment are not affected.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that, in future, there would be the same protection as at present in the declaration to be made on the honour of the officer that he had not received more than the fair expenses incident to the exchange.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, at present, under the regulations of the late Government, they relied on the honour of the officer as to the amount received. He also relied on the honour of the officer in the declaration to be made under the new system.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT entirely agreed that they could rely on the honour of the officer; but the right hon. Gentleman had not explained to the Committee what declaration the officer had to make. That was what they wanted to know. What security had they that Purchase would not be restored? The right hon. Gentleman said Purchase would not be restored; selection would protect them from that. They had heard some years ago, on the highest military authority, that selection could not be worked; then promotion would mainly go by seniority, in a regiment; and, if so, it would be of great importance to a man to buy the place of senior captain, as he would have, if not an absolute certainty, a high probability of promotion. A junior captain wanting to get up to the senior captaincy would subsidise exchanges. That was what would take place. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members might say "Oh, oh!" but it was a well-known practice—[An hon. MEMBER: Not in exchanges.] That might not be so directly; but did they never hear of subsidizing an exchange? It was the commonest practice in the Indian Army. Where a man could not buy a step himself a purse was made to enable him to do so, and that would be done by means of exchange. The thing could not be done directly as in the case of Purchase; but it would be done indirectly by exchanges. What was to prevent a man helping one above him to the money necessary to exchange when he knew that when the exchange was made he would get a step? What security was there against a transaction of that character? The argument derived from the Artillery and Engineers was altogether inapplicable. The argument of the Secretary of State for War was founded on the idea that an officer was commissioned to a regiment; but he was informed that that idea was based on a complete misapprehension—that an officer was commissioned to Her Majesty's Army, and that he was only gazetted to a regiment. At all events, the Secretary of State ought to let them know what was the declaration on which they were to rely.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL said, that after listening to the arguments of hon. Members opposite, he was unable to gather how it was that the proposal to facilitate exchanges could help promotion. If a junior captain exchanged into another regiment and found himself at the bottom of a list of nine, was it to be supposed that the Horse Guards were so blind that they would allow him to effect nine exchanges in succession? In the experience of the oldest soldier, there had been nothing approaching to such a suggestion. Under the old system of purchase a man could exchange with a poor officer, and, by paying a regulation price, buy promotion over the heads of other officers; but under this Bill, officers would simply be allowed to exchange, subject to the approval of the Commander-in-Chief, for their own convenience, provided the exchange did not interfere with the interests of the service; and for the life of him he could not see how this privilege would give rise to traffic in promotion. The explanation of the Secretary of State was as clear as daylight to military men. It did not seem to be understood by hon. Members opposite, and he did not think if it were discussed for three weeks, they would understand it a bit better.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster must have been absent when it was shown there was a danger of exchanges being made the means of buying promotion, unless the Bill should be modified as proposed. He himself sketched the successive steps by which, as soon as the Bill passed, if not so modified, a major would have an opportunity of exchanging from a battalion in India, and in making that exchange he would look for a regiment where the lieutenant-colonel must shortly retire, either on half-pay or full-pay, so that on arriving at that favourable position by exchange, there would virtually stand but one officer between him and that step—namely, the senior major. Then, if he chose his regiment discreetly, he might find the senior major accessible to a further exchange out of his way, and, by paying an additional sum, say £1,000, he would inevitably in the course of 18 months or a couple of years drop into the command of that regiment. The Report of the Royal Commission was full of such cases. It was said that there was a fallacy in that argument in consequence of the question of selection; but what had happened in the past, afforded some indication of what might take place in the future. Out of 149 cases occurring in three and a-half years there were only three which could be called instances of pure selection. As he had said on a former occasion, it was one of the evil effects of this system of exchanges, unless some check was put to it, that it tended to a division of the officers of the Army into two classes—a rich and a poor, with conflicting interests detrimental to the service; it would tend to stimulate what the authorities had been desirous of putting down—an extravagant mode of living in the Army—and if officers were thereby thrown into debt, they would be the more open to offers of money for exchanges.

COLONEL LOYD-LINDSAY said, it was with regret he had to complain that hon. Members opposite had from the first onset treated the question as a Party one. By doing so, they increased the

ing a European force for the Army of India was now being felt, and would, doubtless, be more severely felt in the future, so that it would end in having two classes of officers in our Army—one suited for the Colonies, and one for the Home Army. In that way, all the anticipations so firmly believed in, when the European Army of India was unwisely abolished, would be falsified, and the evils said to have existed under the former system of two Armies would be really felt, instead of being mainly imaginary.

MR. ONSLOW said, he also wished to remind the noble Marquess who led the Opposition, and who had apparently made up his mind to thwart the Bill in every way, that those hon. Members who sat on the Ministerial side of the House were determined to carry the Bill in its integrity. He believed that it would increase the efficiency of the British Army and remove one great inconvenience which now existed.

MR. A. H. BROWN said, he was unable to support the Bill, and he hoped it would go no further than its present stage. His principal objection was based on the fact that in certain favoured Cavalry regiments they were going to endow commissions with a money value. Officers in those regiments might, under the new system, exchange, and after a certain number of years retire from the service with the exchange money in their pockets, there being nothing in the Bill to prevent such an arrangement.

Motion agreed to ; Preamble postponed.

Clause 1 (Short title of Act) agreed to.

Clause 2 (Authorised exchanges exempted from Army Brokerage Acts).

MR. ANDERSON, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 11, after "officers," to insert "non-commissioned officers and privates," said, he must confess himself surprised that the Secretary of State for War should have refused the Amendment, because he had thought the right hon. Gentleman would have been anxious to have removed from the Bill the stigma of being unjustifiable class legislation. The objection urged against his Amendment he had already stated to be entirely erroneous. What did the Bill pretend to do? All it said was, that the Brokerage Acts should no longer stand in the way of officers exchanging commissions.

But the old Brokerage Laws were not confined to officers. The Act of 1809 provided that no person holding a commission, place, or employment under the Crown should traffic in the same. There was therefore no limitation whatever to officers who held commissions, and so his Amendment was quite regular. No one who had listened to the debates on the subject could have come to any other conclusion than that the only argument in favour of the Bill was that it would be acceptable to the officers. That was the basis of the Report of the Commissioners, and it was the basis of all that had been said on behalf of the Bill. It gave the chance of gaining money to the poor man, while to the rich man it gave the privilege of selecting his regiment as well as the district or country in which he should be stationed. Money to the poor, privilege to the rich—the very things those classes most desired. He did not blame the officers for thinking these things acceptable. The same privileges would be acceptable to any other class; but being acceptable and being such good things, why should they not have them all round? If they were good for the officer, why were they not good for the non-commissioned officer and private? It might be said to be beyond the Preamble of the Bill to extend it to all the public services; but distinctly it was not contrary to the Preamble to include non-commissioned officers and privates. That the privileges would be equally acceptable to them, there was no reason whatever to doubt. Officers were allowed without the Bill to effect exchanges, and the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton (General Shute) said, privates and non-commissioned officers were at present allowed to effect exchanges. Therefore, at present, they were all on an equality; but the object of the Bill was to stimulate exchanges by money payments. Why should they stimulate exchanges for money payments among the officers, and not do so among the non-commissioned officers and privates? It might be said that the sum they could pay would be very small; but it would be as great a relative price to the poor man who received it. In fact, the only objection he had heard urged was that the non-commissioned officer or private could not pay the cost of coming home from India. But the Bill was not limited to India.

nights ago, to the effect that many officers after a short service in the Army were useful in the Militia and Volunteers, had been much commented upon; but he had in his hand a long list of Militia and Volunteer regiments in which that was the case. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) was in error in supposing that the Royal Warrant of 1871 contained any words about the passing of money. In answer to the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock), he would also remark that, by the Royal Warrant issued on the recommendation of Lord Cardwell, every promotion was to be made on the recommendation of the Commander-in-Chief, with the approval of the Secretary of State for War. If any officers had been set aside, it must, therefore, have been with the consent of Lord Cardwell. In answer to the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire (Colonel Loyd-Lindsay), respecting exchanges from the Guards, he believed that since the year 1868 only one exchange per annum on the part of the officers had been made. These exchanges must not only have the consent of the Commander-in-Chief and the Secretary for War, but also the approval of the lieutenant-colonels of regiments, who watched exchanges very closely, and were very jealous of the honour of their corps. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford had changed his tone of late in reference to this question. It was not long since he was endeavouring to have Oxford made a military centre, and he painted in glowing colours the advantages which all concerned would derive from this object being attained. He seemed, however, to forget that the troops brought together in such a centre would be commanded by the "fancy officers" to whom he had referred in far from complimentary terms. He wished, in conclusion, to remind the House that the phrase "fancy officers" was not his. He quoted it on a previous occasion from the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), to whom he begged to return the copy-right.

MR. ANDERSON regretted that any remarks should have been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War on his Amendment before it came under the consideration of the Committee. It was very unfair to endeavour to prejudice that Amendment before he (Mr. Anderson) had been heard; and he thought that as the Chairman had called the hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire (Colonel Loyd-Lindsay) to Order for speaking on an Amendment not then before the Committee, he ought equally to have called the right hon. Gentleman to Order. The remarks of the right hon. Gentleman were entirely erroneous, because the Act of 1809 made it a misdemeanour to traffic in any commission, office, place, or employment.

COLONEL EGERTON LEIGH said, he was unable to see the force of the rich-and-poor-officer argument which had been so persistently trotted out in the discussions on that Bill. The fact was, that a very small proportion of rich officers existed in the Army, and that therefore there was very little money among them to pass from hand to hand in case of exchanges. Rich officers in the Army were like the plums in school-boy's puddings—rari nantes in gurgite vasto. There were men in the service who were very poor, and their prospects had been destroyed by Purchase being done away with, because it was to many of them almost a necessity to get to India in order that they might live on their pay. In that case, it seemed to him, as he had said, to be a matter of course that there could not be much money to exchange on either side. A poor man with a wife and large family wanted to get to England, and a poor man who wished to live on his pay wanted to go to India.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he wished to remind the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, that though stringent regulations had always existed in the Army against exchanges to which money considerations were attached, means had always been found to evade such regulations. He deprecated the course now followed of giving to officers the right by law to effect those exchanges which should alone be permitted on military considerations. No one was more anxious than he was to see the rights and privileges of men and officers thoroughly established; but there was a limit to these rights, and especially to the form now proposed, of an Act of the Legislature, to establish exchanges by law, instead of by a General Order or by a Royal Warrant. The fact was, that the evil effect of abolishing a European force for the Army of India was now being felt, and would, doubtless, be more severely felt in the future, so that it would end in having two classes of officers in our Army—one suited for the Colonies, and one for the Home Army. In that way, all the anticipations so firmly believed in, when the European Army of India was unwisely abolished, would be falsified, and the evils said to have existed under the former system of two Armies would be really felt, instead of being mainly imaginary.

Clause 2 (Authorised exchanges exempted from Army Brokerage Acts).

MR. ANDERSON, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 11, after "officers," to insert "non-commissioned officers and privates," said, he must confess himself surprised that the Secretary of State for War should have refused the Amendment, because he had thought the right hon. In fact, the only objection he had heard urged was that the non-commissioned officer or private could not pay the cost of coming home from India. But the Bill was not limited to India.

General Sir George Balfour

It had no geographical limit. Now, a non-commissioned officer might wish to exchange from Aldershot to London, or from Paisley to Edinburgh, or they might wish to exchange from one regiment to another from reasons in no way connected with locality. In the same way as the officers, they might wish to go into the same regiment where they had a brother or some other relative. But he had a word to say about the inability of privates and non-commissioned officers to pay for exchanges. A Return which had been recently issued showed that in the military savings bank there was a sum of £332,000 of the savings of these privates and non-commissioned officers, which showed that they had a little money to expend in this way. In those circumstances, he did not see why the non-commissioned officers and men should not have the same privileges as were given to the officers. A great deal had been said about the discontent which existed in the Army, and which the Bill they were now discussing was intended to allay; but it appeared to him that nothing could be more calculated to lead to discontent among the rank and file than the Bill itself. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 11, after the word "officers," to insert the words "non-commissioned officers, and privates."—(Mr. Anderson.)

MR. GOLDNEY said, the Act of 1809 was passed with the view of bringing in certain officers not included in the old Act of Edward VI. The class of non-commissioned officers and privates were not affected by the Army Brokerage Act, and he did not think the Amendment was at all germane to the purposes of that Act. He would further remark that non-commissioned officers and privates were in no way affected by the Bill either, inasmuch as a rule at present was in force at the War Office by which a man might claim to go into the regiment where his father or brother was. In fact, they possessed the very privilege which the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) sought to give them by his Amendment.

COLONEL MURE said, he had always given the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) credit for knowing something about the Army, and so when he saw his Amendment on the Paper he thought it must be a humorous one. He now found, however, that it was not supported by a humorous speech, and so he was forced to the conclusion that the hon. Member was in earnest. He was sorry that the hon. Gentleman had dissipated the impression in his mind that he knew something about the Army; but every hon. Member in the House, whether he belonged to the military profession or not, must be perfectly aware that the Amendment with which the time of the House had been taken up was perfectly useless. It was an Amendment which could not receive his support, nor that of the Liberal Party. He went further, and said that without drawing any comparison between officers and men—and no such comparison could be drawn—it could not receive the support of any one who had any practical knowledge of the Army.

GENERAL SHUTE said, that he could come to no other conclusion than that some of these Amendments were simply proposed with a view of delaying the Bill. He was opposed to what was called the "levelling" system; and, in his opinion, class distinction was necessary to discipline. No colonel ever troubled himself about exchanges effected by non-commissioned officers and privates, so that the soldier got the best of it. He therefore opposed the Amendment.

CAPTAIN NOLAN pointed out that the proposal would cost the Government of India about £200,000. Every year 6,000 or 7,000 men were allowed to return home from India. Of that number he believed 2,000 or 3,000 wished to stay in the country: but if they were allowed to exchange, there would be that number of men coming home every year in addition to the present number, and 2,000 or 3,000 others going out from England to replace them. He might support the Amendment; but he did so with his eyes open, and on the ground that, if adopted, it might be the means of improving the class of non-commissioned officers.

MR. WHITWELL also supported the Amendment, believing that in many instances the principle would be very valuable. He could not see why the privilege proposed to be given to the officer should not be extended to the soldier.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he did not know whether the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) intended to press his Amendment to a division, but he hoped he might be induced to withdraw it; for he had not satisfied him (the Marquess of Hartington) of the existence of any practical necessity for the legislation which he proposed. Therefore, not seeing any practical object in the Amendment, he hoped the hon. Member might be induced to withdraw it, especially as he (the Marquess of Hartington) could not support it.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had fully expected the officers to be jealous of their privileges, and therefore it was not surprising that all but one of those who had spoken against his Amendment were officers. He might also perhaps except the noble Marquess; but he had long since given up expecting anything thoroughgoing from that front Bench. The only practical argument was that of the hon. and gallant Member below him the Member for Galway (Captain Nolan); but in reply to him he had to say that he fully admitted that it was inoperative as far as India was concerned.

MR. G. O. TREVELYAN said, that if the hon. Gentleman wanted an argument from below the Gangway, he would give him one in a single sentence. There were hon. Gentlemen there who objected to all exchanges of public offices for monetary considerations. They objected to it in the Courts of Law, and they objected to it in the Army; and what they objected to in the case of officers they objected to in the case of non-commissioned officers and privates.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 47; Noes 322: Majority 275.

MR. HAYTER, in rising to move, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 11, after "officers," to insert "not being regimental field officers," said, when Purchase was abolished the recommendation of the Duke of Somerset's Commission was adopted, that all these officers should be promoted by selection on the responsibility of the Commander-in-Chief. But it was impossible to retain the power of selection in the Commander-in-Chief and allow officers commanding regiments to nominate their successors. He wished also to call the attention of the House to the manner in which it would affect the position of superior officers. He had known a case where Major Fraser was serving with a Cavalry regiment—the 7th Hussars—as junior major in India. He exchanged into the 11th Hussars at home, becoming the only major. The lieutenant-colonelcy became vacant in a short time, and, having been appointed, Colonel Fraser became a full colonel in the Army in five years, thus far outstripping his comrades in the 7th Hussars, who remained with their regiment in India. The hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock) had stated that out of 149 promoted by selection, only three had been taken out of regimental promotion, but the case would be very different under the proposed system. Suppose an exchange was made, would that exchange be only for the unexpired term of five years, or would the man who succeeded come in for an entirely new term? In the latter case, the power of selection would be taken out of the hands of the Commander-in-Chief; in the former, the perpetual change of command would be seriously detrimental to the discipline of the regiment and to the public service. He thought it highly probable that this Bill would be worked so as to bring back all the old evils of Purchase, and it was therefore he moved the Amendment. If it were carried, it would remove much of the evil principles of the Bill; but if, on the contrary, the Bill were passed in its present shape, it would be fatal to the system of selection; most injurious to all those regimental officers whose promotion was now the subject of consideration by a Royal Commission, and extremely prejudicial to the discipline among non-commissioned officers and privates, who would know that again, in the opinion of the House of Commons, the command of 1,000 men was to be a matter of purchase or sale to be hawked about in the public market.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 11, after the word "officers," to insert the words "not being regimental field officers."—(Mr. Hayter.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, he must remind the hon. and gallant Gentleman that the system of exchanges would remain as at present; the only difference being as to the payment. If there were two ranks in the Army to which the Bill would more properly be applied than another they were those of lieutenant-colonel and major, because to them the plan of selection applied. Another objection was this—it would interfere with promotion, because when a lieutenant-colonel or major were near the end of their time, other officers would come in and get the fresh term of five years; but his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War had already said that that would not be. It might as well be said that because a lease was originally for 99 years, if it should be taken from the original possessor after 50 years it would run back to the 99 years again. He thought the Committee would do well to reject the Amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he had hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War would have accepted that Amendment, for, according to his own showing, there would be in the case of field officers few, if any, exchanges, and he would therefore be giving up very little in admitting the Amendment. All the evils and dangers which it was feared would result from this Bill were concentrated in the case of the field officers of the Army, because the smaller the body to which and from which exchanges were to take place, the greater the danger would be. If selection for field officers' appointments was to be a reality—and he could show that it had been exercised during the last two or three years in a sufficient number of cases to assert the principle—nothing could more effectually neutralize it than the power conferred by this Bill upon an officer immediately to exchange into another regiment from that to which he had been appointed by selection. The Committee should not forget that the Bill practically conferred on the officers of the Army a right to exchange—a right qualified only by "military reasons." No answer had been given to the question—what was meant by "military reasons," in virtue of which exchange was to be allowed? Was it that no exchanges were to be allowed that were not demanded by military considerations, or was it that no steps were to be taken to prevent exchanges unless they militated against the interests of the service? What sort of a position would the Commander-in-Chief be in when he was called upon to assent to an exchange one day, and to refuse an application for an exchange the next? It would be almost impossible for him to resist the appeals that would be made to him, and to discriminate between the cases. The effect would be to give, contrary to the wishes of the House, a direct money value to the patronage of the Commander-in-Chief, for an appointment as field officer to a home regiment would be worth, by means of exchange, a considerable sum of money. If there were two or three officers of nicely-balanced claims as to merit, it would be a delicate matter to decide who was to be appointed to the lucrative command—namely, that which was convertible into money. If, on the other hand, selection was not to be used, and officers were to be promoted—as no doubt they would be in the great majority of cases—regimentally, evil results were certain, for an exchange on the part of one officer would secure promotion to another; and how could that other officer be prevented from contributing to the exchange? If the junior major in a regiment knew that the lieutenant-colonel was soon about to leave the regiment, would he not be tempted to help the senior major to exchange, in order that he himself might become senior major, and have the certainty of succeeding to the command of the regiment? Such a process might, as had been pointed out, be attended with greater difficulty in the lower ranks; it would, no doubt, be rather a tedious process for a junior captain to induce nine or ten captains to exchange; but this argument did not apply in cases where it was only necessary to assist one major to effect an exchange, and in such a case it would be difficult to prevent an abuse, however great the vigilance of the authorities might be. All these were elements of danger, and the Government did not deny their existence; indeed, the fact that they promised to take great precautions showed they were conscious of those dangers, and they reached a climax in the case of field officers. Staff officers also might plead for exchange as much as regimental field officers. They held their appointments on analogous terms, and there was the same uniformity of duties between staff officers at different stations as there was between field officers in different regiments. Let the operation of the Bill be limited, as proposed in the Amendment, and these difficulties would be avoided. Again, he would like to know whether the exchanging field officer was to serve in his new regiment for the unexpired period of his own original appointment, or for that of the officer whom he replaced? If the latter, an officer might, by always exchanging with an officer who had still the greater part of his five years to serve, prolong his term almost indefinitely; if the former, there would be a stoppage of promotion in the regiment he entered. It was thus clear that exchanges between field officers would involve personal and regimental complications, to avoid which he hoped the Committee would support this Amendment.

MR. A. H. BROWN, who spoke amid continued interruptions and cries of "Divide! Divide!" was understood to say he should vote for the Amendment, because he wished to put an end to money payments in the Army.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, he must remind the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Hayter) that a considerable portion of the officers whom his Amendment excluded—namely, the majors and colonels of Engineers—were the very men who stood most in need of the privilege of exchanging. He should, therefore, oppose it.

MR. DILLWYN said, it was obvious that hon. Gentlemen were determined not to allow of a fair and full discussion of the clauses of this Bill in Committee, and he should therefore move that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

MR. GATHORNE HARDY hoped that the Motion would not be pressed. The hour was one at which hon. Members generally showed themselves impatient of debate, and it was not, perhaps, to be wondered at, when hon. Members repeated the same arguments over and over again, that they should meet with some interruption. He could not quite catch what the hon. Member for Wenlock (Mr. Brown) had said; but his remarks seemed to be a repetition of the speech he had delivered at an earlier hour of the evening. He trusted the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) would not persevere with his Motion. It was most desirable that progress should be made; and, for his own part, he was ready to listen to any arguments that could be urged by the opponents of the measure.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in that case, suggested that the right hon. Gentleman should not give quite so much encouragement to hon. Members who sat behind him and below the Gangway on his own side of the House. It was a most extraordinary thing that those hon. Gentlemen should be so clamorous for a division when the Bill had only been three hours in Committee. This haste contrasted oddly with the debates night after night on the abolition of Purchase. The right hon. Gentleman had alluded to the critical hour, but that was passed, and what he complained of was, that although hon. Gentlemen opposite would not hear his hon. Friend the Member for Wenlock, who supported the Amendment, they listened attentively to the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway (Captain Nolan), who had supported the measure. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Hayter) was one which deserved discussion, and although the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow) had said, speaking of the Conservative Party—"We as a Party are determined to pass this Bill," he (Sir William Harcourt) ventured to think that "we as a Party" would not be able to pass any measure in a high-handed way without listening to arguments when those arguments might happen to be opposed to their particular views. There was no other course open to them than that which had been taken by the hon. Member for Swansea.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL repudiated that view of the case. He admitted that some impatience had been displayed on the Ministerial side of the House, but it was perfectly pardonable. The arguments against the Bill had been repeated over and over again by the same speakers, in nearly the same words. If hon. Gentlemen opposite were convinced that the Bill would restore Purchase, nothing that could be said from the Ministerial side would convince them of their error; but the Bill would do nothing of the sort.

MR. MUNDELLA said, the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Sir Charles Russell) was not in the House during the last Parliament, so that he did not see what took place during the Abolition of Purchase Bill, nor did he witness the tactics then displayed. What the Opposition complained of was, that although hon. Members would not hear the hon. Member for Wenlock, they were as quiet as possible when the hon. and gallant Gentleman who followed him spoke. He had just as good authority for saying that the Bill was intended to restore Purchase as the Government had for saying it would not.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY rose to Order. The hon. Member had stated the Bill was intended to restore Purchase, whereas he (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) had distinctly stated it would do nothing of the kind. By making such a statement he made an imputation on the character of those Members of the Government who were around him.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he had no wish to impute such an intention to the Government. What he meant to say was, that as good a soldier as any that sat in that House had expressed an opinion that the measure would restore all the evils of Purchase—"Name, name!"—he alluded to the late General Storks, who was not a Member of the House when he made the remark; but who deplored that he was not so when this Bill was introduced last year, so that he might have opposed it. Besides that, he had the authority of a distinguished officer for saying that the measure, if carried, would place the poor man in India and the rich man in Pall Mall. He should support the Motion for reporting Progress. He had every confidence in the sincerity of the right hon. Gentleman, but unless the arguments on that side of the House were heard fairly, there was no other course open than to report Progress until the House was in a calmer mood.

MR. ONSLOW said, there was on his side of the House every disposition to listen to what might be urged in opposition to the Bill, but that they had waited in vain to hear any new arguments.

MR. DILLWYN said, he had no desire to prevent the measure from being proceeded with, if temperately and reasonably discussed, and if it was the wish of the Committee he would withdraw his Motion. He hoped the Secretary for War would endeavour to preserve greater decorum among his subordinates during the remainder of the evening.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY pointed out that, although there might have been some interruptions, yet several speeches from the benches opposite had been very patiently listened to. There was no disposition on his side of the House to prevent the fullest expression of opinion on the Bill; but they were naturally impatient when Member after Member on the other side got up and reiterated the same statement which had been so repeatedly and pointedly repudiated—namely, that the Bill was intended to re-introduce Purchase.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

In reply to MR. T. CAVE,

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that in the case where an officer with two years' service desired to exchange with another with five years' service, the military positions of the two would be so entirely different that no exchange could, in all probability, be allowed.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK pointed out that if that statement had been made before, much of the objection entertained to the Bill would have been removed.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 95; Noes 156: Majority 61.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF, who had an Amendment on the Paper, to insert in page 1, line 13, after "corps," "or between officers belonging to the same regiment or corps," said he would withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL LOYD-LINDSAY, who had given Notice that he would move the insertion in lines 13 & 14, after "expedient," of the words, "Provided that in no case the amount paid for any one such exchange shall exceed the sum of five hundred pounds," also intimated that he would not proceed with his Amendment.

MR. MUNTZ regretted the course taken by the hon. and gallant Member, whose Amendment, he thought, should be discussed by the Committee. He urged that there ought to be a definite sum fixed as the amount to be paid for an exchange. Believing himself to be within the Rules of the House, he would himself move that the Proviso of which the hon. and gallant Member had given Notice be added to the clause. Having had to pay £7,000,000 for the Abolition of Purchase, they should be cautious lest they did anything to revive that system. When the Secretary for War said he had no intention to restore Purchase, he believed him; he imputed to him no arrière pensée, because they all knew the integrity of his character, and the straightforwardness of his political principles; but they had no security as to the principles and views of his successors. In such matters they must therefore trust to legislation, and not to the personal character of any Minister. If this Amendment were adopted, he believed it would have the effect of allaying the ill-feeling which prevailed out-of-doors on the subject, and which he felt convinced was much stronger than the Secretary of State for War imagined.

Amendment proposed,

In line 14, after the word "expedient," to insert the words "Provided that in no case the amount paid for any one such exchange shall exceed the sum of five hundred pounds."—(Mr. Muntz.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GATHORNE HARDY objected to saddling the Department with any responsibility respecting monetary transactions arising out of exchanges, and it was on that ground that he had brought forward this measure. He could not assent, therefore, to the proposed Amendment. If his hon. Friend referred to the statute of George III., he would find that all money payments were illegal after the passing of that Act, except such as were sanctioned by Royal regulations. But that Act was only used for the purposes of Purchase, and never operated in respect to exchanges at all.

MR. GOSCHEN regretted that the hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire had not moved the Amendment himself, instead of leaving it to be done by deputy. The hon. and gallant Member had recently written a letter to The Times, in which he had declared that the worst policy would be one under which the pecuniary means of the officers should be eked out by a large bonus system: that the real fault of the existing system arose from the inadequate pay of the British officer; and that under the Bill it would be more difficult for a poor officer in India to effect a homeward exchange than it was at present. He wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman could answer that argument. The Bill would allow exchanges to be put up to auction, a course which he and those who sat near him objected to most strongly, while they thought that free exchanges were of great benefit and should be encouraged. The hon. and gallant Officer further stated in his letter, as he would no doubt have stated in his speech had he brought forward his Amendment, that the abuse of the Bill would be that certain privileges of the Guards, which represented a large money value, would be sold? Why had not the House received an assurance from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War that those privileges would not be sold? Was it, he asked, desirable that those privileges should be brought to market and sold to the highest bidder? He hoped before the Bill passed through Committee to hear some answer given to those questions.

COLONEL LOYD-LINDSAY said, it could not be doubted that the foundation of the Bill was the inadequate pay of the officers, and that, too, was the reason the measure was received with such favour. He felt, however, that was too large a question to introduce into a discussion of this character. He thought a certain amount of bonus was fair, and considered that hon. Gentlemen opposite were very much responsible for this demand, because when Purchase was done away with they took upon themselves the responsibility of saying that the pay of the British officer must be increased. It, therefore, scarcely laid with them now to oppose—as he might term it—this measure of alleviation. He still thought that there could be no great objection to fixing a limit as to the amount within which these exchanges should be allowed, and he failed to see how it could possibly happen that the country would incur any pecuniary responsibility thereby. It was impossible to separate official from private knowledge; and, however much the House might wish to exclude the knowledge of what officers were paying, they could not help knowing it. The reason he did not move the Amendment of which he had given Notice was that the subject had been fully and fairly brought before the Secretary for War, who, he was persuaded, was only anxious loyally to give effect to the Bill of his Predecessor. In that effort he was opposed in a Party spirit by hon. Gentlemen opposite, notwithstanding the fact that the Bill was founded upon the recommendations of a Commission appointed to consider the subject by Lord Cardwell himself.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR agreed with the hon. and gallant Officer who had just down, that the pay of the officers of the Army was inadequate. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War would, he thought, act wisely if he took steps to remedy that state of things. The remedy was available by the use of funds now uselessly spent in paying for too many officers at present maintained for the Army. 1,000 officers of infantry could be struck off the establishment, not only with advantage to the service, but with the certainty of benefit to those who were kept up by providing for their advancement and retirement. The diminution in the number of cadres of regiments, companies, and batteries would also be effected with increased efficiency, and with the certainty of further economies. It was to reforms such as these that the right hon. Gentleman could find ample means for improving the pay, promotion, and retirement of the officers of the Army.

COLONEL NORTH had asked himself during the progress of the debates on that Bill whether there were such persons as the Commander-in-Chief and the Secretary of State for War, or whether the Army was to be placed in the hands of Army Agents. According to the arguments of hon. Gentlemen opposite, an officer had merely to go to an exchange agent, without any regard to the veto of the Secretary of State or the Commander-in-Chief, and arrange an exchange off-hand. He denied that such would be the case, and believed that the supervision which would be exercised would be amply sufficient to prevent any abuses arising under the operation of the Bill. Further than that, he maintained that no officer could be certain of his promotion, and that no man in his senses would pay a large sum upon such a chance. It was refreshing to see hon. Gentlemen opposite standing forward as the friends of the poor officers. Those officers, however, did not appreciate the favour done them by the abolition of Purchase, nor were they grateful to hon. Gentlemen for their efforts to prevent these exchanges. The sooner the House went to a division the better, for both sides had made up their minds upon the question.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, no doubt the hon. and gallant Gentleman had made up his mind; but if upon all subjects when hon. Gentlemen had made up their minds all discussion was to cease, the name of the House of Parliament had better be abandoned. The hon. and gallant Gentleman took exception to arguments against that Bill, which were based upon the supposition that exchanges would be effected through the instrumentality of Army Agents; and himself held the view that nominal, if not active supervision, by the Commander-in-Chief, and of the Secretary of State for War would, if the Bill passed, prevent any of the abuses which its opponents anticipated from its operation. The evidence given by officers examined before the Army Purchase Commission entirely negated the view of the hon. and gallant Member, and showed that the officers regarded the right to exchange through an Army Agent as a vested right on which they could raise money just as easily and as certainly as they could by drawing a cheque against the balance which might stand to their credit at their bankers. For instance, Captain T. Goune, of the 17th Lancers, said that under the old system he should have raised £2,500 by exchanging as a major to India. In what way? He said he should have gone—not to the Commander-in-Chief or the Secretary for War, but to an agent—say Messrs. Cox and Co.—and said—“Find me an exchange as a major to India.” He could have bought his majority by borrowing money. If he had £1,500 and wanted £2,500 he could have borrowed the money upon the certainty of having it repaid by exchange. From that it appeared that the traffic was, and would continue to be, carried on through the Army Agents, and neither Commander-in-Chief nor Secretary of State knew anything about the matter. The hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire (Colonel Loyd-Lindsay) had expressed his opinion that the one thing necessary was to increase the pay of officers in the Army; but he omitted to say that the abolition of Purchase had already done that to the extent of doubling the pay. ["No, no!"] Hon. Members might object to the statement; but if they considered for a moment, they would see that if an officer receiving from £400 to £500 a-year as pay, kept in his own possession the £6,000 or £8,000 which, under the old system, he would have paid for his commission, the interest of that principal sum would amount to doubling his pay. A peculiar feature in the debate had been the fact that the hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire, whose physical courage was undoubted, had run away from his own Amendment. The reason given for that course by the hon. and gallant Member was, that he had entire confidence in the Secretary of State for War; but surely he had the same confidence when he put the Amendment on the Paper. There was something mysterious about the course which the hon. and gallant Gentleman had adopted with reference to his Amendment. Bills had mysteriously disappeared—not in that House of Parliament—under private influences which could not be fathomed, and that evening an Amendment had disappeared under influences which were not clearly explained. That Amendment had been picked out of the mire by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz). Although the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Berkshire had told the House that there would be enormous danger in exchanges unless they were limited to £500, yet he afterwards declined to move that they should be limited because he said he had confidence in the Secretary of State that he would take care that in the system of exchange there should be no abuse. But the day might come when there would be a Secretary of State who would make obnoxious regulations, like the last Secretary for War. How would he feel then? As the hon. and gallant

Member for Berkshire had withdrawn his Amendment in consequence of some assurance from the Secretary for War, he maintained that the Committee ought at least to know what that assurance was. The hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Sir Charles Russell) had stated the other night that those officers of the Guards who had given evidence before the Commission only spoke for themselves and not for the regiments they represented. If so, the Commissioners had made their Report on a wrong assumption, and a new Commission ought to be appointed. The opinion of those officers of the Guards was, that a man in the Guards had a right to sell his privilege, and that it was worth from £2,000 to £3,000. What, therefore, he wanted to ask the Secretary of State for War was whether he meant to allow that or not? That was a question which had not been answered, and it was one to which a reply ought to be given.

COLONEL NORTH said, the evidence which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the City of Oxford had read as to officers in the Guards selling their privileges was the language of a jobber, who was well worthy of the support of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: If the hon. and gallant Member wishes to designate one of the officers of the Army as a jobber I will give him his name.

COLONEL NORTH: I believe if he had not been a jobber he would not have been supported by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Gentleman is out of Order in making an observation of that description.

COLONEL NORTH said, he would at once withdraw the observation. He was answering the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite had argued as if an officer had only to go to an Army Agent without obtaining the consent of the Secretary of State for War and the Commander-in-Chief.

COLONEL GILPIN said, the Commission which was appointed by the late Government to cure the mischief which they themselves had caused, recommended the very course proposed by this Bill.

Sir William Harcourt

MR. ASSHETON observed, that the great distinction between the system now proposed and the system of Purchase was, that in the latter case money had to be paid to an officer by the State; but in the former, money would be paid out of the pocket of one officer into the pocket of another officer.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that the Secretary for War appeared to have some of that cotton wool in his ears, of which he would require a large quantity when this system of exchanges was adopted. The right hon. Gentleman had been repeatedly asked with regard to the privileges of the Guards, and the Committee were entitled to know his views on the subject. The question was whether the officers in the Guards were allowed to sell their privileges, but no answer had been given. With the greatest courtesy he requested the right hon. Gentleman to give an answer.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I have stated several times that the officers in the Guards are not entitled to sell their privileges. The right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that they are not entitled to do so. He knows also perfectly well, that he is not entitled to put to me the questions which he has thought proper to put. I have laid down the principles on which I propose to act—namely, those which were acted on in the former system of exchange. I am determined that those principles shall be observed. I decline to give an answer with regard to particular cases.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he did not ask the right hon. Gentleman whether they were entitled to exchange, but what his views were with regard to the policy of the Guards selling their privileges, for so they termed exchanges. ["No, no!"] If hon. Gentlemen opposite looked at the evidence they would find that officers in the Guards said, when speaking of exchanges, "When we exchange from one regiment to another we are practically selling the prestige of our regiments." Now, that seemed to him to be a question of very great importance and of policy, and any Member of the House was entitled to put a question as to the views of the Government respecting it. What those officers asked for was freedom of exchange, coupled with the custom of selling the prestige of their regiments, as compared with the less privileged regiments. Colonel Burnaby, in his evidence before the Commissioners, referred to the custom of officers selling the intrinsic value of the prestige of commissions in the more privileged regiments, to recoup themselves for the difference in exchanging into the Line. The recommendations of the Commissioners were to the effect that assistance should be given to officers of slender means; but if the right hon. Gentleman made the stringent regulations he had lately spoken of he would fail to satisfy the officers, because they would not be able to sell the prestige of their regiments and to recoup themselves.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL said, that Colonel Burnaby represented solely his own views, and not those of the Guards. There were, however, five other officers of the Guards who held views different from his, but somewhat in accordance with them. Well, he was glad to say only that small number of officers in the Guards did entertain such views. It was clearly shown that in making exchanges the Guards had never bartered their privileges. Officers had come into the Guards, perhaps as Queen's Pages, who had been unable to afford the expenses of a life in the Guards, or who found a wider field open to them in India, or some more active service, and who exchanged for these reasons alone. No doubt, under the old system of Purchase there were a very few cases in which officers accepted a "bonus," to use a commercial term more familiar to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London than to officers in the Guards; but he maintained that such exchanges could no longer be carried out, as the officers had now no opportunity of "recouping" themselves, to use another City term.

MR. GOSCHEN, interposing, said, the terms in question were not City terms, but were used by the officers who gave evidence before the Commission.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL said, the terms were unfamiliar to him until he heard them fall from the lips of the right hon. Gentleman. It would be impossible now to revive the large prices of former times; but the surest way of restoring the old system would be to fix a regulation price, which would become practically the price to be paid.

MR. JAMES said, that as no answer had been given to the question put by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London, he would move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. James.)

MR. DISRAELI said, he trusted the Committee would not take such a course, for it would be unprecedented. Any one might always find an excuse for making such a Motion by imagining that a question had been asked and had not been answered, and there would really be an end to all regularity and decorum of discussion if the Committee authorized such a Motion as that to be made for such a reason. He did not know that any one was justified in saying that a fair Parliamentary question had been asked which had not been answered. Certainly, the right hon. Gentleman opposite had made a charge, and very fairly, but he had only done so in a rhetorical manner. The right hon. Gentleman had not pretended for a moment that the inquiry he had made ought, in a Parliamentary sense, to be answered. He said—"This is a question of policy. I am not asking you a question as to the interpretation of the Bill, but as to your opinion on a matter of policy." The real answer was, that the right hon. Gentleman had no right to inquire what was the policy of the Government in regard to a matter which they had not introduced into the House at all. It was an imaginary point which the right hon. Gentleman had himself created for the sake of discussion. The whole argument of the right hon. Gentleman was as follows:—"I give credit to the Secretary for War for his intentions. I think it likely that his intentions will be realized by the measure he has brought forward, and that all his clients, the officers, will be disappointed." Well, the answer of the Government to the right hon. Gentleman was—"Well, if you think so, you had better let the Bill pass." The Government, on the contrary, said—and he said it himself in a tone of conciliation—"You are very disappointed that we are not restoring and reviving the system of Purchase." The Government quite agreed with hon. Gentlemen opposite that no prestige of any British officer would be sold by auction under the Bill. They entirely agreed with all the inferences which

hon. Gentlemen opposite had drawn, and believed that the Bill was a moderate but a useful one, which would disappoint officers like those whose evidence had been quoted, while it would satisfy such officers as were represented by his hon. and gallant Friend who sat behind him. Having discussed the measure very freely, very fully, and also with credit to both sides, he hoped that the Committee would not for a moment tolerate the proposition made by a Gentleman who bore an honoured name—for he (Mr. Disraeli) had sat for years in that House with his father—but who certainly had not had, with respect to Parliamentary proceedings, so much experience as his respected father. He asked the hon. Gentleman to withdraw his Motion in an amicable spirit, and thus enable them, quite forgetting that it was made, to proceed to the business before them.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the unusual course taken by the Government on the question made it not unnatural that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. James) should have made the Motion. The question put by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Goschen) had not been accurately described as "a rhetorical question." It was an eminently practical question. It was in evidence in the Report of the Royal Commission, which was the shield behind which the right hon. Gentleman acted, that a certain number of officers in the Guards considered that, under the system of free exchange about to be restored, they had a right to sell the prestige of their commissions. It must be known perfectly well that the prestige of the regiments of the Guards was a saleable commodity; that many officers would be willing to pay a large sum of money for such an exchange. What they wanted to know, therefore, was whether the right hon. Gentleman intended to permit exchanges upon such a footing. Of course, these officers had no "right" to demand such permission; but everybody knew that these exchanges were looked upon as a right under the old system. In the view of the Government, then, were sales of the prestige of certain regiments to be permitted in future? If the Secretary for War did not choose to answer the question, the Committee, and he hoped the country, would draw their own conclusions from the silence of the right hon. Gentleman. He recommended, however, the withdrawal of the Motion to report Progress.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 146; Noes 222: Majority 76.

MR. WHITWELL moved, as an Amendment, in lines 13 and 14, to omit from the word "expedient" to the end of the clause. The effect of the Amendment, he said, would be to strike out the words repealing the Brokerage Acts so far as they affected the payment of money for exchanges. He held that it was all the more necessary to maintain the Brokerage Acts, since the Committee had decided in the last division, that no limit should be placed on the amount to be paid for exchanges. The Act of Edward VI. was to prevent corruption, and subsequently the Act 49 Geo. III. was extended to commissions in the Army, subject to the Queen's Regulations; and the Bill would be understood by the country as intended to abolish those restrictions against corruption so far as regarded the Army, which were maintained against all other services.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the hon. Member had by that Amendment, in effect, proposed to leave out the whole substance of the Bill, because it would not have been brought in at all were it not for the purpose of repealing the Army Brokerage Act as far as regarded exchanges. If that Act was to remain in force, he would have to lay down regulations as to the money to be paid on exchange, and to that he entirely objected. He might take that opportunity of saying that he had answered over and over again the question which the noble Lord had put to him, and his answer was that all exchanges, whether in the Guards or otherwise, if there were no military considerations against them, would be made without the amount to be paid being settled by the War Office.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was happy they had got an answer at last. They now distinctly understood that if there was no military objection, officers in the Guards or otherwise would be able to sell their prestige to the officers of other regiments. He did not wish to discuss that point any further, he would merely say that he did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman. As for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Whitwell), it amounted to a proposal to vote again on the principle of the Bill. He had voted twice against that principle, and he did not imagine any different result would be arrived at if the hon. Gentleman were to press his Amendment. If, then, the hon. Member for Kendal would accept his advice, he would not divide the Committee.

MR. WHITWELL said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 16, after "in force," to insert—

"Provided that no exchange shall be sanctioned in any case in which the officer paying money for that exchange would be placed in a better position as to his prospective promotion than he occupied before that exchange,"

said, he had to thank the hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North) for the frank and courteous explanation he had given of his statement the other evening with respect to the exchanges effected by his father, and in which money had been no object, but only regard for the rules of the service. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would adopt the Amendment, which was, both in its nature and its object, entirely in keeping with what the right hon. Gentleman said when he introduced the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman told the House that it was a Bill to facilitate exchanges; and the Amendment, if it had not that effect, would certainly not hamper that facility. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Bill would not open a door for the re-introduction of Purchase, to abolish which the country had paid £7,000,000, and the Amendment had the same object in view. It had always been the practice in this country not to leave the interpretation of laws to those who administered them; but to introduce into every Act a distinct statement of the principle and purpose for which it was intended, and in order to follow that rule he proposed the Amendment. He did not doubt the assertion of the right hon. Gentleman, that he had no intention of retracing the step that had been taken as to Purchase; but Secretaries of State were not eternal, and his successor might not take the same view of the Bill as the right hon. Gentleman. Its meaning and intent, therefore, ought to appear clearly in the Bill itself. There had been a great change within the last few days in public opinion with regard to the Bill, because it so closely resembled Purchase in the Army that it was undistinguishable except by professional men. The apprehension which he entertained was not in any respect a theoretical one, but one founded upon actual experience. He had known within the last few years the case of a major of distinguished service whose name had been frequently mentioned in General Orders and in despatches, so that he had every right to look forward to the command of a battalion, but who was disappointed by reason of an exchange of the kind which it was the object of his Amendment to render impossible. That officer was so disgusted at what had taken place that he at once retired from active service and went upon half-pay. He would give the Government the names if they desired to investigate the case, the details of which, he believed, never came to the knowledge of the Commander-in-Chief. His Amendment put the Bill upon its trial before the tribunal of public opinion, and although the Government, as they had been told by the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow), intended to carry the Bill as it stood, a victory like that in the face of the common sense of the country, resting not upon argument, but upon numerical force, was likely to prove the first nail in the coffin of the Conservative majority. The Liberal Party would, however, have it to say that they did their duty in protesting against such hasty and ill-considered legislation. He would conclude by moving the Amendment.

MR. F. STANLEY wished to say, in no spirit of animosity, that it was impossible to assent to the Amendment, because it contained provisions which, even if adopted, it would be almost impossible practically to carry out. In order to give effect to it, it would be necessary to know what was the exact position as to prospective promotion of any officer in the Army, and to ascertain that knowledge, if it were possible, would involve an amount of actuarial labour which had not been undertaken to arrive at more definite results than had as yet been reached. It would be really very difficult to say whether a man would be placed in a better position than he would have occupied if he had not exchanged. In some military careers promotion had been for a long time very slow and then suddenly rapid; and all depended upon unforeseen contingencies which could not enter into actuarial calculations.

Amendment negatived.

MR. CHILDERS, in rising to move, as an Amendment, at end of clause, to add—

“Provided always, That nothing in this Act contained shall prevent the provisions of the Army Brokerage Acts extending to the payment of any sum of money or valuable consideration by any officer or by any person on his behalf for or on account of an exchange between two other officers, one of whom may be senior to him, and in the same regiment: Provided also, That any person who shall negotiate, act as agent for, or otherwise connive at such payment as last aforesaid shall be deemed and judged guilty of a misdemeanor,” said, that he had added some words to make his proposal more precise. The case was this. When an exchange took place between two captains or between two subalterns each went to the bottom of the list of his new regiment, so that every officer who was the junior of the officer with whom he exchanged got a step towards promotion. His object was to prevent the making up of a purse, or the subscription of a bonus, by junior officers to induce a senior officer to retire, and to prevent the re-introduction in that way of a part of the former system of Purchase. Some years ago, under Purchase the bonus system did not exist, but it crept in gradually, and ultimately assumed proportions the magnitude of which was unknown until Purchase was abolished and questions of compensation arose. The Duke of Cambridge, when examined about it before the Army Organization Committee said, he should be glad if anyone could suggest how it could be stopped, so pernicious did he consider it. But though the practice of paying for non-Purchase steps by a bonus from the officers who would be promoted to a vacancy occasioned by a full-pay retirement was admitted, it had been stated that there was no evidence of the existence in England of these contributions towards a purse by the junior officers who did not actually get promotion. There was hardly a military man present who would confirm that assertion. One of the colonels examined before the Commission in 1874 admitted that he had paid £100, not for his promotion, but to get rid of some one above him who prevented his promotion. What was the evidence given by Colonel Devitt, of the 71st? That he had given from £300 to £400 to induce officers to retire, as he was a junior captain and wished in that way to advance towards promotion. Another case mentioned by a witness was that he knew an instance where, by way of bonus, the second captain paid £400, the third £150, the fourth £80, and the fifth captain £60, and so on, in order to induce a major to retire. There were eight or nine captains in the regiment and all interested in inducing the senior captain to retire, in order that they might get a step in advance. In this case they paid altogether £1,750 for single steps, while the lieutenants paid altogether £1,090 in the same way. Without some distinct words prohibiting this, it would not exist in full force, but would be actually encouraged by the present Bill, as the War Office were to take no cognizance of money transactions. He proposed to introduce words which would prevent anything of the kind happening in future. The right hon. Gentleman himself proposed to make the officers exchanging declare that no part of the money had been received in the shape of contributions from other officers, and that showed that he thought it very probable some infraction of the Act would occur which ought to be guarded against. Now, was it best to rest the matter on a declaration or to introduce a provision making it illegal? That was the whole case. If a declaration were founded upon some distinct statutory provision there would then be some hope that it would be observed. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To add, at the end of the Clause, the words "Provided always, That nothing in this Act contained shall prevent the provisions of the Army Brokerage Acts extending to the payment of any sum of money or valuable consideration by any officer or person on his behalf for or on account of an exchange between two other officers, one of whom may be senior to him, and in the same regiment: Provided also, That any person who shall negotiate, act as agent for, or otherwise connive at such payment as last aforesaid shall be deemed and judged guilty of a misdemeanor."—(Mr. Childers.)

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he could not accept the Amendment. He was not at all disposed to dispute the facts stated by the right hon. Gentleman—indeed, the evidence given before the Royal Commission in 1874 left no doubt on the subject. But bonuses were different things altogether from the objects proposed by this Bill, and the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman did not at all meet the case. Besides, he thought it was entirely unnecessary that an enactment should be made on the subject, or any such words introduced into the Bill. There was no such danger as the right hon. Gentleman supposed, and he was still of opinion that his way of dealing with the difficulty was the best.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the Government had given no reason why the words should not be inserted. If they did no harm, why not accept them, especially as many people believed they would guard against a great evil being introduced into the non-Purchase system. They, on that side, wished to show the public and the Army that the Purchase system was completely abolished, and not to be indirectly revived under a system of exchanges.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 160; Noes 242: Majority 82.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he thought it was impossible that the next Amendment—the most important on the Paper—could be satisfactorily discussed at a late hour, and would therefore move that the Chairman be ordered to report Progress.

MR. DISRAELI said, it would be greatly to the advantage of both sides that the discussion of the Bill in Committee should close that evening. There was only one other Amendment to the clause to be disposed of, and although it was, no doubt, an important one, yet he was sure there was quite sufficient time to enable the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Trevelyan) to propose his Amendment and to obtain for it attentive consideration. He believed it was not yet 12 o'clock, and he would, under the circumstances, appeal to the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, who was always ready to give his assistance in the endeavour to secure that the Business of the country should be carried on in a satisfactory manner, to say whether it was not reasonable, seeing that the labours of the Committee might be closed in an hour or so, that he should ask him to use his influence to put a stop to such Motions as that of the hon. Member for Sheffield—Motions which were conceived in the heat of the Lobby, and which could scarcely bear the cooler atmosphere of the House. He felt it to be his duty to oppose the Motion, but in no hostile spirit, and he would rather appeal to the hon. Member to withdraw it.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he did not quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman opposite. Those who sat upon his side of the House had throughout the evening, he hoped, shown no undue disposition to impede the progress of the Bill. He had every wish, so far as he was concerned, to facilitate progress, and had on two occasions already that evening been successful in inducing hon. Members not to press proposals; but the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) had rather under-stated than over-stated the case for reporting Progress with reference to the next Amendment. He entirely agreed with his hon. Friend that it was the most important Amendment on the Paper; but there was another Amendment to be moved by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Hayter), which was also of great importance, and it was impossible, he thought, that the discussion on those two Amendments could be brought to a satisfactory conclusion that evening. He would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman, whether he would not consult the convenience of the House by taking two or three hours to consider those Amendments on another day. ["No, no!"] The Committee had already been at work on the Bill for seven hours; it was universally acknowledged that the most important Amendment on the Paper had been arrived at, and he thought the right hon. Gentleman would consult the convenience of the Committee if he allowed it to be adjourned, instead of having time wasted in fruitless divisions.

Mr. Disraeli

MR. DISRAELI: I shall not further object to the Motion to report Progress, but then I must propose that the Committee should meet at 2 o'clock to-morrow.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

EAST INDIA HOME GOVERNMENT (PENSIONS) BILL.—[BILL 74.]

(Lord George Hamilton, Mr. William Henry Smith.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed. "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Lord George Hamilton.)

MR. FAWCETT, in moving, as an Amendment—

"That it is inexpedient for Parliament to impose any new charges on the revenues of India until the Select Committee which has been appointed to investigate the Indian home charges has completed its inquiry," said, he had to complain of the hurried manner in which that measure, which imposed a charge on the revenues of India, was pressed forward. It was to be regretted that the Committee which last Session began an inquiry with regard to the Home Charges connected with the Government of India had not been re-appointed, for it had not gone further than the threshold of the investigation, the only part of the subject it had taken up being the military charges. The present Bill proposed pensions to certain officers, but before any measure of the kind was considered, it was most desirable that the whole question of Indian pensions should be investigated. If such an inquiry was held, and he had any share in it, he pledged himself that disclosures would be made which would astonish the House of Commons. Some remarkable differences existed between the system of pensions prevailing at the India Office and that which existed in the other Government Offices. A gentleman employed in the India Office might enjoy two distinct pensions, and in addition occupy a highly-salaried office. If he had occupied two or more offices under the Indian Government he might get as many pensions. The telegrams which had been received from India that day foreshadowed a financial catastrophe in that country, and therefore it behoved the British Parliament to enforce the strictest economy in every Department of the Government of that country. He asked the House to bear in mind that if there was to be profuse liberality and recklessness in the giving of pensions, it should be with the revenues of England, and not with those of India. What was the state of the Revenue of India? The Debt of India was increasing alarmingly, and the Revenue was rapidly diminishing; yet in the face of such a state of things, the burdens of India were increased. Contrast such a course of proceeding with that which was pursued with regard to England with its diminishing debt, rapidly-increasing revenue, and slowly-increasing expenditure. It was said if the Bill was not allowed to pass, the Government would find it difficult to pension the Members of the Council of India; but before those pensions were granted, the House should have the opportunity to consider what the character of the Indian Council was. By all accounts, it was a most extravagant, costly body. There was not a single Member of the Indian Council entitled to a pension. They took the office, to which immense salaries were attached, and they had no ground to come to this House to ask for pensions. In moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice, he was only following the line pointed out by the present Secretary of State for India, when, in his evidence, Lord Salisbury said that the best and only security they could have for economy as regarded the finances of India was the constant watchfulness of the House of Commons. He cordially agreed in that maxim, and for one, he would watch their affairs, and try, by raising his voice, to protect their finances just as much as if the money were to be taken out of the pockets of his own constituents. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is inexpedient for Parliament to impose any new charges on the revenues of India until the Select Committee which has been appointed to investigate the Indian home charges has completed its inquiry,"—(Mr. Fawcett),—instead thereof.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, that if, as was alleged by his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), extravagant pensions had been paid to employés in the India Office in times past—a point on which he (Lord George Hamilton) would not express an opinion—that would not have occurred if the whole of the recipients had been placed under the provisions of the Superannuation Act of 1859, as was proposed to be done with the gentlemen to whom the present Bill applied. Those gentlemen were the auditor, who, through an oversight, was the only member of the Indian establishment not receiving a pension, and certain Members of the Council, a body to whose Members pensions had to be given in order to secure the services of gentlemen best fitted to assist the Secretary of State. If the Secretary of State gave any pension under this Bill the warrant for that pension would have to be laid upon the Table of the House, and the subject could then be amply discussed, if that should be thought necessary. The hon. Gentleman had introduced a great deal of extraneous matter, having nothing whatever to do with the operation of the Bill, which, in his opinion, would not in any way add to the charges upon the Indian Revenue. A telegram had been received from the Indian Government, from which it appeared that the state of the Indian finances was more satisfactory now than when he laid the Indian Financial Statement before the House last year. With respect to the Resolution proposed by the hon. Member, it should be remembered that the Home Charges amounted to a very considerable sum, and that it would be impossible to take any step, however small, with respect to them until the Report of the Committee was presented, if the Resolution was adopted by the House. Under those circumstances, he could not agree to the Resolution.

MR. KINNAIRD regretted that more notice was not taken of the affairs of India, and expressed his surprise that Indian affairs were not discussed until nearly the close of the sitting when not more than 10 to 20 Members were present.

The House divided:—Ayes 138; Noes 72: Majority 66.

Main Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. SHAW - LEFEVRE inquired, whether Members of the Council of India would be entitled to superannuation?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, that as he read the Bill, those Members of Council would be entitled to pensions who had served 10 years, and those who were already in receipt of pensions or superannuations because of services in India, would not be entitled to pensions under the measure.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked for the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown on the point.

MR. SULLIVAN, said, in order to settle the point, he would move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Sullivan.)

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said: he did not object to the Motion, as it would give him time to consult the Law Officers of the Crown; and if they thought it necessary he would introduce words to make his interpretation of the Bill perfectly clear. He hoped if he did so, there would be no further opposition to the third reading of the Bill.

MR. FAWCETT said, he must decline to accept the noble Lord's condition.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

PARLIAMENT—SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE.—RESOLUTION.

On Motion, "That the sitting of the House To-morrow, at Two of the clock, be subject to the Resolution of the House of the 30th day of April, 1869."

MR. W. E. FORSTER hoped that the Friendly Societies Bill would not be taken after the Regimental Exchanges Bill had been discussed, as many hon. Members were not aware that there was to be a morning sitting.

MR. ANDERSON complained that the course of the Government, in fixing a morning sitting so early in the Session, was unprecedented, and he trusted that when they met in the evening, the Government would take care to have a House to enable him to bring on his Motion about the Currency, or else he would suffer materially by the change the Government had made in the sitting of the House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought there was no harm in putting the Friendly Societies Bill on the Paper, in the hope that if the discussion on the Regimental Exchanges Bill terminated at an early hour, they might proceed so as to enable them to get into Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, "That the sitting of the House To-morrow, at Two of the clock, be held subject to the Resolution of the House of the 30th day of April 1869."

PACIFIC ISLANDERS PROTECTION

BILL—(No. 33.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, its object was to extend, and in some respects amend, the Bill which his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Kimberley) introduced three years ago, and which was now an existing Act of Parliament—35 & 36 Vict. c. 19. The object of that Act was to repress those atrocities which had been too often committed in the so-called "labour trade" in the Pacific Islands, and to regulate that trade for the benefit of the islanders and colonists engaged in it. There could be no doubt that the Act had produced very beneficial results. His noble Friend might be congratulated on what it had effected. It had led to the condemnation of a certain number of ships in the Colonial Courts, and the mere fact of its being on the Statute Book had had a deterrent effect. Since that Act passed, Fiji had been annexed and English sovereignty established in the Fiji Islands. In consequence of that fact a clause was introduced in the Bill now before their Lordships to amend the definition of "Australian Colonies" in the principal Act, and the term "Australian Colonies" in the Act and in this Bill would mean and include the Colony of Fiji. The principal Amendment was that introduced by the 2nd clause of the Bill. The provisions of the principal Act covered only those ships which carried native labour from one point to another for a single passage, and did not authorize the carrying in a British vessel of native labourers for the purpose of carrying on the fishery or other occupation in connection with the vessels. It had, however, been found that ships engaged in the pearl fishery and another description of fishery, and therefore following a legitimate trade, employed Natives as seamen or labourers, and were therefore entitled to protection. Ships not protected in that way were subject to penalties; and the object of Clause 2 was to afford it to those fishing vessels and bring them under the law. It therefore provided for the issue of a licence authorizing such vessel to carry native labourers for the purpose of carrying on their industry: and it also provided for the due registration of the native labourer so carried. Another evil now existed in regard to these vessels. Inasmuch as they were not under the protection afforded by the Act, and being consequently exposed to seizure and condemnation, they changed their flags and professed to belong to another nationality—by that means escaping the restrictions of the law altogether. This was an evil of a serious kind and had given rise to not unreasonable dissatisfaction. While this Bill would afford protection to vessels sailing under the British flag, engaged in carrying on a lawful trade in these waters it would not affect, to the extent that was desirable, those ships which were engaged in the slave trade; but he did not know that any Bill could be made completely effectual in that respect until there was an understanding among the European Powers to deal with that traffic in a summary manner. Under the Act it was provided that the offending ships only should be seized and condemned. In this Bill power was taken to condemn the cargoes also of such ships. Then with respect to jurisdiction for dealing with these cases. The Bill provided that the High Court of Admiralty and every Vice Admiralty Court should have jurisdiction to try and condemn or to order the release of any vessel detained under the Act, and gave the same powers as were now vested in Supreme Courts of the Australian Colonies as to the examination of witnesses and the collection of evidence. It was also provided by the Bill that the provisions of the Act and this Bill should apply to the Natives of Fiji in like manner as if they were Natives of islands in the Pacific Ocean not being in Her Majesty's dominions nor within the jurisdiction of any civilized Power. Such protection to the Natives of the Fiji Islands might be necessary for some years; but liberty was given to the Fijian Legislature to enact the Fiji Islands out of those provisions. These were the main objects of the present Bill. As time went on further amendments of the law would probably be found necessary. Everyone was aware of the evils of this labour traffic, when uncontrolled; and though it might be said that the removal of the Natives to where they would find civilization and employment was a blessing and not a curse; yet on the other hand, if unchecked, it was a disgrace and a curse to our civilization. What was required was not the suppression of the trade but its regulation. Such was the opinion of so high an authority as the late Bishop Patteson.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he had heard with satisfaction that the experience of the Act which he had the honour to introduce three years ago had worked well. He had no objection to the Amendments proposed by the Bill of his noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies; for he could well understand that great embarrassments had arisen under his Act to vessels engaged in the pearl and other fisheries in those seas—at the same time he was sure his noble Friend would feel it his duty to ask the Admiralty to get the Commodore on the station to take care that the fishing vessels confined themselves to their legitimate occupation. He quite agreed with his noble Friend that the best policy was not to attempt to suppress the labour traffic, but to regulate it. Indeed, it could not be suppressed without the concurrence of the various civilized nations and the presence of a large squadron in the waters of the Pacific Islands. But, believing, as he did, that civilized man must ultimately prevail in Polynesia, he thought it was much better to prepare the way for his further intercourse with the Natives.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked, whether it was not desirable that the Sandwich Islands should be included in the Bill, since the Sandwich islanders resembled other Polynesians in appearance and language, and some of them might be found either in Fiji, or on board ships in those seas, and might require protection, but would not obtain it as the Sandwich Islands were outside the limits of the former Kidnapping Act; also, whether all enactments as to labour by the Fijian Legislature would not be reserved cases to be referred to the Secretary of State for his approval?

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he did not understand the question of the noble Lord with reference to the Sandwich Islands:—there was no Schedule to the Bill. The case referred to by the noble Lord would be a reserved one, as the question would be a very serious one in reference to the entire subject.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly.

INCREASE OF THE EPISCOPATE BILL. (The Lord Lyttelton.)

(NOS. 8-35.) THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^a."
—(The Lord Lyttelton.)

LORD CAMPBELL said: As this is the last stage, practically, of the Bill, I am compelled to make some observations on it, which I would willingly postpone if there was any further opportunity to do so. And first of all, let me acknowledge the disinterested conduct of the noble Lord, the Mover of the Bill, in not taking the third reading last night, when he could have slipped it through without a chance of opposition or of criticism. I yield to no one in a sense of the virtuous disposition from which the Bill has sprung, or the continued toil which has advanced it through so many stages. And yet I hazard the opinion—which, indeed, alone induces me to trespass on the House—that unless it undergoes a transformation in one essential part, it ought not to find its way into the Statute Book. At the same time, I readily admit that looking to the high nature of the subject-matter, and recollecting that the question can be solved by no formula of party, we ought to act judiciously upon it, and concede to the noble Lord all the points he has established by himself or by his Friends, as well as bear in mind the inconveniences—if any—which appear to counter-balance them. I concede to the noble Lord, that as things now stand, the toil of Prelates is excessive; that in some dioceses the necessary rareness of their visits to this or that locality, has added something to the Nonconformist power; that they are so pre-occupied at times as not to be able to give advice where it is needed: that Suffragans are not found an wholly adequate expedient for replacing them. Beyond that it ought perhaps to be admitted that a noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury), who speaks with great authority on everything which relates to the working classes or theology, gave no conclusive answer to the Bill, when he explained to us, that deeper and more urgent wants exist than any which the Bill professes to respond to. If the noble Mover can establish that his scheme applies to demonstrable evils a remedy which is not mischievous itself, it would be hard upon him to object that there are other, even greater evils, which he leaves unaltered by his project. Having made these remarks to divest of all factious colour my further view as to this Bill, and give myself a locus standi for adverting to it, I shall, with the permission of your Lordships, signalize a few of the inconveniences which, in its present form, the measure might occasion. The first and least important is, that the moment you legislate upon the basis that the toil and occupation of the Bishops are more pressing than they ought to be, you at once raise the question of whether or not it is desirable to summon them to Parliament, and so at certain times withdraw them from their dioceses. This question may, of course, be viewed in very different lights, and some would not at all regret its being presented. It is only necessary to remember that whether for good or not, the project of the noble Lord does forcibly attract it to the surface. The second inconvenience of the Bill, although not at all the gravest, is that it proposes to unite two classes of Episcopacy, one of ancient origin, the other of entirely modern growth; one having access to the Legislature, the other carefully excluded from it; while it is far from clear that the two elements would harmonize reciprocally. The next and greatest inconvenience is, that the new Order so created would rest upon the slender and precarious foundation of the voluntary principle. This point, although no doubt adverted to before, has scarcely had, in past debates, the prominence it seems to be entitled to. Under the Sovereign and Archbishops, the Bishops are allowed to be the highest grade in the Establishment. The whole spirit of the Bill, the whole animus of the noble Mover is to extol their practical, without at all attenuating what you may regard as their titular importance. And yet, while the noble Lord screws up to the highest pitch, the dignity and efficacy of the Order he desires to augment, he is content to build the added portion on the weak material which upholds the Nonconformist Bodies of the country. Such a course evidently gives to Mr. Miall and his party a vantage ground they ought not to be allowed, without a protest, to arrive at, as it may have a serious effect in weakening the defence of the Established Church against their efforts to subvert it. In any agitation they conduct they are not so logical, not perhaps even so scrupulous, as to be arrested by the nice distinctions which the noble Lord no doubt is ready to point out to them. Their language, just or not, will naturally be, that if individuals are prepared to support an added class of Prelates they have called into existence, the older class of Prelates, the archdeacons, and deans with the remainder of the clergy, are not in any want of the provision which law secures to them at present. My Lords, it will thus be seen that, although the Bill may lead to good, it purchases it by far too serious a danger. If it embarrasses—as it clearly does—the subsequent defence of the Establishment, it is exposed to all the range of argumentative artillery, of which the voluntary principle, has been so frequently the object. In the other House of Parliament, from the currents of opinion which prevail there, the question may be frequently debated. In this House, it cannot be so, because no party within its walls has espoused the policy to which the Bill would afterwards contribute. No wonder. The supporters of that policy request the world in our century not to advance but to retire; not to place religious creeds on a new footing, but to recall the system which prevailed in the first three centuries of Christianity, with how much anarchy, confusion, bloodshed, it is useless to remember; not to take a forward step on the path of well-conceived reform, but, on the contrary, a backward plunge into the waters of reactionary violence. But I dismiss that topic altogether. The precise objection to the Bill is, that it makes an unnecessary, an insufficiently requited, and, on these two accounts, an unwise concession to the adversaries of the Established Church. I say, on these two accounts, because, if the concession was imposed, or the advantage was commensurate, no man of sense would urge objections to the project. My Lords, if any one took up the Bill, while uninformed as to authorship, and read it, he might suppose a Bishopric was required in Cornwall money could not be found in that county for the endowment of a Bishopric. Well, probably that was so: but if it was, money for the purpose would be found elsewhere, and money would be found also for any such other endowments as might be shown to be necessary. In that view he proposed that the number of new Sees should be limited in the first instance—for if the public were told that the Bill was one for an indefinite extension of the Episcopate, that would be calculated to dry up the fountains of charity. The more advisable mode of procedure would be to deal with the cases, and with those only, in which there was an existing want. Should a similar want arise in other places hereafter it could be dealt with by a specific proposal. Such was the spirit of his Amendment. He named the places in which he believed the new Bishoprics were required; but if their Lordships wished to add to his list by the insertion of other places he had no objection to their doing so. The question was discussed in the Upper House of Convocation in 1865; but their report did not support the noble Lord in the length to which he now proposed to go—they suggested only that three new Sees should be created; and in 1869, when another Bill was before their Lordships, similar to the Bill now under consideration, the most rev. Prelate opposite (the Archbishop of Canterbury) said, that an indefinite increase of the Episcopate was not desirable. The most rev. Prelate further said that he should prefer to limit the increase to the number required. These observations applied just as much at this time as they did in 1869. He knew that his Amendment would be met with the argument that it was one for piecemeal legislation; but his rejoinder to that objection was that some of the best measures now on the Statute Book had been introduced piecemeal and in the shape of permissive legislation.

Amendment moved accordingly.

LORD LYTTTELTON said, he could not agree to the Amendment which seemed to him to proceed upon an entire misapprehension of the principle of the Bill. The new Bishops would not be a distinct class in any essential respect, and if they were not all to be placed on precisely the same footing they would only resemble in that respect the existing Bench. As to the danger of Sees being erected where they were not called for, he had only to say that if Government authorities, such as the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, were not to be entrusted with the carrying out of the Bill, he had, of course, no case at all. His noble Friend (Lord Cottesloe) had referred him to a report of the Upper House of Convocation; but the Bill was entirely in accordance with the expressed opinion of that body in a later report. Then, as regarded the distribution of Sees, the Bill had nothing to do with any public fund—if it were so it would, no doubt, be the duty of Parliament to look round and consider the state of the whole country and decide where new Bishoprics were most wanted; but this Bill dealt with the private funds, and if the people of a particular district wanted a Bishop to themselves, and if the desire, on any right standard, was reasonable, what reason existed for putting off their application until the wants of certain other districts had been supplied? His noble Friend had spoken of the necessity of easing the Bill in its passage to the other House by his proposed limitation; but he (Lord Lyttelton) refused to believe that the House of Commons would be so unreasonable as not to consider the Bill fairly, seeing that it was so simple in its principle, and that it was capable of being amended in Committee. If, indeed, the other House should refuse to accept the principle of this Bill he should despair of passing such a measure at any future time. He had to complain of the treatment which the Bill had received, both from the Government and the Episcopal Bench. From the Prime Minister he had received verbal assurances of the Government support in both Houses, and the Bishops had given him their written assent to the Bill. Yet in that House not a favourable word had been spoken in its behalf on the part of the Government; and he understood that in the other House the Bill would receive the same half-hearted welcome. He would venture to predict that if it did not meet with a warmer support there than it had here there was small chance of its passing. Moreover, the Bill for the establishment of a new See at St. Albans had just been introduced into the House of Commons, although he understood from the Bishop of Rochester last year that it would not be pressed till the Episcopate Bill was out of the way. He had never heard of the Government Bill till last Friday—he believed it had been kept a profound secret until that day. By the passing of such a local and partial measure as that, the present Bill could not fail to be injured. The Bill would in any case probably have met with most formidable difficulties in the House of Commons; but, as matters now stood, it would go down to that House with every possible disadvantage. He would, however, beg their Lordships to let it go down to that House with its full power, so that a fair appeal might be made on the subject with which it dealt to every part of the country.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that he admired the noble Lord's great talents, and the earnestness in which he had taken up this subject; but the noble Lord must excuse him for saying that he did not admire the language which he had used towards the Government that evening. He had charged the Government with having promised to give the Bill their cordial support. Now he (the Duke of Richmond) did not know what took place in the tête-à-tête interview between the noble Lord and the Prime Minister, for he was not present; but he would state that the Government, as a Government, were not prepared to support the Bill, nor were they prepared to oppose it. But he was disposed to think they had done something more than not oppose it—because when the Bill was under consideration it was at the instance of the Government that some Amendments which were supposed to be very dangerous to the measure were withdrawn. Therefore if the Government had not given the Bill their cordial support they had prevented it from being rejected. The Government did not think it right to accept the responsibility of the measure; but, as he had stated, they did not oppose it. He, under these circumstances, ventured to protest against the strong language of the noble Lord in reference to the Bill which was now before the other House; because he contended that the Government were justified in dealing with the question of creating a new See in the manner in which they had done. This Bill of the noble Lord was not on all fours with the Bill of the Government, and y

noble Lord had said that the Government had acted in a manner which was not befitting them on this occasion. Now, notwithstanding all the hard words which the noble Lord (Lord Lyttelton) had used the Government would return good for evil, and advise the noble Lord (Lord Cottesloe) not to press his Amendment. He thought it would be unwise to mention the places set forth in the Amendment, because they had no evidence that those were the places which ought to be first dealt with before other parts of the country; and he saw no reason why if Lincoln, or Nottingham, or Bodmin were unwilling or unable to make up the fund necessary for founding their new Bishopric, the people of other parts of the country who were both able and willing should be precluded from providing themselves with new Bishops. For these reasons he must vote against the Amendment if pressed to a division.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he desired to refer to one observation of the noble Duke. This was a Bill which affected the Established Church. Now, he had heard with much astonishment the announcement of the doctrine that a proper course for the Government to take was to be so indifferent as to the number of the Bishops of the Established Church in this country, of which the Queen was the head, that it was a matter of no consequence to them whether they voted for a measure or against it. He was most surprised also to find that the noble Duke seemed to have been altogether unaware of the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill with reference to the See of St. Albans in the other House—at least, when this Bill was last under discussion no reference was made to it. On a former night, when he had put a Question to his noble Friend on the subject, he appeared to be as ignorant with regard to it as he was himself. He again protested against the doctrine that a Bill under which any number of Bishops might be added to the Episcopate was, so far as the Government was concerned, a perfectly immaterial question.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, his noble Friend (Earl Granville) appeared to infer that he was as ignorant of the other Bill as he was himself.

EARL GRANVILLE said, his noble Friend appeared to be so.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he thought his noble Friend could hardly have expected him to give a positive statement as to a matter which appeared merely as a vague rumour that appeared to be about the House as to a Bill which was to be introduced into the other House. If, however, it was any satisfaction to him, he could assure him that the Bill which had been introduced by the Secretary of State for the Home Department in the other House had been more than once the subject of discussion in the Cabinet, and that he was perfectly aware of the provision which it contained. He should, he might add, have been very glad to give his noble Friend every information with regard to it had he only received due Notice that he would put a formal Question to him on the subject.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he knew nothing about the Bill brought in by the Secretary for the Home Department when he put his Question, beyond the fact that an announcement had been made in the other House with reference to the subject which their Lordships were the same evening engaged in discussing, and therefore could have given him no Notice of any Question concerning it. It was not strange, however, he thought, that it should have occurred to him that the noble Duke ought to have been informed as to the Bill proposed by the Government. He could not, under the circumstances, offer him any apology for having asked him the Question which he had put to him on the occasion to which he referred.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR could not help thinking that it was rather an inconvenient course to adopt to run from the House of Commons, and to put a Question to a Member of their Lordships' House as to what had occurred there, without any Notice. Every Member of the Cabinet knew perfectly well what was contained in the Bill which his right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department had introduced; but then it was not the custom to give explanations in their Lordships' House with respect to the Bills of which Notice had just been given "elsewhere." As to the Bill under discussion, the Government had not been silent. The Government were not responsible for it—had taken upon themselves no responsibility with regard to it; they had canvassed certain parts of it, and beyond that they took the course of not opposing it; which it was, he maintained, perfectly competent for them to do. He regretted that before the noble Lord (Lord Lyttelton) had made any attack upon them for not having acted up to their professions, he did not communicate with them, so that they might have informed themselves with respect to the statements on which he relied.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL said, he was present the other evening when this Bill was before the House. He understood the purport of the Question which had been put by his noble Friend near him, to have been whether the Bill under discussion having made certain progress through the House, another measure—of which up to that time their Lordships had not heard a word—bearing materially on the prospect of its passing was about to be introduced by the Government. To that Question no answer was given by the noble Duke, although the information could have been given, since the Bill was introduced in the other House by a Member of the Government. The noble Duke, however, gave them no information whatever. His noble Friend, he might add, had not of his own motion risen to make any remarks whatsoever on the subject. His noble Friend rose for the purpose of replying to a speech which had just been delivered by the noble Duke, and which it was impossible for him to have passed by in silence. His noble Friend asked whether it had come to this—that they were to deal with the Established Church of this country—a Church of which the Sovereign was the head—on the principle that the Ministers of the Crown had no opinion whatever on the subject; that they were to discuss a measure most materially affecting the interests of the Established Church until it came to its third reading, and then were to be told at last by the Leader of the Government in that House, that they acknowledged no responsibility as to the question whether it was wise to maintain the present number and status of the Bishops of that Church or whether it was wise to alter them? They had heard a great deal about those who were favourable to Establishments and those who were opposed to them, but he said that the Church of England was half disestablished already, if the House of Lords were to discuss a measure materially affecting its interests, and the responsible Ministers of the Crown were to have neither an opinion favourable nor an opinion adverse to that measure, and were to permit it to pass without any declaration of opinion.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY thought the noble Lord who had last spoken could not have been present during the debates that had occurred in the House on this Bill, or he would hardly have expressed himself as he had just done on the conduct which been pursued by the Government. The Government had never been neutral on the question of policy which that Bill involved. He had heard his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack state with distinctness that the Government were favourable—as most persons who were acquainted with the Church of England were favourable—to any measure that would be effective for the purpose of relieving the labours which lay upon its overworked Bishops; whether that Bill in its practical working was most likely to attain that object, whether its details were precisely those which the Government themselves, if they undertook to deal with the subject in a general way, would have adopted, was a matter on which it was not necessary for them to state, or even to form, their opinion until an exigency arose requiring that opinion to be laid before the world. The policy of the noble Lord's Bill—if any policy it had—was undoubtedly one to which the Government were favourable, if the time was suitable for carrying it into effect, and if the details of the machinery could be found by which the object of the measure could be accomplished. The objects of the Bill were no doubt good; but there were many difficulties in the way when they were dealing with a general Bill which might well make the Government pause before they undertook the responsibility of a general measure of this kind; and although they were perfectly willing to let the noble Lord—with whose wishes and endeavours to promote the welfare of the Church they had the heartiest sympathy—bring forward his Bill, they did not care themselves to accept the responsibility of a Bill of the practical working and general effect of which they had no certain opinion. For himself, he had always

sincerely sympathized with the object which his noble Friend had in view; but he confessed that he did not regard his Bill as a very practical one, and he should be surprised if any great practical result came from it. If those opinions did not justify a Government in refraining from taking any strong practical part in the discussion of a Bill of that character, he hardly knew what rules could guide their conduct. Remarks had been made as to the precise amount of cordiality which the Government had shown towards the Bill. The noble Lord appeared to measure the goodwill and heartiness of those who were friendly to his object by the number of speeches they made, and his complaint was that all the Members of the Treasury Bench had not delivered speeches on the subject. He thought it very undesirable that the noble Lord's canon of cordiality should be followed in that House.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY asked how many speeches it required to show cordiality? He was afraid that some of his Colleagues who had the conduct of measures had reason to complain if the noble Lord's test of a cordial support was accepted. According to that standard, the Mutiny Bill and other Bills had received no very cordial support. The real test of cordiality was when a Bill was opposed. If divisions were taken on a Bill, then the question of supporting it arose; but when a Bill was quietly passing through the House, for the Members of the Government to be required to make gratuitous speeches to prove their cordial goodwill towards its promoter was not the course most calculated to facilitate the progress of business. For himself, if he should have the charge of any measure to which there was no sign of any opposition being offered, he should earnestly deprecate any speeches being made in its behalf that were couched in the tone adopted by the noble Lord himself (Lord Lyttelton) that evening. With regard to what had fallen from the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition in that House, no doubt they all had the means of knowing from the Votes that were laid on their Table what Bills had been brought in and Notices given in the other House of Parliament. But on mere rumour, and at a moment's notice, for the noble Earl to require his noble Friend to go into the witness-box and submit to be catechized on the exact provisions of another Bill, which might have some affinity to that Bill, was to set aside entirely the object for which the rule as to not taking unauthorized notice of what was proceeding in the other House had been laid down. The truth was, that the pretence that the two Bills interfered with each other was wholly unfounded, and there was no reason why both Bills should not be passed, or why, while their Lordships were discussing the present Bill, the Bill in the House of Commons should be mentioned at all. In conclusion, he could not help regretting that his noble Friend at the Table (Lord Lyttelton) had thought fit to accompany the final stage of that Bill with a speech of so much warmth that it certainly was not likely to aid in bringing about the consummation which he desired.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY was not aware what precise amount of cordial support the noble Lord at the Table (Lord Lyttelton) had expected from the Government; but, judging from the speeches just made by the noble Duke and the noble Marquess opposite, it seemed to him that the noble Lord had hardly received any support from them at all. The noble Marquess had very fairly told them that the Bill was not very likely to be a practical measure, and the noble Duke said it was a matter on which the Government were indifferent.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND denied the accuracy of that statement.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY thought, when a Minister said he expressed no opinion for or against a Bill, that looked very like indifference. The noble Lord at the Table had referred to the viaticum given to his Bill. This seemed to him very appropriate, as the viaticum was only given in articulo mortis. Was it too much to ask that the Government should have some opinion on a subject of that kind? Was the Church of England at that moment in such a position that any Bill affecting its interests could be a matter of indifference to any one, whether he was a friend or a foe of the Church? Was the question not one on which the Government were especially called upon, not only to form an opinion, but to announce and act on that opinion? No doubt, the noble Marquess was correct in saying there was a rule that they should not refer to what passed in the other House; but, surely, they had a right to complain that when their Lordships were discussing a measure for the creation of additional Bishops, which had reached its third reading, the Government did not let them know that they had themselves prepared another Bill relating to the same subject. The noble Duke knew perfectly well that the Government were about to introduce a Bill in the other House bearing on the same subject, but he did not say a word about it. And when the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack said it was not a habit in that House to put Questions without Notice, he would ask was it a habit for a Government to leave one branch of the Legislature in entire ignorance of a measure which it had introduced in "another place" on a matter germane to one which their Lordships were discussing? He did not think this ought to be treated as a personal matter; but still he thought his noble Friend (Lord Lyttelton) was quite justified in calling attention to the way in which a measure of such importance had been treated by the Government.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY thought the discussion most unprofitable. At the same time, he could not help saying that during the many years he he had sat in that House he had never heard any Member of it speak as the noble Lord at the corner of the Table (Lord Lyttelton) had done that evening. He had listened to strong language, he had heard emphatic contradictions addressed from one side of the House to the other; but never till the present occasion had he heard a private conversation with the Prime Minister repeated publicly in that House. Whatever might have passed between the Prime Minister and the noble Lord, the latter was wholly out of Order, having regard to the usages of their Lordships' House, in coming down here and accusing the Government of not having fulfilled a promise which the Prime Minister had privately given him. This was what the noble Lord had done, and he appeared unwilling to retract what he had said. He (the Earl of Malmesbury) was in a position to say—indeed, he was authorized to say—that the noble Lord had entirely misunderstood what had passed in the conversation in question, and had consequently—of course, not wilfully—misrepresented the facts of the case. The truth of the matter was as followed:—After seeing the noble Lord the Prime Minister consulted his Cabinet as to the line Government ought to take, and the Cabinet determined that they would not oppose the measure of the noble Lord, but would give him a negative support. This might not be altogether intelligible to the noble Lord the late Secretary for the Colonies, who made many speeches—good speeches, too—and very seldom gave a silent vote. For his own part, however, he very often gave silent votes, and his conscience did not tell him he was to blame when he voted without having made a speech. In the present case, it had not been at all incumbent on the Government to take an active part in supporting the measure; at the same time Members of the Government had never said a word which could be regarded as uttered in opposition to it. They had sat quietly and listened to the arguments of the noble Lord, and had never cheered the arguments that were directed against the Bill. But if it was the duty of the Government on such an occasion to be eloquent and use all the rhetoric they could command, what he would ask was the natural duty of the Opposition? Were they to sit like dummies and have no opinion upon the matter under discussion? Had any Member of the late Government spoken from the front Opposition bench on the Bill of the noble Lord? If any of them had, he did not recollect it. Something had been said in the course of the present discussion by the noble Earl the late Secretary for Foreign Affairs (Earl Granville) with regard to a Bill which had been introduced in the House of Commons. The noble Viscount who afterwards spoke (Viscount Cardwell) explained that the remark in question had been a mere passing observation or allusion, and not an interrogatory. However that might be, he must altogether repudiate the idea that Her Majesty's Government were bound beforehand to inform that House of all the Bills which they were going to bring into the House of Commons. In what they had done they had kept strictly within the usages of Government and of the Legislature. As to the Bill of the noble Lord they had never shown hostility to it in any way, and it seemed to him the noble Lord had shown a most extraordinary ebullition of temper when he declared that the Government had been hostile to his Bill, and found fault with them on that ground.

LORD REDESDALE said, that as one who was extremely favourable to the measure of the noble Lord, he regretted the discussion which had arisen, for he feared it would not assist the passing of the Bill. To his mind the introduction by the Government in the other House of the Bill for the formation of a diocese of St. Albans was not hostile, but rather favourable to the progress of that of the noble Lord. It was a direct admission on the part of the Government that an increase in the Episcopate was desirable, and the measure afforded some practical hints which might aid in making a general scheme effectively operative. In no respect did it conflict with the Bill of the noble Lord.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, he thought the noble Lord might congratulate himself on the interest and excitement his Bill had created that evening. For himself, he could not conceive what the noble Lord had found fault with him for, unless it was that he had spoken twice in favour of the Bill. The noble Lord deemed it extremely improper that a measure of this kind should have been introduced without eliciting a very distinct expression of opinion from Her Majesty's Government; and other noble Lords who sat opposite maintained strongly that there ought to have been on the part of Members of Her Majesty's Government a full discussion of the measure. But the noble Lord had had the Bill in his hands for several years; and, when on a former occasion, the noble Lord had introduced a Bill similar to the present, the Government of the day had acted in regard to it very much in the same way as the present Government had acted in regard to this Bill. It seemed to him the noble Lord was unreasonable, for not only did he require that there should be speeches in favour of his Bill, but he went the length of dictating that no other measure, however valuable it might be, should be introduced with reference to the object he had in view. If he remembered right what he had said on a former occasion, it was to the effect that while giving a full and cordial support to the Bill of the noble Lord he would yet have preferred, had it been in his power, to follow another course than that which had been adopted. The noble Lord spoke of a mine having been sprung under his feet; but it appeared he had been aware for a considerable time that a measure with regard to a new diocese of St. Albans was in contemplation, before, indeed, he himself (the Archbishop of Canterbury) knew of it. Speaking for the right rev. Bench in general, he could only say that they were very much obliged to the noble Lord for having introduced the Bill now before the House. They believed that some measure of the kind was absolutely necessary; they would be very sorry if from any mismanagement or misunderstanding; neither of the Bills passed; and they would be very glad if both of them became law.

On Question, Resolved in the Negative.

LORD LYTTLETON denied that his interview with the Prime Minister was private—it was an official and not a private interview. It was an interview which he had as having charge of the present measure. If he had known what was to have occurred, he would have written instead of having a personal interview. In the month of July last he wrote to the right hon. Gentleman and asked him to bring the question formally before the Cabinet. In reply he was informed that although Her Majesty's Government were disposed favourably to the measure, it was not deemed expedient, at that time of the year, to give a definite opinion upon it. He had never supposed that they would pronounce an opinion upon it at that time; and he was much pleased with the answer, and thought that he was much indebted to the Government for having taken the question into consideration. What occurred subsequently was this—he saw the Prime Minister shortly after the first meeting of the Cabinet in November, and he was about to ask the right hon. Gentleman to bring the matter before the Cabinet, when, much to his gratification, the Prime Minister told him that he had already done so, and that they were prepared to support the measure. There were three courses open to the Government—they might have opposed the Bill, they might have supported it, or they might have made themselves responsible for it. He had never asked the Government to undertake the third course, and he had never hoped that they would do so; but he asserted that the words of the Prime Minister were, that he should have the declared support of the Government in both Houses in favour of his Bill.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND asserted that the noble Lord had entirely misapprehended the purport of what passed between himself and the Prime Minister.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

INDIA—MASSACRE OF MR. MARGARY AT MANWINE.—QUESTION.

MR. WAIT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to demand the punishment of the perpetrators of the treacherous massacre of Mr. Margary and his five servants at Manwine while engaged in Her Majesty's Consular service; and, whether he has any objection to state what directions, if any, have been given on the subject?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, we sent instructions to Mr. Wade, Her Majesty's Minister at Pekin; and Her Majesty's most able Minister at Pekin—for it would be impossible to speak too highly of his qualifications—to call upon the Chinese Government to make a strict investigation into all the circumstances connected with this deplorable affair; and, until we receive his Report, it will, of course, be out of our power to decide upon the steps we will take. The death of Mr. Margary is a public calamity. He was the son of a general officer in Her Majesty's service, and he was a young man of great promise and ability, who had displayed all those qualities which were suitable to the eminent career which I have no doubt awaited him had his life been spared. With regard to the circumstances which are known to Her Majesty's Government, this unhappy event occurred in a district scarcely within the boundary of the Chinese Empire, a district in which it is doubtful whether the power of the Imperial Government was clearly established, and which is inhabited by a mixed population of Shangs and Chinese. The moment the Government receive from Mr. Wade the result of his appeal to the Imperial Government, I shall have, I hope, to make a further communication to the House.

LOCAL TAXATION—COLLECTION OF RATES.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BRISE asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, in the event of there being no comprehensive measure of legislation upon Local Government in the present Session, he would endeavour to carry out one of the resolutions in the Report of the Poor Rates Assessment Committee of 1868, as well as in the Report of the Local Taxation Committee of 1870, in reference to the method in which rates are now collected, the resolution being as follows:—

"That a demand note shall be left at the premises rated for each ratepayer on the rate being made, stating the amount of the requisition; the rate in the pound for each purpose for which the rate is made; the rateable value of the premises; and the amount of the rate thereon?"

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, that by the General Order of Accounts issued in 1867, it was provided that the overseers of the different parishes might, if they thought fit, cause a demand note to be left with each ratepayer, specifying the particulars of the claim upon him, and showing also the purposes for which the rate was made. That power had been availed of in the metropolis to a considerable extent, and also in many other towns, and there was no doubt it would be competent for overseers and parish officers to avail themselves of it much more largely. It was impossible, however, at present, to make this salutary regulation compulsory on all overseers, because, as his hon. and gallant Friend was aware, the recommendation of the Local Taxation Committee of 1870 proceeded upon the assumption that there would be a consolidation rate for all purposes collected by one authority, and that was yet far from being the case.

IMPRISONMENT FOR CONTEMPT OF COURT.—QUESTION.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the report in the "Herts Guardian" of the 6th instant of the committal, by one of the Judges of Assize, of William Craddock to prison for twelve calendar months for contempt of court, the fact being that Craddock, after his acquittal by the jury of the offence charged against him, addressed to his fellow prisoner, who had attempted to incriminate him, Craddock, the words "I'll give it you for splitting on me;" whether, under such order of imprisonment for contempt of court, Craddock is now suffering imprisonment and is put to hard labour of the second class; and, whether he has any power to arrest the carrying out of such order of imprisonment; and, if so, whether he will take steps to secure the release of Craddock?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, his attention had not been called to the statement referred by the hon. Member, but he believed it to be true that this man was committed for 12 months by Mr. Justice Denman for contempt of Court. The facts, however, as he was informed by that learned Judge, were scarcely in accord with the statements made in the Question. The two men were indicted for uttering base coin, Craddock, the elder, after two former convictions. The other man, who was much younger, pleaded "Guilty," and stood aside while the jury were being sworn to try Craddock.

"At that time," says the learned Judge, "I observed that Craddock stepped up to the other in a hasty way and spoke to him, and that the turnkey stepped between them and drew the other man aside."

Craddock was tried, and, although the case was one of strong suspicion, he was acquitted. The learned Judge was then informed by the turnkey that just before the trial began, upon the other man's pleading "Guilty," Craddock had gone up to the other man and threatened that he would "give it him" or "do for him" when he (Craddock) came out for "splitting upon him." The learned Judge added—

"I had, and have, no doubt whatever that what he meant was to threaten the other man if he gave evidence on the trial against him. This I looked upon, and still look upon, as a very gross contempt of Court, which, having occurred under the eyes of the jury and in the dock just at the commencement of the trial, it was my duty summarily to punish if not erroneously imputed."

That was the statement of the learned Judge, and in his (the Judge's) opinion the punishment was not too severe.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS gave Notice that early after Easter he would bring under the consideration of the House the general subject of the power vested in the Judges without any appeal or reference to a jury to inflict fine and imprisonment, for so-called contempt of Court, upon Her Majesty's subjects.

CRIMINAL LAW—VIOLENT ASSAULTS —LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

COLONEL EGERTON LEIGH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the measure mentioned in Her Majesty's Speech for preventing violent assaults will be introduced?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the measure had long ago been prepared, and would be introduced as soon as there was any reasonable chance of passing it through that

"Temple Bar" which at the present moment was so crowded.

INDIAN FINANCES.—QUESTION.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether Her Majesty's Government has received a telegram corroborating the intelligence in to-day's "Times" regarding the state of the Indian finances?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, a telegram had been received at the India Office similar to that published in the daily papers, and Her Majesty's Government had no reason to believe that the figures thus transmitted were less accurate than those which they had received in former years.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE MORNING SITTING.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. NEWDEGATE rose to call attention to the circumstances under which the House had met at 2 o'clock, and, if necessary, he would conclude with a Motion. It might be his own fault that he did not look at the Notices and at the newspapers earlier; but certainly it was not until an hour ago he was aware that the House would not meet at the usual time—a quarter to 4. He might take blame to himself for not being in his place last night; but it was impossible that all Members could always be in their places. He opposed the late Prime Minister when he attempted to alter the time at which the House was appointed to meet, and to change an afternoon into a Morning Sitting, late at night to a Sitting for the following day, without previous Notice, and he was supported in several divisions. Since 1869, the House had been in the habit of adopting a Resolution under which Morning Sittings began from a certain date, and the House had always required the usual Notice of the intention to submit that Resolution; but on this occasion no such Notice had been given. Taken by surprise, he had been unable to look for precedents; but, so far as his memory served him, he believed there was no instance of a Morning Sitting earlier than the 27th of May. He could easily allow that the Prime Minister had taken the course now adopted for the convenience of the House, but the precedent he had inadvertently set was a dangerous one; because the adoption of the Resolution of 1869 without Notice would unfairly deprive hon. Members who might chance to be out of London, or who might not look very closely at the Notices, of opportunity to take part in the Business of the House. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government would give the House an assurance that what happened last night would not be repeated. In conclusion, the hon. Member moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Newdegate.)

MR. DISRAELI: I am not aware, Sir, that I committed any breach of Order in the course which I proposed, and which the House consented yesterday to take; and I am not aware that my hon. Friend has himself personally been subjected to any extraordinary inconvenience, or been deprived of that information as to the meeting of the House which, of course, is convenient to all its Members. The House, when I made the Motion last night, was very full—unhappily, my hon. Friend was absent—but the House was otherwise extremely well attended, as the Division List shows. An opportunity was then given to any hon. Member to object to the course I recommended, but no objection was made. I proposed that the House should continue the Business it was then engaged upon at 2 o'clock to-day. I did not suddenly propose any new Business, and as to giving a Notice of the Motion of meeting to-day at 2 o'clock previous to the debate, that was perfectly impossible; because I could not foresee the circumstances which justified my making that proposition to the House. I do not wish to cavil with the ultimate course of the proceedings and the result; but I think there was a general understanding in the House on both sides that we should have concluded the Committee on the Regimental Exchanges Bill last night, and upon our concluding that Committee last night the general arrangements for future Public Business very much depended. I therefore made a proposition which allowed the House the adjournment upon the subject which they desired consistently with the Forms of the House, which have now been established some years, and which I myself originally proposed with regard to the Morning Sittings, and it was unanimously acceded to by the House; therefore, the great majority of hon. Members certainly can have no reason to complain. My hon. Friend unquestionably has been inconvenienced, but who could have contemplated that? The announcement was made in the House before midnight; and as I have not the advantage of seeing my Friends who sit behind me so well as my courteous opponents who sit opposite to me, I concluded that my hon. Friend, who rarely is absent from this House, and who is well known as a model and the pink of perfection in the matter of attendance at and fulfilment of his Parliamentary duties, was in his place. But if he had not been in his place; who could have supposed that my hon. Friend would not have examined his Papers in the morning—I will not say the first thing in the morning, but after prayers? My hon. Friend, when examining them, would see in a moment that in two places it was stated that the House would meet at 2 o'clock. While I deeply regret that my hon. Friend has been put to some inconvenience, I do not collect from his complaint that it has been greater than being somewhat hurried at a period of the day when one is disposed to restore exhausted nature by morning studies. As regards the House, I do not admit that I have taken any other but a strictly Parliamentary course; indeed, you, Mr. Speaker, would have corrected me if I had done so. Many even of my own Friends, if I had taken a course which was not Parliamentary, would, I feel sure, have interposed. The House will perceive that it was quite impossible for me to give any Notice, because I could not contemplate what would occur. I appealed to the House, and the House responded to the appeal. I think it would be most inconvenient that Notice should be required of such a Motion. I think that, under the circumstances, it is a power which the House ought to exercise. When the Business is unnecessarily disturbed, its convenience should be consulted as to the time when hon. Members may wish the Business to be concluded. I think it is a power which is highly beneficial; and I therefore cannot agree to the proposition of my hon. Friend that Notice should necessarily be given of a Motion which may be required by circumstances which, anterior to the Motion, could not have been anticipated by those who have to conduct the Business of the House.

MR. DILLWYN: The right hon. Gentleman has alluded to the fact that no objection was taken to the course proposed by him when the House adjourned. I felt a very strong objection to that course, and an inclination to disagree to the very unusual course of adjourning without previous Notice having been given. Indeed, I never remember a case in which the House adjourned without Notice at any time of the evening that such adjournment would be moved. Although I felt an objection to the course taken I did not choose to raise the objection. I had before interfered, and I felt that it would be utterly useless to object to anything that might be proposed by the Government with respect to this Bill, seeing that there was a majority in the House who were determined, whether right or wrong, to pass it. They said so more than once, and we were taunted by them that we were in a minority. More than that, there were Amendments which had been placed on the Paper by some hon. Gentlemen opposite which would have improved the Bill, but which had disappeared. I considered that a sufficient reason why it would be useless to make any objection to the unprecedented course pursued by the Prime Minister.

MR. J. S. HARDY pointed out that when the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government made a statement the other day as to the course of Public Business, he said that if the Committee on the Regimental Exchanges Bill was not got through on Monday night it might be necessary for him to make some changes in the arrangement of the Public Business. He (Mr. Hardy) might say for himself, and, he believed, for several hon. Members sitting near him, that they entertained the opinion that a Morning Sitting would be proposed, and he believed that was also the understanding on the other side of the House. ["No, no!"] If they had not received some such Notice as to what might be the intention of the Government they might have pursued a different course.

MR. WHALLEY said, he was surprised that the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) did not rise to protest against a course which he considered inexpedient because he would have been overborne by a majority. That was the very reason why the hon. Member should have protested, even if he had stood alone. He (Mr. Whalley) thanked the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government for having given them the opportunity of considering the subject at a Morning Sitting.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he did not rise to controvert the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, as the course he had taken was within the Rules of Order. Nevertheless, he believed it was an unusual course to take a Morning Sitting without Notice at so early a period of the Session. He could not agree with the hon. Member for Rye (Mr. J. S. Hardy) that sufficient Notice was given to the House, for the statement of the Prime Minister that, in the event of the Committee on the Regimental Exchanges Bill not being concluded some other arrangement would have to be made, did not necessarily imply a Morning Sitting. He might, for instance, have put the Order on the Paper for this evening, and have tried to induce private Members to postpone their Motions. On the whole, however, he was free to admit that, as regarded the discussion on the Bill, the course which the right hon. Gentleman had taken, although perhaps it might be inconvenient to some individual Members, was, generally speaking, the most convenient for the majority of the House. He wished now to call the attention of the Government to the course which it was proposed to take with respect to other Business. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had placed the Committee on the Friendly Societies Bill next to the Order of the Day for the Regimental Exchanges Bill. He did not think it would be fair to a numerous class of hon. Members who took an interest in the Friendly Societies Bill that the discussion on it should be proceeded with to-day. It was understood yesterday that if the Committee on the Regimental Exchanges Bill did not terminate at an early hour, the Friendly Societies Bill would not be proceeded with until after Easter. It was quite possible that many hon. Members might have left London under the impression that there was not the slightest possibility of the discussion on the Friendly Societies Bill being proceeded with; and he trusted if the discussion on the Regimental Exchanges Bill should not terminate shortly, the Friendly Societies Bill would not be proceeded with. He thought it would be for the convenience of the House, when there was a probability of a Morning Sitting being asked for, that some notice of it should be given to the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE, in withdrawing the Motion for adjournment, said, he had called attention to the Rules of the House because those Rules were, as Lord Eversley on quitting the Chair warned the House, all founded on good sense. He must say, in answer to the remarks of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), whom he very much respected—that it would appear from their silence last night as if the Liberal Party had been so long in a majority that they had to learn afresh their duty as a minority.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he wished, before the Motion was withdrawn, to answer the question put by the noble Marquess. Before the House broke up last night the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) put a question to him on the subject of the Friendly Societies Bill, and his reply, which he begged to repeat now was, that it was not at all his idea that the House would be able to proceed with the Bill in Committee to-day; but it appeared possible that there might be an hour or two to spare for discussion in the course of the afternoon. The position of the Bill was this—it had been read a second time; there was no Notice of any opposition to its going into Committee, and he did not apprehend that there was any intention of opposing that Motion; but, on the other hand, there were several hon. Gentlemen who had not yet taken part in the general discussion, and who wished to make some observations on the principle of the Bill. Under these circumstances he did not think any harm could come from a discussion being brought on at any time when hon. Members who wished to express their views on the subject were present. He had told the right hon. Gentleman last night that he would not attempt to bring on the Bill at any time which might be inconvenient to hon. Members. The subject was one which very much interested persons connected with the societies throughout the country, and when there was a suggestion that the Bill was coming on a large number of them came up to London. There was no use, however, in their attending a debate on the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair; when they wished to be present was when the clauses were being taken. It would therefore be desirable that it should be known generally when the Committee was coming on. If he found, in the course of the day, that there was no desire to take the Bill, he would not persevere in bringing it on.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was sure it would have weighed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he had known that hon. Members who had a desire to address the House on the principle of the Bill would not have an opportunity of doing so in consequence of the impression produced by the right hon. Gentleman himself. He hoped, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman would not bring on the Bill to-day.

COLONEL BÉRESFORD said, he wished, before the discussion closed, to put the saddle on the right horse. Any inconvenience arising from the present meeting of the House was owing to the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington.) The Prime Minister last night wanted to proceed with the Regimental Exchanges Bill until the Committee was finished, and it was not until the noble Marquess refused to go on that the Prime Minister proposed as an alternative that there should be a Morning Sitting.

MR. DODDS said, there were many persons in town who wished to know when the Bill was likely to go into Committee, and it would be a great convenience to them if some time could be fixed.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR appealed to the Judge Advocate not to proceed with the Mutiny Bill on Thursday next, on the ground that Members had not time to consider the Amendments, and that there were several matters connected with this Bill which they wished to discuss.

MR. WAIT suggested that it might be convenient for hon. Members to have a Morning instead of an Evening Sitting on the Thursday before Easter.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, that the Amendments on the Mutiny Bill had been delivered to hon. Members that morning; they were few and simple, and the questions which the hon. Gentleman wished to discuss did not come within their scope. He therefore thought that Thursday would be a convenient day for proceeding with the Bill.

[BILL 3.] COMMITTEE.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2 (Authorized exchanges exempted from Army Brokerage Acts).

MR. TREVELYAN, in rising to move, at the end of the Clause, to add—

"Provided, That the provisions of this Act shall not apply to any officer who has entered Her Majesty's service on any day subsequent to the 1st day of November, 1871," said: Sir, I have trespassed so largely and so recently on the kind indulgence of hon. Members that I feel bound to preface my remarks to-night by promising that they shall be brief; that they shall relate to a new and a special matter; and that in making those remarks I will not lose sight of the distinction which within these walls always is—or, at any rate, always should be—observed between a speech on the second reading of a Bill and a speech made when that Bill has passed into Committee. We are no longer concerned with the general controversy as to whether exchanges of commissions involving the payment of a sum of money representing the difference in the market value of those commissions should or should not be permitted in the British Army. That controversy is over and done with, and to recur to it would be to adopt a proceeding which hon. Gentlemen opposite might justly resent as vexatious. Our business at the present moment is not to protest against exchanges of this nature being permitted, but to define the limits which their operation should be confined; and I hope to be able to show that the limit laid down in the Amendment which I have placed on the Paper in consonant with reason, distinctly indicated by the circumstances which have given rise to the introduction of this Bill, and strictly in accordance both with the claims of the public and with the private interests of the officers. In the course of the debates upon this Bill there have been many subjects on which opinions have differed; but there is one subject on which there has been no dispute whatever—one statement which Members of the Government have uniformly made with exultation, and which we have uniformly admitted with regret—the statement that this measure is based upon a recommendation contained in the Report of a Royal Commission, and, what is more, of a Royal Commission appointed by the late Ministry. The First Lord of the Admiralty, speaking on the second reading, represented me as having questioned the right of himself and his brother Commissioners to make that recommendation. I did not interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, as not wishing to exercise the invidious privilege of correcting a speaker in possession of the House; but, as a matter of fact, whatever my thoughts on the subject might be, I never disputed the right of himself and his Colleagues to recommend anything that bore in any degree—and the question of exchanges bears in a very high degree—upon the pecuniary grievances of officers. But what I did say then, and what now I emphatically repeat, was, that the Commissioners were appointed to inquire into pecuniary grievances, and into pecuniary grievances alone; and that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, responsible as he is to Parliament and the nation for the discipline and spirit of the Army, was not justified in sheltering himself behind the dictum of Commissioners who, in their capacity of Commissioners, are no more authorities on the question of Army government and administration than are the Commissioners of Lunacy or the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. But the right hon. Gentleman has chosen so to shelter himself, and the House of Commons by enormous and repeated majorities has approved his course. He has told us that he holds before him as a shield the Report of the Commission; and with regard to the officers who were already in our Army before 1871, that Report must now be acknowledged to have been a very efficient protection; but in dealing with the case of their juniors I will undertake to show, if the Committee will give me its attention for not very many minutes, that this redoubtable shield is one which the feeblest weapons of logic can pierce; or, to drop a metaphor which has already served too long a turn, I assert that, for the purpose of making an alteration in the existing system of exchanges with regard to officers who have been appointed since Purchase was abolished in November, 1871, the Report of the Commission affords no reason, excuse, or justification whatsoever. For under what circumstances was that Commission appointed, and for what end? A great multitude of officers had memorialized the Commander-in-Chief on the subject of the changes for the worse that had been effected in their position by the Royal Warrant of 1871. The Duke of Richmond brought these memorials to the notice of the House of Lords, and a debate ensued in which every speech, and every word of every speech, was directed exclusively to the discontent which existed among the officers who had memorialized the Horse Guards, everyone of whom had been in the Army previous to the time when Purchase was abolished. The Duke of Richmond moved an Address to the Crown, praying Her Majesty to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the allegations of officers in Her Majesty's Army as to the grievances which they state that they suffer consequent on the abolition of Purchase, and this Address, in spite of the opposition of the late Government, was carried by a majority of nearly three to one. The answer to that Address was the appointment of the Commission presided over by Lord Penzance. The terms of Reference of the Commissioners are as explicit and as clearly defined as those of any Commissioners who ever were nominated. They are expressly charged to examine into and report on the complaints of officers who were in the Army before November, 1871, and of those officers alone. Among those complaints, one very frequently insisted on was, the loss of the privilege of exchanging for money. Officers were permitted to appear before the Commission who explained very clearly and in great, but not unnecessary detail, how they had paid large sums of money, under the express or implied sanction of the State, to purchase commissions, in the full expectation that they would be able to recoup themselves by effecting a profitable exchange. But the Royal Warrant of 1871 deprived them of that resource. One gentleman estimated his loss from this source at £2,500 on a single bargain, and another at £2,200, spread over his whole career. A third had actually bought an exchange for £750, "in full faith and confidence," to use his own words, "that I should receive the same again by an exchange to some regiment in India." Sir, these are hard cases; very hard cases indeed; and if, in order to meet these cases, the Commissioners had recommended that the privilege of exchanging for money should be restored to those officers who had entered the Army in the full belief that to the end of their term of service they would be allowed to exchange for whatever sum they could obtain, I should have said that, though they had overstepped the letter, they had not violated the spirit of their terms of Reference. But now we are asked to extend the effect of their recommendation to a fresh class of officers—to those young men who have entered the Army voluntarily, and with their eyes open, under the new set of conditions laid down by the Royal Warrant of 1871; one of which conditions is, that exchanges shall not henceforward be bought and sold at their market price—a class of officers about whose status, if there be any force and meaning in the English language, in which the terms of Reference are written, the Commissioners had no instructions to inquire, and no authority to pronounce. Sir, if the Committee does not accept this Amendment, we violate the terms of an express contract, under which the Crown engaged the services of all the young men who have entered the Army since November, 1871, and in so doing we commit an injustice to the nation, and a still greater injustice to the officers. It is an injustice to the nation, because we are allowing a number of its servants to settle among themselves the locality of their service by private arrangement, and, what is worse, by private bargain; because we are striking out one of the most important provisions from the ruling clause of the Royal Warrant—a clause which has cost the taxpayer hard upon £1,000,000 a line. And this in the case of men who have not, and do not profess to have, the shadow of a ground of complaint: who entered the Service with no more notion that they would, at any future time, be allowed to barter their commi-

sions, than the officers in our Departments at Whitehall believe that at some future time they will be allowed to barter their clerkships. And if you extend the operation of this Bill to recently-appointed officers, you will give rise to an abuse which appears to me to be the most flagrant with which the discipline, and I will venture to say the honour, of the Service was ever threatened. Officers complained before the Commission that they were unable to sell "the intrinsic value of the prestige of commissions in the more privileged regiments;" and there was no reason why they should not so complain, for acting strictly according to the old rules of their profession they had purchased that prestige for large sums of money. An officer who has given £8,000 or £9,000 for a commission of major in the Guards, when he might have bought a majority in the Line for little more than half the money, suffers under a grievance which is great in my eyes, and enormous in his own, unless he is allowed at will to exchange that commission, and receive the £3,000 or £4,000 of difference. But we have changed all this. An officer now receives a commission in the brigade of Guards by favour, and not by purchase; and henceforward if a gentleman who, without expending a farthing, has been honoured with the privilege of guarding Her Majesty's person is to sell that privilege, not to pay his tailor's bill—for Beau Brummell himself would hardly in the course of 10 years run up a tailor's bill within one half of the amount—but in order to purchase the freehold of a house in Onslow Square, or to make a settlement on his wife, all I can say is, that Mr. Cox's head clerk himself would call such a transaction a scandal to the Army and an outrage on the Crown. If we do not take care what we are about we shall violate the terms under which all our younger officers have given us the benefit of their services, and shall violate them to their immense disadvantage. The great majority of these gentlemen have obtained their commissions by their own industry and ability; not by private interest, or by having money at their command. Many of them belong to the class which Sir Charles Napier described as providing the best officers in the world, the class of gentlemen who have their bread to earn. They joined our Army on the express understanding, that if their health would not allow them to support the influences of a tropical climate they should, on application to the military authorities, have their claims to exchange with an officer in a battalion at home fairly and equitably considered. But, if this Bill passes without the addition of the words that I have placed upon the Paper, the less wealthy among them will find all the exchanges bought up by their richer comrades; and they will have absolutely no choice but to ask for sick leave, and, when that sick leave is out, to retire on half-pay, because they cannot live in the climate to which their regiment is attached on account of their health; or, it may be, in consequence of the very wounds which they have received in defence of a nation whose Representatives have had so little regard for the terms of the agreements which they make with the officers whom they employ. And, again, what will be the effect upon the mind of these officers when they become the victims of a transaction similar to that described by the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock) in his admirable speech; where a major or a colonel in their own regiment, whose five years are nearly out, and for whose vacancy they were anxiously looking, is suddenly, in consequence of an exchange, transferred to another and luckier, because wealthier, regiment, and replaced by an officer who has still four of his five years to run, and who blocks the prospect of advancement which had once been so fair. Already these gentlemen are overweighted in the race of promotion. They find themselves passed at every step by officers who enter through the Militia, and who begin their Army career in a higher rank than themselves. But if you give to these officers from the Militia, who for the most part belong to a wealthy class, the additional facilities for rapid promotion which this Bill affords to men of means, you intensify into a gross injustice that which is at present a serious inequality. These gentlemen chose their profession under the belief that they would be encouraged to devote their entire attention to their studies, to their drill, to the welfare of their men, and to the administrative work of their regiment. In the Royal Warrant of 1871, they had an absolute pledge that the cares and occupations of a military career would be exclusively of this honourable and interesting nature. And now we come to tell them, with all the authority of Parliament, that their business will henceforward be to watch the market, to calculate like so many actuaries the chances of promotion in a battalion at the Mauritius as opposed to a battalion at Aldershot, and to worry themselves with speculations whether or not it is worth their while to sell the prestige of a famous and ancient regiment, to which they have perhaps been appointed as a reward for proficiency in military knowledge, or transferred as an acknowledgment for distinguished service in the field. It is to rescue them from such a prospect as this, so contrary to the anticipations which at the time when they donned their uniforms these officers had reason to entertain, that I earnestly entreat the Committee and the Government favourably to consider the Amendment that is now before them. And I venture humbly to express a hope that those Gentlemen from the Sister Isle who sit around me will not on this occasion resort to a neutrality which both sides of the House alike lament, but will record their votes either for or against a proposal of such high import to the future well-being of that Army, the past history of which is the common pride of every one of the Three Kingdoms. And, Sir, we must not too readily come to the conclusion that the wishes of these, the younger officers of our Army, are in favour of this Bill. It will be said that they have not proclaimed their objections to it; but no one who knows the British Army, with its spirit of strict and graduated discipline, and its deeply-rooted respect for seniority, could possibly expect that officers, the oldest of whom is of three years' standing, should indulge in any manifestations against a measure which is popular with the majority of his seniors among company officers, with a great majority of field officers and generals, and which is ardently promoted by those who are in the confidence of the Commander-in-Chief, and by the Secretary of State for War. It is not in Memorials and Petitions, and letters to the newspapers, that you must look for the opinions of these young men. You have an indirect, but most significant test of their feeling in the matter. If the abolition of the purchase of exchanges had, indeed, made the Service less attractive to men of birth and high spirit, hon. Members who have sons or nephews would not have been obliged to resort to statistics in order to ascertain that the Army was less popular than of yore. But as it is, every avenue to military service, whether through the Militia, the Universities, or the open list, is crowded with a throng of candidates exactly of the same class as we have always been proud to see at the head of our soldiers, who prove, by their numbers and their eagerness, how highly they appreciate a service, one of the first conditions of which still is that exchanges can no longer be bought or sold. It so happens, Sir, that, from circumstances to which it is unnecessary to allude, I have a pretty extensive acquaintance among the junior, and, without unduly boasting, I may say, the rising officers of our Army; and I know, as well as perhaps most other hon. Gentlemen know, the objects on which their hearts are set. They wish to have the rules of retirement definitely laid down on a regular and not too illiberal scale. They wish to be able to look forward to a certain pension when they leave the Army, and while they are in the Army to a reasonable flow of promotion. They wish to have their obligatory and customary expenses decreased and their pay increased, until they may be able to earn, by the devotion of their lives, a modest, but a secure subsistence. By the abolition of Purchase, the late Secretary of State made the Army a profession in which men must work. It is for the present Secretary of State to make it a profession in which men can live. And let him undo that lamentable General Order, by which those prizes in the Army which had been solemnly promised to officers who had passed the Staff College were wantonly taken away, just as they were rising to the rank at which they could enjoy them. Let him give once more a fair field to merit, and no favour to wealth or patronage, and he will do much more to win the gratitude of the gentlemen in whose behalf this Amendment is moved than if he includes them wholesale in a measure whose justification is the Report of a Commission which, as I have shown by arguments that I believe to be absolutely unanswerable, has no more to do with the officers appointed to our Army during the last three years than with the lieutenants in the Prussian Guard. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided, That the provisions of this Act shall not apply to any officer who has entered Her Majesty's service on any day subsequent to the first day of November 1871."—(Mr. Trevelyan.)

MR. FORSYTH considered that the Amendment rested upon a basis which was entirely fallacious. The hon. Member asked the House by this Amendment to decide that the free exchanges permitted by the Bill were a necessary evil, which ought to be restricted as much as possible, and ought not to be allowed at all whenever they could be prevented. But the principle of this Bill was the very reverse. Its object was to facilitate free exchanges. The hon. Member (Mr. Trevelyan) wanted the House to draw a hard-and-fast line at a certain year, and to say it would allow this necessary evil up to 1871; but that as regarded officers who had entered the service since that time, and in future, no free exchanges should be permitted. If the Members on the Ministerial side of the House accepted that Amendment they would stultify themselves. Exchanges were permitted by the law as it at present stood, and money was also allowed to pass. In the year 1871, when the late Government abolished Purchase, they were so satisfied that the system of exchanges should continue that they made special regulations recognizing it, and also for allowing money to pass. Three-fourths of the arguments on the other side were based upon the ground that this Bill ought not to pass, because thereby officers would be enabled to escape foreign service. Now, he held in his hand a Return relative to exchanges during the last few years, which was in more than one respect significant. Since exchanges had been regulated by the late Government there had been 106 exchanges in regiments of the Line, 75 of which were effected in order to escape going to India, which showed that the officer now escaped going to India, and did not face the jungle and the malaria. In the Artillery, which was a non-purchase corps, there had been 129 exchanges within the last seven years, 71

of which had been effected to escape foreign service. In the Engineers only 17 had exchanged, 14 of which were effected to escape foreign service. These figures proved that the declamation against this Bill on the ground that under it there would be exchanges injurious to the service and derogatory to the character of the British officer was all moonshine, because the very thing was happening under existing regulations. The same remark applied to money. Money was allowed to pass under the regulations of the late Government just as it was to be allowed under the present Bill. But the War Secretary very wisely and very judiciously declared he would not take any cognizance of these money transactions. His position in the matter was simply this—that exchanges must be regulated by military considerations, and military considerations alone. That was surely not a point to be controverted by hon. Gentlemen opposite. He must credit the Leaders of the Opposition with sincerity of purpose—else, having achieved unpopularity with the British electors, they could not be so determined to alienate the affections of British officers. He believed there were no military officers on the front Opposition bench; but he could not think that right hon. Gentlemen would run their heads against a wall unless impelled by countervailing considerations. They must be constrained by the highest and purest motives to increase their unpopularity in standing forth as the opponents of the wishes of the officers of the whole British Army. He should certainly vote against the Amendment.

MR. LOWE said, the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Forsyth) had taunted the Leaders of the Opposition with not being military officers, and he presumed that taunt would not have been levelled at them if the hon. and learned Member had not acquired his knowledge in the corps of Volunteers over which a peculiar potentate was popularly supposed to preside. Whatever might be the merits of the hon. and learned Member from a military point of view, he had not done justice to his other profession of the law, because he had done that which lawyers seldom did—he had carefully avoided touching in the most remote manner upon the question now before the Committee. The question was not that of exchange, but it was the passing of money—whether money was to pass or not, and whether money should pass as an inducement to effect these exchanges. How, then, could the hon. and learned Member think he had proved his point by adducing a large number of instances of exchange which had been effected without this consideration? The points made against them by hon. Gentlemen opposite might be stated in a very few words. They said—“You appointed a Commission to inquire into the grievances of the Army”—occasioned by the abolition of Purchase—“and you are bound by what your Commission reports. It is the same as if you had done it yourselves; we take it from you and carry it out.” Now, was that a fair statement of the case? He thought it was not. The late Government did appoint a Commission to look into the grievances occasioned by Purchase, and there was some force in the argument so far as it applied to what had been done by the Commission, with the view of remedying the hardships occasioned by the abolition of Purchase. For the purposes of this discussion he admitted the argument, and was ready to concede what the Commission recommended in that sense. But the Commission being appointed for one purpose went beyond what was entrusted to them, and made recommendations which were not apparently intended to remedy the evils of purchase at all, but merely to please the Army by letting them traffic in exchanges, and there he thought they strained the matter too far. Let them look at the matter plainly, and as men of the world. Why, this officers’ grievance question had come as a god-send to right hon. Gentlemen opposite. They were looking out for something to do to please the Army, and they got hold of this aberration of the Commission and jumped upon it with both feet, receiving it like manna or dew from Heaven, so welcome was it to them. For the purposes of this Motion he was ready to be bound by the Commissioners so far as their authority extended; but when the Commissioners went beyond the scope of their inquiry, it was open to right hon. Gentlemen opposite to say that they chose to follow them in that erratic course, but not that the founders of the Commission were responsible for it. The chief thing which struck him in connection with the question before the Committee was the extreme hardship and unfairness that would be imposed upon young officers who had joined the service since the abolition of Purchase. § When the latter fact was accomplished the country practically said to these young officers,—“We are going to introduce a new kind of service; by diligence and studious devotion to your profession you may rise in it without any pecuniary means whatever; the element of money is banished, and you may look forward to anything that is to be got in your profession.” That was the sort of temptation and prospect we had held out to them if they would look at their profession as gentlemen ought to look at it, as a noble pursuit to be followed as a matter of duty and honour, and if they would not look at everything simply in the light of the amount of money to be got out of it. He really did not envy the feelings of any man who preferred to educate our young officers in the old school of the Army, subject as it was to all its low and mean pecuniary considerations, instead of inculcating upon them the nobility of a service free from such degrading influences. Another point upon which he desired to lay stress was this. He could not conceive how a system of promotion by merit could be reconciled with the principle of the Bill which the House was asked by Her Majesty’s Government to pass. When a man was promoted for merit he did not perhaps gain much in material advantages, but had conferred upon him a high and distinguished honour, and this distinction was a means of delivering the Army from mere pecuniary fetters. But how would such a system work when a young man was placed in such a distinguished position and was then afterwards allowed to sell it? Surely the two systems of selection and purchase could not work together. If they favoured the system of promotion by merit they must give up these pecuniary transactions; but if they maintained the latter they must abandon the former. He was concerned to see that the whole argument had changed since they had first begun to discuss the Bill. Then the House was told that it was only desired to legalize these exchanges in order to promote the convenience of officers, who by reason of ill health, large families, or other causes, found it necessary to change their places of residence. As the discussion had advanced it had turned upon considerations more and more mean and sordid, and it was now clear that the only point upon which officers and their friends were thoroughly agreed was that they had in their commissions vendible commodities, and that they did not mean to be deprived of the power of disposing of them. During the past few days he had been engaged in a Committee upstairs inquiring as to certain matters affecting the Stock Exchange, and he found it difficult to distinguish between the proceedings in the Committee on this Bill and those in the other Committee to which he referred as far as their tone was concerned. He had in the course of the debate heard declarations which were anything but re-assuring. The Secretary of State for War had been very difficult to be "drawn" in reference to the matter. The declaration of the Secretary of State merely amounted to this—that the Guards were not entitled to sell the intrinsic value of their corps. But that was just the very point that was doubted. It was asserted by the Opposition, that an officer might look over the roll of such a regiment's achievements inscribed upon its colours, from Blenheim to Waterloo, and Waterloo to Inkermann, and then consider how much money he could get for an exchange. That was the thing called prestige. A band of brave, gallant, and noble men had served their country in every part of the world; they had shed their blood, and brought upon themselves immortal honour; and it was left for another set of men to make money out of these exploits of their predecessors by selling their positions. That point had been made abundantly clear by the admissions of the Secretary of State for War himself. Another serious blot in the Bill was that which his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) endeavoured to meet by moving an Amendment to the effect that a number of officers in a regiment should not be allowed to make up a purse to be presented to a senior officer in order that he might, by retiring from the regiment, give them each a step. The Secretary of State for War, in opposition to this Amendment, held that the state of things against which it was proposed to guard would not arise, but this statement did not get over the fact that what had happened in the past was likely to occur again.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS rose to Order. The right hon. Gentleman was in Committee making a speech which would have alone been appropriate on the Motion for the second reading of the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly in Order.

MR. LOWE said, it was clear that the hon. and learned Gentleman who interrupted him did not understand the question, which was, whether Parliament should or should not exclude from the operation of the present Bill certain officers who were not affected in any way by the abolition of Purchase. This was an entirely new question, and its discussion necessitated the examination of certain general considerations connected with the measure. Under the existing law, transactions such as those referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract were punishable by expulsion from the Service, and the Secretary of State for War proposed to legalize such proceedings, meeting the objections made on the score that it would re-enact Purchase with the observation that the state of things so strongly feared would not arise. Let them not force this iniquity upon young men, who were free from the system of Purchase, who never had anything to do with it, and who, unless the House insisted upon breaking down this salutary bulwark, would never have anything to do with it. He was told that the promotions for merit in the Army amounted to some 2 per cent—so small an amount that, as a mathematician would say, it might be neglected altogether; and therefore, after paying an enormous sum to get rid of Purchase, we had not got what we paid for, and meant to have, we had got not a service of promotion, but a service of seniority, and now this vagary of the Commission was taken advantage of in order to bring back in its full effect and integrity the system of buying officers out by bonus and by contributions. Although we had got a seniority service, that service was encumbered and disgraced by a great many of the incidents of the Purchase system. How long it would be before we came to Purchase pure and simple no one could say; if things remained in the present train come it would; so he thought they were justified in asking the Secretary for War to have a little mercy upon the young officers who had been trained up to look to other and better things, and not to insist upon bringing back upon them all the old incidents of buying, selling, dealing, trucking, and huckstering in commissions.

Mr. J. S. HARDY opposed the Amendment, remarking that it seemed to have been assumed as a fact that the present system of exchanges in the Army was satisfactory. He, on the other hand, thought it utterly indefensible. It was a thoroughly weak system, and acted unjustly. Under it the middle-class man with £100 or £200 at his banker's, might be relieved from the competition of the richer man bidding against him; but the really poor man might be left to rot in India or to submit to any misfortune that might happen. It seemed to him that there were only two courses to be adopted—either they must allow unrestricted exchanges, or prohibit them altogether, leaving any arrangement of the kind which might be absolutely necessary to be made by means of a payment by the War Office, and not by the officer. The latter plan would involve a charge upon the country which hon. Gentlemen opposite were not likely to approve, while it would also greatly interfere with the convenience of the officers, and, for his own part, he should support the Bill.

Mr. PERCY WYNDHAM remarked that it was too late for hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite to bring forward such arguments against the Bill as they now advanced, considering the manner in which they dealt with this question when they were in power. Did they say that exchanges were beneficial to the service, and that therefore they ought to be made at the expense of the country? No; their economy prevented them from taking this course, and they threw the cost of an exchange on one of the parties making the exchange, reserving a right to limit the amount given. The whole of their objections to the Bill and their reasons for supporting the Amendment, arose from their opinion that an exchange for 5s. was a moral transaction, but that one for which 7s. 6d. was paid must be condemned.

Mr. A. H. BROWN deprecated legislation in favour of the rich only, adding that no money would ever be required to induce British officers to encounter danger.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Mr. Raikes—I have not, Sir, been eager to take a part in the discussions on this Bill; on the contrary, I have been exceedingly desirous to avoid it. I have a great dread of re-actionary measures in general, and I was in hopes that the experience of last year upon another measure would have conveyed a warning to the minds of Her Majesty's Government. But on this occasion my hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) has given us an opportunity, for which I, for one, feel much indebted to him, of meeting the Government and doing all we can to procure what would be, upon the whole, a not unreasonable, and what would almost promise to be a reasonable, settlement of this question. Sir, I must here refer to words I have heard. A sentiment has been expressed by a Gentleman who has had the benefit, I think, of a few months' experience in this House, and who announced, on the part of the majority of this House, that they were determined to carry through this Bill exactly as it stood. Well, Sir, I trust the very last thing for which a Liberal Opposition will be known in future times will be a resort to factious resistance; and there cannot be the smallest doubt of the power of the majority to carry out their threat, and, as the field of discussion is a limited field, of their power to carry out their threat within a very moderate time. But a settlement such as this, in so far as it is a settlement at all, is a settlement due to the humour of the day. It is founded, not upon an appeal to the general reason, but upon the possession of a majority, which, as it came into existence upon a certain occasion, may upon some other occasion in the future cease to exist. So far as all reasonable concessions are intended and are desired, in order to meet the grievances of individuals, there is every disposition on our part to be parties to them, even if we do not take the same view of those grievances as has been taken by hon. Gentlemen opposite. But this I must say, that if, after the enormous sacrifices the country has been called upon to make with a view to the abolition of Purchase, practices are to be introduced which rest upon essentially the same foundation, which differ in principle though not in name from Purchase, which the Secretary for War disapproves, and the re-introduction of which I feel perfectly confident he will do his best to resist, and practices which, as we believe, will infallibly draw after them, probably by a series of changes, according to the insidious nature of the motives you are now asked to bring into action all that is essentially contained in the system of Purchase—I must say, for one, it is impossible to regard such a settlement as that as a permanent settlement; and those who avail themselves of the majority of the moment for the purpose of pushing on a measure so remarkable in distinct, although only partial, derogation of the great measure of 1871, must not be surprised if, at some future time, the measure with which they measure is meted out to them. I am not going to refer, in the name of boon and privilege, to that which I believe it to be, the bane and mischief of the future of the officers of the Army; but hon. Members must not be surprised if, upon public grounds, it shall be hereafter disavowed and withdrawn, even as upon grounds, I think not public, it is commended to this House. I give the fullest credit to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War for his intentions in this matter. I give him the same credit as I gave to those from whom I may have differed in opinion, and who were my Colleagues in the service of the Crown. It is not, however, integrity and uprightness of intention which will suffice to counteract and neutralize the subtle, vigilant, incessant action of those personal motives besetting him in every form and at every point which we are now going to set in motion. Well, Sir, what did the right hon. Gentleman tell us? I wish to show how completely my hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs meets the reasonable—the not unreasonable—demands of this case. The right hon. Gentleman has stated it is behind the shield of the Commission he seeks shelter. Now, how far does the shield of the Commission avail him? For what purpose was the Commission appointed? It was appointed to inquire into grievances, and into grievances entirely of a personal and pecuniary character. So far as the Commission recommends to us measures affecting the future policy of this country with respect to the Army, the Commission consists of three respectable, amiable, and distinguished individuals, and it consists of nothing more; because as soon as it goes into a question of future policy, it is acting entirely beyond the grounds on which it was appointed to act; and it is impossible to quote the authority of this or any Commission, except for the purpose to which it was instructed by the Crown to direct its attention. What was that purpose? It was the relief of officers from what were considered their pecuniary or their personal grievances; and all the Commissioners have said with respect to the policy of the case is this—that they are not satisfied that there will be any detriment to the Service from the re-introduction of exchanges in the manner of Purchase. That may be all very well; but it is not the question they were appointed to settle. That was not the question which the Commissioners were appointed to inquire into, and any one sitting here is as much entitled to give a judgment, and with as much authority, as these Commissioners, respecting what is detrimental to the Service. I have a great respect for the Commissioners, within the lines in which they were appointed to act. They were appointed to consider the relief and advantage of officers who were in the service at the time the Warrant for the Abolition of Purchase was issued, and who had formed certain expectations founded on long-continued practice—expectations which it has always been the habit of Parliament, even in its greatest energy of reform, to respect, and which I trust it always will be the habit of Parliament to respect. The Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs, accordingly meets the whole of the purpose for which the Commission was appointed. He grants to every officer who had obtained his commission before the 1st of November, 1871, all that is asked for in this Bill. I must say I was in hopes that upon this ground we should have been met. I am sorry to see the nature of the policy which has been pursued on the other side of the House. In every shape in which mitigation of this Bill could be suggested, it has been or it is intended to be opposed. The Government were asked to exclude field officers from the provisions of the Bill. This has been refused. Then the Government were asked to prohibit by statute what is called the making of purses—that is to say, to prohibit it by the only means which can be effectual. That, too, has been refused. The Government were also asked to limit these transactions within the pecuniary amount of £500, and we had an expectation of arguing that question under a shield—to use a favourite word—and under the authority of the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Loyd-Lindsay), who proved last night to be somewhat less gallant than he has been on all previous occasions; but we were obliged to argue that matter on the shield of our own responsibility. That also was refused. Another proposal will be made for giving publicity to these transactions. I have a strong opinion on the subject; but I am afraid that that also is to be refused. And now my hon. Friend comes forward with this proposition and says—“Take for your officers who have a grievance everything that they demand.” And if I may form a judgment from the voices which have been heard on the Government side of the House I conclude that this also is to be refused. I must here point out, as I did some eight or nine months ago, when speaking on another subject, that this is not the way to secure the stability of legislation, and that proposals so conceived and so pushed, without mitigation, with no justification practically of the grounds on which they are made, are not according to the habits, the temper in which Parliament usually acts, or according to the principles and modes of action by which the legislation of this country has become so famous. Let it be remembered how serious are the difficulties which will be set in operation by this Bill. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Rye (Mr. J. S. Hardy) who has spoken this evening in that manner which always pleases the House, and with a talent which all are glad to acknowledge, says with truth that it will be a difficult thing for the Secretary of State to determine between what regiments exchange shall be allowed, and between what regiments it shall not be allowed—whether the credit and fame of a regiment be such that an officer shall be allowed to part with it, or whether it be such that he may not be allowed to part with it. Is not that the very strongest reason which can possibly be conceived against a measure which allows you to bring into the field motives not in themselves legitimate—motives which will create desire for such things—motives which do not now exist, and which will place the Secretary of State in difficulties he is not placed in, and need not be placed in now? But the right hon. Gentleman has felt that he was obliged to make his choice between them. After the pressure of the questions addressed to the right hon. Gentleman last night we now clearly understand, as far as negatives can make a thing clear, that although he has told us exchanges are not to be free, the circumstance that the credit and reputation of a particular regiment enter into the price to be paid is not to be a reason for refusing an exchange. If I am wrong I hope I shall be contradicted at once; but I have no doubt I am right. Indeed, it was impossible to listen to the right hon. Gentleman last night, and not to perceive that he felt the difficulty which the hon. Member for Rye has now explained to us, and that he would not undertake to lay down distinctions in principle between one regiment and another. Consequently, those regiments which are famous, and which in other respects possess the greatest advantages, are to have those advantages, whether they consist in fame and glory or not, put up to sale whenever the process of exchange can be made conducive to the transaction of such a sale. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth) says all these evils already exist, and that at the present moment exchanges are made for the purpose of avoiding service in India. But nobody denies for a moment that there may be perfectly legitimate causes for desiring to avoid service in India. Causes of health, of family, and many other personal considerations may give a just personal ground for desiring to avoid service in India. And the merits of the present system is, that it affords that degree of scope and enables the Secretary of State for War and the military authorities to meet these reasonable demands. But is it because there are sometimes just reasons for wishing to avoid service in India that we are to recognize those reasons which are unjust? What we contend to be an unjust reason is this—that the possession of wealth ought not to be a ground for the avoidance of irksome service. Let us well understand what is this question. Nobody supposes that any officer in the British Army will ever be misled by any amount of money, or by any secondary motive whatever, in a case where honour or where danger is in question. It is not a question of dangerous service; it is not a question of finching from the calls of honour; it is a question of the avoidance of irksome service. But that service is the greatest difficulty of a standing Army in time of peace, and most of all the difficulty of a standing Army like ours, which has to serve all over the world; and the difficulty is greatly aggravated by the constant and rapid growth of wealth in the country, and the incessantly more and more luxurious habits of society. It is idle to tell me that young men, whether in the Army or not, entertain considerable repugnance to the undertaking of irksome service if they can avoid it, and we contend that they ought not to be enabled to avoid it by means of wealth. We are not, however, urging this objection against those who have claims growing out of former expectations. Look at the evidence adduced before the Commission, and at the Report of the Commissioners. Everything they have heard and everything they have said carries up the question to this very point—that it is proposed to allow men by force of money to obtain the privilege of relief from irksome service. Now, it has been shown over and over again how hardly this will operate on those men who now, having legitimate reasons for desiring to exchange home from India or elsewhere, and having now nothing to bar their arriving at such exchanges, will be debarred in future by the competition of the wealth they do not possess. But, Sir, apart from hardship to individuals, I ask the House of Commons whether, at this time of day, it is wise, whether it is patriotic, I would almost say whether it is decent, that we should be busying ourselves with legislation to place wealth in a position of advantage as compared with talent, with character, and with service? Is, then, wealth so poor and so oppressed a thing; is it a commodity so little in request that it is totally destitute of the means of getting fair play for itself in the different ranks of life? Is this an age which is honourably distinguished for its indifference to the mere claims of wealth? I love not excessive privilege, whether for wealth or for anything else; but if privilege were to be introduced in favour of rank, birth, and ancient name and family, I should infinitely prefer it to the invidious, I must say the odious, task of deliberately and with our eyes open making for the service of the Queen Regulations, so that, by means of wealth apart from merit and service, a particular officer is to have an advantage over another in choosing the place where he shall serve. All this is most serious matter. These discussions, I think, need not be greatly prolonged, yet I very greatly doubt whether the question can end with discussions of a Bill conceived in such a spirit as this. The right hon. Gentleman referred to one point which I must notice. Of course, I am sorry to be compelled to touch upon topics of a general character; but as the question is whether officers of the future shall be included in the Bill, it is necessary for me to touch briefly on the leading points of the measure. If the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War were omnipotent in the case, I should not be in the slightest degree afraid of leaving the honour of the service of the country in his hands; but he has said very frankly, that by declaration he proposes to take what he thinks is a security against the practice of what is called making purses. My right hon. Friend near me proposed to deal effectually with this question by making it penal on the part of officers to concur in any arrangement contravening the law now in existence. The right hon. Gentleman rejected this suggestion, and proposes in lieu of it to proceed by way of declaration. Now, a man's declaration is only valuable with reference to what is done by himself. For example, an exchange is going to be made between two officers, A and B, who are to make a certain declaration. Such a declaration may be perfectly good as far as A and B are concerned; but this is not the point at issue. The allegation is that C, D, E, and a number of other officers will have direct inducements in many of these cases to subscribe money and enter into what will be peculiarly a pecuniary transaction, and the right hon. Gentleman proposes to prevent that proceeding, not by asking these officers—which, indeed, might be absurd—whether they have done so, but by asking A and B what C, D, E, and half the other letters of the Alphabet have been about. This seems like an unquestionable leaving open of the door for the introduction of the process of Purchase. There is no doubt about the nature of the objects the Commissioners have had in view. It is quite evident to those who read this portion of the Report that the adjustment of matters of pecuniary and personal grievance has been that to which they had addressed their minds. I greatly regret that they did not take into view the distinction between the officer of the past and the officer of the future. But as they have not done so, and as when they were called upon to make recommendations they made a declaration deeply involving the policy of the future, I maintain that the claim of the right hon. Gentleman to be covered by their authority entirely fails, and that the whole measure remains open to the force of these remarks which have been made from this side of the House in so many forms and with so much weight and clearness—that this is a measure tending to give undue advantage to the possession of wealth as compared with other and far higher claims upon the notice and attention of authority. Such a measure has no claim upon our respect and attention, and can promise no good either for the present or for the future of that gallant service whose honour and distinction we are always so desirous of maintaining.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I rejoice, in common, I am quite sure, with the whole Committee, in hearing again the eloquent voice and the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman who has just addressed us; and before proceeding to remark upon those arguments, I must be allowed to thank him for his courtesy towards myself, and the fairness with which he admitted that I had no intention to bring about the evils we all so greatly deplore. Passing from this personal matter, I think, from what we have heard during this debate, it might be supposed we were forcing this Bill upon the House in some unheard-of manner; whereas, in the case of no Bill ever brought before the House of the same length and importance, have there been opportunities for such full discussion. The right hon. Gentleman says we have used our majority in opposing the various Amendments which have been proposed from the opposite side of the House? Why did we do so? Because these Amendments were every one of them in flat contradiction to the Bill I had brought forward. They were strenuously directed against the main object for which this Bill has been introduced, and against the definite terms which were introduced to meet the difficulties which were the cause of complaint. In my first statement I forestalled the objections upon many of the subjects since alluded to, and I said then, as distinctly as I said last night, that my object was that exchanges should be as free as they were in former times, though then they were illegal; that I would render that legal which was formerly illegal; but, as regards money transactions, I should make no inquiry at all. I said this at first; I repeated it afterwards. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen), rather in the catechizing manner of a schoolmaster than that of one Member of Parliament addressing another, put a question to me in a leading form, which, if answered in the same form would have rendered me liable to misconstruction of the grossest kind, while I had really answered the question frequently in the course of these debates in a general and true form. Was it never the case in former days that all the Amendments proposed on our side of the House were rejected by an overwhelming majority? Have there not been occasions when attempts were made, not by the ordinary constitutional means, but by that force which can never be exercised constitutionally in this House, by observing perfect silence, and by refusing to discuss the arguments urged on one side, and hasten on the adoption of a particular measure? No one can say that speakers have been wanted on this side of the House to meet the arguments addressed to us on the other side. Much has been said by the right hon. Gentleman about what I said about our being under the shield of the Royal Commission. Now, nobody knows better than the right hon. Gentleman that a shield is not a complete protection to the body, and that it is not supposed to render unnecessary every other kind of armour. It is true I have adopted the arguments of the Commissioners, and believe that the system they have recommended would be beneficial to the exchangers, and not disadvantageous, but in many cases even beneficial to the service. But I have not only advanced under this shield, I have also in my defence used such weapons as I had a right to use, and have relied upon other arguments, as well as upon the authority of the Commission. We had been told that no great authority is due to the Commission, though they may have reported that this system would be beneficial to the Service. I should have thought men like Lord Penzance, Lord Justice James, and my right hon. Friend (Mr. Hunt) were peculiarly qualified to sit on such a Commission. They had sat on other Commissions which had considered the question, and Lord Justice James had himself been in the service. All the Commissioners were, in fact, well acquainted with it; and how was it that my Predecessor, Lord Cardwell, selected them for the purpose? At least we can claim the authority which is due to them, and I ask no more. The right hon. Gentleman says that abuse must necessarily arise from the existence of declarations. Now, the whole of our present system rests upon declarations. With respect to the Artillery and the double battalions, the Act of 49 Geo. III. does not apply, and therefore you must prosecute, not under that statute, but under the declarations. And what are these declarations? Do you suppose we shall allow them to be violated as the law was allowed to be violated in former times? Do you think we shall allow an officer to make false declarations, to violate honour and truth, and that he will not be prosecuted as he would have been under the statute of Geo. III.? The right hon. Gentleman says the declaration may be good as regards the two officers who exchange, but that other officers may be concerned by making up a purse to bring about the exchange. But does not the right hon. Gentleman see how the purse will be used? It must be made for the purpose of being paid to A or B, or else it is of no use at all. I say, therefore, if A can come forward and say—"I have received no money from my juniors in the regiment to exchange," and if B can say—"I am not cognizant of any money passing in this transaction, except the money paid by myself," such a declaration will be just as efficacious as the declaration made in the present instance. Is it not remarkable that the right hon. Gentleman should now support a proposal which would divide the Army into two classes of officers, and should tell us that this would not be an unreasonable solution of the question? What! Not an unreasonable solution of the question if it leads to the evil consequences which the right hon. Gentleman apprehends, and if we are putting the great majority of the Army into a position in which abuses must spring up which will bring back Purchase? Now, if this thing were not right in itself—if it were not as right for both parts of the Army as it is for one part—I should not advocate it; and I do not envy the feelings of hon. Members opposite who, having opposed every part of this Bill at every stage as a thing so horrible in itself that they would never assent to it, now say it would not be an unreasonable solution of the question to divide the officers of the Army into two classes. I pass now from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) and come to the right hon. Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe). What shall I say of the way in which that right hon. Gentleman has spoken of men who availed themselves of this system of exchanges in former days? He spoke of bartering and huckstering and trafficking in the prestige of a regiment. Let the right hon. Gentleman turn to the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock), and ask him who had huckstered and bartered and trafficked in the prestige of their regiment. Who are the brokers, and traffickers, and tricksters to whom the right hon. Gentleman referred? I think I see another hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite who in his time has been an exchanger, and who no doubt has paid or been paid for exchanging. Is he one of the barterers and tricksters—[An hon. MEMBER: Hucksters!] —whom the right hon. Gentleman is so anxious to exclude from the Army? I must leave those who make such charges to settle the matter with this gallant and distinguished profession, and to justify the taunts and sneers which are levelled against it in so unceremonious a manner. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to represent that among the officers of the Army there was no sense of faith, or truth, or honour; that they were ready to part with the honour of their regiments. Let the right hon. Gentleman settle that with the Army and with the Commissioners. The right hon. Gentleman has intimated that there were officers in the Army who sought to excuse themselves from participation in irksome and dangerous duty by resorting to money payments. An argument on the other side was founded upon the assumption that there was a right on the part of the officers to exchange, and that we were going to make it an absolute right, without any control whatever. What I said to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) was—"You know as well as I do there is no such 'right.'" I avoided the trap which seemed to be laid that I might fall into an expression used by the right hon. Gentleman, and afterwards find it perverted into an expression to be used against myself. We have heard a great deal during the debate of money which would pass in these transactions, and the supposed degrading element of money has been much dwelt upon. From which side of the House did these expressions proceed? The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) began his speech with money, the middle of it was money, and the conclusion money. It was from that side of the House, not from this, that these constant controversies about money arose. I ask, in what do we differ from our Predecessors? What was the ground upon which Lord Cardwell sanctioned exchanges in the future? Upon the ground of personal convenience. Yet this is the thing which has been condemned over and over again by the right hon. Gentleman. It was on the ground of personal convenience that exchanges have been made; it is on that ground that they are to be continued. Now, I listened to the speech of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) with the greatest pleasure, because it was a speech addressed calmly and coolly to our understanding and our reason, and did not fall under the head of appeals to that prejudice and passion which have been so characteristic of the speeches from the other side. The hon. Member for the Border Burghs seemed to say I had a very pleasant task before me—the task left me by my Predecessor. He says that my Predecessor made the officers' profession a profession of work, and that it will be for me to teach them how to live. I would like to know what particular act of my Predecessor has made the profession a profession of work more than it was a profession of work before. I would like to know what is that particular thing done by my Predecessor, on which the hon. Member for the Border Burghs can lay his finger, which has exalted the profession of arms from the slough of idleness and uselessness to the noble position of a profession of work. I say that no distinction of that kind can be made between the Army as it was before and as it is now. But as for the other point, I quite admit there are many difficulties in the way of making officers live by their profession, and I must say it is not from below the Gangway opposite that I look for assistance whereby they may be enabled to live. There has been no great desire hitherto on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite to pay British officers excessively; but I am sure the hon. Member for the Border Burghs will be glad that they should be paid, not an excessive, but a reasonable remuneration. When the hon. Gentleman tells me that I shall have to reduce their expenses and increase their pay, I hope if I live long enough I may be able to do something in that way; but I should tremble if I were to depend for my success on what was done by my Predecessor, for if my Predecessor has left me that work to do he has left me nothing wherewith to do it. Then there is another argument, and one of wider scope, which has been used by the hon. Gentleman. He says that by this Bill we have violated the understanding on which officers have entered the service under the Royal Warrant of 1871. Well, is it to be contended that Royal Warrants are not to be changed, no matter what may be the pressure of circumstances? And, if they are to be changed, is it to be admitted that this is to be done without giving officers any compensation? If the hon. Member means that, he broaches a very dangerous doctrine, because the moment you touch a Royal Warrant you touch a question of contract under which every officer in the Army entered. And now I have to say I am not prepared to accept this Amendment. I am not prepared to divide the officers of the Army into two classes—one class enjoying a freedom of exchange from which the other shall be debarred. The hon.

and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) would debar from exchange all those officers who have come in since 1871. Well, that is an intelligible proposition. I have always said so. On the other hand, I assume that the hon. Member for the Border Burghs means them to come in under the present system of exchanges—that is, under the Warrant made since they came in. I have been told to distinguish between the condition of things under the existing Warrant and that which I am about to produce; but I cannot consent to make so invidious a distinction. It is perfectly true the rich man has an advantage, because a large sum may have to be paid; but in cases where there are children and governesses to be taken into account I do not see how that is to be avoided. But when the right hon. Gentleman opposite speaks with contempt of the declarations which may be made hereafter he throws considerable doubt on the declarations made at present. For my part, I am not inclined to throw doubt on those declarations. I trust in the integrity and honour of British officers. I am aware of the responsibility I undertake, but I will say this—trusting as I do to the integrity and honour of the British officer, if I find that integrity and that honour violated, I will then be as severe as I am now disposed to be generous.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I am not disposed to prolong the debate on this Amendment after the very eloquent speeches of my right hon. Friend near me (Mr. Gladstone), and the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. G. Hardy); but there were one or two things stated by the Secretary for War which I cannot altogether pass over. The right hon. Gentleman stated at the beginning of his speech that every Amendment proposed from this side of the House was hostile to the principle of the measure. The right hon. Gentleman must have forgotten the Amendment of my right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), which was not in the slightest degree hostile to the principle of the Bill, or to the spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman proposes to administer it. The object of my right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract was merely to give a legislative condemnation to the practice which the right hon. Gentleman himself denounces —that of subscribing and making purses to enable senior officers to exchange. That Amendment cannot be described as in opposition to the principle of the Bill. Then the right hon. Gentleman stated that Lord Penzance, Lord Justice James, and the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hunt) had been employed on other Commissions connected with the Army, and were good authorities upon Army matters. I can hardly concur in the opinion that, however good authorities they may be on Army matters, they are the best men for settling the future policy of the Army. I do not think that a Commission composed of a couple of lawyers and a county Member is the best Commission we could have for such a purpose. The Commission should have included some one who had been connected with the administration of the Army; but this Commission was of a purely judicial character; and it never seems to have occurred to my noble Friend (Lord Cardwell), when he appointed those Commissioners, that they would do nothing else than report whether, if the officers' grievances were well founded, compensation ought to be awarded to them. I do think the Commission did somewhat exceed the scope of their instructions when, finding it not desirable to award any pecuniary compensation on account of exchanges, they took it upon themselves to recommend that payment for exchanges should be restored. The right hon. Gentleman has said that the declaration of officers was the only thing on which we had now to rely. That is very dangerous ground to proceed upon. I would be the last person to say a word that would be offensive to any officer. But we know that declarations of the most stringent kind could not be enforced during the existence of the purchase system, and, notwithstanding those declarations, that over-regulation prices had grown up was a matter of perfect notoriety. We know, and the right hon. Gentleman knows, these things, and yet he proposes to rely on declarations. No doubt, to a great extent we rely on declarations at this moment. I do not wish—and I do not know any one on this side who wishes—to contend that the present is a perfect system. If the right hon. Gentleman can recommend any improvement let him do so by all means. What is the declaration which an officer is required to make? Is it that he has not done something condemned by law? But what the right hon. Gentleman is going to substitute is that he has not done something contrary to the Regulations the right hon. Gentleman is going to lay down. My right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract did attempt to make illegal this practice of subscribing a bonus, and making up a purse to enable senior officers to exchange. But is there no difference between requiring an officer to declare he has paid nothing whatever except certain sums specified in the Schedule, and making it illegal to do so? Parliament tells the officer up to this time that his position is not to be obtained by any pecuniary compensation whatever. In future you are going to tell him that on certain conditions his position may be bought. You are now about to do what our Predecessors attempted when they laid down the regulation system, and over-regulation prices were the result. It is true, as has been stated, that General Havelock and other distinguished officers were obliged to sell their commissions—but what compelled them to do so? It was the purchase system; that purchase system which hon. Gentlemen opposite did so much to oppose the abolition of. It was impossible for a poor officer under that system to get on at all, except by the practice of exchanging for money; and, naturally, officers who wished to rise in their profession would take every chance that was left open to them to do so. But is it not a very different thing that an officer who has obtained by good fortune a commission in a privileged regiment of great prestige should barter the prestige of that regiment for a sum of money? I do not think that the conduct of officers in past time was deserving of the indignation of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. The right hon. Gentleman, referring to the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen), says that it began with money, continued with money, and ended with money; and the same charge was made last night against my right hon. Friend by the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Sir Charles Russell). But Sir, is it our fault or the fault of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite that a word is brought into this discussion that some of us regard as lying at the very root of the matter. The right hon. Gentleman opposite does not get rid of the money consideration by saying that he will not know anything about it. He does not, he cannot, deny that it is a question of money. The right hon. Gentleman seems to suppose that because he does not wish or intend to know anything about the sums of money which will pass between officers, he can by that easy process get rid of this as a question of money altogether. We have listened to speeches in which sordid considerations for exchanges was referred to; but we have also read the Report of the Commissioners and the evidence of gallant officers who were examined, and we find that the beginning of their evidence was money, the continuation of it was money, and the ending of it was money. And, Sir, if we find that pecuniary considerations occupy so large a space in the minds of gallant officers, to meet whose grievance the Bill was introduced, is it our fault, or is it the fault of right hon. Gentlemen opposite, that we have been obliged to call the attention of the House to the pecuniary consideration which the right hon. Gentleman thinks he can dispose of so readily? With respect to the Amendment of my hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan) I have not heard from the right hon. Gentleman any reason for refusing to accept it. The right hon. Gentleman says he thinks the measure right in itself, and equally applicable to one class of officers as another. We, on the other hand, think that the Bill is not right in itself, and, that although there may be some degree of palliation for it in the case of officers who entered under the Purchase system, who paid large sums for the position they hold, and who have been deprived of certain pecuniary privileges, we hold that there is no shadow of reason for re-establishing the system in the case of officers who entered the Army without any pecuniary intervention at all. The right hon. Gentleman has shown no ground for extending this system. Has any officer been examined by the Commissioners who has entered the Army since the abolition of Purchase; or have the officers themselves proved that there is any difficulty in effecting the necessary exchanges; is there any scrap of evidence that they themselves wish to have the system extended? Even if there were any such evidence I would ask what claim have the officers for any such provision? It was admitted last night that the privilege of possessing a commission in one regiment would show a distinct pecuniary value as compared with a commission in another regiment. Appointments are made to the Guards and to other distinguished regiments by the favour of the Commander-in-Chief, or of the colonels of those regiments; and it cannot be denied that, under these circumstances, the commissions of these officers, as compared with those of other officers, will possess a pecuniary value. The right hon. Gentleman says that no officer is entitled to exchange from those regiments; but he has not stated that he will impose any difficulty whatever in the way of such exchanges; and the result of the Bill will be that a young officer appointed to a certain regiment by the favour of the Commander-in-Chief, or of the colonel, will on the day that he obtains his commission become possessed of a valuable commodity, for which he has paid nothing, but with which he may part for a pecuniary consideration. The right hon. Gentleman was extremely indignant last night because we ventured to doubt whether this Bill would not restore Purchase. Well, I say that the effect of the Bill will be, contrary to the wish of the right hon. Gentleman, to restore something very like it; and not only that, but it will actually establish a new purchase system. I maintain that no answer has yet been given to the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) on the first night of the debate, in which he challenged hon. Gentlemen opposite to show a distinction in principle between buying a commission for a sum of money and exchanging in consideration of a sum of money. That is the system you are establishing, and that, not in the case of officers who entered the service under the old system of Purchase, but who joined the Army under totally different conditions, and who have no claim whatever to benefit in a pecuniary sense by the system which this Bill will set up.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 168; Noes 259: Majority 91.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 (Definition of Army Brokerage Acts), agreed to.

MR. HAYTER rose to move the following new Clause:—

(Terms of every agreement for exchange to be reported to Secretary of State.)

"No exchange shall be made in pursuance of this Act unless the terms of the agreement entered into between or on behalf of the officers making such exchange be reported to the Secretary of State for War before the same be authorised.

The hon. Member said that, in rising to make that Motion, he was not without hope that, even at the eleventh hour, the Government would assent to it, so that at least the country would feel that these transactions should take place in the light of day. The right hon. Gentleman said that he would take good care that no harm should be done to the officers of the regiment into which the exchange took place; but he did not, apparently, intend to look very much to the terms of the exchanges. The Bill was not a little measure. Purchase had been extinguished, and the House should be very careful how it allowed either the old system, or one like it, to grow up again. If there was any doubt whatever as to the large sums to which officers of the Guards would be entitled on the passing of this Bill, it was to be supplied in many quarters. Colonel Bateson stated that as much as £20,000 had been offered for a commission in the Life-Guards. It was certain that the four Heavy Cavalry regiments which did not go to India would acquire thereby an immense pecuniary advantage, and it was absurd that they should be allowed this to the exclusion of other regiments. If the right hon. Gentleman would accept his Amendment, it would remove much of the apprehension that was now felt, and would meet many of the Amendments which had been offered on this side of the House. He was sure that without it the whole system would crop up again, and in every mess-room exchanges would again become the universal topic of conversation, as Purchase was some time ago. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would meet them half-way, and accept a Motion which would do away with a great deal of the distrust which was now felt at the operation of the Bill.

New Clause (Mr. Hayter,) brought up, and read the first time.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that if the hon. and gallant Member thought that he could accept this clause he must have formed an extraordinary opinion of those debates. He stated at the outset of these discussions that he neither could nor would know anything of the money which might pass between officers exchanging. The proposal would compel him at the outset to become acquainted with the terms on which every exchange was proposed to be affected. The question had been discussed over and over again in the course of the debate, and were he to acquiesce in the Amendment he might as well drop the Bill altogether.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK supported the Amendment, and denied that the right hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) had cast any slur upon the officers of the British Army. The Secretary for War seemed to hope, by shutting his eyes to money payments, to modify in some way the transactions which would take place under this Bill. He regretted the Amendment had not been accepted, because he was sure that the Regulations which it was proposed to frame in regard to exchanges, if they were to be of any effect at all, would have to be framed in something like the spirit of the Amendment.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that if he supported the principle of this clause, he hoped he would not be subjected to such reflections as the Secretary for War had made in his speech, and which he believed that the right hon. Gentleman would be sorry for after. The right hon. Gentleman said that he had discussed the question from a money point of view more than any other hon. Member who had taken part in the debate, and that money formed the beginning, middle, and ending of his speech. The joke was a very good one on the part of the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Sir Charles Russell), but it was hardly worthy of repetition by the Secretary of State for War. What was the fact? The beginning of his

(Mr. Goschen's) speech was composed of extracts from the Commission, the middle of it was devoted to the Report of the Commission, and the end to the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman, together with his views upon it. He thought, therefore, that the Secretary for War was hardly justified in making such a remark. The Committee might entirely rely on the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that he would be uninfluenced by the amount of money which passed; but what Members on the Liberal benches were very anxious about was, that they should be informed how the system worked. A short time after it was put in operation they would ask under what circumstances exchanges had been sanctioned, and for such information as they thought the House of Commons was entitled to ask for. For these reasons, he would support the Amendment of the Member for Bath.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause be read a second time."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 158; Noes 254: Majority 96.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time upon Thursday.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was not aware that there would be any further discussion on the third reading; but he presumed the right hon. Gentleman would take it at an hour when, if necessary, discussion would be practicable.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, it would be placed second to the Artizans Dwellings Bill; but if there were any opposition, he would not bring it on at so late an hour that it could not be properly discussed.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES BILL.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would postpone the Order for going into Committee on this Bill to Monday, the 19th of April.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (£822,661 8s. 11d.) BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE wished to explain how it happened that he was not acquainted with the fact when he put a Question on the subject to the First Lord of the Admiralty yesterday, that £12,000 had been voted as compensation to the owners of certain boats on the Coast of Africa engaged in the pearl fisheries, which were destroyed by Her Majesty's Ship Thetis. The item had been inserted not in the Navy Estimates, but in the Civil Service Estimates, where he should never have thought of looking for it, and the discussion on it came on very late on the night of the 10th instant when there were very few Members in the House.

MR. HUNT said, the Vote was placed in the Civil Service Estimates on the principle that the Department which administers a Vote should take the Vote on its Estimates.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, nobody could suppose that this Vote would have appeared on the Civil Service Estimates, as there was an item in the Navy Estimates for damage done by Her Majesty's vessels.

MR. W. H. SMITH pointed out, however, that in this particular case the Vote had to be administered not by the Admiralty, but by the Foreign Office.

Bill read the third time, and passed. [New Title.]

And it being now twenty minutes past Six of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

CURRENCY.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. ANDERSON rose to call the attention of the House to the subject of the Currency; and to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the operation of the Bank Acts of 1844 and 1845."

He remarked at the outset that after what had happened already that day, all he could hope for was an audience fit though few, and, therefore, he would confine his remarks as much as possible—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present—

Mr. Goschen

MR. ANDERSON, proceeding, said, that when he was met by the somewhat ungracious interruption of the hon. Member for Scarborough, what he was saying was, that he was not going to make a long speech. He intended, moreover, as far as possible, to avoid figures and statistics, because it was too much the custom to overload speeches on such subjects with figures and statistics, in order, as he supposed, that the audience, if not convinced, might at least be confused. It was just two years since he brought forward this question, and he might briefly allude to what then took place, for it was possible a similar thing might occur now. He was met by that serried band of bankers which, without any formal alliance, performed all the functions of a trade union, and at once put down anything like an attack upon its monopoly. This was nothing new, and nothing they need not have expected. They remembered how the land interest had fought for the Corn Laws, the ship-owners for Navigation Laws, mine-owners against mine legislation, and they knew how officers were even now fighting for their privileges; but he had been of opinion that the House was accustomed to look with suspicion on men who were known to be battling for their own interests or privileges, and he hoped it would be so now. On that occasion, however, he was also opposed by the Gentleman who was then the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and was now the Member for London University (Mr. Lowe), and he regretted that the right hon. Gentleman was not in his place, as he intended to make some strictures upon him, and had sent him word to that effect. The right hon. Gentleman treated his (Mr. Anderson's) arguments and subject with a lofty scorn quite worthy of him, and said, in effect, that there was no reason at all for an inquiry; that the principles which regulated the currency were well known; that he understood them thoroughly; and that if the matter were left to him and the Government, they would bring in a Bill to set everything right, and make that admirable Bank Act more admirable still. They waited patiently, and at last they did get a Bill, and he never saw a Bill meet with such a shout of derision as that Bill was met with. The very newspapers which had patted the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the back when he advocated the Bank Act, scoffed at the Bill. No one would have it. It proved that he either knew nothing about it, or that he had brought in the Bill to shelve a troublesome subject. The Bullionists would not have it, because it was founded on the theories which he (Mr. Anderson) had advocated. Those theories were, that when gold went out of the country, the trade of the country required the equivalent of that gold; that there should be an extra issue of paper money to correspond to it; that that extra issue should be based on Government security; and that the profits upon it should belong not to the Bank, but to the Exchequer. These formed the basis of the Bill. But although it was founded on correct principles, these were adopted in such a manner as to be utterly impracticable and unworkable, and it almost seemed as if this were done intentionally. The Bill, in fact, seemed framed as a mockery to that suffering trade it was intended to relieve. The first provision was, that there should be no relief till the discount rate had risen to 12 per cent, which was 2 per cent higher than it had ever been before, and therefore a worse panic than ever before. The next condition was that the existing note issues should have become "ineffective through panic." But in no panic had any note issues even been ineffective. Panics made notes more effective, and in our previous panics the difficulty as to notes had only been to get plenty of them, or, indeed, to get any at all; but even if bank notes did become ineffective in a panic, it was very difficult to see how a farther issue would make them more effective. He had heard it said that this part of the Bill meant not ineffective through panic, but scarcity of notes through hoarding; but he could not think that a man with such a command of language as the right hon. Gentleman, could have used words which expressed a meaning so very different from that which was in his mind. Much more likely was it that the condition was intended for nothing else than to delay the coming into operation of the Act until the Greek Kalends. The next condition was that the foreign exchanges should be favourable to this country, and as it was not said what foreign exchanges, it might be supposed that all foreign exchanges were meant. But as soon as these foreign exchanges were favourable to this country, the panic was over, and so it was only after the disease had run its course, and the patient was on the fair way to recovery, that the State doctor was called in with his patent paper medicine, and took the credit of the cure, which would have been very well effected without his assistance. The next condition was that the profit should go to the Exchequer; but the mode in which this was proposed to be arranged for was just as impracticable as the rest. The Treasury was to get the 12 per cent, and it was to pay back to the Bank just 2 per cent for the trouble and risk of the discount. The result of this would have been that the bank managers would simply have declined to do business. They would have been manifest fools to do business on such terms. They would have acted in such a case just as they did in 1866. On that occasion they got a letter on the very terms provided for by the Bill, and instead of increasing their issue, and allaying the panic, they kept the letter carefully in their drawers, the result being that they were enabled to keep the rate at 10 per cent for a period of three months. A Bill for amending in such a way was either an insult to the understanding, or a mockery of the troubles of trade. The only glimmering of discretion that the right hon. Gentleman did show was in never venturing to bring the Bill up for discussion. Ultimately, the Bill bantling was exposed and deserted, and left to die of neglect. However, he (Mr. Anderson) met with other opposition. The Times was good enough to denounce him, and it admitted a letter signed "J. G. Hubbard," written, he believed, by a Gentleman who was now a Member of the House, and who he hoped was present to-night, for he believed he was considered a considerable authority in the City. That Gentleman commenced his letter by denouncing all currency reformers as people who wanted to eat their cake and have their cake, and he finished up a long letter by giving his own remedy, which was the issue of Exchequer notes. He now asked, passing over the respective merits of bank and Exchequer notes as regarded curing panics, where was the difference between them as regarded the eating their cake and having their cake? To have been consistent, he ought to have insisted on the withdrawal of all notes, and the return to bullion pure and simple. That was the high Toryism of currency, which would make the currency the master of trade instead of its servant. He did not wish now to defend or advocate his own particular views. In some places they had been misunderstood, and in others they had been misrepresented; but he wished at present only to argue for inquiry, and the ignorance or haziness of idea which he had shown to exist on the part of a Chancellor of the Exchequer and other authorities he considered a strong reason for inquiry. He would give other reasons. There had been no inquiry since 1848, and yet there had been many events to call for an inquiry. The French had since then inquired into our system, and at the close, instead of adopting our system, they adopted a free system, by which they had been able to keep up their stock of gold when ours failed, and to keep down their discount rate when ours rose, and to avoid panics. Then, moreover, the French had come through the trouble of an exhaustive war and an enormous money fine, and they came through it, too, comparatively scatheless. Surely it was time we knew the reason for their doing this while we fall into a state of collapse if gold to even a hundredth part of the French fine left the country. That was a fact which ought to be enough to prove the necessity for inquiry; but, again, we had had the crisis of 1873 since then, and on that there was a great deal of difference of opinion. The bullionist party said we should have had a panic but for the Bank Act. The currency reformers said that but for the Bank Act they would have had no 9 per cent and no crisis. Our commerce was then sound, and our work plentiful, and the only cause of the crisis was that a foreign nation wanted to buy a little of our gold. £4,000,000 left the Bank, but £1,000,000 went to Scotland, another to the counties, and so only £2,000,000 left the country—the result of this being that money rose from 3 to 9 per cent in three weeks, and that every trade we had was threatened with collapse, and fell into a state of prostration, from which even now they had hardly recovered. But the country was not poorer. Even the bullionist Times admitted that. It said that if the foreigners had not given something more valuable, the gold would not have gone. Even if the money had been sunk in the sea, it was inconceivable that it could have produced such an effect in a healthy state of matters; but that there was no scarcity of capital was shown by the fact that within a month Russia came with a demand for a small loan of £8,000,000 or £10,000,000, and our bullionists offered them £80,000,000. Very soon the rate was down again at 2½ per cent—and why? Not because our high rate attracted gold—because little gold came to the country—but because the paralyzation of our whole trade made home capital no longer needed. The bullionist party said the 9 per cent was only the natural result of supply and demand. He denied that it was natural demand and supply, but in a forestalled market, and unless the country was prepared to say that credit trade was bad, and ought to be put down; it was very questionable policy to have money laws which enabled all the lenders to make a raid every now and then on all the borrowers, blackmail them, and strip them bare. It was not the mere 9 or 10 per cent discount rate that formed the plunder, but that in a crisis all sorts of property and merchandize and stocks, except gold, became immensely depreciated, and then owners of gold stepped in and bought everything at half value. There was another good reason for inquiry. It was that the American system of bank notes had been established since the last inquiry. They were called inconvertible notes, and it seemed to be thought that there was something discreditable in that. He was well aware there was a party who wanted to overthrow the National Bank system of America. Of that party he would say—

They had the best currency in the world, and did not know it. It had one fault, one serious defect—it was rigidly inelastic, and instead of trying to cure that fault, they were going to throw the whole thing away, and return to specie payments and free banking, by which they meant the right to any one to issue notes. If America attempted to resume specie payments, he believed she would have the same troubles which befel this country between 1819 and 1825, and she would only accomplish it at the expense of a crippled trade; and, on the other hand, if she adopted free issues, she would have mushroom banks and a bogus currency. They had other good reasons at home for inquiry, because a doubt had been raised as to whether the gold in the Issue Department of the Bank of England was absolutely held as against the issue of notes. The public always believed so, but the hon. Baronet (Sir John Lubbock) had greatly shaken this faith by saying that in the event of an extremity, the Bank of England would interfere with the gold in the Issue Department, and would be right to do so. Under these circumstances, it was time for the House to consider how far it was safe to leave the Issue Department of the Bank of England any longer under the control of the Bank's Directors. Another reason for inquiry was that they had a Committee of the House of Lords and a Committee of the House of Commons on the question of the Bank Act in 1848, and these two Committees came to absolutely opposite decisions, and no inquiry at all had been held since 1857. There was yet another reason for inquiry. Germany had lately changed her standard from silver to gold, and this had done this country great injury, and was calculated to do still more in the future. The loose ideas which prevailed in many quarters on this subject was also an additional cause for the inquiry he asked. Bullionists said the Bank Act was merely intended to secure the convertibility of the bank note, and that it had succeeded. Now, that was only a secondary object of the Bank Act; but they ignored all the principal objects which had ignominiously failed, and they paraded convertibility as a success; but he denied that the Bank Act insured the convertibility of the bank note; that convertibility had only been secured on three occasions by setting the Act aside. It would therefore be far fairer to say that the Bank Act put the convertibility of the bank note into hazard. Even admitting that it did secure its convertibility, he contended that they paid a great deal too much for it. They might pay too much for a good thing, and it was paying too much to secure the convertibility of the bank note only by destroying the convertibility of everything else in the country. On occasions of panic our commerce collapsed, our mills were stopped, ships rotted in the docks, and our workpeople starved, and all for what? Why, merely that they might avoid a depreciation of 5 or 6 per cent in the paper currency. People did not seem to understand what the convertibility was, for which they had to suffer such sacrifices. It was not a question of good or bad notes; it was a question between notes instantly convertible and notes ultimately convertible. In conclusion, he urged upon the Government the necessity of having a full and proper inquiry. Do not let them have the miserable thing they had two years ago. The country wanted to know whether there was not something unsound in a system of currency which contracted when more was needed, and expanded when less was required. The country wanted to know why France had refused to adopt our system, and had, in fact, adopted an opposite one. He asked for a Royal Commission because he had not confidence in a Committee of this House on such a subject. The difficulty was to find a Committee the Members of which had not formed some opinion on the subject. A Royal Commission would be much more likely to be independent, and therefore to arrive at a sound judgment.

MR. MORLEY, in seconding the Motion, said, he should have been deterred from doing so if the object of the hon. Member had been to aid any particular crotchet or urge any impracticable theory upon the House in connection with this subject. The ground upon which he (Mr. Morley) ventured to press upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer to yield to the suggestion conveyed in this proposal was, that the trading classes of this country were exposed constantly to fluctuations which were destructive to small traders. Some hon. Members had heard with great pleasure the announcement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that he proposed to refer the Bill intended to prevent the Scotch banks from coming into London to a Committee for consideration. He was persuaded that he was expressing a very general feeling in the City, when he said that there would be a feeling of relief if the Scotch banks were to come into London. The Scotch were confessedly the best bankers in the world. We needed more banking accommodation, and a substantial addition to the existing accommodation would be secured by the establishment, legally and absolutely, of the Scotch banks in London. The traders, in making this appeal to the House, were not asking for any pecuniary help. Trade was never more thoroughly sound or more based on capital, than it was now. The most intelligent part of the trading class believed that there was more danger in low rates of money than in high rates. The Bank of England, being a joint-stock bank, having to provide dividends twice a-year, frequently competed with Lombard Street for the discounting of bills, when, in the interests of trade, they ought to keep the rate high rather than low. He justified the competition as a matter of trade, but deplored its mischievous tendency. The solution of one great difficulty in that matter would be, that they should have a really national establishment for the issue of their notes and circulation. There was no subject more worthy of the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer than that. They were not raising the question of the Act of 1844, or pushing any extreme view; but he could state, as the result of many years of trading experience in the City of London, that a large number of small traders were needlessly and periodically ruined from causes beyond their own control, and were driven out of existence by a pressure which was so excessive. What they wanted was steadiness in the rate of discount. Gold, no doubt, like every other commodity, would find its level, but no commodity varied so constantly and largely in price. On September 17, 1873, the Bank Rate was 3 per cent. On November 12, or less than two months afterwards, it was 9 per cent. It was easy to see how such violent fluctuations must affect trading operations, which often took six or nine months for their accomplishment. When they approached a period of panic, the Bank of England was impotent to help them. In 1857, the Bank was reduced to such a condition, that unless the letter of the Government had been issued, it could not possibly have paid its notes. The Minister would have deserved impeachment if he had refused to issue that letter under the circumstances. No other country in the world had been subjected as this was to those tremendous panics, and as a commercial nation we had been made the laughing-stock in every money-market of Europe. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would confer a boon on the trading class if he acceded to the present proposal.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the operation of the Bank Acts of 1844 and 1845."—(Mr. Anderson.)

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he thought the necessity for that Motion was removed by the Notice that a Committee of that House would be moved for to-morrow. Such a Committee could better perform the duties that would devolve on it than a Royal Commission. The theory of financial panics was referrible to the state of our foreign exchanges; while the state of the exchanges was favourable to this country, no difficulty was experienced; but when the balance of trade turned against us, our margin of specie rapidly ran away, and a panic became imminent, if we kept our engagements to pay all our obligations in sterling, or in money that was convertible. The fear that we might not have in the country sufficient coin to balance our foreign exchanges was, in fact, the cause of panics; but did the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) mean that we were to have money which was inconvertible? If such a principle were affirmed by the House, it would give the greatest possible shock to the trade of the world. The precious metals were the recognized medium of commerce all over the world, and we required specie to meet our obligations to other countries when the balance of trade was against us. When the balance of trade was in our favour, we paid other countries with their own bills. The Bank Acts of 1844 and 1845 were intended to make certain institutions keep margins of money in hand; and he could not see how trade and commerce, with the great expansion they had undergone since those years, could be carried on at all, unless they had provision made that some capitalists should hold money in hand of such a nature as would enable us to discharge our debts abroad as well as at home.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, interest was the price which was paid for the use of capital, and according to experience and theory, the rate of interest should depend upon the supply of capital. The loanable capital of this country was a very extraordinary sum, the deposits alone had been estimated at £600,000,000 sterling. Surely it was a very great anomaly that the withdrawal of £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 out of this £600,000,000 should so affect the price of the whole as to double the rate of interest. Recently, at a meeting of the Associated Chambers of Commerce, the feeling was strongly expressed that there ought to be an inquiry into the anomaly, by which the withdrawal of so small a quantity of gold could have such an effect upon the whole of the loanable capital of the country. So far as appeared, the panic of 1873, which raised the rate of discount from 3 to 9 per cent, might have been obviated by an increase in the stock of gold held by the Bank of England. If the Bank had had a few millions more in its coffers, there would have been no need for alarm. The question for the country was, how was it possible to increase this store of gold, so that the withdrawal of £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 might not be regarded with apprehension? If the note issue of the country, instead of being in the hands of 188 banks, were concentrated into one general bank of issue, the quantity of gold which would be required to be kept in store would be very much less than when scattered over the 188 banks. They had been told that the provisions of the Bank Act had ensured the convertibility of the notes since 1845, and it had been denied that the bank notes were ever in jeopardy. If that was the case, why had the Bank Act been suspended? The time had now come when this question of a national note issue ought to be fairly and clearly considered by the country. They were beginning to more and more understand what was the real value and service which a bank note performed; and practically, so far as currency or circulation was concerned, there was no difference whatever between a bank note and a sovereign. For all purposes of circulation, the one was really as good as the other, and the necessity for convertibility was only in order to insure that an undue amount of paper money was not put into circulation at once. The experience of the last 30 years showed what had been the fluctuation of the currency from time to time, and what amount of gold or specie was necessary to maintain the convertibility. Looking over the expansion and contraction of the circulation of the whole country since 1845, so far as he had been able to discover, the greatest contraction which took place within a space of six months did not exceed £4,000,000 sterling. It therefore appeared, if the notes had been issued from a national Department, and if that Department had maintained in its coffers 5,000,000 of sovereigns, it could have insured the convertibility of the notes without its being necessary to realize any of the securities whatever. They ought to recognize that banking and the issue of notes should be separate, and that both could be better conducted when separate. What occurred to him as the simple remedy, not only for the circulation, but also for securing an additional store of gold in the coffers of the Bank of England, was to establish by Act of Parliament a separate Department of issue corresponding to the Mint Department, whose duty it should be to supply paper to the country in exchange for gold. The rules under which the Department was conducted could be made as stringent as those of the Mint. It would be the duty of this department to issue notes to all persons who wanted them for gold, and the law should settle what amount of gold the Department should hold for the convertibility of notes. There was a strong feeling in the country that the time had arrived when an inquiry ought to be made into our financial system, and that if the present anomalous state of things went on, great danger to our commercial prosperity was likely to arise. He, therefore, trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would consent to the appointment of the proposed Royal Commission.

Mr. J. G. HUBBARD agreed with the hon. Member for Glasgow that it was desirable, in the interest of trade and of the community, that the Bank rate of interest should fluctuate as little as possible, because commercial operations were carried on with more certainty when the rate of interest was steady. He was afraid, however, that the fluctuations in the rate of interest were beyond the control of any human being or of any Government, however great its power might be. He must demur to the assumption by the hon. Member for Glasgow and the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. Morley) that trade had suffered to any great extent in consequence of those fluctuations. The House would recollect that those fluctuations had never lasted long, and that it was only for a short period during which the temporary pressure lasted that an exceptionally high rate of interest was demanded. The high rate of interest which the merchant had to pay occasionally for the money he borrowed was as nothing compared with the fluctuations in prices which were continually recurring from week to week, and from month to month. He affirmed that scarcely a house of position or of importance had failed during a commercial crisis, in consequence of its being unable to obtain the accommodation it required, provided it had good security to offer. Where the variations in the rate of interest were destructive was in cases where men had undertaken operations of an extended character at a time when the rate of interest was exceptionally low, and because neither their capital nor their credit was commensurate with their trade. The moral to be drawn from these facts was that people with little or no capital should limit their transactions accordingly, and he ventured to assert that in no case had a man failed owing to a high rate of interest who would not in all probability have failed if the rate of interest had remained stationary. In to-day's paper there was a most remarkable illustration of his argument. It was that of a house which had failed for several millions, at a time when the rate of interest was only $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent, its failure having been occasioned by its engagements being infinitely beyond its capital and its deserved credit. He was ignorant of the fact that had been stated by the hon. Member for Bristol, that the Bank of England competed with other banks and discount brokers for bills, nor was it the business of the Bank of England to do so. Receiving as it did the surplus deposits of bankers and traders, it was bound to hold them with a degree of reticence that would not apply to any other bank. The hon. Member had expressed his surprise that with the enormous loan capital of this country the loss of two or three millions of gold should so largely affect the rate of interest; but he should not forget that the bulk of our loan capital was already out on loan, and that it was merely the small portion of it which was available for lending which was affected by the loss of the gold. The reason why this country was more subject to panics than France was because here credit was pushed and strained to its utmost degree; whereas such was not the case among our neighbours, who traded upon capital rather than upon credit. It was the knowledge of the immense operations carried through by the French and German Governments with reference to the engagements and payment of the indemnity to Germany, quite as much as the actual abstraction of gold, which necessitated some 12 months back the stringent action of the Bank of England. One feature very seldom noticed by those who criticize the Bank of England was that the Bank was not only agent of the Government in the management of the issue department, but was also a joint-stock bank, with banking business of its own. But where was the private or joint-stock bank which published its accounts from week to week? The Bank carried on business in a house of glass; everybody might see what it did. It not only published accounts of the issue department, but it published its private banking accounts. The Bank did not wish to escape criticism; but it was an unheard-of proceeding for any bank to publish from week to week an account of its reserve and deposits. Very few banks in the country could carry on business if they were subject to such an ordeal. The hon. Member for Glasgow not only brought his Bill of Indictment against the Act of 1844, but also against certain writers in The Times who defended it. The principle on which that Act proceeded was that all issues beyond £15,000,000 must be based on gold—that when gold was carried away notes should be cancelled and the currency diminished pro tanto. The hon. Member for Glasgow said that was a very antiquated and mischievous policy—he held that when gold went away they should put something in its place, and that something was paper money. But where were they to stop in that process of substitution? The whole essence of the Bill of 1844 was this—at £15,000,000 they must stand. The hon. Member for Glasgow said the amount of paper issues was too small; but his argument, as a writer in The Times expressed it, amounted to this—it was trying to have your cake and eat your cake. They had not lent their gold for nothing. They got something for the gold that had been taken away. They had value received in corn, wine, cotton, foreign securities. But the hon. Member for Glasgow was not satisfied with the value received for the gold we parted with; he wished as fast as it left us to occupy its place with paper; but if they went on in this way as they had done in other countries, the convertibility of the Bank note would be lost, the value of all property would be shaken, and instead of the stability of appreciation which this country had enjoyed for so many years, they would be reduced to that deplorable state to which many Continental countries had been driven, by the unlimited issue of paper money. That was the state of things which would inevitably follow from the substitution of paper money desired by the hon. Member for Glasgow. There was a very great distinction between the issue proposed by the hon. Member for Glasgow and that proposed by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer. The hon. Member proposed to fill up with paper any gap caused by the withdrawal of gold; but the proposal of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer was the new creation of a circulating medium, for the purpose of being used at a period when our credit was internally shaken and was no longer available, and bills of exchange would no longer circulate, so that it became expedient for the Government to supply a greater amount of circulating medium for the purpose of settling the transactions of the country. He did not conceive that the operation proposed by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer could at all be an admission that the Bank Act of 1844 had broken down. On the contrary, it showed how safe in the estimation of the Government that Act must have been before they could venture to load it with the additional temporary responsibility which they proposed. His own opinion with regard to the measure of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer was that the whole question had better be left alone.

He did not wish to see any such remedy provided by anticipation; but if it had been provided, it would require all those safeguards by which the right hon. Gentleman's proposal was environed. With regard to the proposition of the hon. Member for Glasgow, he could not see that it was called for; and if the hon. Member would read the Reports of the inquiries which had already taken place, he would obtain an insight into the principle of the Bank Acts and the Bank of England—namely, that of limitation of credit—which would satisfy him that no further inquiry was necessary.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, he thought the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) was deserving of credit for having called the attention of the House to this subject, which was one that related to the currency of the country, and, at the same time, included the question of issue by Scotch banks, and such English banks as possessed the privilege. There was no need to go into all the deeper quagmires of bank notes and such things, which no man could understand in this world or he believed in the next. There was no subject which he would rather not discuss with a man than banking matters. As far as his experience of money matters went—and he had had some experience—they were very much the same as other commercial transactions. A banking company was simply a commercial firm, established for the purpose of making money, and if we gave them the privilege of issuing notes, that was our fault, not theirs. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman who spoke last. He had scarcely ever seen a house in the City of London which failed that did not deserve to do so. They came down because they trusted to credit, and the consequence was as we saw. He did not understand why the Government of this country should support any fictitious system of credit. He believed, however, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would do well to grant the Commission which the hon. Member for Glasgow desired, for then people would be led to look into this affair of banking and currency. There was something in what the hon. Member had said. Things had changed a good deal since the sensible measure of Sir Robert Peel was passed; and he could wish that the Government of the day would appreciate the circumstances of the times as well as Sir Robert Peel had done. Sir Robert Peel had gone as far as any reasonable or intelligent man could go in his day, and there he stopped. Now, he would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman—who was an intelligent man also—why, if it was not desirable to appoint the Commission proposed by the hon. Member for Glasgow, he should not look into these matters himself, and see whether they could not be put into a better condition. The liabilities and money matters of the country were different from what they were in Sir Robert Peel's time, for the average of money that passed through the clearing house in a week was now about £100,000,000. It would be impossible to say what would happen if those who owned the money were to call it in. One thing was certain the time was come when, considering the riches of England, we ought to put an end to all private banks of issue. We ought to put all men on an equality and do away with all monopolies and privileges. It was an hallucination to think that bits of paper were money. When people wanted our gold and took it away from us, all we had to do was to give a higher price for it, and we should get all we wanted just as we should get corn, tea, or any other article. He hoped the time was coming when things would be allowed to take their natural course, and then men would not trade so much upon bank notes and regulations of currency which they misunderstood. He wished to see an end put to a system under which men stood upon crutches, when they might better stand upon their own feet.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, he had heard nothing during the discussion to shake his conviction that the panics of 1848, 1857, and 1866, were not due so much to the provisions of the Act of 1844 as to the fact that the operation of that Act had been completely misunderstood. It was, on the other hand, through the effect of that Act that the store of gold was maintained which ultimately brought us through those panics. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) spoke of bankers enjoying a monopoly and special privileges from the State; but out of more than 100 banks in London only four or five enjoyed any privilege from the State, and he was at a loss to see the alleged monopoly. The hon. Member said that with a paper currency when gold went out of the country it would be replaced by paper; but the only effect of that would be that more gold would continue to go out of the country, and at last they would have an entirely paper currency, a result which no one desired. The hon. Member for Glasgow had criticized the policy of the Bank of England. Well, there might be differences of opinion as to that policy. But the general opinion of the commercial community was, he thought, upon the whole, that the management of the Bank of England had on the whole been conducted with caution and prudence. The hon. Member for Glasgow had referred to the American system with great praise, and to the fact that in this country the rate of interest had gone as high as 9 per cent. But did the hon. Member know that in America the rate rose not to 9, but to 90 per cent, and even more? Again, the hon. Member had asserted that American notes had never been discredited; in this the hon. Member was entirely mistaken, and he entirely overlooked the panic through which America had passed within the last few months, and from the effects of which American trade and commerce had scarcely yet recovered? The hon. Gentleman, indeed, admitted that the American system had one fault—that it was not elastic. That was the greatest fault that a currency could have, and it was the elasticity of our system which accommodated it to transactions involving more than £6,000,000,000 per annum. He had great difficulty in understanding what was meant by a system of notes which would be ultimately convertible. If notes were payable at certain periods only, they became bills of exchange, and would have a different value according to the time they had to run, and therefore they would not be adapted for the purposes of currency. His hon. Friend the Member for Bristol (Mr. Morley) stated that the present system had led to a large number of failures. Now, he must say he entirely concurred with his right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. J. G. Hubbard) and his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Sir Andrew Lusk) that there had been few failures indeed which could fairly be traced or attributed to our system of currency. After all, what was the difference in the fluctuation of the rates? The rate of interest had reached 9 per cent, as had been stated, and within three weeks had fallen as low as 2½ per cent, and the result, said the hon. Member for Glasgow, had been to strip traders bare. He thought, indeed, that if the rate had been raised a little sooner it need not have been carried nearly so high; but, after all, they must look at the average. Now, what had the average rates been upon three months' bills? In 1868 it was £2 2s. per cent, in 1869 £3 4s., in 1870 £3 2s., in 1871 £2 18s., and for the last two years the average was, he believed, about 4 per cent. That being the case, he could not but think that in that respect there was very little to complain of. The hon. Member for Glasgow said that to avoid the evils of which he spoke there should be a paper currency which would vary 5 or 10 per cent in value. But what did that mean? It meant that every person who had an income of £1,000 a-year, should submit to a fluctuation of, perhaps, £200 a-year, without knowing whether his income would be decreased or increased to that amount. Such fluctuations would be most inconvenient, and would strike at the very root of our commercial prosperity; and although there were questions connected with the subject which might well be considered, he could not help thinking that the present system was not open to the accusations which had been brought against it by the hon. Member for Glasgow.

MR. HANKEY remarked that almost all the speeches which had been delivered, save, perhaps, that of his right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. J. G. Hubbard) and the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) had reference to the subject of banking, and not to the subject of currency. Now, what was currency? Popularly understood, the word simply meant ready money—that which everybody wanted as the substitute of barter. Messrs. Baring and Rothschild might negotiate a loan of £30,000,000, and yet there might not be a sovereign passed in the transaction. It was the duty of the Government to coin money sufficient for the daily use of the people, but there the functions of the Government were at an end. But the great requirements of the country had nothing to do with currency. The power of obtaining that which was understood as currency was only limited by the means at the command of the individual—it was itself practically unlimited. There must, however, be some sacrifice made to obtain it, for if they could get on without gold and silver they would be so much the richer, as they would not be deprived of the use of them for other purposes. He frankly admitted that the railroad interest alone, which was now tenfold greater than it was some years ago, demanded an enormous amount of increased currency; but that had nothing to do with the Act of 1844, or with banking. Sir Robert Peel in framing that Act by which the convertibility of bank notes should always be secured, left the Bank of England and every other bank to act as free as possible; the only tie was with regard to the issue of paper money. As to that he refused to allow any new bank to issue paper money. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London had entered so fully into the question about the Bank of England that he (Mr. Hankey) would not trouble the House with any remarks upon it.

MR. C. PALMER said, that the time had now arrived when this question of the Bank Charter Act ought to form the subject of investigation. It was said that no result would follow from such an investigation; but he thought the time for it was opportune, and that such a step would, at all events, have the beneficial result of at least satisfying the minds of the trading community. In countries that were not trammelled by a Bank Act the rate of interest was even; whereas in this country it was subject to sudden fluctuations. That subject itself deserved investigation.

MR. MUNDELLA reminded the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he gave Notice he would to-morrow move for a Select Committee to inquire into the question of issue, and he would suggest to him to include in that inquiry the operation of the Bank Acts of 1844 and 1845. He contended that the inquiry should be conducted not by a Select Committee, but by a Royal Commission, the Members of which could be chosen from the widest field and not merely from the House of Commons.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he agreed with the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down that a Select Committee of that House was not likely to set at rest some of the questions which had been touched upon that night, and which were more largely discussed in other quarters in this country; but he must go a little further than the hon. Gentleman, and say that, in his belief, neither would a Royal Commission settle those questions. A short time ago a deputation from the Associated Chambers of Commerce waited upon him and requested him to lay before the Government a proposal for the appointment of a Royal Commission to discuss those various questions upon which there was so much difference of opinion and set them at rest; but when he asked those gentlemen what their views were on different points which had been raised he found there was considerable difference of opinion among them, but that they had very wisely, for the purpose of getting a Commission appointed, resolved to put their differences of opinion behind a veil and to express no opinion on many of those critical questions. They alleged that the Government should appoint a Royal Commission for the purpose of showing who was right and who was wrong. He did not know whether any being in this world or in another world could select a Commission that would satisfy everybody when they pronounced against their opinions. He was quite certain that if it were the unfortunate position of a fallible body of men like the present Government, or any Government, to have to make such a selection they would find the task an exceedingly difficult one; because they must do one of two things—they must either select a Commission which would be composed of men who were all of one colour of opinion, in which case it would be said, "Oh! this appointing of a Commission is a mere mockery," or else they would have to appoint a Commission which would contain eminent men whose views would be equally well known, but whose opinions would differ from each other. The result of such a Commission would simply be to leave matters where they stood before. There would be the usual difference of opinion, and nobody would be satisfied. Therefore, he felt that they would be doing very little good, and probably a great deal of harm, by appointing a Commission of a roving character to ascertain whether we had exactly the right sort of currency system, and, if not, how we were to get it. An hon. Gentleman had said—"After all, what would be the harm of having a Commission? at the worst there would only be a little time wasted in investigation." Well, in his opinion the appointment of a Commission would have a wider result than that. It would create a false impression; and, as a great deal of the mischief which everybody now complained of was the result of a false impression, it was necessary to be particularly careful in this matter. The false impression which he ventured to think lay at the root of so much evil consisted in regarding the questions of credit and currency as one, instead of regarding them as perfectly distinct. In his belief, the evils attributed to our system of currency arose mainly from an over-straining of credit. There were, no doubt, some points of friction in the system of currency itself, and he should be prepared to-morrow to show the desirableness of practically considering those evils with a view to their mitigation. But that was a very different question from entering into the large inquiry now proposed. The Government felt that if they consented to the appointment of the Commission they would be betraying their own conviction and be seeming to throw doubt upon the general soundness of the Act of 1844. Several serious occurrences had taken place since the Act of 1844, but those troubles had arisen from causes which had nothing to do with the Act of 1844 or the question of currency. They had their origin in the fact that we were carrying on an enormous and unprecedentedly large system of commerce and trade; we were the centre of the monetary transactions of the greater part of the world; we were carrying on business which required not only a large amount of fixed capital, but a large amount of disengaged and floating capital. Now, the more we could utilize our system of credit, which stood towards currency very much in the same relation as currency stood towards barter, the less loanable capital we required, and we had learnt to carry on our transactions with a much smaller amount of currency than would have been possible without the system of credit. The great increase in the amount of our transactions was in itself a proof that the Act of 1844 had not been of a character to restrain the development of the industry and energy of the country. What he wished to point out, however, was that since we had chosen to give a great expansion to our commercial and mercantile enterprises by means of a large amount of credit based on a small amount of loanable capital, the withdrawal of capital affected our financial system in a proportionately high degree. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) thought it very strange that when we wanted more money we had less, and that when we wanted less we had more. But the matter was very easily explained. When a gentleman spent a good deal, his banker's balance fell, and when he spent little, his banker's balance got up. He would not detain the House after all the discussion that had taken place; he would only express a hope that the hon. Gentleman would not feel it necessary to divide the House on the Motion as he did not think any good would result from it. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) objected to a Royal Commission because it would be very difficult to constitute it satisfactorily, and also because if they succeeded in doing so they would raise false notions which had much better not be raised.

Mr. SAMPSON LLOYD said, the Associated Chambers of Commerce had no difference of opinion as to the advisability of having an inquiry into this subject, and he believed that this inquiry might be made more easily by a Royal Commission than in any other way.

Mr. ANDERSON maintained that the inquiry on the minor question, which was to come up to-morrow, would in no way meet the end he had in view. He felt obliged to press his Motion.

NEW FOREST—DEER REMOVAL ACT, 1851.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

LORD HENRY SCOTT rose to call attention to the present condition of the New Forest, particularly in respect to the operation of "The Deer Removal Act, 1851," and to move—

"That a Select Committee be appointed 'to inquire into and report upon the present condition of affairs in the New Forest, into the operation of 'The Deer Removal Act, 1851,' and particularly into the exercise and effect of the powers of inclosure given by that Act to Her Majesty's Commissioners of Woods and Forests.'"

The noble Lord said, the effect of the operation of the Act of 1851 had been that nearly all the best land in the Forest had been enclosed; that very little would remain for the exercise of the rights of the commoners; and that the privileges of the public were seriously interfered with. Unless either the Government or the House interposed, all the rights of the commoners would be taken away, and the privileges of the public sacrificed. Before any fresh legislation on the subject was attempted, it was desirable that information upon it in all its bearings should be obtained by means of a Select Committee. The value of the rights of the commoners had never yet been ascertained, and justice required that their case should be inquired into. It was most important that the right of free user enjoyed by the public in the Forest should be preserved; and he might remark in connection with that point, that there was now awakening in the country a public feeling in respect to the inclosure of open spaces, of which they had a striking example in the case of Epping Forest.

Mr. COWPER-TEMPLE considered that ample grounds existed for the appointment of the Committee, and he hoped the Government would assent to the proposal. The policy under which the Act was administered tended to the destruction of the beauty and enjoyment of that great national place of recreation which could never be replaced.

Mr. W. H. SMITH said, that he had no objection to the appointment of the Committee. The position of matters in regard to the New Forest was certainly not satisfactory.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into and report upon the present condition of affairs in the New Forest, into the operation of 'The Deer Removal Act, 1851,' and particularly into the exercise and effect of the powers of inclosure given by that Act."—(Lord Henry Scott.)

And, on April 22, Committee nominated as follows:—Lord HENRY SCOTT, Mr. COWPER-TEMPLE, Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH, Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, Earl PERCY, Sir CHARLES

DILKE, Mr. LOPES, Colonel KINGSFORD, Lord ESLINGTON, Mr. ALEXANDER BROWN, Mr. JOHN STUART HARDY, Mr. RYDER, Mr. ERNEST NOEL, Mr. EDWARD STANHOPE, and Mr. BIDDULPH:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records: Five to be the quorum.

METROPOLIS LOCAL MANAGEMENT ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 38.]

(Mr. Boord, Sir Charles Mills, Mr. Coope, Mr. Gordon.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BOORD, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said: The object of this Bill is to remedy an anomaly in the rating of certain property within the metropolitan area, which has arisen apparently from an oversight in framing the Metropolis Local Management Act of 1855. In the outskirts of the metropolis, within the jurisdiction of the Metropolitan Board of Works, there is still a large quantity of land unbuilt upon—occupied chiefly as pasturage or market gardens—representing altogether an annual value of about £88,000, which, although fully rated to the poor rate, is entitled, under the Act of 1855, to an abatement of 75 per cent on the sewers rate levied by the Metropolitan Board of Works—or, in other words, the sewers rate can only be levied on one-fourth of the annual value of such property. There are, also, in the same area tithes of the annual value of £25,000 wholly exempt, and £1,000 partially exempt, besides railways, water companies, and cemeteries claiming total or partial exemption under the same Act; and yet the Metropolitan Board, disregarding all exemptions, issues its precepts in full to the local authorities, who are consequently compelled to increase the rating on house property in their several districts in order to make up the deficiency arising from these exemptions, which they on their part are bound to respect. More than one-half of the metropolitan parishes have no exempt property, and therefore have nothing to complain of; but, in the remainder, occupiers of house property suffer in proportion to the greater or less amount of land contained within the boundaries of their respective parishes, and it unfortunately happens that the grievance is greatest where the rates are higher and the householders poorer than in other parts. I will take one example from many, and

Lord Henry Scott

I select it from my own constituency, because I am better acquainted with the circumstances there than I am with those in other parts. In Plumstead, a parish populated almost entirely by the workmen and others employed in the Royal Arsenal, and where the rates are, or were last year, 8s. in the pound, there is land of the annual value of £18,617 and tithes £2,690, out of a total rateable value of £254,000. The effect of the exemptions in this case is that the Local Board is obliged to levy increased rates on these poor householders in order to make up the deficiency caused by the exemptions enjoyed by land and tithes, and which are not regarded by the Metropolitan Board of Works, but must be by the local authorities. Now, having stated the nature of the grievance, I will first briefly explain how it arose, and then proceed to the remedy. When the Metropolitan Board of Works was formed under the Local Management Act of 1855, the boundaries of the metropolitan district were so defined for the purposes of that Act, as to include large tracts of land still unbuilt upon in order to anticipate the extension of the metropolis, and so avoid the constant necessity of re-adjustment which would otherwise have arisen. The basis of assessment to the metropolitan rate was made the same as the poor rate; but an abatement of 75 per cent was allowed on land to avoid the opposition that would certainly have been made to so extended a boundary by the occupiers, had it been proposed to charge them with the full amount of a rate raised for purposes from which they could derive little or no benefit. It appears, therefore, that these abatements were the consideration in return for which the Metropolitan Board were to secure a sufficiently extended boundary for their purpose; and now, having obtained all they require, they leave the suburban ratepayers to pay the cost, the result being that a householder living in these outlying districts—who, in the majority of cases, is a poor man—has actually to pay more in proportion towards metropolitan improvements, the benefits of which hardly reach his remote neighbourhood, than a rich inhabitant of a central district where there is no exempted property. The remedy proposed in this Bill appears to me to be of the simplest possible description; it consists merely in enabling the Metropolitan Board of Works to take cognizance of the exemptions provided for in their Act of 1855. That the omission of this power in the first instance was an oversight I am convinced, and I cannot imagine any valid reason for the opposition with which the Board have thought proper to meet my proposal. There is certainly another method of redress—namely, to repeal these exemptions altogether. [Sir JAMES HOGG: Hear, hear!] The hon. and gallant Gentleman says “Hear, hear;” but what will the occupiers of the land say if he proposes to break faith with them in that manner? As I have already pointed out, these abatements formed the basis of a distinct contract between the occupiers of land and the Metropolitan Board of Works, whereby the latter obtained a sufficiently extended boundary for their purpose, and now the hon. and gallant Gentleman would break faith with them! This is certainly out of the question. When this Bill was introduced last year its principle, so far from being questioned, was admitted; but it was objected that no machinery was provided by which its purpose could be effected, and it was said that such machinery should be that of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869. This objection has been met in the present Bill by the addition of three clauses, whereby the valuation lists may be made to show the extent of exemption claimed in respect of any property included in them, and by the last clause, the power of appeal is extended to the additional items in case of incorrectness. The Bill is based on the broad principle of justice to the poorer class of ratepayers who reside for the most part in the outskirts of the metropolis. It will not harm their richer neighbours, but will remedy a grievance which has been repeatedly pointed out to the Metropolitan Board of Works, and should long ago have been redressed at their instance; therefore, I have no hesitation in calling on hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House to support the second reading, which I now beg to move.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.—(Mr. Boord.)

SIR JAMES HOGG stated that he was quite prepared to admit that the Bill introduced by the hon. Member showed a somewhat anomalous state of things, and that there was a certain amount of inequality in the incidence of the taxation. The Metropolitan Board were fully alive to this, and had passed a resolution on the subject when the hon. Member's Bill was before the House last Session. The Board concurred in the opinion that some redress was needed for the state of things complained of, and decided on the advisability of remedying the inequality which led to the introduction of the Bill. But while agreeing with the hon. Member so far, the Board could by no means concur in the means which it was desired to adopt for securing the ends in view. Their view was rather that the occupiers of land should be placed on the same footing as occupiers or owners of houses. It appeared to the Board that there was no reason for this immunity of land. Its owners derived various advantages from its nearness to London, and which, as regarded the sewer rate of the district, it might be fair that it should be assessed at only one-fourth of its value; this did not apply to the rate of the Metropolitan Board, of which a large part was not for sewers, but for street and other improvements, parks and open spaces, protection from fire, and municipal administration generally. If the Bill of the hon. Member passed, the deficiency in the rates would have to be made up from other districts of the metropolis. For instance, take the case of Plumstead. Assuming that the Board made a rate of £10,000 on the district, of which, say, four-fifths was house property and half land, the local authority would raise £9,500 of this sum from the owners of property, and on account of the exemption £500 only from the owners of land. The Bill, in effect, asked Parliament to enact that the precept of the Board should be reduced from £10,000 to £8,500, by which means £1,500 would have to be raised on the other districts of the metropolis. The whole rateable value of the metropolis was £20,644,000, while that of arable land was less than £90,000, and it appeared to the Board that the simplest plan would be to remove the exemption altogether. This was their intention in their resolution passed in July last year, when they expressed a determination to endeavour to obtain a remedy in the event of a Bill for amending their Loans Act being introduced. As affairs stood at present, the Board were bound to adopt the county rate in making their assessments, putting land at its full value and calling upon the local authority for its rateable proportion of the Board's expenses, although the local authority could only raise from the owners of such land one-fourth of the amount which, if the land were assessed at its full value, would be payable in respect of it, and the remaining three-fourths had to be made up by laying a higher rate on the owners or occupiers of houses in the district. The hon. Member had alluded to the Act of 1855; but, as a matter of fact, the Board had nothing to do with the passing of that Act, not being in existence at the time. They could not, therefore, have entered into any compact of the nature alluded to by the hon. Member. In conclusion, he (Sir James Hogg) must repeat, that while the Board admitted the anomaly and would be glad to see it removed, they were not prepared to endorse the proposal contained in the Bill introduced by the hon. Member, and he therefore moved that it be read this day six months.

Sir James Hogg

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Sir James Hogg.)

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that there was some force in the objections raised by the hon. and gallant Gentleman; but, on the whole, he thought the hon. Member for Greenwich had succeeded in establishing his case. The question involved was a difficult one, and full of technicalities, which rendered it unsuitable for discussion in a Committee of the Whole House; and he should, therefore, recommend the hon. and gallant Gentleman to withdraw his opposition on the understanding that the Bill was referred to a Select Committee.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

And, on April 14, Committee nominated as follows:—MR. STANSFELD, SIR CHARLES MILLA, SIR JAMES LAWRENCE, SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW, SIR ANDREW LUSH, SIR CHARLES LEGARD, SIR JAMES HOGG, MR. ASHLEY, MR. COOPE, MR.

GOLDNEY, Mr. SAMUDA, Mr. SPENCER STANHOPE, Mr. HEYGATE, Mr. JAMES, and Mr. BOORD:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

CONVENTION (IRELAND) ACT REPEAL BILL.—[BILL 85.]

(Mr. P. J. Smyth, Mr. Downing, Mr. Ronayne, Mr. Richard Power, Mr. O'Gorman, Mr. O'Clery.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. P. J. SMYTH, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, in the Session of 1871, in answer to a Question put by him to the Irish Solicitor General, Mr. Dowse said with reference to the Act which this Bill proposed to repeal, that there was no statute of a similar kind in England, and that it was still in force in Ireland. In consequence of that answer, he introduced in the Session of 1872 a Bill similar to the one then before the House. He was opposed by the Government of that day, as he was told he would be opposed by the Government of the present; but as he was persuaded his request was a most reasonable one, he trusted the House would lend him its attention for a few minutes. The title of the Act which it was the object of this Bill to repeal, was calculated seriously to mislead. It was not an Act to prevent unlawful assemblies, but to make unlawful assemblies, which without it would be perfectly lawful. It was introduced in the Irish Parliament by Lord Clare, in the year 1793, the pretence being a rumoured intention of the Catholics to hold a Convention in Athlone. It enacted—

“That all assemblies or other bodies of persons elected or otherwise constituted or appointed are unlawful assemblies, and all persons taking part therein are guilty of high misdemeanour.”

An Act of so extraordinary and unconstitutional a character could not fail to meet with vehement opposition in the Irish Parliament. Mr. Grattan said its object was not the peace of the country, but reflection on great bodies, and gratification of spleen at the expense of the Constitution, by voting false doctrine into law. His objection to the Bill was, that it was a trick, making a supposed national Convention in Athlone in 1793 a pretext for preventing delegation for ever. Lord Clare, at all events, had his pretext in 1793. He was curious to know on what pretext the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland would attempt to justify, in 1875, the prevention of delegation for ever, and the voting of false doctrine into law. Hon. Members would see, by referring to the Act, that it related solely to the mode of convening or holding a public meeting, and not in the slightest degree to the object for which a meeting might be convened. A meeting might be convened for the worst imaginable object, and if it had not a representative character, it might, so far as this Act was concerned, proceed without interruption. On the other hand, if a meeting be convened for the most laudable object in the world, and if it had a representative character, the police were commanded to disperse it by force, and those taking part in it as representatives were liable to the penalties of high misdemeanour. That was the law of public meeting in Ireland in this, the seventy-fifth year of the Legislative Union. He might be told the Act was not enforced since O'Connell's time. But why, if violated, had it not been enforced? Why the opposition to this Bill? Let the truth be proclaimed; the motive be frankly avowed. It was felt that this Act was a potent weapon in the hands of Government, and so it was held in reserve, bright and polished, for some great occasion. Such was the policy; but it was an unconstitutional policy, and as unstatesmanlike as it was unjust. It was a policy that condemned the Irish people to live on sufferance in their own land, and hold the plainest of constitutional rights—the right of public meeting—at the caprice of the Law Officers of the day. They have ostensibly,

but they are told in effect,

“He meant them for a slave!”

A conclusive proof of the mischievous vitality of the Act, and at the same time an overwhelming condemnation of it, would be found in the Act disestablishing the Irish Church. A special clause in the Irish Church Act, placed the Convention Act in abeyance, in order to enable the Protestants of Ireland to meet by delegation for the purposes of organizing their Church. A former Attorney General for Ireland (now Mr. Justice Barry), explaining that clause, said—

"By a peculiar law of old standing in that country, and framed for a particular purpose, no person or body could meet by delegation."—[3 Hansard, excv. 1019.]

Thus, before a section of the Irish community could discharge one of the most solemn duties ever imposed upon men, Parliament was obliged to remove the barrier interposed by this Act of old standing, framed for a particular purpose. It was the Act thus emphatically condemned, this peculiar Act of old standing, framed for a particular purpose in 1793, put aside for a particular purpose in 1869, and maintained for some very particular purpose from the Union to the present day, that he then asked the House totally to abrogate, and by so doing assimilate the law of Ireland, with reference to public meetings, to that of England. There was nothing which so impressed the observer of public events in England during the last half century, as the ease and quietness with which vast constitutional changes, amounting to revolutions, had been effected. A convention was held in Manchester or Birmingham, or a series of delegate meetings in London, and, as if by magic, religious liberty was established, and a cherished monopoly went down, and the portals of Parliament were widened, till the Commons' House became the expression of the peoples' will. The magician was not their Canning or their Brougham, their Cobden or their Peel, but that principle of representation that underlay the Constitution, and, like light itself, permeated the whole framework of English society. Give to Ireland the benefit of that saving principle—give her the Constitution. Repeal the Convention Act, or Repeal the Union.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. P. J. Smyth.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, he must oppose the Motion of the hon. Gentleman. The Motion had been before the House on several occasions, and had been resisted by the Representatives of the Irish Government of both political parties. The speech of the hon. Member tended to create a misapprehension as to the character of the measure. The Convention Act did not in any degree interfere with the right of public meeting in Ireland, nor did it interfere with the right of petitioning. That Act provided that meetings of a representative character, or in the nature of a delegated assembly, drawn together for the purpose of procuring a change in matters established by law in Church and State, should not be allowed. It would not be denied, he apprehended, that were the Act repealed a convention would be immediately called together in Ireland. Would not such an institution necessarily act as a rival to the House of Commons, and keep alive and exasperate those unhappy dissensions that had already existed there? Could any one doubt that such meetings would tend to create discontent and dissatisfaction in Ireland, and lead to most unhappy results? But this Bill would make such meetings legal, and would therefore enhance the danger. The Constitution gave the same liberty for lawful meetings in Ireland and in England. At present the Irish people were not deprived of any right of meeting in order to petition Parliament, or for any other legitimate purpose. When this proposal was made in 1872 it was opposed by the late Prime Minister, who said—

"We must admit, with deep regret, that we have not reached the time when we could safely and prudently venture to apply the entire identity of political legislation to Ireland, which I believe every man in this House desires."—[3 Hansard, ccxi. 166.]

The Bill would confer on the Irish people a dangerous gift; it would enable them to set up a mock Parliament and a mimic House of Commons, and he would therefore give it his decided opposition.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, there had been representative meetings not long ago in Dublin of the very character described, and they were not interfered with. He should support the second reading.

MR. SULLIVAN said, the custom had been to have two weights and two measures for England and Ireland. The system of taxation, as had been shown a few nights ago, was in Ireland most oppressive and double in amount. The Convention Act was not put in motion against the friends of the Government. A few days ago a meeting of medical men was allowed to be held at the Limerick Junction, in direct contravention of the Convention Act; but those who held the meeting were not disturbed, because it consisted of friends of the Government. Could any Minister dare to propose a Convention Act for England? The Irish Convention Act was the cause of disturbances. If the Irish met in thousands they were charged with endeavouring to over-awe the Government, and if they met, as they did lately at the Rotunda, in Dublin, then they were despised on account of the paucity of their numbers. Whether their meetings consisted of few or many, the result was the same; their voice was not heard. To public opinion out-of-doors he would fearlessly leave it to decide whether such oppression should be allowed any longer to continue.

Mr. P. J. Smyth

BANKRUPTCY (SCOTLAND) LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Fortescue Harrison, Mr. Anderson, Mr. William Holmes.)

MR. FORTESCUE HARRISON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, Sir, the Bill which I ask leave to read a second time is by no means pretentious. Its dimensions, its object, and those persons whose interests its provisions are intended to affect are alike humble; and although it is described as a Bill to amend the Law of Bankruptcy in Scotland, the contemplated changes are not of a character to alarm the most timid of law reformers. The Bill begins and ends with an amendment of a short section of that Act. In point of fact, it extends only to the substitution of a single cipher in a section of the present Act. Yet, Sir, unpretending as it is, and small and slight as is the concession I seek, I venture to say that more interest is at this moment excited amongst thousands of working men in Scotland on my present humble efforts to amend the law, than would probably be evoked by more ambitious legislative propositions. The working men in Scotland believe—and in my judgment justly believe—that they are unfairly treated in one particular provision of the Scotch Bankruptcy Act. To explain how that section works injuriously to these men—to show that it is in Scotland only, as compared with England and Ireland, that the grievance exists, and to ask the House to sanction a remedy, is what I now propose briefly to do. The principle has long been conceded that certain claims should rank preferentially on bankrupt estates, and amongst these are arts of the Kingdom. They urge with justice, that while they are told they could improve their technical education, and fit themselves to rival and excel the highly skilled labour of foreign competitors, they, by the very act of improving their position as skilled, and consequently as more highly-paid workmen, are placed, by the operation of the Act I am endeavouring to amend, upon the footing of unskilled labourers. I hope I have shown the House a sufficient justification for my attempt at legislation so early in my Parliamentary experience. The duty was cast upon me, and I should have been unworthy of the great industrial burghs I represent in this House if I had evaded it. I have only to thank the House for the patient attention it has given me, and to ask it to do an act of justice to working men.

Scotland by the passing of the Bill, the second reading of which I have now the honour to move.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Fortescue Harrison.)

MR. FARLEY LEITH: Sir, I entirely approve of the principle of this Bill, but I wish to make a few observations, as I consider it is too limited in its object and provisions. It can neither remedy the acknowledged defects of the Bankruptcy Law of Scotland, nor satisfy the reasonable demands of the mercantile community in respect to it. The Bill proposes to deal with one section of the Bankruptcy Act of Scotland, and with only a portion of that section. Indeed, I am of opinion, it leaves untouched the most objectionable part of that section. The hon. Member for the Kilmarnock Burghs (Mr. Fortescue Harrison) seeks to raise or extend the pecuniary limit mentioned in that section from £50 to £100. Now, I consider that the most objectionable part of the section is the latter part of it, which limits the wages to be allowed in cases of bankruptcy to the clerks, shopmen, labourers, and workmen, to one month's wages. That, I think, is, in itself, indefensible. It is objectionable and unjust to those hard-working, meritorious persons whose benefit we all have in view. The limit of one month's wages is unjust in principle, and certainly may be shown to be so by reference to the Act which the hon. Member for Kilmarnock referred to as the English Bankruptcy Act of 1869. On reference to that Act, it will be found that it distinguishes between clerks and shopmen on the one hand and labourers and workmen on the other. It provides that, as regards the former of these, the allowance of salaries shall be for four months, limited only by the provision which accompanies it—namely, that such amount as shall be awarded shall not exceed the sum of £50. With respect to the other class and division—namely, the labourers and workmen—the provision in the statute is, that they shall be allowed wages for two months. Now I ask, why should the clerks, shopmen, workmen, and labourers in Scotland be placed in a worse position than those of the sister Kingdoms of England and Ireland? Justice requires that the hon. Member for Kilmarnock should have further sought to amend that section of the Bill to which his attention has been particularly directed, by incorporating into his measure the four months and the two months which are given by the Act of 1869 in England. There is absolutely no reason for distinguishing between the circumstances, the position, and I may say the rights of the workmen in Scotland, and of those in England. I have no objection to this Bill, considered by itself, other than that which arises out of what I have just stated to the House. The mercantile community of the large city which I represent has, however, expressed its views in the Chamber of Commerce, and it desires a much more comprehensive alteration of the Bankruptcy Law of Scotland. It requires that it should be brought into harmony with the Bankruptcy Law of England generally, and that the two systems of law should be assimilated. I have proof, also, that this is what is demanded by the mercantile communities both of England and Scotland. At a meeting of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of the United Kingdom, held in February, 1873, a resolution was passed which embodies the suggestions and the reasoning which I have just brought under the notice of the House. That Resolution is in these terms—

"That it is expedient and desirable that there should be one Bankruptcy statute for the United Kingdom, and that the Government be memorialised to instruct the Law Officers of the Crown to prepare and introduce such a measure."

"That it is expedient and desirable that there should be one Bankruptcy statute for the United Kingdom, and that the Government be memorialised to instruct the Law Officers of the Crown to prepare and introduce such a measure."

Now, that resolution was acted upon,

included the wages of working men. Under the provisions of the 122nd section of the existing Bankruptcy Act for Scotland—namely, the 19 & 20 Vict., cap. 79—the wages of workmen, and of clerks, shopmen, and servants, have a preferential claim on the bankrupt estate to the extent of a month's wages, provided that such wages or salary does not exceed £60 a-year. Should it be that any of the persons here described are paid at a rate above that limit, they have no preferential claim whatever, and must prove their debts in the ordinary manner, and rank with other creditors. The Act which so limits claims of this nature was passed in 1856, now nearly 20 years ago, and I have no doubt that at that time £60 a-year was considered a sufficiently limited amount to save the average working man from losing by the bankruptcy of his employer. Wages in those days were considerably less than they now are, and the means of living proportionately cheaper. From 20s. to 25s. a-week was the ordinary average wages of working men in Scotland at that time, and the limit of £60 a-year provided fairly enough for that calculation. But, Sir, things have changed very much since that period, and the average wages of working men have nearly doubled, while all the necessities of life have risen in an equal proportion; so that I question much if working men are better off now, so far as a margin between expenditure and receipt is concerned, than they were 20 years ago. That this is so, is to a certain extent proved by the way this question of preferential payment to workmen has been treated by subsequent Bankruptcy Acts. By the Irish Bankruptcy Act, passed after the Scotch Act of 1856, provision was made to protect the wages of workmen to the extent of £5, without reference to any particular rate of wages. That arrangement gave workmen an opportunity of protecting themselves from loss by insisting on fortnightly, or even weekly, payments of wages. By the English Bankruptcy Act of 1869, Section 32, it is provided—

“That all wages or salary of any clerk or servant in the employment of the bankrupt at the date of adjudication, not exceeding four months' wages and not exceeding £50, and all wages of any labourer or workman not exceeding two months' wages, shall have priority of payment.”

Mr. Fortescue Harrison

Taking quarterly payments as the rule in regard to salary of clerks and shopmen, this would give priority to the extent of a rate equal to £150 a-year for this class of persons, while for workmen no specific rate in wages is named; and thus, whatever the annual rate may be, a workman of England is entitled to priority for two months' wages. This is a fair and liberal interpretation of the preference intended by all Bankruptcy legislation in favour of working men. If the wages of workmen are to be protected at all, there is no reason why there should be any limit beyond that period at which it is the local custom to pay wages. In Scotland, it is the rule to pay fortnightly, and I should have preferred to introduce a measure securing a fortnight's wages to working men in cases of the bankruptcy of their employers, irrespective of any rate of wages. But being most desirous to see a speedy change in the present system, and anxious to avoid an opposition which would have been fatal to my desires, I thought it best to follow in the track of the existing law, only extending its operation. By the Bill which I now submit to the consideration of the House, I propose to extend the annual rate of salary or wages from £60 to £100. I feel that, looking either to the Irish or the English Bankruptcy laws, skilled working men in Scotland will still be placed in a worse position in this respect than their fellow-workers in the rest of the United Kingdom, inasmuch as the enlarged rate of £100 a-year protects working men only up to 36s. a-week, the actual average rate of skilled workmen's wages in Scotland being much in excess of that amount. But anxious to obtain some relief for those I sympathize with, I have preferred to name a low sum, with a fair chance of success for the measure, rather than, by attempting more, to fail altogether. If, however, the Bill is, by your favour, permitted to go into Committee, I shall be happy to accept any suggestion to increase the limit beyond the sum I have named in it. Recent occurrences in one of the burghs I have the honour of representing have awakened a strong feeling in this matter not only there, but throughout Scotland, and a sense of injury is felt by the classes affected that their position is inferior to that of working men under similar conditions in other parts of the Kingdom. They urge with justice, that while they are told they should improve their technical education, and fit themselves to rival and excel the highly skilled labour of foreign competitors, they, by the very act of improving their position as skilled, and consequently as more highly-paid workmen, are placed, by the operation of the Act I am endeavouring to amend, upon the footing of unskilled labourers. That Resolution is in these terms—

"That it is expedient and desirable that there should be one Bankruptcy statute for the United Kingdom, and that the Government be memorialised to instruct the Law Officers of the Crown to prepare and introduce such a measure."

Now, that resolution was acted upon,

and a memorial was presented to the late Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman handed the memorial to the Lord Advocate for the time being. We have lost his services in this House in consequence of his promotion, and of another event which has happened in the change of Government; but I trust we have not at the same time lost any assistance in carrying that object out by the change of Lord Advocate. Therefore I appeal to my right hon. and learned Friend the present Lord Advocate to give effect to the memorial so presented. We had the promise of the late Lord Advocate that he would give effect to it. What are the objections to the present systems of bankruptcy in the Three Kingdoms? They appear on the face of those systems, and may be summed up in a few words without going into detail. First, there are three distinct and several statutes on the Bankruptcy Laws of the Three Kingdoms; one for England, one for Scotland, and one for Ireland. Now, hon. Members can easily imagine the inconveniences, the difficulties, and the evils which must arise from these widely differing systems of bankruptcy. The creditors in one country are at a loss to know the peculiar proceedings which are required to be followed in order to enforce rights in the other country, the principles and procedure in those other countries being diametrically opposed to each other. There are different rules concerning the marshalling the assets of the bankrupt's estate, and there is a difficulty, which has led to much litigation and delay, in ascertaining to which Bankruptcy Court's jurisdiction, of the Three Kingdoms a case ought to be referred. Is this not a scandal to the three countries, or at least to the two countries of England and Scotland, which are so closely united, and where the ramifications of commerce and trade are so extensive that we ought to have the same law to govern commercial transactions in both countries. I feel sure my right hon. and learned Friend will agree with me that there is no difficulty in having one statute for the Three Kingdoms, and we have precedents for it in the General Shipping Act, and the Revenue Act, which govern alike England, Scotland, and Ireland. The present Bill deals with only an infinitesimal part of the subject—the Bankruptcy

Laws—and although I am reluctant to vote against the Bill, I doubt whether in Committee we could so alter and amend it as to meet the reasonable demands and wishes of the mercantile community of England. However, having expressed these opinions on the general question, I shall vote in favour of the Bill, the subject-matter of which I hope will receive favourable consideration at the hands of the Government.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he should record his Vote with great pleasure in favour of the Bill, because the hon. Member who introduced it had hit an undoubted defect in the Scotch Act, and at the same time had very properly refrained from touching upon the much greater question which the hon. and learned Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Leith) had referred to. The complete general question of a good law of bankruptcy ought, in his judgment, to be dealt with by the Government of the day, and was of too serious a nature to be dealt with by any private Member. He would suggest that if they did so, and introduced a Bill upon the subject, there should be a clause to the effect that no bankrupt should receive his certificate if he had not kept a set of books of account. As the Bill before the House only changed one item in the existing Act—namely, the amount which might be claimed for wages—and as it was an alteration needed from the changes in wages, he hoped the House would pass it in its limited shape.

THE LORD ADVOCATE: I do not intend, Sir, to make any objection to the second reading of the Bill. The object of the hon. Gentleman who has introduced it is to assimilate as far as possible the law of Scotland to the law of England, in reference to the payment of preferential claims to clerks and workmen. I think it is quite right that that should be carried out by legislation, but I venture to think that the Bill is capable of some improvement in Committee, and I shall be most happy to put myself into communication with the promoters of it with a view to consider the question. As to the much larger question introduced by the hon. and learned Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Leith), I must say I do not look forward with very great composure to a Bill for the assimilation of the Bankruptcy Laws of the three countries. In Scotland I am not aware that there is any great dissatisfaction in regard to the working of our own system. Of course, there will always be dissatisfaction regarding bankruptcy; but as far as the forms in use in Scotland exist, I do not think there is much dissatisfaction. On the contrary, the attempt of the framers of the last Bankruptcy Act which was passed for England was to assimilate as much as possible the law of England to the law of Scotland, and therefore I apprehend that if there be any faults in the English system, they arise from some departure from our Scotch system. I was not aware that any pledge was given by the late Government in this matter, or that the late Lord Advocate had given any pledge in regard to the reconstruction of the Bankruptcy Law. But it is a large question, demanding grave consideration, less, perhaps, by me, than by the people of Scotland, in reference to a change of the system, and the opinion held in England concerning the assimilation of their system to ours.

BANKERS' ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Goschen, Mr. Weguelin, Mr. Baring.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. GOSCHEN, on rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said: The Notice of Amendment given by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the second reading of my Bill, with a view of referring the subject to a Select Committee, has changed the aspect of the question, and considering the power which the Government can exercise on a matter of this kind, and also the position which the Scotch Members are likely to take in opposition to the measure, I think I may conclude that the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman, or some similar Motion, will be adopted by the House. Therefore, I do not propose to enter into any elaborate arguments in support of my Bill, or into the objections which may be taken to it. But I think I should be wanting in respect to the House, and to those large interests which are affected by the Bill, if I did not explain the motives which have induced me to bring it forward. The turning point of the Bill consists in the fact that Scotch bankers have virtually a monopoly—a Parliamentary monopoly, and a monopoly which has existed almost without question since the year 1845. In reply, the Scotch bankers say—"Why should we not come to England, when the English banks can come to Scotland? There ought to be free trade." I submit to the House that they know, by the experience of 30 years, that when they say that their English brother-bankers can come to Scotland, the conditions of banking in Scotland, and of the law affecting the Scotch banking interest, are such that English bankers are virtually precluded from going to Scotland. When I introduced this Bill, I stated that there were two grounds for dealing with the subject. In the first place, I thought the English bankers had an equitable case for consideration, as they are under restrictions which the Scotch bankers are not under. Surely it is an anomaly that the National Provincial Bank should be obliged, as it has been, to give up the right of issuing bank notes to the extent of half-a-million when it comes to London, while the Scotch banks can come here without giving up their issue of notes. Perhaps, however, the Scotch bankers would retort—"You ought to remove the restrictions on the English banks." ["Hear, hear!"] Well, those cries of "Hear, hear," proceed from the Representatives of the Scotch monopolists, who are anxious that monopoly should become more valuable year by year; but the question of public interest in dealing with the Bill is, whether you ought to allow the monopoly by a stealthy process—opposed, as we believe, to the intention of the framers of the Acts of 1844 and 1845—to become more valuable year by year. That it has become more valuable I think no one will deny; and if you have a close body like the Scotch bankers, who, in addition to the great privilege they exercise in their own country, are to be free to come across the Border and to compete with those who have not such privileges, you are increasing the value of the Parliamentary privilege they wish to enjoy. How far is it desirable in the interest of Scotland herself that the monopoly should continue? That, in my opinion, is a question for the Select Committee to decide. Many persons, whose opinions are entitled to considerable weight, do not wish, notwithstanding the many arguments which may be urged in favour of the Scotch bankers, to maintain this monopoly in Scotland. Then the Scotch bankers may say—"Let us have free trade in banking in Scotland, and let English bankers come and issue notes." Well, it is for Her Majesty's Government to consider whether such a course would be desirable; but, for my own part, I think that if the question were raised, it would be decided by this House in the negative, and that no body of monopolists or bankers should issue notes without the State claiming its portion of the profits. I have been charged by those who have not examined the question closely, with offending by the Bill against the doctrines of free trade. Now, I wish to point out that the question as regards free trade is this—you have on one side a body of monopolists with Parliamentary privileges, subsidized by the State; and on the other side, in competition with them, you have a body who are not so subsidized, and who have to contend against them. The Scotch bankers derive a certain annual value from those great privileges which they possess, for they can issue these £1 notes without paying any tax to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Now, it is said—"Let there be free competition. Let the English bankers go to Scotland, and let the Scotch bankers come to England." The question has been argued as if the London bankers, or the English provincial bankers, objected to the establishment in this country of other banks, whereas, what they really contend against is the establishment among them of banks which have privileges in regard to the issue of their notes. They say—"This is free banking on one side, while you have the privileged issues on the other side." That is a very serious question, and the whole Bill turns virtually, as far as regards the public Exchequer, on the question, whether you ought to allow a privileged system of issues to go on and increase in value day by day. I think it is perfectly fair to take the course proposed in the Bill, and to say to the Scotch bankers—"If you drop your issues, you can come to England, and to London like any other bank; but as long as you enjoy the practical subsidy and those privileges which were granted to you 30 years ago, and which have never been interfered with, so long we think your wings ought to be clipped, and you ought to be confined to your own preserves." I have mentioned as an historical fact that no new banks have been established in Scotland. There is, indeed, a branch of the Oriental Bank in Edinburgh, and there may be branches of English deposit banks in Scotland and of colonial banks; but it is a fallacy to compare the business done by an Indian bank or by a colonial bank in a Scotch town with the regular business of Scotch banks. And this is the reason why it is impossible for English banks to establish themselves in Scotland. The Scotch system of banking covers the whole population of Scotland in a most remarkable way, and I give the greatest credit to the able and indefatigable men who manage those banks. They have covered the whole of Scotland with those banks. Some banks have from 70 to 100 branches, and they supply £1 notes which they alone have the privilege of issuing, and they know that by the custom of the country the people in Scotland will only take £1 notes. What have the English banks that go to Scotland to do? They cannot issue Bank of England notes, because the people will not take them. They cannot pay their own notes, because it is not the custom of the country. What then are these banks to issue? Why, notes of their rivals. They are to issue the £1 notes, which they must take from the Scotch banks already established. The first operation of an English bank would be to get from the Scotch banks say £100,000 Scotch notes; and so in going to compete with its rivals, it would actually pay it a subsidy, because it would increase the issue of the Scotch banks. The English bank in Scotland must show its impotence, by not being able to issue the currency of the country, and in the next place it must actually go to its rivals and ask them for a supply of their £1 notes to carry on business at all. It may be said that this is not an advantage to the Scotch banks, because they must hold gold against their issues; but at this point there comes in the singular privilege of the Scotch banks—a privilege which the English banks have not, and which on general grounds is most questionable—of holding the gold, not against the notes, but against the general issues of the bank. They have a certain stock of gold, which every prudent banker must want, and with the store of gold they can cover their general liabilities. Therefore the present position as between the two countries, and the two competing banks in the different countries, is this—an English bank goes to Scotland; it can issue only £1 notes. A Scotch bank comes to England, and it can pay over its counter the general currency—gold and Bank of England notes—a currency to which they have the same access as everybody else. See how differently they are placed in this respect from the non-issuing English banks in a Scotch town. The Scotch bank has got a monopoly of the issue of the £1 notes; but in a provincial town in England, the bank has got to deal with the competition of a non-issuing bank and the Bank of England. In fact, there is no analogy between the two cases. In England there are the three issues—Bank of England notes, gold, and private issues. In Scotland you have only one—namely, the private issues. Those banks are limited in number. No addition has been made to them by Parliament, and these banks are now enjoying the privilege of coming over the Borders and establishing branches in England. They bring with them the advantages derived from their Scotch monopoly. They bring with them this fact that they have drained, to the advantage of the country—I use the word in no sense implying any blame upon the transaction—Scotland of the deposits. They are able to secure what is beneficial to Scotland, but coming to England with these deposits thus obtained, they say—“This is free trade.” That is not the only point. Do they bring their own £1 notes with them? In Cumberland they do, and the £1 notes circulate in great numbers in the North of England. The £1 notes, which English bankers have never been allowed to issue, circulate in the North of England under the auspices of the Scotch banks. They do not issue them in England itself; they issue them in a branch close to the Borders, and their customers bring them to England in their pockets, and pay for commodities with them. If this were reciprocal, it would be perfectly just; but see how this affects the English

bankers in the North. They get these £1 notes paid into them by their customers. They must cash these notes, however, through a Scotch bank. That Scotch bank—a privileged bank—charges them what commission it pleases, because it is able to regulate these matters itself. Having paid the commission, the bank in England is compelled to charge its customers. The customers naturally say—“We don’t wish to pay this commission;” and the customers take their accounts to the Scotch banks, who are able to do the business without charging the commission; while English banks are unable to retaliate, because, owing to the Scotch system of issue, they are unable to cross the Borders. No one can say that it can be proper that a system should exist which so heavily handicaps one class as against the other. I think our Scotch friends may admit that much. The same argument applies, but not with equal force, to London. A Scotch bank may be established there, and its managers may be able to do all Scotch business free of commission, and in that way they may be able to supplant their rivals in certain branches of business. I think, however, the House would not wish that the privileged monopolists coming to London, and driving their rivals out of a certain business, should make it appear that the business cannot be done as cheaply and as satisfactory to the public by arrangement. If the English banks could have the privilege of paying their notes throughout Scotland, as the Scotch banks have, then they would be able to effect another arrangement. I quite agree that the interests of the public must be paramount in this matter. My feeling is, that the interests of the public must be secured by taking care that the value of a monopoly should not be increased. I would just refer to what has been stated in some of the able papers which have been circulated on both sides of the question. Sir Robert Peel foresaw what has happened. He knew that the course he was taking would be to the advantage of Scotland in the respect to which I have referred, and I suspect that he intended that arrangement practically not to be a permanent one; but that it should be subsequently revised by the State. There is only one point which I need further touch, and that is a comparison of the position of the issuing banks in England and the issuing banks in Scotland. I have shown that the former is no monopoly. They have to compete through the system of currency in the country with other banks—with the Bank of England and non-issuing banks. With regard to Ireland, there are issuing banks there; but the same monopoly which exists in Scotland does not exist in Ireland. This brings us to the question—What is the difference between the position of an issuing bank in England and an issuing bank in Scotland? The Scotch bank issues £1 notes, and the English bank £5 notes. The Scotch bank is not tied down to its issue, but can issue above the authorized amount against gold to cover its general assets, and it has got the further advantage of meeting with no competition at the hands of the Bank of England. It is clear the position of the English banks is different, and I must say that the issuing banks established in the North of England may claim the consideration of the House; and without saying what the remedy is, it may be said that the present state of things is intolerable to them, because it is perfectly clear that they cannot compete with the Scotch banks. Under the circumstances, I propose the Bill which I have laid upon the Table. I suppose it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government—so I gather from the Amendment of which they have given Notice—to deal with the matter themselves, I will not say immediately, but after the Report comes up. I know the immense difficulties which a private Member has in dealing with a question of this kind, and I should not have attempted to deal with it, unless I understood that the Government had some difficulty in taking up the matter. I perfectly agree with the opinion that it is for the Government, if possible, to deal with this class of questions, and I hope that they will do so. Let me, however, point out that this is a Committee which, if the House should assent to its appointment, will take a considerable amount of time. What is to be the condition in the meantime? If the House at all shares the views which I have endeavoured to put before it—that it is unwise on the part of the public to allow the value of this monopoly to go on gradually increasing by stealthy means, which were not intended by the Legislature, then I think the House would think it better that the status quo should remain during the time that this inquiry progresses. I should be very glad if I can persuade Her Majesty's Government to assist in passing a Suspensory Bill; or what would be far better, that the Government itself should pass such a Bill. Otherwise, the Scotch banks, pending the Committee, might be induced to take the very steps which the Committee afterwards will recommend should not be permissible. I call the attention of the Government very respectfully to the point. It would be difficult for the Committee to report, if at all, this Session, in time for legislation on so large a subject to take place. It might be two years before any action could be taken by Parliament, and in the meantime I think the monopoly with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer might wish himself to deal would have become more valuable, would have taken root in new places, and then we should find ourselves embarrassed in dealing with many vested interests which are absent at the present moment in a certain degree. I think it only just to have stated as clearly as I can the view I have taken, because it is a matter in which a great interest is taken by the mercantile community. Having done so, I will now move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed.
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Goschen.)

Mr. STEPHEN CAVE, in rising to move, as an Amendment—

“That a Select Committee be appointed to consider and report upon the restrictions imposed and privileges conferred by Law on Bankers authorised to make and issue notes in England, Scotland, and Ireland, respectively,” said: I am not going, Sir, to make a long statement on this question. I rise simply to give a short explanation of the intentions of the Government. The question will be inquired into by a Committee, and we should be anticipating the labours and the result of that Committee if we went far into the question now. The Government has had the subject under their consideration for a considerable time. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has considered it most carefully; but he felt that a matter of the kind, involving interests of such lishments should be hampered by arbitrary provisions, and should be obliged to pass their business through the hands of agents?" — [3 Hansard, clxxvii. 618.]

That imperative necessity has forced one bank after another to become its own agents in London when there was no legal disability. The National Bank of Ireland, with an authorized issue of £850,000—double that of any Scotch bank—has been domiciled in London for 20 years, and it now has eight branches in the metropolis. The Provincial Bank of Ireland, in like manner, has had its London centre for 10 years. No one has disputed their right, nor does the Bill of my right hon. Friend propose to take it away. The Irish banks have taken root, and perhaps it would require an effort even beyond the strength of my right hon. Friend to pull them out of the ground, and so he leaves them alone. Nor does he attempt to root out the Oriental Bank and other colonial banks, which in logic he should extirpate also. The Irish and colonial banks of issue are to remain in London, at least for the present, until my right hon. Friend gets his Bill passed into an Act, when it may prove a fulcrum on which to apply a lever for the stronger task of getting all these banks of issue rooted out of the City of London. For Parliament cannot consent to pass an Act of disability against Scotch banks, unless it proceeds on a distinct principle, which it is proposed to apply to Irish and colonial banks of issue. Now, why are the London agencies of Scotch banks selected for primary extirpation? My right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London knows very well that the right of issue of Scotch banks is not the main cause—is, indeed, only a small cause of their prosperity. He may justly look upon them as formidable competitors with London bankers; but he cannot in his heart believe that their strength depends upon their £2,750,000 of authorized note issue, when their deposits reach £77,000,000. They have a surplus issue; but it is covered by gold, and though a convenience to their branch business, is only indirectly a source of gain. The strength of the Scotch banks does not thus consist of their authorized circulation of £2,750,000, constituting only one thirty-third part of their resources; nor does it rest on their total of note circulation of £6,000,000, for that is only one-fifteenth of their resources. These resources amount to the large sum of £90,000,000, of which £77,000,000 consist of deposits. That is the capital—the results not of privilege, but of the savings of industry—which constitutes the strength of the Scotch banks, and creates alarm among the London bankers. I have said that the Scotch banks do not fear an inquiry into the expediency of imposing restrictions upon them, if they are not aimed at exclusively, as the Bill before us unfairly and illogically does aim at them. For the issue before a Committee would be—Ought restrictions to be imposed on Scotch and Irish banks in the interests of the public, and not merely in the interests of London bankers? The Scotch banks have been forced to come to London from the great increase of their metropolitan business. One Scotch bank assures me that its transactions to and from London amount to £60,000,000 annually. Can you conceive that with such an amount of business, a second-hand agency can work satisfactorily? Surely the benefits of a direct agency must be beneficial to the Scotch merchants who have dealings with London, and to the English merchants who have dealings with Scotland. I admit that the benefits which the public thus gain by a direct agency are detrimental to some of the London bankers, who formerly transacted the Scotch agencies—for even to their own customers they are unable to transact Scotch business as cheaply as the Scotch banks can do. But to suppress them, for this reason, would be a complete return to class legislation, and protection in its most naked form. If my right hon. Friend had brought in a Bill to enable the English banks of issue, if they left their issues behind them in the provinces, to open agencies in London, he would have been thoroughly justified as a free trader, and he would have been supported by the Scotch Members; but to drive Scotch agencies out of London when doing banking business only, apart from issue, is the antithesis of free trade. It is impossible to see in this proposal any other ground than that of protection to a class. Assurances are given that the Scotch banks will be gainers by their exclusion from London, because if they remain, they might be tempted into all sorts of transactions on the Stock Exchange, unfitted for their small stock of metallic reserve. The Scotch shareholders and depositors belong to a canny race, and are well able to protect themselves. The metallic reserve in Scotland of £4,100,000 forms only a small portion of the reserve of the Scotch banks, and is scarcely deemed by them a reserve at all in its true sense. Their second line of reserve, in Government securities and bills of short date, exists in London, and is so ample, that no one questions the solvency of the Scotch banks. They deem it wiser to use money, than to let it lie idle in their tills; but the prudence of its use as a whole has justified the confidence of the public, and this confidence is the real ground of alarm of the English bankers. They fear that a system of banking, which has inspired every individual in Scotland with as much confidence in a bit of dirty greasy paper as in a sovereign in gold, may have a catching effect on the English people, and induce them to add to the £77,000,000 of deposits which form the groundwork of their resources. It is this accumulation of the savings of the prudent Scotch which mainly remain in London, and, therefore, which requires constant watching in investments, that forms a strong argument for direct and responsible agency. I should have met the Bill of my right hon. Friend by a direct negative vote, were it not that I was anxious to show, for my own part, that the Scotch Members are not afraid to court inquiry, and do not wish to show satisfaction with the continuance of restrictions which the law imposes upon English banks of issue. I believe that any Committee which this House may appoint will recommend that the existing restrictions should be withdrawn—not that new restrictions shall be imposed. Parliament, which has so thoroughly carried out the principle of Free Trade, is not likely to return to the system of Protection in banking. Even the larger proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have been welcomed by us, if we had thought the time opportune for a complete review of the system of currency. The Scotch banks have no fear that any Government will interfere with their paper currency. If a Government desired to make the Scotch people Home Rulers, I can give them a double receipt for their speedy conversion.

Mr. Lyon Playfair

Threaten to suppress Presbytery, and threaten to suppress the £1 note. One would be about as dangerous a proceeding as the other. But we do not wish to introduce our paper currency into England, though I think few people would object to the Bank of England notes being made legal tenders in Scotland. While, then, we preserve an issue which forms an insignificant part of the resources of the Scotch banks, and which is not more than sufficient for a circulating medium in Scotland, and cannot affect the just influence of the Bank of England on exchanges, we are quite willing that a Committee should inquire into the expediency of maintaining or imposing restrictions on banking, in the full belief that the House will be advised that the principle of unrestricted banking, so forcibly urged by such great financiers as Sir Robert Peel and the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), will more firmly be established by a new investigation of the relations of the metropolis as the centre of monetary transactions to all the banks throughout the Kingdom.

MR. GLADSTONE: One thing, at all events, that is satisfactory is—and I am glad that it has been already recognized to-day—that this is not at all a party discussion, and that we may exchange our sentiments, whether in approval of or against the Bill, without their being embittered by any of those feelings which arise out of political contests. It is in that sense I wish to speak, and in starting I am free to admit that I think that in one instance the right hon. Gentleman who spoke last made a point against the right hon. Gentleman the promoter of the Bill, for it is undoubtedly not consistent, at any rate in theory, that we should be asked to legislate against the privilege of Scotch banks coming to England, and should at the same time be called on to close our eyes against the existence of a similar privilege which is enjoyed by the banks of Ireland. Whatever course is taken with regard to the banks of one of the two countries would have to be taken in equity and policy with respect to the other, and I shall be very much surprised if my right hon. Friend (Mr. Goschen) shows any disposition to be obstinate on this subject, or pushes his quarrel to extremity for the sake of excluding the Irish banks. I am led to make a few remarks immediately after the last speaker in consequence of his references to the Acts of 1844 and 1845, and to the views of Sir Robert Peel, for I have the eminent and melancholy privilege of being the only person now in the House who belonged to the Cabinet of 1844, and as I occupied a post intimately connected with the trade, commerce, and finances of the country, I was naturally and necessarily cognizant of the views of that eminent statesman upon which the legislation of that period was founded. Now, my right hon. Friend has referred with perfect accuracy to the declaration of Sir Robert Peel that he was entirely in favour of absolute freedom of trade in banking; but he did not give him credit for the qualifying statement he made—that he was not also of opinion that, if it were the pleasure of Parliament to combine the business of banking, which is essentially and properly a free business, with the factitious and artificial privilege of issue, which has nothing whatever to do with banking, and which rests on grounds of its own, such a combination of privileges might not materially modify the principle of freedom in banking. That was the course taken by Sir Robert Peel in respect to English banks at the period referred to, and it affords an illustration of his opinions on the question, and I do not think my right hon. Friend (Mr. Lyon Playfair) has been at all successful in his attempt to show that it was otherwise. It could not be conceived by Sir Robert Peel that the circulation of the English banks could ever be made an instrument of inconvenience as regarded the foreign exchanges. Sir Robert Peel proceeded steadily on the principle that where the law imposed restrictions on issuing banks, these restrictions ought to be maintained; and, moreover, Sir Robert Peel did that with reference to a wider principle still—namely, the principle that the State ought ultimately to get into its own hands the whole business of issue, and that that course should be taken upon the first favourable opportunity. That is the true statement of the views of Sir Robert Peel, and his views on subjects of this kind, I need not say, must always be of very great weight and authority. I am not prepared to admit to my right hon. Friend (Mr. Lyon Playfair) that this Bill is to be justly described as an attempt to legislate in favour of English as against Scotch bankers. It is perfectly true that there is a class interest involved, on the one hand, of Scotch bankers, respecting whom I do not deny that the extension of their privileges, apart from issue, appears in itself desirable, and a class interest, on the other hand, of English bankers. But my right hon. Friend (Mr. Goschen) bases his Bill and his arguments in support of it mainly upon the public interest—basing this measure, in fact, entirely upon the ground taken by Sir Robert Peel, that banking privileges in the case of those banks which enjoy the additional and external privilege of issue must not be taken for granted as fit subjects for unlimited extension, but are open to the consideration of Parliament as regards the sphere within which they are to be exercised. My right hon. Friend (Mr. Goschen) put the case of equity very strongly as regards the English banks, and my right hon. Friend who has just spoken did not deal with this point when he referred to the case of the National Provincial Bank. I will ask, with my right hon. Friend, the simple question again, whether it is equitable that the National Provincial Bank should be required to surrender its very valuable issue of £400,000 of notes as a condition of its coming to London, and at the same time, that any bank in Scotland or Ireland should be allowed to come to London without surrendering its privilege of issue? That, I think, is a very inequitable state of the law, and fully justifies my right hon. Friend in having raised the question now before us. I suppose my right hon. Friend will not insist on desiring to obtain the second reading of his Bill in face of the Notices of Motion upon the Paper, and especially of the action taken on behalf of the Treasury Bench. I am not, however, for myself, prepared to say, in regard to this matter, that there is any case requiring investigation as anterior to legislation. I think the question is quite clear and simple, and I know there are hon. Gentlemen in this House perfectly competent to discuss it without any previous inquiry. But we are in the hands of majorities, and I am disposed to assume that probably the majority is in favour of having some inquiry previous to legislation. In that case, being under some apprehension, I would venture to suggest that the terms of the inquiry proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer should be altered in such a way as not to leave them open to the construction put upon them by the last speaker. The words he complains of ought to be left out, otherwise the terms seem to amount altogether, or very nearly, to the appointment of a Committee for the purpose of investigating generally the state of the currency, and even the privileges and powers of the Bank of England. If you are to discuss generally the issue powers of private bankers, which is obviously the immediate scope of the Motion, it will be quite impossible to exclude from inquiry the issue powers of the Bank of England. The two things are in point of fact the complement of one another. The interests of bankers and the issues of private banks and the Bank of England are so closely connected, the one taking the place which the other does not fill, that it is impossible to make an inquiry in regard to the one without extending it to the other. I am not quite sure that I gathered distinctly from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who spoke on the part of the Government (Mr. Stephen Cave) on what ground the objection was raised to the narrower inquiry proposed to be instituted by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Lyon Playfair). [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: We dispute that it is narrower.] I am glad to hear that answer from my right hon. Friend. It is going into a question of words, and if it is limited to a question of words the matter may be easily settled. What I understand to be the contention of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Lyon Playfair) is to confine the inquiry strictly to the purpose and scope of the Bill before the House, not denying, as I understand, that Irish banks would be properly included in such an inquiry. That being so, there need be no great difference as to the terms of the inquiry; but I do not understand the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as being capable of that interpretation. However, I leave that to be settled, as I have no doubt it will be settled, further on in the debate. As I have already said, I see no advantage to be gained by this preliminary inquiry, but I do not feel it my duty to ask the House to vote in opposition to it.

Mr. Gladstone

What I do look for from this discussion as likely to be beneficial has reference to the larger aspects of this question. The point raised by the Bill of my right hon. Friend is, in itself, comparatively narrow. It either relates to the interests of certain English and Scotch banks, or it relates to matters connected with the public interest which go far beyond the question of banking in Scotland or England—namely, the question whether the privilege of banking shall or shall not be accompanied by the greater privilege of issuing notes. The real question which I think the Bill, after this debate, must suggest to the mind of the House is whether it is or is not desirable, supposing a favourable opportunity to have arrived, that we should now at length, after the lapse of 30 or 31 years since the last legislation upon this subject, endeavour to deal with the whole question of issues. I am one of those disposed to adhere firmly to the principle of the Act of 1844, and I am disposed to adhere firmly to the principle laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—namely, that all issue is the privilege and prerogative of the State, and that nothing can be more fallacious and mischievous than confounding the privilege of banking with the privilege of issue. Nothing could be more strictly accurate, and, at the same time, more felicitous, than the expression of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Goschen) when he spoke of the issue banks as being subsidized by the State. They are so subsidized in the strictest sense, because they have in their own hands, in their notes, a power which, if exercised by the State, would be directly productive of considerable funds available for the relief of the taxpayer. It would be exactly the same thing, as far as the money is concerned, to grant a lucrative privilege to a person or pay over to him a considerable sum from the Consolidated Fund. Do not suppose that I wish to speak with disrespect of the persons who possess these privileges of issue, especially the Scotch banks. I think they have derived rather more advantage than my right hon. Friend (Mr. Lyon Playfair) is disposed to admit, from the possession of this privilege of issuing notes, and coming to the metropolis. But I feel bound to admit and assume that the prosperity of the Scotch banks, and their great extension, is in the main due to the prudence of the

Scotch bankers, not only in the way they manage their issues, but also, and to a still greater extent, in the way they have extended their branches and banking facilities to all parts of the country. Why, so thoroughly have they done this that I would hardly be surprised to hear that there was a branch bank at John o' Groat's House. [An hon. MEMBER: There is one at Thurso.] Yes, and at other places far less promising and fruitful than the town of Thurso. It is this extraordinary banking energy—the manner in which the wise and thrifty disposition of the people to avail themselves of banking facilities has been developed and turned to account—which has been the main cause of the prosperity of the Scotch banks. But what I wish to point out to the House and suggest to the Government is, that there is now a good opportunity for that larger legislation upon this subject which I have indicated is desirable for an equitable settlement of every just claim on the part of vested interests—and I admit that these vested interests exist—for the establishment of the title of the State to issue, and for effecting a very large economy in behalf of the people of this country. The question could never be settled if party interests were allowed to enter into it, but if the Chancellor of the Exchequer avails himself of the opportunity which I think is open to him, I venture to think he will not be met in a partizan spirit. It is impossible, however, that considerations of party feeling can at present enter into the consideration of the question. I know the opinions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject, because I have heard them explained in this House with great clearness and great force. I know that the opinions which he has expressed are also the opinions of the Government, and I know that these opinions are in conformity with the opinions of hon. Gentlemen sitting on independent benches on both sides of the House, who may be able to render the right hon. Gentleman valuable assistance in the task which I respectfully propose to him to undertake. Though I have not asked the permission of those who sit near me upon this bench, I am sure I speak their sentiments when I say that if my right hon. Friend is disposed, on the part of the Government, to grapple with this great and important question, he will receive from them, as from myself individually, the most cordial support. This is a very important matter. When the present Government took office, we were told that all dangerous categories of legislation were to be avoided. Among these I hope cannot possibly be included a subject of this kind, in which such large public interests are at stake, and as to which substantially the same views are taken on both sides of the House by those who have considered the question. I simply throw this out as a suggestion to my right hon. Friend, and trust it will receive from him the consideration it deserves. With regard to the matter more immediately before the House—the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen), I think there is great force in the plea that he has made—which can hardly be viewed with jealousy or antagonism. If an inquiry is to be instituted, I think the Government should take care that the status quo is maintained while the inquiry is progressing. Obviously, the House would be placed in a false position, and would be exposed to just criticism and censure for want of foresight, if, when we are going to inquire whether it is or is not desirable to do a certain thing, we should leave the door open for those who may forestall the decision of the House by instantly establishing those houses of business in London. To that extent, at any rate, I hope that my right hon. Friend (Mr. Goschen), while meeting the Government in the most conciliatory spirit in the inquiry they suggest, will adhere to his proposal that the status quo should be preserved. Indeed, I anxiously hope that we shall hear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that, in view of the investigation he suggests, it is reasonable and right that this precaution should be adopted.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, that while the Scotch banks had exceeded their limit of issue by £3,600,000, the English banks were £1,100,000 within the limit, from the fear of the heavy penalties they would incur by exceeding it. The English banks in the North of England had no fear of competition, provided it were conducted on fair and equitable terms; but the competition to which they had recently been subjected in Cumberland by the Scotch bankers was neither the one nor the other. The Scotch banks had peculiar privileges, and when they came to England and exercised those privileges against the English country banks which had no such privileges, great injustice was necessarily committed. When the Scotch boasted that they had covered the whole of the country with banks, it must be remembered that if a bank in Cumberland wished to start a branch, they could not do so without locking up a large portion of their capital; whereas a Scotch bank could start tentative branches without locking up any capital at all. It was said that the Scotch bankers did not seek to issue their notes in England. Virtually, however, there would be a £1-note issue in England, and even last year in Carlisle £100,000 in £1-notes were paid over the counter of the banks there. This was a question between banks of issue with great and peculiar privileges and banks of issue without those privileges. The question was asked—"Why not object to the establishment here of foreign, colonial, or Indian banks?" The answer was, that these banks competed with the English banks upon fair terms, whereas, as he had observed, the Scotch banks came here with peculiar privileges. These privileges were conferred upon the Scotch banks in 1845, on account of the poverty of the people, and the great advantage which it was alleged would accrue to them if they had a larger note circulation. Now, as the fruit of these privileges, the Scotch banks had more money than they could lend in Scotland; but it was never intended that they should cross the Border and compete with English banks upon unfair terms. He did not see why inquiry should preclude a more immediate remedy, because, otherwise, if time were allowed to pass, legislation would become increasingly difficult.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I am fully impressed with the perfect equity of the Bill which has been introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen). I am likely to feel this, because I remember the debates on the Acts of 1844 and 1845. In those discussions I took the part of the country bankers, who felt—and, I thought, justly felt—aggrieved by the stern restrictions which the Act of 1844 imposed upon the powers of issue. It appears to me that if it were right that those powers should then be so severely restricted, it is only right now to protect those who are so restricted against this invasion of Scotch bankers. It appears, therefore, to me a matter of sheer justice, that we should now prevent the extension to England of the monopoly which was granted to the Scotch bankers for public reasons in 1845. But I observe that this question is about to assume far larger dimensions than at first appeared; for, limited as is the scope of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman, it is announced by the Government, and the proposal is supported by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), that this is a favourable opportunity for the State to assume the exclusive power of issuing notes in the United Kingdom. That is a question of the deepest and widest importance; and I would entreat the House, when that question is raised by persons of such weight and authority, to consider well the history of the currency and of the Banking Acts of this country before it lends itself to the sanction of any further steps towards the policy of the late Sir Robert Peel, beyond the point to which he was able to carry that policy. The step now contemplated is one which, if the late Sir Robert Peel ever thought it prudent, he never actually proposed, a measure which he never thought his own powerful Government in 1844 capable of enforcing. Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich will not, I am sure, think I am likely to overlook the fact, that there has been a great change in the relations of money to the prices of labour, and of produce, and of property of all kinds since 1844. My firm belief is, that had it not been for the subsequent great additions to the circulating medium of the world, by the discoveries of gold, our Banking Act of 1844, and the system of commercial policy founded concurrently with the passing of that Act would have broken down. We had the failures of 1847, of 1857, and of 1866; and I am quite sure that, although it has been said that no house which did not deserve to fall did fall during these crises under the pressure of the action of the Bank of England, as dictated by the statute of 1844, that statement will not commend itself to any person, who remembers the circumstances. It is enough to say that the operation of the Banking Act of

Mr. Percy Wyndham

1844 has been twice interrupted, and that the right hon. Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), when Chancellor of the Exchequer, not only proposed a system by which these interruptions which were at these periods justified as exceptional, would become regular, since similar interruptions would have been organized as the standard method of relief for the future. I only touch upon these subjects in order to show how large a question has cropped up out of the very limited Bill now before us. It is now suggested that we should have an inquiry, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich tells us that he contemplates as a completion of the policy of Sir Robert Peel, that the State should take into its own hands the whole issue of the United Kingdom. I want to know what is meant by this contemplated intervention of the State; because the late Sir Robert Peel did not even propose that the issue of the Bank of England should be regulated by the State. The late Sir Robert Peel did not propose that the issues of the Bank of England, or of the English country banks, or of the banks of Scotland, or of Ireland, should be regulated by the State. On the contrary, he placed that function by law in the hands of that great corporation, the Bank of England, supplemented by the issues of the English country banks; he either suggested or suffered the continuance of the right of issue by the minor banks as well as those of the banks of Scotland, and he retained the same privilege for Ireland. This was not taking the issue of the country into the hands of the State, for that issue is committed by law to those banking corporations which have been thought worthy of the confidence of Parliament—Parliament representing the State. It is my belief that it would be most dangerous, considering the form of government in this country, and the constant changes in the depositories of power brought about by varying majorities in this House, for the State to have the regulation of the issue of notes; and that it is wiser and better that these issues should continue to be controlled by laws which are much more likely to be observed by banking corporations than by the Ministers of the day. The present system is this—We rely on the discretion of the banks of England,

Scotland, and Ireland, which have the privilege of issue. The issue of notes in this country is governed by commercial corporations, empowered by law and trusted by the State; and I believe that system is far safer for the interests of the people of England and far more consistent with their freedom than any gigantic system of issue in the hands of officers of the State. I did not intend to take part in this debate; but I beg hon. Gentlemen to remember the tremendous power and, possibly, pressure that may be brought to bear on the industry and production of this country by measures of this kind, as was manifested in 1824 and 1825 by the action of the Bank Act of 1819; to remember also the effect of the Act of 1844, which was the complement of the Act of 1819, and of the still further restrictions enacted in 1845 on the power of issuing notes, which produced or contributed to the panics of 1847, 1857, and 1866. If we are to carry these restrictions still further, I trust that Parliament will consider well before so doing the history of the effects of these disasters upon the Bank Acts. I view with no alarm the privilege of issue which the Scotch banks enjoy; on the contrary, under the wise and prudent management of those banks, that privilege of issue has contributed greatly to the prosperity of that country. If that privilege were now to be restricted in Ireland, we should lay the foundation of a grievance much more solid and real than most of those we hear so frequently advanced. It has been said in this debate that the principle adopted by the late Sir Robert Peel involves stern restrictions on the issue of notes; but, at the same time, favours the greatest freedom as regards banking. But I doubt whether in its unrestricted sense that was the opinion of Sir Robert Peel; because when the Bill of 1844 was in this House, I, on behalf of the country banks, proposed to extend to the Bank of England the power of issue from £14,000,000 on securities—its present issue, with perhaps the addition of another £1,000,000 taken up by the Bank of England when abandoned by certain provincial banks—to £22,000,000, as the limit. What was the answer of Sir Robert Peel? I am not likely to forget it. He said, that in order to secure the convertibility of the note—that is, the convertibility of the notes issued by the Bank of England—the power of the Bank of England to issue on securities must be limited, and he maintained that the Bank of England, while it had the right of issue, had also the right to continue its banking operations, but to conduct those banking operations with reference to the securities upon which the power to issue £14,000,000 of notes is based, and the total amount of gold in its coffers, which is affected by its banking operations. I have always held that, although it is very convenient for the information of the public, that the accounts of the issue and of the banking departments shall be kept separate, it is the credit of the whole establishment of the Bank of England on which the privilege of issuing notes is granted and founded. That the security for the whole operations of the bank is one and the same—they rest on the same basis. It is useful for business purposes, useful that the trader shall be able to regulate his transactions by being able to judge from the amount of bullion in the coffers of the Bank the probable state of exchange, and hence the probable operation of the Bank upon commercial transactions and trade; but I hold that the security for the whole of the operations of the Bank of England, whether of issue or of banking, is, in fact, positively and absolutely the same.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA, while feeling no difficulty in accepting the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) thought the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer preferable, as it was of wider scope. There were a great many difficulties and defects in the working of the Acts of 1844 and 1845, which had escaped general observation. The Committee should be prepared to deal with those difficulties and defects and to recommend a satisfactory solution, if the Acts were to be altered. The proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London that we should have a Suspensory Act to maintain the status quo, in order to prevent any bank from taking advantage of the present state of the law would to a large extent prejudice the case. He understood that the Scotch banks, which alone were feared by the right hon. Gentleman, were prepared, individually, to come under terms that they would not attempt to alter the status quo while the Committee was sitting. The Irish banks had been referred to, as if they enjoyed an advantage without paying for it, and as if a subsidy had been granted to them by the State. While admitting that any advantage enjoyed by one corporation and not by another was to a certain extent in the nature of a subsidy, he begged to say that the Irish banks paid the State for the advantage which they possessed. They paid 7s. per cent per annum on the total of their note circulation, although beyond a certain limit, that circulation was secured by specie which the banks were bound to retain. What he wished to impress on the House was, that the scope and powers of enquiry granted to the Committee should be as wide as possible, with a view to effect as nearly as could be done a satisfactory settlement of the question. He conceded that the right of issue should be in the hands of the State; but the State was in the habit of respecting vested interests, and he trusted that all the interests of the Irish and Scotch banks would be duly provided for in any legislation which might ensue.

MR. HANKEY said, it was evident from the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), which must have had great weight with the House, that in his opinion the time had come when the whole question must be dealt with, and if that were so, the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be insufficient. He (Mr. Hankey) could not conceive it possible that a Committee of that House, representing particular interests as that Committee must do, could possibly take that large and general view of the question which was required, and which could properly be taken only by Her Majesty's Government. Was it possible that a Committee of that House could enter upon the investigation proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer without going into the question of the circulation of the Bank of England? Suppose they entered into the question of currency, as established by the Act of 1844, and the position of the Bank of England with respect to it, could it be doubted what a large and important subject that would be? He did not want to overrate the importance of the Bank of England; but its issue formed so large a proportion of the currency, under the Act of 1844, that it was impossible for a Committee of that House, constituted as that Committee must be, to come to a satisfactory conclusion on the subject. If the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman the Member of Greenwich had any weight with the House and the Government, they must see that the Cabinet, and the Cabinet alone, could deal effectually with the question as a whole, for any attempt to treat it in a piecemeal fashion would not be satisfactory.

MR. BALFOUR said, he was afraid they were straying from the specific point before the House, and were losing themselves in generalities. He assumed that the Bill before the House and the whole agitation on the subject were based upon the grounds of public utility. One thing, however, was clear, and that was that if the English bankers were afraid of being damaged by their Scotch competitors, the Scotch were able to offer better terms to the public than the English could. Since that was so, it could hardly be contended that the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) was favourable to the interests of the public. He had received a circular asking him to vote for the Bill on the ground that his constituents were much interested in it; but the only persons who would be benefited by the measure were the shareholders of such English banks as were being thrust out of the market by Scotch banks. There were, however, two other grounds upon which the Bill was recommended; the first, the Act of 1844; and the second, the principle of justice. As for the first point, the Act of 1844 was not a Banking Act at all, but a Currency Act. The whole object of that Act was to make the currency safe and to place it above suspicion. But it could not be maintained that the presence of Scotch banks in England would throw any doubt upon the currency. As to the second point, any appeal to justice seemed rather to show that the present system was unjust. It was said that in Scotland the banks had taken advantage of the Act of 1845, and when they came to England they would use that advantage by cutting out those banks which were not similarly favoured. But nobody maintained that the banks in this country were on an equality;—there was a marked inequality: the Bank of England was itself a monopoly. Then it was urged, that the Scotch banks were subsidized, because they did not pay, like the Bank of England, any equivalent to the State for their powers of issue, and that the Scotch Banks were thus extracting from the country the whole interest of their note issue. Though that statement had been supported by high authority, he could not think it was well founded. On the contrary, in England, private banks of issue were really subsidized by the State, because none of them had any rival in the town in which it was established. That was not the case in Scotland. There, in each town, there were 10 or 11 rival banks, which reduced by their competition the profits to the lowest point on which the business could be carried on. Upon these grounds, he should think it his duty to oppose the Bill, not because he thought restriction or privilege was good, but because the result of the right hon. Gentleman's Bill would be that we should have all the disadvantages of increased restriction, and lose all the benefits which the public now derived from the privileges of the Scotch banks.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD said, he supported the Bill upon this plain and intelligible principle. He contended that where two rival banks existed, those banks should both be placed upon the same footing as regarded privileges, and that the one ought not to have any unfair advantage over the other. It was absurd for them to suppose that the Scotch banks were purely actuated by considerations for the public benefit. They were simply looking after themselves. Even supposing all existing monopolies were to be respected, he thought those monopolies ought not to be extended beyond the boundaries where they now existed. What were the facts under which the Bill came before them? The Act of 1845 gave the Scotch banks specially valuable and exclusive privileges—practically, a monopoly of banking business in Scotland, where they were protected against competition of any bank which could not issue notes. No such monopoly of banking existed in other parts of the Kingdom. To permit the extension of a monopoly was contrary to free trade and public policy. English banks of issue—only 174 out of 370 banks—might not issue £1 notes—by far the largest portion of the circulation where it was permitted—might not under a very heavy penalty exceed the authorized limit by even £5, and might not issue against gold. On the other hand, all existing Scotch banks had the privilege of £1 notes, and might issue against any stock of gold which they held. The result was that, while the English circulation steadily declined, the Scotch circulation, which was authorized to the extent of of £2,749,271, actually amounted to £5,862,215. They might form some idea of the enormous value of these monopoly privileges by considering, first of all, what was the profit on the authorized notes themselves; secondly, these notes, being payable in coin only at the head office, they could keep all their tills supplied with their own notes. There were 862 local bank offices in Scotland, and if each only required £5,000 they thus got the use of £4,310,000. Then, adding £200,000 each for 11 head offices and £2,700,000 authorized note circulation, they had £9,200,000, the interest on which at 3½ per cent was over £320,000. It was important to note the argument that if they kept gold against notes they could not get profit by it. But all banks in England, as well as in Scotland, must keep a certain amount of money in their tills. In England bankers were prohibited from making use of this. In Scotland they were permitted to make use of it, by issuing notes against it. These privileges were worth to the 11 banks which possessed them not less than £300,000 per annum. Surely it was an injustice and an anomaly that Scotch banks of issue were permitted to do business in London, while English banks of issue were absolutely prohibited from doing it at all? Surely it was an injustice to grant a monopoly worth £300,000 a-year to 11 banks, and then turn them loose into England to compete with banks which had no such privilege? This Bill had been represented as a Protectionist measure. It was really one aimed against Protection. Scotch banks were strongly protected. English banks—at least 200 out of 370—had no protection at all. English banks of issue were only very partially protected. The English banks merely asked that wherever trade was carried on, the law should give equal freedom to all who there carried on that trade. If the interests of the public required restrictions to be imposed, such restrictions should be equally imposed on all. If public policy permitted one of several banks competing in the same town to issue notes at its head office, the other banks competing in the same town should be also permitted to issue notes at their head offices. If, on the contrary, public policy required that the issue of £1 notes and issue against gold should be forbidden to the one, they should be equally forbidden to the other. But it was said—Why complain of Scotland, and not of Ireland and the Colonies? In Ireland two banks only had offices in England. One was merely an agency; the other had no branches in the country, and was only doing banking business in London, where its head office was. Foreign and colonial banks did not compete for banking business in England. They were more merchant bankers than bankers, having no monopoly powers conferred by the British Legislature. This Bill did not seek to prevent any Scottish bank having a London agency. He should not oppose the reference of the whole of this subject to a Select Committee; but, as it was a most grave and complicated question, he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would make that Committee as fair as possible, and large enough to include representatives of all class interests.

MR. ANDERSON said, that as he had an Amendment on the Paper, the House would expect him to make a few remarks. The excellent speech they had just heard from the hon. Member for Plymouth (Mr. Sampson Lloyd) would have been a very a good speech if its object had been to advocate the removal of restrictions from English bankers; but it was in no sense a good argument for removing the privileges enjoyed by Scotch banks. He would himself have no objection to assist in removing the restrictions on English banks; but he objected to imposing them on the banks of Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) had set the example of opening up a very much larger question than the Bill dealt with, and other hon. Members had followed his example, notably the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newbould) had made an able speech, which would, however, have been more appropriate as a contribution to the Currency debate of the previous evening. He should like to return to the Bill immediately before the House, and in doing so, he could not avoid expressing his surprise and regret that a Liberal ex-Cabinet Minister of a Free Trade Government should be found lending his position and influence to a small knot of London bankers, for the purpose of bringing in a Bill to create new restrictions, and a new monopoly, rather than a Bill for doing away with the restrictions which already existed. This Bill was founded on a complaint that English issue banks could not come within 65 miles of London. That was the real secret of it, as was shown by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich when he said the question had never been answered, whether it was fair that English banks should be prevented from coming within 65 miles of London, whilst Scotch and Irish banks were allowed to come to London? Well, he admitted it was not fair; but how should the unfairness be got rid of? Why, by removing the restrictions from English bankers. Any free-trader who wanted to get rid of a monopoly would adopt that plan, instead of taking away the privileges of the Scotch bankers. That was why he complained of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London, as a professed Free Trader and Liberal ex-Cabinet Minister, bringing in such a Bill as that. He had, however, been pleased to hear the right hon. Gentleman so well rebuked by the speech of his late Colleague in the Cabinet, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair). The Bill had two aspects, and he did not think they had been sufficiently separated from each other. In one aspect it was a question affecting the Scotch banks of issue as against the English banks of issue, and in its other aspect it affected the non-issuing banks. With regard to the English banks of issue, there was nothing to prevent them going to Scotland, backed by their issue, and establishing branches there, any more than there was to prevent a Scotch bank, backed by its own issue, coming into England. Neither one nor the other took their issue with them. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London had said that if an English bank went into Scotland to establish a branch, it must begin by subsidizing some Scotch bank, and getting the use of its notes, on which it would pay that bank a profit. That was an entire fallacy. The Scotch bank issue was at present something above £6,000,000. Its legal authorized issue without gold was only £2,700,000; therefore every penny of the authorized issue had been exhausted long ago, and on the extra issue, for which they had to keep gold, they made not a penny profit; so that if the English banks did go and use the Scotch bankers' notes, they would not be giving those bankers a farthing profit. The same thing held good in reference to competition in London by Scotch banks. The latter, having fully used up their issue at home, had already got all the profit they could have from it, and it did not assist them in their business with the English banks in London. More than that, he proposed to show that in this matter the Scotch banks were not aggressors. They had been told it was an omission in the Act of 1844 that the same restrictions were not placed upon Scotch as upon English banks; but those restrictions were created not by the Act of 1844, but by an Act of 1826, and was it to be thought that that Act, creating the 65 mile radius, would have been allowed to go on till 1844 without somebody discovering the omission, if it had been an omission, and endeavouring to get it rectified then? That was hardly credible when they knew they had so many English bankers watching all these clauses. The Royal Bank of Scotland was prohibited by its Charter from coming to England, until in 1873 it brought in a private Bill with the consent of the Bank of England, and the consent of a great many of the London bankers, to remove those restrictions and allow it to establish a bank in London; and was it to be believed, if it was intended to put a restriction on Scotch banks, that the English bankers would have allowed a special Act to be passed? Would they not have said—"The Scotch bankers ought to be under the same restrictions as the English bankers, and should not have any special privileges." That Act, given with the consent of the Bank of England, was enough to condemn the present Bill, even if there was nothing gested that there should be a Suspensory Bill proposed. That he objected to. The Scotch bankers would object to it altogether. In the first place, a Suspensory Bill would rob them of the right they possessed by law; and, in the next place, the action of the House of Commons in passing such a law would be a censure on Scotch bankers. It would be saying that Scotch bankers, in coming to London, had done that which was illegal and improper. If it was desired, Scotch bankers would be willing to agree with Government to preserve the status quo, but would not suffer a Suspensory Act to prevent them from doing a thing which they had a perfectly legal right to do.

MR. BIRLEY said, he thought the supporters of the Bill had just grounds for the course they had taken. Could there be any doubt that the Scotch banks at present enjoyed a large and valuable monopoly? In 1846 there were 19 joint stock banks in Scotland—there were now 11. It was impossible to find more conclusive evidence that a great and powerful monopoly existed. It was quite clear that that far-seeing statesman Sir Robert Peel, foresaw what would occur when he said the Act of 1845 would have the effect of conferring a monopoly on them, and that an exclusive power would be given to these banks which was not given to banks in other parts of the country. The banks in the North of England were not afraid of free competition in banking. They did not ask for an exclusive privilege. They were not banks of issue; they simply carried on the ordinary business of banking; but the power which the Scotch banks had in the issue of their £1 notes was so great, that give them only time, and they might take possession of the whole southern part of the island. If they did so much upon their comparatively barren hills, what would they not do on the fruitful pastures of England. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had stated that he should not be surprised if a Scotch bank were established at John o'Groat's; he (Mr. Birley) should not be surprised if one were established at the Land's End. He gave the Scotch bankers every credit for remarkable talent and energy; but he asserted, without the fear of serious contradiction, that if they came here without their rights of issue, English banks would be perfectly able to maintain an equal contest. The Scotch banks derived great advantages from the Bank of England, and from the accumulation of gold in the southern part of the island. If, as had been stated, the question of issue had nothing to do with banking, let the two be separated, leaving issue as much as possible under the control of the Government, and the business of banking to private competition. The Scotch banks combined the two, and that gave them an overwhelming power over their competitors. Taking the whole thing together, he could not but think the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London, whatever might be its defects, was founded on sound principles, and that the only way in which it could be settled, would be to deal with the whole question by a Select Committee, a course which if decided on, he should not oppose.

MR. LEVESON-GOWER said, it did not seem to him that the measure was so large as many hon. Members appeared to imagine. He should have thought from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) that his proposal was to deal with the banking monopoly of Scotland, or, at all events, to have some inquiry on the subject. But, so far as he could make out, his Bill had nothing whatever to do with the monopoly of Scotland. His (Mr. Leveson-Gower's) objection to the Bill was founded on the principle of free trade. As a free trader, he felt it was their duty to consult the interest of the public generally, and not of individuals or classes. The language of the circular which had been freely distributed among hon. Members by the promoters of this Bill reminded him very much of the representations which had been urged against free trade—that such and such interests were not afraid of competition, provided that competition was not unfair. Competition was always said to be unfair where advantages were offered to the public superior to those which the complaining interests could themselves afford. That was invariably the case where the competition originated in a foreign source. For instance, take the case of the agriculturist, where it was said the foreigner could export untaxed. Take the case of the paper-makers, who said they would never have feared the competition of France, except that the exportation of rags was prohibited. He wished to secure the advantage for the public which it was well known the Scotch banks afforded. Now, he did not defend monopoly, but he did not think it fair to taunt Scotland with monopoly. That monopoly was not the production of Scotland, and it was therefore unfair to tax her with it. He was, therefore, disappointed at the course taken by the Government, for he thought they ought either to have supported or opposed the Bill on its merits. It had been forced on Scotland most unwillingly, and the only reason why Scotland did not oppose it with greater success was the bribe which was offered to the existing banks. Then it was said Scotch bankers were enormously wealthy. Surely that was a reason why the English community should profit by it. Why should they not take advantage of the great knowledge which had been brought into use for the benefit of this country? He hoped the Government would make perfectly distinct what was the nature of the proposed inquiry, because there was still considerable doubt on that subject. He would like to know whether they were merely to inquire what legal objections there were to the establishment of these banks, or whether they were going into the whole question of currency. Were they to go into the disabilities of the English bankers, the monopoly enjoyed by Scotchmen, and the whole question of Government issue? Because if they were to have an inquiry of that sort, he did not think that a Committee of that House was the proper body to conduct it. An hon. Member had suggested that the Representatives of the large commercial towns should be upon the Committee. Many hon. Gentleman who would be admirable witnesses would be very bad judges. He did not suppose any Commission could be appointed which did not include persons who entertained some previous opinion upon this subject, but persons could be appointed who would easily surrender their opinions. If hon. Members of the House who represented large commercial towns were appointed, they could not surrender their opinions.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had referred particularly to the case of the agriculturists and paper-makers; but what the English bankers complained of here was, that disabilities were placed on them by their own Legislature. They could not help what other countries did, but they had a right to ask for equal justice at the hands of their own Parliament. The hon. Member for Glasgow recommended the removal of the restrictions on English banks; but he did not think that Parliament was prepared to give to English banks the right of issuing £1 notes. The question raised by the Bill was whether it was desirable in the public interest that a monopoly should be increased in area and in value. It had, indeed, been said that the Bill was an attack upon free trade in banking; but, so far from that being the case, the supporters of the Bill were contending for free trade, while the opponents were endeavouring to uphold and extend a monopoly. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) had said that the measure had been instigated by a knot of London bankers. Speaking in the presence of a great number of country bankers, he felt sure they would all confirm him when he said that this matter was first of all taken up by the National Provincial Bank—which had recently surrendered a circulation amounting to £400,000 for the privilege of coming to London—then by other country banks, and it was only when these pressed the matter on the attention of the London bankers, that the latter took up the question. Several hon. Members had spoken as if this matter specially affected London bankers; but, in fact, the North Country bankers were those most immediately interested in the question. Had the Scotch banks a monopoly? It was no doubt true that, technically, the monopoly only existed in Scotland; but if you had two sets of banks in a country—one set with a monopoly of one half of the country, and able also to extend into the other half—it was obvious that they possessed so great an advantage as to render competition almost impossible. It was true that some of the English banks had the privilege of issuing notes, but on much less favourable terms than those enjoyed by the Scotch banks. Moreover, while the Scotch bank circulation had greatly increased since 1845, that of the English country banks, which was £9,000,000 in 1845, had now fallen to an average of about £5,000,000. Again, the English right of issue was exercised under such restrictions that it had no appreciable effect in preventing the establishment of new banks. That the legislation of 1845 had practically given the Scotch banks a monopoly of Scotch banking business could not be denied. The Economist, in a recent and very able article in support of the Bill, truly said that the law had given them "one of the greatest benefits which legislation ever conferred—the absolute monopoly of the deposits and of the business of banking in Scotland." Since 1845, though many banks had been successfully started in England, and attempts had been made to do the same in the North, not one of them had succeeded, and in 33 years not one new bank had been established in Scotland. Sir Robert Peel himself, in the debates on his Bill of 1845, described the measure as practically "a prohibition against the establishment of competing banks of issue;" and said—"I have protected the Scotch banks from competition." When Sir Robert Peel introduced his Bill, there were 19 Scotch banks, whereas now there were only 11; in fact, banking in Scotland was a sort of tontine. The Scotch banks considered that the law permitted them to come to England. His opinion on such a point was of no value. But he thought it was inconceivable that, while thus conferring such privileges on the Scotch banks, Sir Robert Peel should have meant to allow them to come into England and compete with English banks for English business. It was incredible that Sir Robert Peel did not anticipate that the Scotch banks would open branches in England if they could, since geologists told us that even the fossil footsteps of the extinct animals on the Scotch rocks point southwards. Sir Robert Peel certainly considered that he had subjected the Scotch banks to the same restrictions as had been imposed upon English bankers. In one of his speeches he enumerated the privileges he had conferred on the Scotch banks, which were denied to the English banks of issue. Now, if he had meant to give them the privilege of coming to London without surrendering their issues, he would have alluded to the subject at that time. But more than this, in one speech he expressly objected to the introduction of the Scotch system into England. Several hon. Members having spoken in terms of high praise of the Scotch system, Sir Robert, in reply, admitted the fact with some qualifications, but he added—

"I say, Sir, that if there were the same system of banking in England as in Scotland, everything would be ruined. . . . The security of the system which prevails in Scotland rests in the amount of gold in England, and it is this which enables Scotland to dispense with an amount of bullion in proportion to its circulation."—[3 Hansard, lxxxi. 147.]

If any hon. Member disputed Sir Robert Peel's dictum, he (Sir John Lubbock) would ask his attention to the following facts:—The liabilities of the 11 Scotch banks, as stated in Mr. Somers's recent work, which was easily accessible to hon. Members, and written in the interests of the Scotch banks, were £82,503,000. The amount of gold held against this immense liability was, however, only £3,324,000. But more than that, the amount of notes then in circulation was returned as £5,300,000, while the authorized circulation was £2,700,000. The Scotch banks, therefore, were bound to hold £2,500,000 of gold against their notes. Out of the total of £3,300,000, therefore, £2,500,000 was held against the notes, and only £800,000 against deposits and acceptances amounting to £79,000,000. It was perfectly obvious that if it were not for the gold in England, the Scotch system could not be maintained for a moment. Under any circumstances, the Scotch banks must hold some reserve against their immense liabilities. This could not well be less than it was, so that in reality the Scotch banks enjoyed a practically unlimited right of issue, and under these circumstances any permanent competition between the English and Scotch banks was out of the question. It must be remembered that the value of the Scotch circulation was by no means to be limited to the £2,700,000 of authorized issue. The Scotch banks had 862 branches, and if it was not for their peculiar privileges, they would have to hold, say £5,000 of currency at each, making in all £4,300,000. Add to this £2,200,000 for the 11 head offices, and we had the sum of £6,500,000, which, added to the authorized issue of £2,700,000, made an amount of £9,000,000, which, at 4 per cent, was equivalent to £350,000 a-year. But even this calculation did not represent the full extent of their privileges. Any one who compared the published Returns of the English and Scotch circulations, bearing in mind the absence of £1 notes in England, would see at a glance that the Scotch Returns gave the minimum and not the average circulation of the Scotch banks. They did not, therefore, represent the true state of the case. He did not say that they were not true at the moment to which they referred, but they did not indicate the average condition. It might naturally be supposed that, having such great privileges and advantages, the Scotch banks would do business on very cheap terms; and, in fact, some hon. Members had hinted to him that the North Country banks deprecated this competition on that account. But what were the facts? Mr. Somers, in his work, gave the average rates of interest for the years 1868 to 1872, and in every case the English rate was lower, and in some cases considerably lower, than the Scotch rate. The Scotch banks enjoyed not only a subsidy, but a monopoly. As Sir Robert Peel truly said, he had protected the Scotch banks from competition, and if by the effect of law that House prevented English banks from going to Scotland, surely it ought also to prevent Scotch banks from coming to England. In reference to the former contingency, they had been told that the Oriental Bank had a branch in Edinburgh; but he believed that the staff employed there simply consisted of a man and a boy, and that it was opened as an agency for the benefit of their Indian shareholders in Scotland, and no real banking business was done there. The case of colonial and other banks coming to London had been referred to, but none of these transacted banking business in the English sense of the word. It was no doubt true that in this matter the House must look principally to the public interests; but it did appear to him that the extension of a monopoly could not in the long run be for the public interest. It must be remembered that this was not merely a question affecting private bankers; there were more than 50,000 shareholders in joint-stock banks whose property would be prejudicially affected for the benefit of the 15,000 shareholders in Scotch banks. The monopoly enjoyed by the Scotch banks enabled them to make any charges they pleased on cheques

and bills payable in Scotland. For instance, if a Scotch bank received a cheque or bill payable in any English town, it received the full amount in London. While, on the contrary, if an English bank had to collect a cheque or bill payable in Scotland, the Scotch bank always charged a commission for paying it. As regarded the circulation of £1 notes, although it might be true that the Scotch bankers would not bring their £1 notes with them, yet their notes would follow them, if they were to have branches established in England; and if they were to have a circulation of £1 notes in England, let it be after careful consideration and discussion in that House, and let it not be altogether to the advantage of one set of bankers, for it was surely unfair to this country that the advantage of such a circulation should be enjoyed by the Scotch banks alone. Since the passing of the Act of 1845, the Scotch banks had diminished in number from 19 to 11, and surely these 11 had an ample field in Scotland for their energy and their capital. It had been deemed to be for the national advantage to maintain a gold circulation in the country; but though, no doubt, the advantage of that was great, the expense was very heavy, and was thrown almost entirely on England. Under those circumstances, he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would accede to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London, and bring in a Suspensory Bill. In moving for a Select Committee, he practically admitted prima facie that there was a case for the Bill then before the House. Surely, then, it would be only fair and wise to keep matters in statu quo, until Parliament should have had time to deal with the matter. The English banks could not, and did not, object to any fair competition; they did ask Parliament that it should be on equal terms. They submitted that the Scotch banks were in possession of a monopoly, and that to permit the extension of a monopoly was unjust in itself, contrary to the public interests, and to the whole principles of our commercial policy.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, that that House was the acknowledged redresser of grievances, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) had propounded a very serious grievance. He (Mr. Hubbard) would indicate what in his opinion was the grievance, who were injured by it, and what was the remedy. The grievance complained of on the part of the bankers of London and of the provinces was, that the Scotch banks had by law a privilege of issue which could not be enjoyed by any new comers, and that the circulation of £1 notes gave to them a large advantage in carrying on their ordinary banking operations. With the exception of the notoriety which the issue gave to the Scotch banks, he declined to admit that the mere fact of issue gave to the banker, who was the issuer, any advantage in the conduct of his ordinary deposit business. If the issue were unlimited, the case would be entirely different, and undoubtedly the banker would then have a very advantageous monopoly. At present he could not see that the operation of this power on the part of Scotch banks incapacitated them from demanding the free use of their capital in the ordinary process of banking and of their deposits. It was quite true that the operations of the Scotch banks were not confined to the other side of the Cheviots, but extended to this side of the Border, and that £1 notes were found circulating in Cumberland and Westmoreland. He admitted that was a grievance; but he asked again, who was injured by this grievance? He could not himself think that the London bankers were pecuniarily injured by the action of these Scotch banks. Undoubtedly, so far as having greater power, wealth, and credit were concerned, the Scotch banks were formidable competitors of the English bankers; but who would suppose that in that year of grace 1875, the London bankers would be frightened at the introduction of capital into their own business? Did they not see constantly in the City of London, some of those ancient firms, whose names were coeval with the greatness of the City, endeavouring by the conjunction of their capital to ensure a larger amount of credit and acceptances with those whose custom they sought to get? So far, therefore, as the exaggeration of the power and wealth of the Scotch banks went, he could not as a disinterested spectator admit that the English bankers had any grievance as against them; but he admitted that the exercise by these Scotch banks of the right of issue, and especially the issue of

£1 notes, was an exceptional feature in the system of currency instituted in 1844 and 1845, and did constitute a grievance. But who were the sufferers? The whole nation, for the Scotch banks were not so much monopolists as usurpers of the Royal Prerogative. They were exercising on the other side of the Border that which was the special function of the Crown—that function, which ought to be exercised for the advantage of the Exchequer, in the interests of the whole people of England, was exercised by a knot of something less than a dozen Scotch banks. That was an anomaly. It was an invasion of the rights of the nation, which had been tolerated for a period of 30 years. But he quite agreed with the view that had been expressed, that this state of things was never intended by Sir Robert Peel to be a permanent adjustment of the currency question. He judged so from the different manner in which Sir Robert Peel dealt with those with whom, at the moment, he had the power to deal. How did he deal with the Bank of England in 1844? A distinct compact, the Bank Act of that year enabled the Bank of England to issue paper to the extent of £15,000,000, and the Bank of England was required to pay £200,000 a-year to the State as due to it in virtue of that prerogative; while, at the same time, only £80,000 a-year was paid to the State in respect of all the other issues of the country. He was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) say that that was an opportune moment for taking up once for all the great question of the prerogative of coining, and seeing whether they could not bring it into a position more in accordance with the public rights of the country. There was, however, one point on which he could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman. Speaking clearly and distinctly of the right of the State, the right hon. Gentleman went on to make a suggestion, that as a temporary arrangement the Bill should be accepted, and a restraint put on the Scotch banks, pending the investigation about to be entered upon. He (Mr. Hubbard) must say that he most humbly but most earnestly protested against the adoption of that suggestion. It was not the duty of that House, nor was it in accordance with English principle to level inequalities by adding new restraints. If the London banks were so fettered hand and foot that they could not compete with Scotch banks, it was not the business of the House to put handcuffs and chains upon the Scotch banks, but to take them off the English banks. He was in favour of universal liberty, not of universal coercion, and he did not think the circumstances of which London bankers complained were any justification for the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. He trusted that Her Majesty's Government would stand distinctly to the position which they had taken. He understood them to oppose the second reading of this measure. After having listened attentively to the debate he felt it his duty to vote against it; but he most earnestly recommended Her Majesty's Government to accept the other suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, and to take the present great and favourable opportunity for reviewing the whole question, with a view to adjust it to the interests of the trading community, and restoring to the Crown a function which ought never to have been in abeyance.

MR. D. DAVIES said, his opinion was, that the bankers might very well be left to fight out this matter among themselves. He was not a banker, nor had he a shilling of interest in any bank; but he wished to call the attention of the House to one point which had not been alluded to by any previous speaker. It was, that as regarded the question of competition, banking as a trade stood in a very different position from that of any other business, such as shipping, and matters connected with railways. He did not offer any opinion as to whether they had already in England too much competition in banking, but he thought they had got quite enough of it, for it seemed as if its only result was to make some people rich who were rich enough already. There was this objection to free banking and to Scotch banks coming to London, that when the competition was great, every bank was anxious to use its surplus money, and that money was often used in making advances on rotten securities, and in the end that brought down the just with the unjust, the holy with the sinner. In 1864 a great many finance companies were brought out, which were practically banks. They advanced money on rotten securities, and the effect of that was, that they blew themselves up, blew up the people to whom they lent the money, blew up a great many honest men, and injured thousands more. How many, in fact, had they killed, of whom it might be said they could never be revived? He thought it was not for the interests of banks to issue notes. What was the paper they issued? Nothing more nor less than a mortgage on the little capital they had, and the deposits were already a sufficient mortgage upon it. He had confidence in the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and hoped he would apply the brake, and see the safety valve right, as long as he remained in office, for we were inclined to go too fast, and that was more injurious than going too slow.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he wished to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the condition in which the Scotch banks would be placed during the inquiry which it was proposed to institute. It had been suggested that something should be done to keep up the status quo. He believed that the House was entirely of that opinion, and that the Scotch banks themselves were quite willing to assent to it; but there were some circumstances in the passing of a Suspensory Bill which made them, he thought, not unjustly opposed to the proposal. As the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) had pointed out, the passing of a Suspensory Bill would convey the idea that the banks had done something which was wrong, while what they had done was acknowledged on all sides to be within the law. In fact, one bank had the direct sanction of Parliament for the step which it had taken. It would, therefore, be rather unfair to place upon these banks the imputation which the passing of a Suspensory Bill would imply. He believed the Scotch bankers were all perfectly willing to declare that they would not extend their business or establish new branches while the inquiry lasted, and he thought such a declaration should be accepted, instead of placing any legislative veto upon them. At the same time, he trusted that some period would be put to the inquiry of the Committee, because as every Member would go into it with a foregone conclusion, the work might go on year after year, and any prolonged delay would be unfair to those banks which had not exercised their right to come to England, and which would, during the inquiry, remain at a disadvantage as competitors with their neighbours who had exercised that right. If the status quo was to be maintained, some limit should be put to the sitting of the Committee. The Scotch banks would have no objection to go on as at present for two or three years.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think, Sir, that those who have been present at the discussion must feel that a great deal of light has been thrown upon a very complicated and important subject, and, although some persons may be disposed to look upon the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) as raising a very small point, or as being simply designed to protect the interests of one particular class in the community against another, yet all who have attended to the debate must feel that the question he has opened is a very large one, and one which presents many aspects beyond what at first appeared. I will not enter at any great length into many of the subjects which have been raised in the discussion, but there are two or three points upon which, before we proceed to a division, I should like to indicate on the part of the Government their views as to the course to be taken. The questions before us may be taken in this way—First, whether there is a case; and, secondly, if there is a case, in what direction we should look for a remedy? Then, do we need inquiry; and, if so, what is the proper form of reference; and, lastly, should we pass a measure in the nature of a Suspensory Bill? Those are the practical points to be decided. First, as to the question whether there is a case. It seems to me that the case originally made out by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the Member for the City of London, although it is said he has not made out his position, shows that there is by general consent some inequality which ought to be recognized, and which does deserve the attention and consideration of Parliament, with a view to see whether a remedy is not required, and what that remedy should be. Some time ago the representatives of the English country banks came to me and laid before me, with a view to some action on the part of the Government, the position in which they were placed. I admitted that the position was one which they must naturally and reasonably feel to be embarrassing and unfair, for there was truth in the argument that under the existing state of things the competition which they were called upon to maintain with the Scotch banks was not a purely fair and even competition. But it is not unequal in the sense understood by the hon. Member for Bodmin (Mr. Leveson-Gower). The English bankers do not ask simply to be protected against the Scotch; for if they had, the Government would have said—"Gentlemen, whatever is the case with regard to yourselves, the public interest is not concerned, and we have nothing further to do in the matter." The case of the English bankers is, that the competition is not an equal one, because in fact a subsidy is given on the part of Parliament to one of the competitors. It becomes, therefore, something more than a battle of the gauges, so to speak, between English and Scotch banks. It becomes a matter in which the propriety of the conduct of Parliament is called in question in respect to the unfair advantage alleged to have been given by it to one of the competing parties. It has been contended that it is not a subsidy, because all the advantages are given to the Scotch banks in Scotland, and they do not carry these advantages into England. We need not, however, go fully into the question, which has been amply debated. The statement of the case is clear. I will illustrate it by saying it resembles the case of two steamship companies plying to a distant part of the world, of which one has a subsidy to a certain point—say to the Cape—and the other has no subsidy at all. As between England and the Cape we should say the one has an advantage, but beyond that point both are free, and may compete as they please. The unsubsidized company say—"Yes; but you give our rivals the advantage on one side of the Cape, which enables them to compete with us unfairly on the other." This is the case which the English bankers make—namely, that the advantages given to the banks in Scotland enable them to compete unfairly with the banks in England. Assuming, then, that there is a case of inequality, is it one in which the Government are bound to interfere, and, if so, in what manner? In the first place, the first thing I have to look to is, whether the public interests are involved. Having done so, it seems to me that it is a matter in which—although it does not appear so at first—public interests are deeply involved, and that by whatever step we may take we may be laying the ground for important measures hereafter. Therefore, it behoves us to be exceedingly careful as to the first step, for we ought to foresee to what it may lead us. I have also to consider some of the complications which have arisen. One of these arises from the surrender by the National Provincial Bank of its issue; another from the admission to London of the Royal Bank of Scotland in 1873, by an Act of Parliament sanctioned by the late Government for removing an obstruction which prevented its coming here; another, as to the position of the Irish banks, one of which has been admitted into the Clearing House by the London bankers themselves; and there are questions with regard to other transactions which have taken place, all of which require to be minutely and carefully weighed before one can decide what will be the just and proper line of action. Beyond that comes the question, in what direction are we to seek for a remedy? An inequality between two parties may be removed by two modes—either by placing restrictions on one party, or by removing restrictions from the other. The discussion this afternoon resolves itself into the question, which of these two courses is the more proper for the House to take? It seems the easiest plan to say—if the Scotch banks come to England, they must surrender the privileges in Scotland which give them an unfair advantage. But that is, to my mind, a very unsatisfactory solution, and one that I will not say we may not be driven to, but which I shall accept with great reluctance, because it is rather in the direction of restriction than of freedom. The Government accept in the fullest manner the principles of the legislation of 1844 and 1845, and on such a question—as that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich speaks with an authority superior even to his ordinary authority on all questions of finance and currency, because to a great extent the right hon. Gentleman knew the mind of Sir Robert Peel, and was a Member of the Government which originated the legislation of those years. It is therefore a great satisfaction to me to hear from the right hon. Gentleman the complete confirmation of the view which I have always taken of the intention and meaning of that legislation. I understand that that meaning is this—to make a clear distinction between the two great principles of issue and of banking—to put the currency or issue under proper regulations, on the assumption that the privilege of issue belongs to the State, and that the State exercises that right of issue in such a manner as may be most for the convenience and interests of the public. At the same time, with regard to banking, the principle is, that competition should be free, and that no restriction which the State can impose can be so advantageous to the public as free banking. But I have also understood that although these were the principles which Sir Robert Peel laid down as the basis of his legislation, yet he found himself unable, from various circumstances, to carry them to their proper results. He found it impossible for the State to exercise the right of issue for its own profit, and he was obliged to leave that power to some extent in the hands of the bankers. On the other hand, he counterbalanced the privilege thus conferred by restrictions on the banking system. I believe this to be the truth of the case—that as far as England at least was concerned, Sir Robert Peel looked forward to the time when the provincial issues would be absorbed, and would come into the hands of the Bank of England as the agent of the State. He made certain provisions to meet the interval, and imposed restrictions on the country banks, partly to protect, but partly also to restrain their issue, and to render it their interest to make arrangements for disposing of it which might be satisfactory to all parties. In the same way, certain provisions were made which were regarded by Sir Robert Peel as of a temporary character with regard to the Scotch and Irish banks of issue. There were, however, considerations connected with those countries which made those provisions of a somewhat more durable character than those which applied to England. There is, for instance, that great question of the difference of the amount of the note, which now stands on a different footing in Scotland from what it does in England, and which introduces a very serious complication into the questions we have to deal with. Well, then, how are we to deal with the restrictions that now exist? Suppose we wanted to do away with all these restrictions. Two questions would then arise—first, can you with safety, and consistently with the principles of the currency, do away with any, or all the existing restrictions? If you cannot, ought you, in order to get rid of the restrictions, to make any change with regard to the principles on which you have allowed the currency to remain in the hands of private issuers? These are questions of great magnitude and importance, and it is not desirable that a Government with a great deal of other business on its hands should take them up without first preparing the public mind and endeavouring to ascertain public opinion upon the subject, in order to see how far it is possible and desirable to go. It therefore appeared to my Colleagues and myself that the time is not favourable to our commencing any legislation; but, at the same time, we feel most fully the truth that the responsibility of proposing any legislation on the subject, when the time is ripe for it, must ultimately rest with the Government of the day. I have been twitted with allowing this matter to be taken up by a private Member. I have always said for the Government and myself that the question can never be settled permanently by any one but the Government. There is, however, a great difference between a permanent settlement of the question, and its opening by a private Member, and the appointment of a Committee of Inquiry, which would be desirable before the Government could with any hope of success bring forward a measure to give effect to their convictions. The effect of this discussion, and of the pains that will be taken by the Committee to elicit the facts, will be of very great advantage to Parliament in any legislation which may result therefrom. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) intimated some doubt whether there was any necessity for inquiry by a Select Committee. If I were disposed to be personal, I might quote his own authority against himself; because on the last important discussion when the attention of the Government was called to the subject in 1865, the right hon. Gentleman brought forward, and very nearly passed, a measure dealing with the provincial issues, and when on the third reading he was obliged to withdraw the Bill, he said—

“Her Majesty’s Government, however, do not propose to abandon their intention of prosecuting the subject, and, in the absence of such an agreement as I have referred to [between the Government and country bankers] they may conceive it to be their duty to take up the question on a future occasion upon broader grounds, and they reserve to themselves the power of determining whether it would or would not be right that on the first convenient opportunity, which I am not prepared to say will occur during the short remainder of the Session, they should invite the assistance of Parliament to investigate this subject by means of a Committee.”—[3 Hansard, clxxix. 1123-4.]

Now the same considerations that induced the right hon. Gentleman then to think it might be desirable to have a Committee weighed with us in considering what was the best course to be taken on the present occasion. I do not imagine that any Select Committee would be able to devise, nor is there any intention that they should devise, a Code of Currency Legislation. What I ask the House to do is, to assist us by means of a Committee to investigate the question and to bring the facts fairly before the public, so as to remove doubts, and that we may have the subject fully discussed before we attempt to legislate upon it. We have been told by my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General (Mr. Stephen Cave), in the commencement of the discussion, that there is a question even as to the law of the case. That is not one of the most important points, perhaps, but it may be worth while that it should be made clear, because, while I am not prepared to say that the Scotch banks are not within the letter of the law in what they are doing, I have seen some opinions, given by persons of no inconsiderable authority, throwing great doubt upon their being in that position. My attention has also been called to this curious fact—that in the year 1849, four years after the passing of the Scotch Act, a communication was made by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, to three Scotch banks who had opened agencies in Berwick, intimating something to them which had the effect of causing them to withdraw their agents. I apprehend that that must have been a communication to the effect that their position was, at all events, doubtful. It will be worth while, therefore, to endeavour to obtain certainty on that point. What is more important, however, is to ascertain the truth of the matter with regard to many of those subjects that have been debated this afternoon, as to the privileges of the Scotch banks, the precise extent to which they can use the privilege of issue, whether the privilege is or is not something beyond the mere power of issuing a thousand pounds worth of notes against a thousand sovereigns; whether by the way in which the averages are taken they obtain even a greater advantage than they seem to obtain. Those points should be cleared up, and there are many other points in respect to the Scotch banks and the English issuing banks which it is extremely desirable to ascertain. No such inquiry as that now proposed has taken place for a great number of years, and none at all has ever been directed to those particular points. We have now a fair and proper opportunity of making such an inquiry. The exact point now is as to the proper form of reference. The particular reference which I propose has been challenged as being too extensive, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) has proposed a form of reference which I at first thought might be more strictly confined than my own. When, however, I came to examine it, I found that it opened a question which goes deeper than mine, and one which I object to have opened. The objection taken to my words is that they are too large, and that they open the question of the issue of the Bank of England. The words of my reference are that the Select Committee shall consider and report upon—

"The restrictions imposed and privileges conferred by Law on Bankers authorized to make and issue notes in England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively."

I fail to see how the issue of the Bank of England is taken out of the Order of Reference proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. He says the Committee are to consider—

"The expediency of maintaining or imposing restrictions upon issuing Bankers, so long as they shall continue to be such, in respect of their banking business.

That is as wide a term as could be used, and it is as applicable to the Bank of England as to other banks. The right hon. Gentleman opens up the very question which Sir Robert Peel had made up his mind upon—namely, whether, if you entrust the bankers with the power of issue, you are to impose restrictions upon their banking business. So that, if we adopt the right hon. Gentleman's Order of Reference, we are really going to open up the policy of the Bank Act of 1844. I doubt, however, whether there is any great occasion to quarrel about the terms of reference, although I think mine preferable. One thing I want the House clearly to understand—that we do not propose this inquiry with a view of changing the bases of the legislation of 1844, or of questioning whether we are or are not to maintain the distinction which that Act created and recognized between Currency and Credit. That ought not to be an open question, and the Government feel that they would be guilty of a breach of propriety if they threw it down as an open question before any Committee or Commission that might be appointed. They will maintain the principle, that the issue of notes is the right of the State, and ought to be granted only upon such terms as are compatible with the public safety and convenience, while, on the other hand, banking should be as free and as open as possible. Inquiry may be invited, and may usefully be made into the friction which is found to exist in some parts of the machinery of the Bank Act. The Government desire that any points of friction which are found to exist may be carefully examined. Having thus defined the object of the Committee, I may fairly expect that the inquiry will not be of that enormous length and duration which some hon. Gentlemen apprehend. I think that even the remainder of the present Session will be quite sufficient to ascertain the main points to which our legislation should be directed. In proposing this Committee the Government maintain they are not endeavouring to shift from their own shoulders the responsibility which they admit belongs to them. We only desire to bring before the public the facts and bearings of this question. A suggestion has been made in favour of passing a Suspensory Bill. The Parliamentary position of this question is this—that supposing the House should agree to the Amendment of the Government, the second reading of the Bill will not be proceeded with and the Committee will be appointed. Then, it may be asked, what will become of the Bill? I imagine it will be still in the hands of the House, and it will be competent for the right hon. Gentleman to bring it on for further consideration at a future time, if he should desire to do so, after the Committee have reported. With regard to a Suspensory Bill, it may be a question whether the right hon. Gentleman shall go on with his measure, and try and make it a Suspensory Bill, or whether he should ask leave to introduce a Bill of a different character from the present. I own I think there would be great difficulty in framing a satisfactory measure in the nature of a Suspensory Bill. I also attach great value to what has fallen from the several speakers in the debate, who have declared that a great deal of misconception would be created by such a course. At the same time, I feel that the position of the English bankers is one which naturally makes them very sensitive, and makes them feel that if nothing is done to protect them, their interests may suffer seriously while the inquiry is going on. I do not know whether we may take the statements made by several hon. Gentlemen, especially by the hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), as formal assurances, that in the event of the inquiry being set on foot, not in a dilatory spirit, but with a view to bring about an early and satisfactory solution of the question, there will be no disposition on the part of the Scotch banks to push their proceedings further, and that they will be willing to let the status quo remain as at present. I do not suppose that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City will let his Bill disappear from the Orders. Perhaps, however, it can be ascertained by communication with those who are authorized to speak on behalf of the Scotch banks, whether it is not possible to come to an agreement that would be satisfactory to all parties. Such an agreement would, it appears to me, be preferable to a Suspensory Bill. I hope that the House will be prepared to adopt the course which, in the name of the Government, has been suggested—namely, that the Bill should for the present, at all events, be laid aside, and that we should proceed to appoint a Committee upon the lines which I have indicated.

MR. LOWE: I think we are very much indebted to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the pains which he has evidently taken with this subject. If he had been a Scotch clergyman instead of merely a lecturer on Scotch banks, he could not have mapped out his subject more clearly than he has done. I am bound to say also that I think he deserves our thanks for the very distinct and explicit manner in which he has delivered his opinion on the merits of this question. He has left us in no doubt either as to his own opinion or as to that of Her Majesty's Government. They are of opinion, as I understand, with my right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen), that the issue of notes is a matter which belongs properly to the Sovereign Power of the State, and that it ought to be placed exclusively in the hands of the State. I understand the right hon. Gentleman further to be of opinion that it is desirable not to proceed by way of limitation in this matter, by limiting, that is to say, the power of the Scotch banks—but rather by way of equalizing the privileges of all bankers—which means, as I take it, depriving in some way or other all bankers in England, Scotland, and Ireland of the power of issuing notes and vesting that power solely in the Supreme Authority. ["No, no!"] That, I understand, to be the declaration which has been made on behalf of Government by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I understand, moreover, that the right hon. Gentleman adopts the statement of my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) with regard to the policy of Sir Robert Peel, and that he says Her Majesty's Government take the same view of the Bill of 1844 and the Bill of 1845 as Sir Robert Peel did. So I think nothing [can be more clear, and nothing—to a person of my opinions—more satisfactory than the views which the right hon. Gentleman has laid before us. We are indebted to him not only for the clearness with which he has expressed those views, but also for the candour with which, so far as theory goes, he has investigated the whole question. In that respect he cannot have failed to satisfy the most ardent Currency reformer. But then comes another question. As long as it is a matter of theory, nothing can exceed the boldness and fairness of the right hon. Gentleman's statement. We are met, however, by the question—What is to be done? And here I think we have some reason to say that—

“—the native hue of resolution
Is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought.”

I cannot say that I feel the same satisfaction when I come to consider the step which the right hon. Gentleman advises us to take. The Government have clear and distinct views on the subject. They have the power, moreover, to give effect to their wishes—a power which carries with it a great responsibility. They are met nowhere with any doubt or difficulty as to the principle of the question. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that the only thing that remains for the Government to do is to introduce a measure immediately to give effect to their views, and to put an end to all the inconveniences of the present system. If they had felt difficulties or doubts, or if they had been led away into the flowery paths in which the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) tempted them to stray, the case would have been very different. But as they have surmounted all difficulties, and have reached a serene height of contemplation, where all is light and brilliant, I cannot conceive why they should falter on the very threshold of action, and tell us that while they are fully prepared, as far as opinion goes, yet they are not disposed to do anything. Nothing could be more marked than the contrast between the speculative opinions and the practical proposals of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. As clear as he was in the former, he became vacillating and nebulous in the latter. It seems we are to have a Committee; but when I try to find out what the Committee is to do, I entirely fail in discovering any reason for its appointment. The right hon. Gentleman said something about ascertaining what profit was made by different banks from the issue of notes. That is a very pretty little inquiry, but what does the profit signify? Why should the assertion of a great principle, upon which the Cabinet and both sides of this House were agreed, wait till you have gone into these little peddling details? Then, we were to get at the facts of the case. What facts? This is not a question of facts. It is a question of abstract opinion which has been worked out painfully and laboriously by the ablest men in the country till they have come to be pretty nearly unanimous upon the subject. It is not proposed that the theory should be considered by the Committee, but only that certain facts should be elicited. The matter is to wait till next year in order that those facts may be found out. Why wait till next year? Why lose the opportunity which we have at present? We have got a Government with strong convictions on this subject, and with an undoubted power to give effect to these convictions. It is evident the right hon. Gentleman is firmly convinced of the importance of the proposed change, and unless something is to be done, it is not fair to interfere with the operations of these Scotch banks. The only justification for interfering is, that the Government are prepared to act now, and I cannot see what state of things can give them any better assurance in taking action. I can regard the proposed Committee as nothing more nor less than a pretext for getting rid of a troublesome subject, with which the Government would rather not deal. Committees are appointed to an extent which is almost too much for human patience. Every question which is not actually before the House is either before a Committee, or before a Commission. I really think we have reached the limit beyond which the force of Committees can no further go. But who among the already over-tasked Members of this House are to carry on the inquiry which is proposed? If you assign the duty to hon. Gentlemen who are not already familiar with currency matters, they will barely have learnt their first lesson before the Committee comes to a close. And as to persons who are qualified to serve on such a Committee, such as the English, Irish, and Scotch bankers, there is not one who has not made up his mind on the subject long ago. Moreover, it is likely that the men of experience and the men whose names would give weight to the Committee are already so fully occupied that it would be impossible for them to give their services in this matter. I have stated some objections which occur to me as to the course pursued by the Government. It is a great step gained that the House has heard the intentions of the Government; but unfortunately the world is not governed by people's good intentions, unless they are prepared to take some step towards giving effect to them. It seems that having found out what is right, the whole object of the Government now is to find out the way not to do it. I see no good that can result from an attempt to oppose them in their course; but it is fair to point out the difficulties I have suggested as to the working of the Committee, and as to the utterly unsatisfactory nature of the inquiry which is to be delegated to it. It is very well to regulate the circulation of the currency, but there is another circulation which, I think, needs to be regulated. I mean the circulation of the blood which courses through the veins of right hon. Gentlemen opposite. I should like them to have an amount of vitality which would enable them to have the courage of their opinions and act for themselves, without seeking a shelter behind Committees and Commissions from the responsibility which properly belongs to them.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE hoped that when the Committee was appointed it would not be restricted in its inquiry, but that it would be enabled to go into the question, as it affected the whole Kingdom, and not merely the action of the Scotch banks.

MR. GOSCHEN felt that, as a private Member, he had no course open to him but to leave the matter in the hands of Her Majesty's Government. He would leave the Bill however, in the hands of the House, and endeavour to confer with Her Majesty's Government as to the support they would give to a Suspensory Bill, or to some arrangement with the Scotch banks. He understood the Government to think that the present status quo should be no further maintained, but that they wanted time to consider what the future status quo should be. If he were right in that impression, he would at a later stage put himself into communication with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he should think it necessary. He might add, in reference to the appointment of the Committee and the terms of reference, that he did not wish to be considered as wedded to any particular form of proceeding or terms of reference.

LORD ESINGTON suggested that the right hon. Gentleman should move the adjournment of the debate, so as to carry out his own proposition that the Bill should not now be dealt with, but should be simply "hung up."

MR. GOSCHEN said, he did not consider it necessary to take that course.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, "to consider and report upon the restrictions imposed and privileges conferred by Law on Bankers authorised to make and issue notes in England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively."

And, on April 13, Committee nominated as follows:—MR. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, MR. GOSCHEN, MR. STEPHEN CAVE, MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY, SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, MR. HUBBARD, MR. ANDERSON, MR. MULHOLLAND, MR. LEVESON GOWER, MR. BALFOUR, MR. NORWOOD, MR. ORR EWING, MR. MUNDELLA, MR. TORR, MR. WILLIAM SHAW, MR. BECKETT DENISON, MR. BACKHOUSE, MR. KAVANAGH, MR. SAMPSON LLOYD, and MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

OPEN SPACES (METROPOLIS) BILL.

(Mr. Whalley, Sir George Bowyer.)

[BILL 50.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. WHALLEY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was to give facilities to not less than two-thirds of the owners of any open space in the metropolis to throw it open for public use, leaving the power to any dissatisfied owner to bring an appeal before the Local Government Board, with a view to inquiry and redress, so that the smallest objection of the humblest individual so interested might not be overruled, excepting by means of a Provisional Order of the Local Government Board sanctioned by Parliament. The hon. Member concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER, in seconding the Motion, hoped the second reading would be agreed to, and the details left to be considered in Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Whalley).

SIR JAMES HOGG said, that speaking on behalf of the Metropolitan Board of Works, he must express the opinion that the measure would be quite useless. With reference to the improvement of Leicester Square, the experience as to the cost incurred and likely still to be incurred in connection with it was a warning to the Board, rather than an example, in taking upon their hands any other of the metropolitan open spaces.

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

PRISONERS ON REMAND BILL.

On Motion of Mr. H. B. SHERIDAN, Bill to amend the Law relating to the treatment of Prisoners on Remand and persons awaiting bail, ordered to be brought in by Mr. H. B. SHERIDAN,
Mr. LOCKE, Mr. GOURLEY, and Mr. MACDONALD.
 Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 99.]

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.
